7/88

Others by Baster at $25

Joan Gilbert
10 Feb. 1967.
Drexel Institute

From the collection of the

Prelinger Library

San Francisco, California
2006

A GUIDE TO THE STUDY OF

The United States of America

Representative Books Reflecting the Development of American Life and Thought

Prepared under the Direction of Roy P. Basler
By Donald H. Mugridge and Blanche P. McCrum

GENERAL REFERENCE AND BIBLIOGRAPHY DIVISION • REFERENCE DEPARTMENT
LIBRARY OF CONGRESS • Washington: 1960

UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE
WASHINGTON : 1960

FOR SALE BY THE SUPERINTENDENT OF DOCUMENTS, WASHINGTON 25, D.C. PRICE $7

Contents

	Page
Introduction	IX
Acknowledgments	XIII
Key to Symbols	XV

	Item Nos.
CHAPTER I
Literature (1607–1955)
A. The Thirteen Colonies (1607–1763)	1–95
B. The Revolution and the New Nation (1764–1819)	96–185
C. Nationalism, Sectionalism, and Schism (1820–1870)	186–682
D. The Gilded Age and After (1871–1914)	683–1152
E. The First World War and the Great Depression (1915–1939)	1153–1906
F. The Second World War and the Atomic Age (1940–1955)	1907–2235
CHAPTER II
Language
A. Dictionaries	2236–2241
B. Grammars and General Studies	2242–2252
C. Dialects, Regionalisms, and Foreign Languages in America	2253–2271
D. Miscellaneous	2272–2275
CHAPTER III
Literary History and Criticism
A. Anthologies and Series	2276–2370
B. History and Criticism	2371–2550
C. Periodicals	2551–2577

	Item Nos.
CHAPTER IV
Biography and Autobiography	2578–2844
CHAPTER V
Periodicals and Journalism
A. Newspapers: General	2845–2850
B. Newspapers: Periods, Regions, and Topics	2851–2865
C. Individual Newspapers	2866–2876
D. Newspapermen	2877–2894
E. Foreign Language Periodicals	2895–2899
F. The Practice of Journalism	2900–2912
G. Magazines: General	2913–2919
H. Individual Magazines	2920–2926
I. The Press and Society	2927–2932
CHAPTER VI
Geography
A. General and Physical Geography	2933–2941
B. Geology and Soil	2942–2947
C. Climate and Weather	2948–2953
D. Plants and Animals	2954–2966
E. Historical Geography and Atlases	2967–2976
F. Polar Exploration	2977–2981
CHAPTER VII
The American Indian
A. General Works	2982–2989
B. Archaeology and Prehistory	2990–2997
C. Tribes and Tribal Groups	2998–3014
D. Religion, Art, and Folklore	3015–3021
E. The White Advance	3022–3037
F. The Twentieth Century	3038–3043

Item Nos.

CHAPTER VIII

General History

A. Historiography 3044–3069
B. General Works 3070–3152
C. The New World 3153–3175
D. The Thirteen Colonies 3176–3236
E. The American Revolution 3237–3272
F. Federal America (1783–1815) 3273–3311
G. The "Middle Period" (1815–60) 3312–3358
H. Slavery, the Civil War, and Reconstruction (to 1877) 3359–3417
I. Grant to McKinley (1869–1901) 3418–3451
J. Theodore Roosevelt to Wilson (1901–21) 3452–3474
K. Since 1920 3475–3500b

CHAPTER IX

Diplomatic History and Foreign Relations

A. Diplomatic History
  Ai. General Works 3501–3526
  Aii. Period Studies 3527–3542
  Aiii. Personal Records 3543–3549
  Aiv. The British Empire 3550–3559
  Av. Russia 3560–3568
  Avi. Other European Nations 3569–3573
  Avii. Latin America: General 3574–3579
  Aviii. Latin America: Individual Nations 3580–3587
  Aix. Asia 3588–3597
B. Foreign Relations
  Bi. Administration 3598–3608
  Bii. Democratic Control 3609–3616
  Biii. Policies 3617–3635
  Biv. Economic Policy 3636–3642

CHAPTER X

Military History and the Armed Forces

A. General Works 3643–3652
B. The Army 3653–3665

Item Nos.

C. The Navy 3666–3677
D. Wars of the United States
  Di. The Revolution 3678–3684
  Dii. 1798–1848 3685–3689
  Diii. The Civil War 3690–3706
  Div. The Spanish-American War 3707–3708
  Dv. World War I 3709–3716
  Dvi. World War II 3717–3727

CHAPTER XI

Intellectual History

A. General Works 3728–3737
B. Periods 3738–3749
C. Topics 3750–3762
D. Localities 3763–3767
E. International Influences: General 3768–3772
F. International Influences: By Country 3773–3780

CHAPTER XII

Local History: Regions, States, Cities

A. General Works, including series 3781–4025
B. New England: General 4026–4031
C. New England: Local 4032–4042
D. The Middle Atlantic States 4043–4065
E. The South: General 4066–4084
F. The South Atlantic States: Local 4085–4096
G. The Old Southwest: General 4097–4098
H. The Old Southwest: Local 4099–4108
I. The Old Northwest: General 4109–4117
J. The Old Northwest: Local 4118–4144
K. The Far West 4145–4150
L. The Great Plains: General 4151–4164
M. The Great Plains: Local 4165–4171
N. The Rocky Mountain Region: General 4172–4177
O. The Rocky Mountain Region: Local 4178–4185
P. The Far Southwest: General 4186–4191
Q. The Far Southwest: Local 4192–4199
R. California 4200–4211
S. The Pacific Northwest: General 4212–4214

	Item Nos.
T. The Pacific Northwest: Local	4215–4217
U. Overseas Possessions	4218–4222

CHAPTER XIII

Travel and Travelers

A. General Works	4223–4230
B. Anthologies	4231–4235
C. 50 Selected Travelers, 1743–1894 (chronologically arranged by the date of their travels)	4236–4389

CHAPTER XIV

Population, Immigration, and Minorities

A. Population	4390–4403
B. Immigration: General	4404–4417
C. Immigration: Policy	4418–4425
D. Minorities	4426–4435
E. Negroes	4436–4451
F. Jews	4452–4462
G. Orientals	4463–4469
H. North Americans	4470–4476
I. Germans	4477–4481
J. Scandinavians	4482–4487
K. Other Stocks	4488–4498

CHAPTER XV

Society

A. Some General Views	4499–4513
B. Social History: Periods	4514–4522
C. Social History: Topics	4523–4534
D. Social Thought	4535–4545
E. General Sociology; Social Psychology	4546–4558
F. The Family	4559–4573
G. Communities: General	4574–4578
H. Communities: Rural	4579–4585
I. Communities: Urban	4586–4599
J. City Planning; Housing	4600–4613
K. Social Problems; Social Work	4614–4627
L. Dependency; Social Security	4628–4638
M. Delinquency and Correction	4639–4660

	Item Nos.

CHAPTER XVI

Communications

A. The Post Office; Express Companies	4661–4671
B. Telegraph, Cable, Telephone	4672–4681
C. Radio, Television: Broadcasting	4682–4698
D. Radio, Television: The Audience	4699–4705
E. Government Regulation	4706–4711

CHAPTER XVII

Science and Technology

A. General Works	4712–4730
B. Particular Sciences	4731–4741
C. Individual Scientists	4742–4760
D. Science and Government	4761–4779
E. Invention	4780–4792
F. Engineering	4793–4803

CHAPTER XVIII

Medicine and Public Health

A. Medicine in General	4804–4817
B. Physicians and Surgeons	4818–4832
C. Psychiatry	4833–4840
D. Other Specialties	4841–4844
E. Hospitals and Nursing	4845–4854
F. Medical Education	4855–4861
G. Public Health	4862–4881
H. Medical Economics	4882–4891

CHAPTER XIX

Entertainment

A. General Works	4892–4896
B. The American Stage
Bi. History	4897–4906
Bii. Criticism	4907–4912
Biii. Particular Stage Groups, Theaters, Movements, etc.	4913–4926
Biv. Biography: Actors and Actresses	4927–4939
Bv. Biography: Directors, Producers, etc.	4940–4943

	Item Nos.
C. Motion Pictures
Ci. History	4944–4946
Cii. Special Aspects and Analyses	4947–4951
Ciii. Biography: Actors and Actresses	4952–4956
Civ. Biography: Directors, Producers, etc.	4957–4963
D. Other Forms of Entertainment
Di. Radio and Television	4964–4966
Dii. The Dance in America	4967–4972
Diii. Vaudeville and Burlesque	4973–4976
Div. Showboats, Circuses, etc.	4977–4982

CHAPTER XX

Sports and Recreation

A. General	4983–4996
B. Community and Scholastic Activities	4997–5000
C. Particular Sports and Recreations
Ci. Auto-Racing and Motoring	5001–5007
Cii. Baseball	5008–5015
Ciii. Boating	5016–5022
Civ. Boxing	5023–5033
Cv. Football	5034–5045
Cvi. Golf and Tennis	5046–5053
Cvii. Horse-Racing	5054–5057
Cviii. Miscellaneous	5058–5064
D. General Field Sports	5065–5097

CHAPTER XXI

Education

A. General Works
Ai. Historical and Descriptive	5098–5114
Aii. Philosophical and Theoretical	5115–5130
B. Primary and Secondary Schools
Bi. General and Historical Works	5131–5146
Bii. Preschool and Primary Grades	5147–5151
Biii. Secondary Schools	5152–5159
C. Colleges and Universities
Ci. General and Historical Works	5160–5190
Cii. Individual Institutions	5191–5204
D. Education of Special Groups	5205–5212
E. Teachers and Teaching	5213–5223
F. Methods and Techniques	5224–5231
G. Contemporary Problems and Controversies	5232–5239
H. Periodicals and Yearbooks	5240–5249

CHAPTER XXII

Philosophy and Psychology

A. Philosophy: General Works	5250–5264
B. Representative Philosophers	5265–5387
C. Psychology	5388–5393

CHAPTER XXIII

Religion

A. General Works	5394–5404
B. Period Histories	5405–5417
C. Church and State	5418–5422
D. Religious Thought; Theology	5423–5438
E. Religious Bodies	5439–5473
F. Representative Leaders	5474–5483
G. Church and Society	5484–5497
H. The Negro's Church	5498–5502

CHAPTER XXIV

Folklore, Folk Music, Folk Art

A. Legends and Tales: General	5503–5519
B. Legends and Tales: Local	5520–5548
C. Folksongs and Ballads: General	5549–5564
D. Folksongs and Ballads: Local	5565–5584
E. Games and Dances	5585–5592
F. Folk Art and Crafts	5593–5604

CHAPTER XXV

Music

A. General Histories and Reference Works	5605–5614
B. Contemporary Surveys and Special Topics	5615–5625
C. Localities	5626–5630
D. Religious Music	5631–5634
E. Popular Music	5635–5640

	Item Nos.
F. Jazz	5641–5646
G. Orchestras and Bands	5647–5654
H. Opera	5655–5663
I. Choirs	5664–5667
J. Music Education	5668–5672
K. Individual Musicians	5673–5687

CHAPTER XXVI

Art and Architecture

A. The Arts	5688–5697
B. Architecture: General	5698–5703
C. Architecture: Special	5704–5725
D. Interiors	5726–5732
E. Sculpture	5733–5740
F. Painting	5741–5759
G. Painting: Individual Artists	5760–5776
H. Prints and Photographs	5777–5783
I. Decorative Arts	5784–5793
J. Museums	5794–5800
K. Art and History	5801–5807

CHAPTER XXVII

Land and Agriculture

A. Land	5808–5818
B. Agriculture: History	5819–5838
C. Agriculture: Practice	5839–5850
D. Agriculture: Government Policies	5851–5861
E. Forests, National Parks	5862–5866
F. Animal Husbandry	5867–5874

CHAPTER XXVIII

Economic Life

A. General Works: Histories	5875–5883
B. Other General Works	5884–5900
C. Industry: General	5901–5906
D. Industry: Special	5907–5919
E. Transportation: General	5920–5925
F. Transportation: Special	5926–5943
G. Commerce: General	5944–5950
H. Commerce: Special	5951–5964
I. Finance: General	5965–5975
J. Finance: Special	5976–6002
K. Business: General	6003–6010
L. Business: Special	6011–6030
M. Labor: General	6031–6042
N. Labor: Special	6043–6058

CHAPTER XXIX

Constitution and Government

A. Political Thought	6059–6072
B. Constitutional History	6073–6089
C. Constitutional Law	6090–6105
D. Civil Liberties and Rights	6106–6130
E. Government: General	6131–6139
F. The Presidency	6140–6149
G. Congress	6150–6169
H. Administration: General	6170–6180
I. Administration: Special	6181–6194
J. State Government	6195–6206
K. Local Government	6207–6218

CHAPTER XXX

Law and Justice

A. History: General	6219–6236
B. History: The Supreme Court	6237–6260
C. General Views	6261–6270
D. Digests of American Law	6271–6279
E. Courts and Judges	6280–6293
F. The Judicial Process	6294–6309
G. Administrative Law	6310–6316
H. Lawyers and the Legal Profession	6317–6332

CHAPTER XXXI

Politics, Parties, Elections

A. Politics: General	6333–6340
B. Politics: Special	6341–6346
C. Political Parties	6347–6373
D. Local Studies	6374–6383
E. Machines and Bosses	6384–6391
F. Pressures	6392–6399

	Item Nos.
G. Elections: Machinery	6400–6411
H. Elections: Results	6412–6423
I. Reform	6424–6434

CHAPTER XXXII

Books and Libraries

	Item Nos.
A. Printing and Publishing: General	6435–6448
B. Individual Publishers	6449–6453
C. Book Production: Technology and Art	6454–6459
D. Book Selling and Collecting	6460–6465
E. Libraries	6466–6475
F. Librarianship and Library Use	6476–6487

	Page
Appendix: Selected Readings in American Studies	1081
Index	1091

Introduction

FOR ALMOST a century and a half, since the purchase of Thomas Jefferson's library in 1815, materials that reflect the development of the United States have been accumulating at an accelerating rate in the Library of Congress. By copyright deposit, by acquisition of special collections, and with the help of generous benefactors, the Library has become the home of the largest collection of Americana in the world. Even if it has not realized the dream of a former Librarian of Congress by assembling within its own walls "the complete product of the American mind in every department of science and literature," it nevertheless has reached such proportions that it justly may be called a mirror of the national culture. Generations of scholars, research workers, students, and readers have employed it, not only to see new facts and relationships that have extended their knowledge, but also to gain a clearer vision of the tradition, meaning, and character of civilization in these United States. To further such aims the Library has consistently bent its efforts through the years.

It was not, however, until the beginning of the decade just past that a marked increase was observed in the number and complexity of questions addressed to the Library about practically all phases of life in the United States. Numerically, of course, the largest number of requests for information came from individuals and institutions in this country; but the most comprehensive questions frequently were posed by national and public institutions located in the four corners of the world. The reply to one of the second class of inquiries involved assembling a bibliography composed of 1,800 Library of Congress printed catalog cards. A comparable request led to the publication in 1950 of American History and Civilization: A List of Guides and Annotated or Selective Bibliographies. The continuing interest in this bibliographical approach to American affairs, past and present, was made evident by demands that exhausted the first edition and required the publication, in 1951, of a second and revised edition.

Many of the movements and events that inspired this growing interest are actively at work in the contemporary world. They include: the place assumed by the United States in the society of nations after World War II; the scientific achievements that have made communication relatively easy and breached international barriers resulting from distance; the increasing cultural maturity of the United States, made evident by growing self-examination and self-expression; the idea current among American educators that general education from childhood to maturity, in all phases of the American heritage, will help to increase national unity by basing it on a solid foundation of shared knowledge and understanding; the emergence in higher education, on both undergraduate and graduate levels, of programs in American studies developed through the interrelation of different disciplines; the establishment in countries as far apart as Germany and Japan of centers for American studies; the plan for exchange professorships put into effect through the Department of State in the interest of international education and mutual understanding between countries; and the work of the American Studies Association, the national society for the interdisciplinary study of American civilization.

With these and other influences operating in what is virtually a new international age, it has become more and more apparent that the Library of the Congress of the United States must anticipate even greater demands upon its reference and bibliographical services to mobilize American materials for increasing usefulness and use. This was the situation in the autumn of 1952, when the Library explored the feasibility of gathering together in one publication a series of bibliographical studies of civilization in the United States to which inquirers might refer. Clearly, if such a project could be carried through successfully it would enable the Library to accomplish two objectives at the same time: that of contributing to a wider diffusion of knowledge about this country throughout the world; and that of preventing wasteful duplication of work resulting from repeated attempts to give individual attention to questions that might be more satisfactorily answered within the compass of one carefully prepared reference book. The Guide contained in the following pages is the result.

The 6 years that then elapsed after the study was launched may be divided roughly into three periods: 1953–1954, the beginning stage, when members of the staff, while carrying on their regular assignments, studied the problems, planned the scope, put the work in train, and selected basic collections of books for various chapters; 1955–1956, when first two and later three persons devoted substantial but varying portions of their time to further selection of materials, as well as to their description and organization; and 1957–1958, when four or five bibliographers were working, as time could be spared from their other duties. During all these years the group at work suffered the usual dislocations from resignations, leaves of absence, new appointments, and transfers to other assignments. Thus it may be said that a skeleton staff produced the 32 chapters that compose the volume, which includes about 6,500 main entries and half again as many more references found in annotations and headnotes.

The work began and has continued under my general direction, and has been supervised by Henry J. Dubester, Chief of the General Reference and Bibliography Division. Under our instructions, Donald H. Mugridge planned the general scope of the study, personally selected the references included in 24 chapters, and gave editorial revision to work done on them by other bibliographers. The annotations in Chapters VI, VII, X, XI, XIII, and XV, and in portions of several other chapters, also are his work. Blanche P. McCrum and Allan G. Anderson are responsible for the eight additional chapters, the most substantial of which is Chapter I, Literature. Other contributors and associates, and specialists in and outside the Library, who have generously helped us with their advice, are named in the section of Acknowledgments which follows this introduction. The paragraphs that follow immediately are designed to clarify a few points for the convenience of readers.

Selection of Material. References have been selected to meet the requirements of serious readers, students seeking orientation, and librarians engaged in developing collections of books about the United States. It is hoped, however, that the advanced specialist also may find the volume a useful desk reference book, particularly for subjects outside the range of his expert knowledge; and that, although no section on bibliographies as such is included, both he and the less advanced student will be served by the valuable bibliographies regularly noted when these appear in books for which main entries are provided.

The broad plan of selection has been to bring together between the covers of one volume materials relating to subjects as divergent as Art and Public Health, and thus to spread before readers a panorama of life in the United States, past and present. The basis of selection throughout has been the value of each book as an expression of life in the United States, not necessarily because it has the reputation of being a classic, or because it is a learned monograph primarily of interest to the specialist. No book has been chosen for inclusion, however, unless it has seemed significant in the light of our purpose. By the very definition of that purpose many of the selections necessarily embody the thought and learning of the best minds found in this country from its beginning until today. Timeliness, too, has been considered as of the essence; therefore, except in the chapter on Literature, contemporary and revised editions, more readily available through publishers' lists and in libraries, have been preferred to the first publication of a text unless that has remained the best.

To arrive at any but a hypothetical date of publication, it was decided to set 1955 as the terminal date for selecting material and to prepare each section for the printer as it was completed. Parts of the work concluded in or shortly after 1955 conform to these rules. As the work progressed and was expanded, however, publication was necessarily delayed, and it was possible to include in various other chapters books published as late as 1958. The timeliness of sections is therefore somewhat uneven, something particularly to be regretted in the chapters devoted to Literature, Intellectual History, Society, Education, Sports and Recreation, and Entertainment, all of which might have been enriched by a number of significant recent references if work on them could have been reopened.

A policy of extremely rigorous selection has been maintained. The Guide is an introduction to representative books that reflect the development of life and thought in the United States. In no sense is it a source of information about every conceivable facet of that life; nor has it any completeness as a catalog or compilation of Americana. Probably other bibliographers would not have made identical choices; and specialists in the various subjects will doubtless regret omissions quite as keenly as do the bibliographers responsible for them. The fact remains that time and cost are hard masters that must be obeyed. It is equally true that a study of this kind can be elaborated to the point where it ceases to be selective and its complexity defeats its own purpose. We have endeavored to keep within limits properly imposed by all these considerations.

Main Entries and Bibliographical Style. The aim in preparing the entries has been to give references that may be readily identified in the Library of Congress catalogs and consequently in those of hundreds of other institutions where the same cards are used or where the Library's published catalogs are available. Call numbers have been included as additional safeguards for exact identification. A small minority of entries record titles or editions that are not in the collections of the Library of Congress. In each case some other major library which does have the book is referred to by means of the appropriate symbol used in the National Union Catalog (see Key to Symbols).

Concerning the prevailing bibliographical style followed, it may be said in general that we have attempted to give an author's name in the form preferred by him, if that can be determined. When, however, he habitually uses the initial of his first name, we have spelled it out if possible for purposes of identification and have supplied a middle initial when known, even if that is regularly missing from his name on the title pages of his books. In the chapter concerned with Literature, on the contrary, the fullest known form of the names of principal authors has usually been preferred as a matter of literary history. Long titles, particularly of books published in the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries, occasionally have been shortened by the omissions of repetitious endings and wordy subtitles. To conserve space, names of publishers have been shortened to the briefest form that can be readily identified. In these and other questions of bibliographical form we have striven for consistency throughout; but some differences inevitably appear in a work from various hands, and in which individuality is reflected from time to time in differences of concept and of style. When no confusion results from these human tendencies to be different, we have frequently preferred to spend time on matters of substance rather than on revisions to secure meticulous conformity of style.

Main entries in chapters are grouped according to classification schemes outlined in the introduction that precedes each chapter and explains its individual purpose and method. Subordinate arrangement of entries within the various schemes tends to be alphabetical by author's name, as in Literature, for which a period division is supplied by the plan of the classification itself. When arrangement of entries by date, place, or subject more effectively brings together related references, in part or all of a chapter, these variations have been made without hesitation.

Annotations and Headnotes. Annotations have been written primarily to aid the reader in judging what the book contributes to an understanding of the United States and in determining, more specifically, what bearing it has on the aspect of that subject in which he is particularly interested. These notes or annotations are not written as reviews, or literary essays, or dissertations on an author's thesis; quite simply they are meant to be aids which readers may use to eliminate materials irrelevant to their purpose and guideposts to lead them as quickly as possible to the heart of what concerns them. The length of an annotation must not be taken as evidence of the importance of the book annotated. The nature of a famous book may be nearly self-evident from the name of the author and the title, while a less conspicuous book may require more detailed description to place it properly in relation to the subject or subjects with which it deals. Upon occasions two or more books have been annotated together, with the annotation normally following the last entry in the group. For reasons of brevity and readability ellipses normally have not been used to mark the omission of initial or terminal connectives in quotations that appear in the annotations and headnotes, but of course no words and, we trust, no thoughts have been changed. Both annotations and headnotes have been freely used to provide additional documentation by means of brief references to books not described in main entries. Such additional citations are identified sometimes only by date of publication, if that suffices; but in general both imprint and number of pages are given.

The usual practice of annotating individual titles has been varied in some sections by the substitution of one headnote under the author's name, without additional annotations for his individual works unless the range of these was too great to be covered in a headnote. Interest has thus been focused on the total contribution of the writer, and reiteration of statements applicable to all or nearly all his books has been eliminated. Chapters that illustrate this method of approach are those on Literature and Biography and Autobiography, while the largest sections of the chapters on Travel and Travelers and Philosophy and Psychology have been treated in the same way. A similar device has been employed in some cases when the use of a headnote following the title of a long series of books has made it unnecessary to annotate the separate publications that make up the series, as in the cases of "Original Narratives of Early American History" and the readings selected by the Department of American Studies of Amherst College, "Problems in American Civilization."

Appendix: Selected Readings in American Studies. At a meeting of the Council at the American Studies Association held at the Library of Congress in June 1954, announcement was made that work on our bibliography was in progress and suggestions concerning it were solicited. A number of the members present favored the inclusion of a separate section containing those titles which have a synthetic approach, bridge the various academic and scholarly disciplines, and are therefore of special significance to teachers or students pursuing courses in American studies. As a result, a tentative list of 100 such titles was submitted to various members of the Association, who examined it and made suggestions for additions and deletions. The Appendix contains a revision of this original list, enlarged somewhat by the inclusion of new titles located as our study progressed. Entries are in brief form, with reference numbers added to guide the user to the full description of each book in the main body of the bibliography. It remains a sample listing of references, which, if fully expanded, would constitute a new bibliographical enterprise outside our scope.

Acknowledgments

MEMBERS or former members of the General Reference and Bibliography Division who have contributed one or more chapters of this book are Allan G. Anderson, Ann Duncan Brown, Helen F. Conover, Peter Draz, and Jane Kline. The following, who were attached to the Division for periods of varying length, lent valuable assistance to the work of the editors or the contributors: Nelson R. Burr, Edith H. Leeds, James S. Sweet, Burdette S. Wright, Jr., and Marko Zlatich.

Colleagues in various divisions of the Library of Congress have assisted us in a number of ways and greatly to the benefit of our study. The staff of the Music Division assumed responsibility for extending and annotating Chapter XXIV, Folklore, Folk Music, Folk Art and Chapter XXV, Music. Donald L. Leavitt took charge of the work on the first of these chapters and a similar labor of love for the chapter on Music was shared by Richard S. Hill, William J. Lichtenwanger, and Donald W. Krummel, in association with Frank C. Campbell, Darius Thieme, and Carroll Wade.

Reviews of chapters, criticisms, and suggestions for additions and deletions were sought and obtained from other members of the Library staff who have special knowledge of the subjects dealt with, as follows: David Baumgardt, former Consultant in Philosophy, now of Columbia University, Chapter XXII, Philosophy and Psychology; Edgar Breitenbach, Chief, Prints and Photographs Division, Chapter XXVI, Art and Architecture; Arch C. Gerlach, Chief, Map Division, Chapter VI, Geography; William H. Gilbert, Jr., Analyst, Indian Affairs, Legislative Reference Service (LRS), Chapter VII, The American Indian; Halford L. Hoskins, Senior Specialist, International Relations, LRS, Chapter IX, Diplomatic History and Foreign Relations; Helen A. Miller, Analyst, Education, LRS, Chapter XXI, Education; John K. Rose, Senior Specialist, Conservation, LRS, Chapter XXVII, Land and Agriculture; Willard Webb, Chief, Stack and Reader Division, Chapter X, Military History and the Armed Forces; Walter H. Zeydel, Assistant Chief, American-British Law Division, Law Library, Chapter XXX, Law and Justice; and Raymund L. Zwemer, former Chief, Science and Technology Division, Chapter XVI, Communications, and Chapter XVII, Science and Technology.

From outside the Library's own walls we also received generous help from specialists in several subjects. Irene B. Taeuber, Research Associate, Office of Population Research, Princeton University, twice reviewed the section on Population, made suggestions, and permitted us to use her own bibliography; Dorothy M. Schullian, History of Medicine Division, National Library of Medicine, studied the chapter on Medicine and Public Health in detail and made comments and suggestions. Joy E. Morgan, in 1955 Director of the Publications Division, National Education Association, and Ruth C. Little, then Assistant Director, examined the chapter on Education, commented upon it, and suggested certain additions. Our debt to these specialists and those with whom we are associated in the Library is a very real one, which we acknowledge with pleasure and pride. It would ill requite them for their help, however, to lay any of our own bibliographical faults and failings at their doors. The working staff, not the specialists, are responsible for judgments implied or expressed and for the final form and content of the volume.

Finally, acknowledgment must be made of the contribution of two participants in the work who, although their names are not attached to any chapter, have nevertheless left their impress on most of the pages in the book. They are: Grace Hadley Fuller, Head of the Bibliography and Reference Correspondence Section of the General Reference and Bibliography Division, and Helen Dudenbostel Jones, Assistant Head, who reviewed and edited the whole manuscript with respect to its technical bibliographical details and supervised the preparation of the voluminous index which is a distinct feature of the work.

ROY P. BASLER,
Director,
Reference Department.

Key to Symbols

CLU–C	University of California at Los Angeles, William Andrews Clark Memorial Library.
CSmH	Henry E. Huntington Library, San Marino, Calif.
CtMW	See CtW.
CtW	Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn.
CtY	Yale University, New Haven, Conn.
DA	U.S. Department of Agriculture Library, Washington, D.C.
DCU	Catholic University of America Library, Washington, D.C.
ICU	University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.
IU	University of Illinois, Urbana.
IaU	State University of Iowa, Iowa City.
MB	Boston Public Library, Boston, Mass.
MBAt	Boston Athenaeum, Boston.
MH	Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.
MWiW–C	Williams College, Chapin Library, Williamstown, Mass.
MdBJ	Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md.
MeB	Bowdoin College, Brunswick, Maine.
MeWC	Colby College, Waterville, Maine.
MiU	University of Michigan, Ann Arbor.
MiU–C	—William L. Clements Library.
MnU	University of Minnesota, Minneapolis.
NN	New York Public Library.
NNC	Columbia University, New York.
NNU	New York University Libraries, New York.
NRU	University of Rochester, Rochester, N.Y.
NcD	Duke University, Durham, N.C.
NjP	Princeton University, Princeton, N.J.
OCU	University of Cincinnati, Cincinnati, Ohio.
OCl	Cleveland Public Library, Cleveland, Ohio.
OO	Oberlin College, Oberlin, Ohio.
OOxM	Miami University, Oxford, Ohio.
PHi	Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.
PPD	Drexel Institute of Technology, Philadelphia.
PPLas	La Salle College, Philadelphia.
PPT	Temple University, Philadelphia.
PPTU	See PPT.
PSt	Pennsylvania State University, University Park.
PU	University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.
RPB	Brown University, Providence, R.I.
RPJCB	John Carter Brown Library, Providence.
ViHaI	Hampton Institute, Hampton, Va.
ViU	University of Virginia, Charlottesville.

I

Literature (1607–1955)

A. The Thirteen Colonies (1607–1763) 1– 95
B. The Revolution and the New Nation (1764–1819) 96– 185
C. Nationalism, Sectionalism, and Schism (1820–1870) 186– 682
D. The Gilded Age and After (1871–1914) 683–1152
E. The First World War and the Great Depression (1915–1939) 1153–1906
F. The Second World War and the Atomic Age (1940–1955) 1907–2235

LIFE in America, from small beginnings in 1607 to vastness in 1955, is the medium in which our writers have worked creatively. In the pages of the books that have resulted we relive the physical, intellectual, emotional, and spiritual experiences of the men and women who have shaped and been shaped by this nation. Through the processes of imagination and esthetic expression characters having "forms more real than living man" speak to us in the contemporary accents of each period. Personal narratives, journals, letters, and especially poems, plays, novels, short stories, and essays reveal the mind and spirit of America as it has developed during 350 years. Writ large in this body of material, originally designed possibly for edification, information, persuasion, excitement, amusement, or even only for the sake of self-expression, are found firsthand impressions of our culture nowhere else preserved. The books so written supplement, even illumine, those substantial works of research and scholarship that have their place in other chapters of this bibliography. In these other chapters, notably those devoted to General History, Biography and Autobiography, and Philosophy, also will be found many references to books excellent for their literary quality, but too valuable on the score of content to be placed outside their subject category. Not "mere literature," however, but literature that preserves a record of American life is the specific concern of this chapter. A few paragraphs about the selection, description, and arrangement of the materials with which the chapter deals may serve to facilitate its use by the audience to which it is addressed.

Selection of Authors. Pre-eminence in the selection of authors inevitably has been given to acknowledged literary artists, because in general they not only write more powerfully but also about more important phases of American experience. Not every one of these, however, has found a place within the limits of what is, after all, an introduction and a guide, not a catalog. Obviously, to include every example of a genre or a movement would confuse a landscape more clearly viewed if uncluttered by too many figures. On the other hand, popular and less distinguished writers have not been automatically excluded. While no author has been selected unless some genuine literary interest attaches to him, the relation may not always be as immediately apparent as in the case of writers that have deservedly received much greater critical acclaim. In some cases these minor writers have been selected because they have perceptibly influenced taste, or illustrated manners and customs, or kept a region or a class from literary oblivion. Their importance derives from their historical and social significance—possibly also because they are good examples of "Americana"—and not from the unusual literary excellence of their accomplishment. Whether the selection that has been practiced has brought in major or minor figures, the touchstone of choice has been the relevance of the writer's work to the understanding of American civilization.

Description of Authors. In this chapter descriptive annotations generally are attached only to names of authors, rather than to titles of individual books, as in most other chapters. Such a variation in practice has been determined by a variety of considerations. Chief among these is the purpose to focus attention at once upon the total emphasis of the author's contribution, even if the scope of the chapter permits the inclusion of only a token representation of his complete work. It has seemed desirable also to facilitate the use of the guide by epitomizing the author's significance in a headnote, rather than by leaving that significance to be derived from the examination of numerous annotations of titles. Other reasons for using this device are: avoidance of boring repetitions resulting from annotations of numerous books by one author, all having similar characteristics; and economy of detail that makes it somewhat easier to see the literary forest in spite of its numerous bibliographical trees. In individual instances, however, when the headnote defies attempts to make it sufficiently explicit without becoming unduly wordy, supplementary annotations are incorporated with entries for titles of books.

677676 O–63–2

To avoid repetition of information already fully supplied in standard histories and other studies of American literature, biographical and critical comments and citations usually have been omitted unless required for clarification or documentation. Guidance with respect to these aspects of a writer's work is provided in Chapter III, Literary History and Criticism, where entries will be found for such inclusive works as Literary History of the United States (no. 2460) and The Literature of the American People (no. 2496). References are given in the same chapter for numerous monographic studies of special aspects of American literature, and for anthologies that cover a wide range of topics dealing with writers and the books they have written.

Obviously, significant biographical and critical studies of authors have been published after the closing dates for inclusion of new material in the standard histories of literature. The bibliographical treatment given to a selection of these, in this study, is described in number 5 of the following paragraph. The reader is reminded, however, that for directions to the older, and in some cases the more important studies, he must turn to books of history and criticism such as those mentioned in the foregoing paragraph.

Arrangement under Author's Name. Sections A through D, representing American literature from the beginning to 1914, have identical arrangements. Following the headnote under the name of the author, full bibliographical entries are inserted for titles of books selected to represent his work. Ordinarily these entries are arranged chronologically by date of publication, and in the following sequence:

1. First or earliest identifiable edition of each title, chronologically arranged by date of publication.

2. (a) New editions and (b) reprints, entered under each title in the order indicated.

3. Collected works, followed first by new editions, and second by reprints.

4. Selected works, new editions, and reprints, in the sequence designated in (2) and (3).

5. Selected biographical and critical studies of the author, not already mentioned in the headnote, and not represented in standard texts because they appeared after the publication of such texts. In general these entries are for books issued between 1949 and the end of 1955, with rare entries for works having 1956 imprints. They are arranged alphabetically by the name of the author of the biography or criticism.

Sections E and F, concerned with modern and contemporary literature, have required two types of arrangement on account of the extremely large amount of material involved: (a) the plan used in sections A–D, when the author's work is represented by relatively few titles; and (b) a new scheme when representation involves a large number of titles. In the latter case, separate entries for individual titles are not supplied, if these titles are adequately covered in collections or selections for which entries are being given. Under this scheme, entries for collected, selected, and individual works are interfiled by date of publication. However, attention may be called to individual titles by mention either in the headnote or in annotations of the more comprehensive volumes.

In these two sections it has seemed unnecessary to cite reprints, either because the original edition is still available and is to be preferred, or because reprints may be anticipated after the publication of this bibliography. To keep abreast of such future reprints, reliance must be placed on standard guides to new books that appear periodically.

In the interest of clarity it may be well to amplify the foregoing statements. For instance, if a first edition perished in its entirety and is not at the present time susceptible of accurate bibliographical description, the next earliest edition usually has been selected for description. Another variation occasionally has resulted when the author himself has indicated that a later edition has replaced the first, or when a collected edition preserves the text of several first editions that have been scattered and lost.

It may also be in order to repeat the emphasis given earlier in connection with the selection of authors to be represented by saying that the same degree of selectivity has been applied to the choice of titles, editions, and reprints. The aim has been to show the author's value by citing those of his books that are most significant to the reader interested in American civilization. No effort has been made to give a complete panorama of the writer's achievements. Such a limitation of choice, necessitated by the purpose of this study, has forced the compilers to make many painful deletions, with which specialists understandably may disagree. Again, the reader is referred to Literary History of the United States, volume 3, "Bibliography" (no. 2460). Repetition of work already well and fully done would have been supererogation, even if it had been possible.

A final word of explanation must be given concerning the meaning of the words "edition" and "reprint" as used in this chapter. "Edition" implies one of the successive forms in which a text has been issued, either by the author or by an editor. "Reprint" has been taken to mean reproduction of material previously printed, but not necessarily by the use of the same type or plates. It is applied also to republications, perhaps in inexpensive format, and frequently with notes and comments designed to assist the reader.

Organization of the Chapter. The work of some 340 authors, and its representation in 2,235 numbered items, make up the substance of this chapter. It has, therefore, been necessary to impose some sort of formal order on such a mass of material, not only for the convenience of readers but also to relate it as logically as possible to other chapters of the bibliography.

The method of organization finally selected has resulted in arrangement according to six periods of time between 1607, when the first permanent colonists came to Jamestown, and 1955, the closing date assigned to the gathering of material. Authors are placed within each period alphabetically by their names, for ease of identification. There are certain objections to this division by periods; these are freely admitted. One difficulty is that authors are exceedingly unaccommodating about living and dying within the exact limits of designated periods. Moreover, arrangement by period, rather than by form, or style, or trend, brings together very strange literary bedfellows indeed. In spite of these difficulties, division of American literature into periods comparable to the large divisions of general American history has advantages for our purpose that outweigh objections. Such division has the merit of indicating the way in which literature marches with the political, social, religious, economic, and other developments of American civilization from the beginning of permanent colonization to the middle of the 20th century. The idea of this relation is basic to a correct understanding of literature itself; hence an arrangement that emphasizes the connection has been favored above others considered. For the same reason the six selected periods, named at the beginning of the chapter, have been characterized in historical rather than literary terms, to show the link between this chapter and other chapters of the bibliography.

A. The Thirteen Colonies (1607–1763)

The mixed company of adventurers, saints, sinners, and plain people who conquered the wilderness and made possible the settlement of 13 colonies in America were not given to thinking about writing as art for art's sake. Only two writers in the whole period, Anne Bradstreet and Edward Taylor, may be said to have carried on the tradition of belles-lettres in any accepted meaning of the term. Colonial Americans, however, believed profoundly in using the written word to put themselves and their affairs on record. It is, therefore, to annals, diaries, histories, sermons, theological treatises, and personal narratives that we must look for the most significant literary beginnings in America.

Nineteen authors selected to represent the period in this bibliography reflect a wide range of interests and illustrate a variety of literary styles in their writings. John Smith, flamboyant chronicler of the settlement at Jamestown, shines through his own history as an embodiment of many qualities of courage and hardihood that animated English explorers in the 16th and 17th centuries. At the opposite extreme, the plain, even prosaic William Bradford undertook to justify the ways of God to man on the bleak New England coast, while faithfully setting down priceless details of the cold, hunger, hardships, troubles with the Indians, and loneliness that daily beset his Pilgrims. Cotton Mather, much later on the literary scene, gave evidence of the far-reaching interests of a Harvard graduate and early New England Brahmin by treating of the church, science, history, biography, and witchcraft in his voluminous writings. Jonathan Edwards, Yale-trained and a younger contemporary of Mather, is credited with one of the finest intellects that has left a mark on American civilization.

Without his great theological-philosophical treatises, ideas of sin, salvation, destiny, and freedom of the will would not have sifted down, as they have done, with powerful effect on literary artists working in later periods.

Not all writers considered in the bibliography were, however, intellectuals, nor were all concerned with large questions related to this world and the next. At least two of the diaries described in the bibliography are replete with down-to-earth details of domestic manners and customs. A collection of Puritan love-letters is cited, and the narrative of a terrifying captivity among the Indians is used to illustrate a theme that has been developed in a variety of ways by an indefinite number of later writers. A fortunate life of wealth and security, lived on a fine Virginia plantation by a man of large affairs, is also given a place in the record to indicate the enrichment of culture that had taken place towards the end of the colonial period.

Apart from the choicest books and parts of books written in this country before the Revolution, much of the literary heritage of the period is today of interest chiefly to the specialist. The Puritan cast of thought in the more substantial part of it, its prevailing sobriety, emphasis placed on beliefs and opinions long ago abandoned, and in some cases the use of crabbed, outmoded styles of writing, all impose barriers between certain colonial writers and 20th-century readers. Nevertheless, the student of American civilization must turn back again and again to these authentic sources, from which have come ideas and influences formative in the country's destiny, and to which literature in the United States owes a continuing debt.

1. WILLIAM BRADFORD, 1590–1657

Governor of the colony at Plymouth for 30 years between 1621 and 1656, Bradford became the annalist of the beginning of New England. In his history he portrayed the piety of the Pilgrim Fathers who settled there, gave their English and European backgrounds in the Separatist movement, and told of their earlier wanderings for conscience's sake. The relations they established with the Indians and the courage they found for enduring hardships while making a home in the wilderness are also recorded with convincing contemporary detail. The vigor of the author's style when at its best and the quality of his thought have made the history highly influential in subsequent literary treatment of New England themes.

2. History of Plymouth Plantation. Now first printed from the original manuscript. Boston, Massachusetts Historical Society, 1856. xix, 476 p. (Massachusetts Historical Society. Collections, 4th ser., v. 3) in 9–889 F61.M41, 4th ser., v. 3

Edited by Charles Deane.

3. ——— Now reproduced in facsimile from the original manuscript, with an introd. by John A. Doyle. London, Ward & Downey; Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1896. 17 p., facsim. (535 p.)

1–16539 F68.B78 RBD No. 168.

4. ——— Edited by William T. Davis. New York, Scribner, 1908. xv, 437 p. (Original narratives of early American history)

8–7375 F68.B802 E187.O7B7

Recently published by Barnes & Noble, New York.

5. ——— Edited by Worthington C. Ford. Boston, Published for the Massachusetts Historical Society by Houghton Mifflin, 1912. 2 v. illus.

12–29493 F68.B805

6. ——— The complete text, with notes and introd. by Samuel Eliot Morison. New ed. New York, Knopf, 1952. xliii, 448 p.

51–13222 F68.B8073

Modern text, under title, Of Plymouth Plantation, rearranged for easier reading, with documentation relegated to appendices.

7. ANNE (DUDLEY) BRADSTREET, 1612?–1672

Mrs. Bradstreet, daughter of one governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony and wife of another, had enjoyed a life of privilege and some leisure in England before she was subjected to pioneer conditions in the New World. The scope of her reading, her familiarity with the works of Edmund Spenser and Sir Philip Sidney, and particularly with translations of the poems of Guillaume du Bartas, influenced her style, which is characterized also by the typical metaphors and conceits of English poetry during her period. "Contemplations," her most famous piece, prose meditations, and various poems added to the edition of 1678 make use of themes drawn from admiration of the New England landscape, love of husband and children, and experiences of family life. These mitigate the sameness of her prevailing tone of Puritan piety. Mrs. Bradstreet is frequently called the first authentic poet writing in America.

8. The tenth muse lately sprung up in America . . . With divers other pleasant and serious poems . . . London, S. Bowtell, 1650. 207 p.

6–31257 PS711.A1 1650 RBD
A second edition, revised by the author, was posthumously published under the title, Several Poems . . . By a Gentlewoman of New England (1678).

9. Works in prose and verse. Edited by John Harvard Ellis. Charlestown, Mass., A. E. Cutter, 1867. lxxvi, 434 p. illus.
12–30892 PS711.A1 1867
The Poems are reprinted from the second edition. Cf. p. [78].

10. ——— New York, P. Smith, 1932. lxxvi, 432 p. illus. 32–26751 PS711.A1 1932
A reprint of the edition of 1867.

11. Poems . . . together with . . . prose remains. With an introd. by Charles Eliot Norton. [New York] The Duodecimos, 1897. xliv, 347 p. illus. 32–6990 PS711.A1 1897
Editor's note signed: Frank E. Hopkins.

12. WILLIAM BYRD, 1674–1744

The holder of various public offices of trust, Byrd traveled extensively over the outlying sections of Virginia, observing physical aspects for the benefit of his fellow members of the Royal Society in London, and looking at social conditions on an expanding frontier from the point of view of a man of large affairs. The commentaries and diaries which preserve his reflections on conditions in the colony when its age had passed the century-mark were written in a style typical of a gentleman educated in the English 18th-century manner. For that reason, as well as for their contents, they have been useful literary sources for later writers on the place and the period.

13. The Westover manuscripts . . . written from 1728 to 1736, and now first published. Edited by Edmund Ruffin. Petersburg, Va., E. & C. J. Ruffin, 1841. 143 p. Rc–2772 F229.B963
Includes The History of the Dividing Line Betwixt Virginia and North Carolina; A Journey to the Land of Eden, A. D. 1733; and A Progress to the Mines. Reprinted as A Journey to the Land of Eden and Other Papers, edited by Mark Van Doren (New York, Macy-Masius, 1928. 367 p. An American bookshelf, no. 4).

14. Writings. Edited by John Spencer Bassett. New York, Doubleday, Page, 1901. lxxxviii, 461 p. illus. 2–1125 F229.B96
One of an edition of 500 copies.
Includes also miscellaneous papers, e. g., letters and a catalog of some 4,000 volumes in Byrd's library at Westover.

15. The secret diary of William Byrd of Westover, 1709–1712. Edited by Louis B. Wright and Marion Tinling. Richmond, Dietz Press, 1941. xxviii, 622 p. 41–21807 F229.B9715
A transcription from the original shorthand of the first part of Byrd's diary now in the Henry E. Huntington Library.

16. Another Secret diary of William Byrd of Westover, 1739–1741, with letters & literary exercises, 1696–1726. Edited by Maude H. Woodfin, translated and collated by Marion Tinling. Richmond, Dietz Press, 1942. xlv, 490 p.
43–1881 F229.B9717
Reproduced at the Henry E. Huntington Library from shorthand and holograph manuscripts owned by the University of North Carolina.
Bibliographical footnotes.
Both secret diaries supply details of daily life on a large plantation as lived by the ruling class in colonial Virginia. Louis B. Wright's The First Gentlemen of Virginia (San Marino, Calif., The Huntington Library, 1940. 373 p.) throws light upon the intellectual qualities and activities of Byrd and his predecessors.

17. JOHN COTTON, 1584–1652

John Cotton, once dean of Emmanuel College, Cambridge University, and a notable pulpit orator, incurred the wrath of Archbishop Laud on the score of his Puritanism. Fearing for his life and liberty, he chose to join his friends and fellow Puritans in Massachusetts Bay Colony, where he arrived in his 49th year. There his talents and his earnestness soon made him the leading clergyman of the infant colony. According to Puritan practice, this spiritual office carried with it civil influence as well, so much so that it has been said opinions uttered by Cotton in the pulpit soon were embodied in the laws of Massachusetts. In the remote outpost of civilization in which he found himself, the former university official continued his industry as a scholar and a voluminous writer. His catechism Milk for Babes (1646) became a standard text for the moral education of New England children. Among his other works are found books about prayer, collections of sermons, pamphlets on controversial subjects, and treatises on theological subjects, particularly in relation to the conduct of the Congregational Church in New England. They were written to warn, reprove, edify, and instruct his fellow Puritans, and to combat errors he found in ideas different from his own. Their value today to the student of American civilization is found chiefly in the light they throw on Puritanism and Calvinism as influences in the making of New England culture from which, some 200 years after Cotton's day, American literature flowered in the American Renaissance. No collected edition of Cotton's works has appeared.

18. God's promise to His plantation. London, J. Bellamy, 1630. 20 p.
49–56418 F67.C83 RBD

Example of Puritan plain style used in sermons; preached for John Winthrop and his party immediately before their departure from England for the Bay Colony in Massachusetts. Reprinted in 1896 in Old South leaflets, general series, v. 3, no. 53.

19. The way of the churches of Christ in New England. London, M. Simmons, 1645. 116 p.
RBD

Treatise on the theory of government under which the New England church functioned; together with Cotton's The Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven (London, H. Overton, 1644. 59 p.) it embodies the author's undemocratic and authoritarian philosophy of the relation of church and state.

20. The bloudy tenent washed and made white in the bloud of the Lambe . . . Whereunto is added a reply to Mr. Williams' answer to Mr. Cotton's letter. London, H. Allen, 1647. 194, 144 p.
49–38592 BV741.W58c RBD

Polemic against religious toleration as advocated by Roger Williams in his The Bloudy Tenent, of Persecution, for Cause of Conscience (q. v.).

21. JONATHAN EDWARDS, 1703–1758

Edwards shared with Cotton Mather the experience of trying to uphold Puritan orthodoxy when it was declining in New England. Theologian and fiery preacher though he was, Edwards was not, however, concerned solely with the damnation of sinful men. Scientific, metaphysical, and mystical elements in existence, or "being," were reflected in important sections of his voluminous works. These legacies from his intellectual and spiritual life entered into the thought of America through his writings and bore fruit in succeeding generations of authors, particularly in New England. Emerson's theory of nature, in relation to his Transcendentalism, Hawthorne's preoccupation with the consequences of sin, and Melville's awareness of the powers of darkness in conflict with human souls—all these and many other ideas found in American literature have been influenced by the fact that Edwards thought and wrote as the philosopher he was. Substantial contributions to the understanding of Edwards' works and to an appreciation of his rightful place in American life and letters may be gained from Perry Miller's Jonathan Edwards (New York, Sloane, 1949. 348 p. American men of letters series). See also Professor Miller's edition of Edwards' notes having the title Images or Shadows of Divine Things (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1948. 151 p.), which emphasizes the empirical character of the writer's thought.

22. A faithful narrative of the surprising work of God in the conversion of many hundred souls in Northampton, and the neighbouring towns and villages of New Hampshire in New England. London, J. Oswald, 1737. 132 p.
BR520.E4 1737 RBD

23. ——— 3d ed. Boston, D. Henchman, 1738. viii, 79 p. 21–18452 BR520.E4 1738 RBD

Fullest contemporary account of the revival launched by Edwards in 1735, a forerunner of the Great Awakening which began in 1740; an early work on phenomena observed in revival meetings.

24. Sinners in the hands of an angry God. Boston, S. Kneeland, 1741. 25 p. MBAt

Sermon preached at Enfield, Massachusetts, July 8, 1741, during the Great Awakening; extreme example of Edwards' belief in appeal to the emotions to secure religious conversion.

25. A treatise concerning religious affections . . . Boston, S. Kneeland & T. Green, 1746. 343 p.
11–2602 BX7230.E4 1746 RBD

Pioneer American contribution in the field of religious psychology.

26. A careful and strict enquiry into the modern prevailing notions of that freedom of will which is supposed to be essential to moral agency, virtue and vice, reward and punishment, praise and blame. Boston, S. Kneeland, 1754. 294 p.
28–7122 BT810.E25 1754 RBD

Written to clarify and establish Edwards' position concerning the Calvinistic doctrines of free will and determinism, the work is the cornerstone of the writer's fame as one of the foremost thinkers and philosophical theologians produced in America.

27. Works. Edited by Edward Williams and Edward Parsons. Leeds, Eng., Baines, 1806–11. 8 v. IaU

"Reprinted in 1817, and again in 1847, with two 'Supplementary Volumes'."—Literary History of the United States, v. 3, p. 482.

28. ——— Worcester, Mass., Isaiah Thomas, Jr., 1808–09. 8 v.
8–32280 BX7117.E3 1808
Edited by Samuel Austin.
A reprint of the edition, with additions, was issued as an 8th edition (New York, Leavitt & Allen, 1851–52. 8 v.).

29. ——— With a memoir of his life. New York, G. & C. & H. Carvill, 1830. 10 v. illus. 25–23341 BX7117.E3 1830
Edited by Sereno E. Dwight.

30. Representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes by Clarence H. Faust and Thomas H. Johnson. New York, American Book Co., 1935. cxlii, 434 p. (American writers series)
35–30040 BX7117.E33F3 1935
Part of the introduction was issued as C. H. Faust's thesis (Ph. D.) University of Chicago, under the title: Jonathan Edwards's View of Human Nature. Brief selections are given in full; longer works are represented by excerpts. A bibliography, chiefly of critical works about Edwards and his writings, appears on p. cxix–cxlii.

31. Puritan sage; collected writings of Jonathan Edwards. Edited by Virgilius Ferm. New York, Library Publishers, 1953. xxvii, 640 p.
53–3143 BX7117.E3 1953
Anthology of partial or complete selections, drawn chiefly from the Works (1830) edited by Sereno E. Dwight.

32. THOMAS HOOKER, 1586–1647

Hooker's background and experience before he came to America in 1633 closely paralleled those of his friend, John Cotton. Each was trained at Emmanuel College, Cambridge University, a stronghold of Puritanism in England. Both so persuasively preached doctrines unacceptable to the established Church of England that emigration was their refuge from prosecution on the charge of nonconformity. In Massachusetts Bay Colony, a destination they reached in the same boat, each began a career that was instrumental in promoting the influence of the Congregational church and Puritan ideologies in the developing life of the colony. Their extant sermons and theological treatises preserved for posterity the beliefs that shaped the early culture of New England, and that were influential in all parts of the country where Calvinists were found. In 1636 Hooker and his congregation left Massachusetts to found a new colony at Hartford and surrounding points in Connecticut. There, it is said, Hooker's enunciation of the principle that "the foundation of authority is laid, firstly, in the free consent of the people" contributed to the adoption of the Connecticut Fundamental Orders of 1639, an early and remarkable declaration of American democracy. Hooker's works have not been published in a collected edition; full reprints of separate works also are lacking.

33. The soules preparation for Christ . . . London, R. Dowlman, 1632. 242 p. NN
Sermons widely known and discussed; influential in forming literary taste according to the Puritan plain style, without metaphysical complexities or ornate quotations, but characterized by pointed allusions and imagery drawn from homely situations.

34. A survey of the summe of church discipline. London, J. Bellamy, 1648. 18, [16], 139, 185–296, 90, 46, 59 p. 22–6482 BX7240.H7 RBD
Has been called the most important exposition of Congregational church polity; also includes discussion of philosophical theories affecting the development of New England law and politics.

35. The covenant of grace opened . . . Being several sermons preached at Hartford in New-England. London, G. Dawson, 1649. 85 p.
21–9106 BX7233.H6C7 RBD
Bases salvation on a contract between God and man, a legalistic concept also present in the Puritans' attitudes towards political and social relations.

36. SARAH (KEMBLE) KNIGHT, 1666–1727

Madam Knight, a lively, intelligent woman of substantial position in Boston, occupied herself by keeping a writing school, where, according to legend, Benjamin Franklin was a pupil. She also acted as an official recorder of public documents, a capacity in which she gained sufficient knowledge of court procedures to be employed from time to time in the settlement of estates. Having been called to New York to undertake such a piece of work, she made the unprecedented decision to go there on horseback without formal escort, except such as could be found on the way. The diary she kept during pauses on the hazardous journey to New York and back to Boston is marked by gusto, good humor, earthiness, and the evidence of keen observation. It is replete with apt, sometimes witty, comments on the manners of the people she encountered, the lack of suitable accommodations, and the physical aspects of the country traversed. Since the diary is neither pretentious nor self-conscious, it provides an unusually valuable picture of people and conditions along the New England shore at the beginning of the 18th century.

37. The private journal kept by Madam Knight on a journey from Boston to New York in the year 1704. In The journals of Madam Knight and Rev. Mr. Buckingham from the original manuscripts written in 1704 and 1710. New York, Wilder & Campbell, 1825. p. 9–70. 1–13318 F7.K71 RBD

38. The journal of Madam Knight. With an introductory note by George Parker Winship. Boston, Small, Maynard, 1920. xiv, 72 p.
21–10698 F7.K723 RBD

39. ——— New York, P. Smith, 1935. xiv, 72 p.
35–12871 F7.K724 RBD
Facsimile reprint of the 1920 edition.

40. COTTON MATHER, 1663–1728

A member of the second generation of his family to be born and reared in America, Cotton Mather was descended on his maternal side from the apostolic John Cotton (q. v.). By paternal ancestry he belonged to the "Mather dynasty," composed of leaders in the church, in education, and in matters of state during the better part of a hundred years. He graduated from Harvard at the age of fifteen, then took his M. A., and became associated with his father in the Second Church of Boston. In 1685 he was ordained as one of its two ministers and served the same Congregational church for the remainder of his life. Mather was essentially a religious conservative in a time of transition to more liberal theology, and his lot was not always a happy one. Some of his many scientific interests also were viewed with suspicion by his contemporaries. For example, when popular opinion was inflamed against inoculation for smallpox, he was a persistent advocate of the new method. His various medical ideas and the progressiveness of his thought in this field recently have been analyzed by Otho T. Beall and Richard H. Shyrock in their Cotton Mather, First Significant Figure in American Medicine (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1954. 241 p.). Also akin to his interest in scientific observation was his continued investigation of alleged witches; but these activities may have contributed to the fanaticism that culminated in the Salem trials whose later odium Mather shared. His intellectual curiosity operated in many fields besides science. He made good use of a personal library, said to rival in size that of the second William Byrd at Westover. In the course of his busy life as a clergyman he found time to write some 450 books and pamphlets. In writing these he consciously experimented with various literary styles. However heavy and archaic some of his work may now appear, all of it is not in this vein. Moreover, it must be remembered that he formulated one of the first theories of literary composition enunciated in America. Although primarily a preacher and a Calvinist theologian, Mather has a place in the literature of America, as well as in its theology and religious history. However, no collected edition of his works has appeared.

41. The wonders of the invisible world. Boston, S. Phillips, 1693. 16, 1, 151 (1), 8, 17–32 p.
NN

Concerning the witchcraft trials in Salem, Mass., in 1692.

The text was republished in volume 1 of Samuel G. Drake's compilation entitled The Witchcraft Delusion in New England (Roxbury, Mass., E. Woodward, 1866. Woodward's historical series, no. 5), p. [1]–247. Selections appear in Narratives of the Witchcraft Cases, 1648–1706, edited by George L. Burr (New York, Scribner, 1914. Original narratives of early American history [currently published by Barnes & Noble, New York]), p. 203–251.

42. ——— On witchcraft, being The wonders of the invisible world. Mount Vernon, N. Y., Peter Pauper Press [1950?] 172 p.
50–9778 BF1575.M54 1950

43. Magnalia Christi Americana; or, The ecclesiastical history of New-England. London, T. Parkhurst, 1702. 7 pts. in 1 v.
1–24698 F7.M41 RBD

Covers the years 1620–98 and includes numerous biographies of notable Puritans, stories of marvels, histories of Congregational churches, etc. Written in the author's "Massy" style, based on "fantastic" English prose of the 17th century, and characterized by conceits and other artificialities.

44. ——— With an introd. and occasional notes by the Rev. Thomas Robbins . . . To which is added a memoir of Cotton Mather by Samuel G. Drake. Hartford, Conn., S. Andrus, 1855, 1853. 2 v.
3–4343 BR520.M4

45. Bonifacius. Boston, S. Gerrish, 1710. 206 p.
38–12900 BV4500.M35 1710 RBD

A guide for ordinary men, simply written in the "Plain" style congenial to Puritan taste, to be used in organizing charitable impulses so that they constitute a workable system which contributes to maximum benefits. Benjamin Franklin loved the book and ascribed to its influence his own interest in being useful as a citizen. Later editions were published as Essays To Do Good.

46. The Christian philosopher . . . London, E. Matthews, 1721. 304 p.
45–45057 BL180.M4 1721 RBD
Represents the author's interest in natural phenomena and science, in which he was a precursor of Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson.

47. Manuductio ad ministerium. Boston, T. Hancock, 1726. 149 p. RBD
A manual for pastors, belonging to a well-developed 17th-century literary type; includes an important statement of the author's theory of literary style.

48. ——— Reproduced from the original edition . . . with a bibliographical note by Thomas J. Holmes and Kenneth B. Murdock. New York, Published for the Facsimile Text Society by Columbia University, 1938. xix, 151 p. (Facsimile Text Society. Publication no. 42.)
38–8438 BV4009.M35 1726a

49. Diary, 1681–1724. Boston, Massachusetts Historical Society, 1911–12. 2 v. (Massachusetts Historical Society. Collections, ser. 7, v. 7–8)
11–14733 F61.M41, ser. 7, v. 7–8

50. Selections from Cotton Mather. Edited with an introd. and notes by Kenneth B. Murdock. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1926. lxiii, 377 p. (American authors series, general editor, S. T. Williams) 26–12606 BX7117.M25
"Selected reading list": p. lxi–lxiii.

51. THOMAS MORTON, fl. 1622–1646

Attracted to New England by a desire to make money, the adventurer Morton traded guns and liquor to the Indians in order to secure furs for sale. He was twice expelled from the country by the Pilgrims of Plymouth for these offenses and also on account of the convivial life carried on at his trading post, Ma-re-Mount. In retaliation, he wrote and published a satire against the colonists which is unusual in the annals of early American literature for its expressions of enjoyment derived from the primitive environment, for the levity of its tone, and for its ridicule of fanaticism in the Pilgrims' way of life. For all these reasons the book has been used as a source of later literary treatment of the same themes, the best known of which is probably Hawthorne's sketch, "The May-Pole of Merrymount," in Twice-Told Tales (q. v.).

52. New English Canaan or New Canaan. Amsterdam, J. F. Stam, 1637. 188 p.
1–12043 F67.M88

——— Reprint. With introductory matter and notes by Charles Francis Adams, Jr. Boston, Prince Society, 1883. vi, 381 p. (Prince Society, Boston. Publications [v. 14]) 1–16032 E186.P85, v. 14 F67.M895

53. MARY (WHITE) ROWLANDSON, ca. 1635–ca. 1678

Lancaster, Mass., experienced an Indian raid in February 1676, while King Philip's War was in progress. As a result, Mrs. Rowlandson and her three children were carried into captivity by the Indians. The youngest child soon died, a victim of the hardships and exposure to which the prisoners were subjected. Finally, however, the mother and her remaining children were ransomed and restored to their friends. Mrs. Rowlandson's account of their terrible experience, expressed in the tone of resignation and religious piety typical of Puritan writing at the time, was nevertheless a forthright and realistic portrayal of one of the grimmest aspects of colonization and frontier life in America. Personal narratives of Indian captivities, of which this is an outstanding example, created a body of literature that attained great popularity among readers. As such, it is responsible in part for the hatred of Indians that developed in the country, and also must be considered in connection with the romantic revolution from that hatred on the part of James Fenimore Cooper and other novelists who created idealized Indian characters.

54. The soveraignty & goodness of God . . . being a narrative of the captivity and restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson. 2d addition [!] corr. and amended. Cambridge, Mass., S. Green, 1682. 6, 73 p. MB
An earlier edition, supposed to have been published in the same year, is no longer extant.

55. ——— 2d ed. [i. e., 3d ed.?] Carefully corr. and purged from abundance of errors which escaped in the former impression. Boston, S. Phillips, 1720. 80 p. 8–33637 E87.R862 RBD
Reprints having the title, The Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson include the following: (a) a facsimile reprint edited by Henry S. Nourse and John E. Thayer (Lancaster, Mass. [Cambridge, Mass., J. Wilson] 1903. vii, 158 p.); and (b) another reprint edited by Charles H. Lincoln, in his Narratives of the Indian Wars, 1675–1699 (New York, Scribner, 1913. Original narratives of early American history [recently published by Barnes & Noble, New York]), p. [107]–167.

56. SAMUEL SEWALL, 1652–1730

Sewall's success while a student at Harvard College led to his appointment as a resident fellow. Although he had considered entering the ministry, his final decision was in favor of a career in public life. Among prominent positions held by Sewall was that of chief justice of the Superior Court of Massachusetts. One of his unfortunate appointments was to membership in the special commission set up to hear the Salem witchcraft cases of 1692. His part in the trial and condemnation of various defendants weighed so heavily upon him that he repudiated his judgment and announced his penitence in a public confession made in 1697. His humanitarian sympathies were also manifest in The Selling of Joseph (1700); reprinted in the Diary, v. [2] p. 16–20. This pamphlet, one of the first documents against slavery written in America, contains the famous dictum: "It is most certain that all men, as they are sons of Adam, are coheirs; and have equal right to liberty, and all other outward comforts of life." With ample means, strong common sense, and considerable wit, this layman was qualified to portray in his diary and letters a view of colonial life in New England quite different from that presented in the prevailing clerical writings of the place and period.

57. Diary. 1674–1729. Boston, Massachusetts Historical Society, 1878–82. 3 v. (Massachusetts Historical Society. Collections, ser. 5, v. 5–7) 10–12994 F61.M41, ser. 5, v. 5–7 F67.S45

A Puritan Pepysian chronicle that includes trivia, financial records, intimate domestic details, shrewd comments on important men and events, and expressions of sincere religious belief.

——— Abridgment. Edited by Mark Van Doren. New York, Macy-Masius, 1927. 272 p. (An American bookshelf [1]) 27–23367 F67.S515

58. Letter-book. [1685–1729] Boston, Massachusetts Historical Society, 1886–88. 2 v. (Massachusetts Historical Society. Collections, ser. 6, v. 1–2) 10–12993 F61.M41, ser. 6, v. 1–2

59. THOMAS SHEPARD, 1605–1649

In 1635 Shepard followed John Cotton and Thomas Hooker to New England, there to constitute with them a triumvirate of highly educated Congregational clergymen who greatly influenced the cultural development of the young colony. In common with his two friends he had been driven out of England by Archbishop Laud because of his nonconformity. Although he was a Puritan of the dissenting Calvinistic type, his sermons and theological writings included emotional and mystical elements that gave them unusually wide appeal, when delivered with the eloquence at his command. In spite of the fact that he was frequently unable to revise the rough drafts of his sermons and other writings before they were published, his works reached a large audience and attained the dignity of a collected edition in 1853. According to the biography by John Albro (Works, v. 1, p. clxxxix) Jonathan Edwards' A Treatise Concerning Religious Affections includes some 75 quotations from Shepard's The Parable of the Ten Virgins (1660). It has been suggested that Shepard's reputation for godliness and scholarship was influential in the choice of his parish at Cambridge, Massachusetts, for the location of Harvard College.

60. The sincere convert. London, H. Blunden, 1640. [271] p. NN

61. The sound believer. London, R. Dawlman, 1645. 352 p. 52–46573 BV4914.S55 1645 RBD

62. The clear sun-shine of the gospel breaking forth upon the Indians in New England. London, J. Bellamy, 1648. 38 p. 6–43056 E78.M4E35

——— Reprint. In Massachusetts Historical Society. Collections, ser. 3, v. 4. Cambridge, C. Folsom, 1832. p. 25–67. 9–889 F61.M41, 3d ser., v. 4

63. Autobiography. With additional notices of his [Shepard's] life and character by Nehemiah Adams. Boston, Pierce & Parker, 1832. 129 p. 36–16665 BX7260.S53A3

64. Autobiography. In Colonial Society of Massachusetts, Boston. Publications [including] transactions, 1927–1930. v. 27; 1932. Boston. p. [343]–400. 1–280 F61.C71, v. 27

Based on a fresh study of the original manuscript first published in the edition by Nehemiah Adams described in the foregoing reference. A bibliography is supplied, p. 347–351.

65. Works. Boston, Doctrinal Tract and Book Society, 1853. 3 v. 39–1493 BX7117.S5

Contains a life of Shepard, by John A. Albro, v. 1, p. [vii]–cxcii. Volume 3 is wanting in the Library of Congress set.

66. JOHN SMITH, 1579/80–1631

Smith's right to be called one of the fathers of American literature may be defended on several counts and in spite of certain reservations that are in order. If he is thought of as a chronicler of his firsthand observations, it must be admitted that he was frequently hasty, careless, repetitious, boastful, and confused. His reputation for veracity, viewed more leniently by contemporary scholars than by those of an earlier time, must still sustain the charge that he told taller tales than the facts warranted. Nevertheless, interest in him as a man of letters has not suffered from the lack of exactitude in his writings. His Pocahontas story, whether true or apocryphal, soon became a legend. As such it inspired a literature of its own, which includes James Nelson Barker's drama, The Indian Princess (1808), and John Esten Cooke's novel, My Lady Pokahontas (1885). What Smith stood for in his own person has, perhaps, had the strongest literary influence. Coming to America as Elizabethan explorers went to strange places, he shared a heroic enterprise as a colonist, in the best tradition of an English gentleman adventurer. He was to succeeding generations of Americans the typically intrepid pioneer, frontiersman, and strong man whom they elevated into a national hero. His writings are, therefore, not only source materials for understanding early colonial life in Virginia, but also sources of inspiration for various themes that in different periods and with different emphasis have been used by writers in America. The most recent study of Smith's life, which favors the case for his reliability, is Bradford Smith's Captain John Smith, His Life & Legend (Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1953. 373 p.).

67. A true relation of such occurrences . . . as hath hapned in Virginia since the first planting of that collony . . . London, J. Tappe, 1608. 22 l. NN

First account of the first permanent English colony established in America.

68. A map of Virginia. Oxford, Eng., J. Barnes, 1612. 39, 110 p. fold. map.

Rc–2805 F229.S69 RBD

Includes a detailed account of the physical aspects of Virginia and of the Indian way of life observed there.

69. A description of New-England . . . London, R. Clerke, 1616. 61 p.

7–15406 F7.S63 RBD

Favorable description of the natural resources of New England, designed to attract settlers; part of Smith's campaign to promote colonization in that region, an enterprise in which he was interested for some 20 years after leaving Virginia in 1609.

70. The generall historie of Virginia, New-England, and the Summer Isles . . . London, M. Sparkes, 1624. 248 p. illus.

Rc–2796 F229.S61 RBD

Repeats and enlarges upon various earlier writings; first appearance of the story of his rescue by Pocahontas.

71. Travels and works. Edited by Edward Arber. New ed., with a biographical and critical introd. by A. G. Bradley. Edinburgh, J. Grant, 1910. 2 v. (984 p.) illus. W11–10 F229.S655

Bibliographies: v. 1, p. xxvii–xxx, [cxxx]–cxxxvi.

Reprints of Smith's shorter narratives about Virginia, and of Book IV of his General History of Virginia are contained in Narratives of Early Virginia, 1606–1625 (1907), p. [25]–204; [289]–407, a collection edited by Lyon G. Tyler, for the Scribner series, Original narratives of early American history, recently published by Barnes & Noble.

72. EDWARD TAYLOR, 1642–1729

Taylor was a devout Puritan clergyman who lived and wrote in Massachusetts during the late 17th and early 18th century. Nothing considerable was known of his poetical work until a representative selection of it was made from a manuscript belonging to Yale University. The result was published in 1939. His disinclination to permit his poetry to reach a contemporary audience may have stemmed from a fear that it revealed emotions too strong, in imagery too worldly, to be compatible with strict Puritan orthodoxy. Upon the appearance in print of the poetical works, a new name was therefore added to the short roster of colonial American poets, and a new light was cast on the deeper esthetic and emotional elements in Puritan religious thought. In structure, Taylor's verse belongs to the tradition of religious poetry represented by John Donne, George Herbert, and other English metaphysical poets of the 17th century. In content and style it combines, however, two personal departures from more typical Puritan poetry that give it unusual variety and interest: its piety is expressed by means of imagery derived from rich colors, sweet odors, and other delights perceived by the senses; and its reality is increased by contrasting imagery based on everyday experiences of ordinary Puritans, expressed in their own colloquial language. Taylor has been called "The greatest poet of New England before the nineteenth century" (Literary History of the United States, v. 1, p. 65).

73. Poetical works. Edited with an introd. and notes by Thomas H. Johnson. New York, Rockland Editions, 1939. 231 p.
39–34182 PS850.T2 1939 RBD
Notes to the edition are supplied on p. 189–199; Taylor's library is described and the contents listed, p. 201–220; the manuscript of Poetical Works is discussed, p. 221–228; a bibliography of Taylor's manuscripts, printed works, and sources for the study of his life and achievements are found on p. 229–231.

74. ——— Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1943. 231 p. A45–4662 DCU

75. NATHANIEL WARD, ca. 1578–1652

Another Cambridge University graduate driven out of England by Archbishop Laud, Ward in 1634 brought to New England his exceptional attainments in the law and in the Puritan ministry, his second profession. Wide experience of the world, not only in England but on the Continent, increased his stature. Although Ward was anything but a democrat in the modern understanding of the term, he was well-versed in the rights of the individual under British law. For that reason, his draft of the first code of laws for Massachusetts, adopted with some revisions in 1641, contained certain provisions for safeguarding such rights. Thus, even within the stronghold of authoritarian Puritanism, the heritage of British justice was preserved and its concepts made a part of American civilization. Ward's other contribution to early American letters (cited below) was a true 17th-century pamphleteering satire, directed against the sins of the times. In it the writer employed Puritan plain style mixed with other elements derived from Elizabethan and Jacobean literature, in which he was apparently steeped.

76. The simple cobler of Aggawam in America . . . By Theodore de la Guard [pseud.] London, S. Bowtell, 1647. 80 p. MiU–C NN

77. ——— Edited by Lawrence C. Wroth. New York, Scholars' Facsimiles & Reprints, 1937. 80 p. 38–18217 PS858.W2S5 1647a RBD

78. [The body of liberties] A coppie of The liberties of the Massachusetts Collonie in New England. In Massachusetts Historical Society. Collections, ser. 3, v. 8. Boston, Little, Brown, 1843. p. [216]–237. 9–889 F61.M41, ser. 3, v. 8
First printed edition of the document of 1641. Cf. p. [191].

79. MICHAEL WIGGLESWORTH, 1631–1705

A Puritan clergyman in Malden, Massachusetts, Wigglesworth apparently wrote his famous long poem, The Day of Doom, in ballad measures to attract unlearned readers and so to instruct them, for the salvation of their souls, in the dogmas of Calvinism. The poem immediately became a best seller, by virtue of its appeal to the emotions, beliefs, and literary taste prevailing at the time. Said to have been distributed not only as a book, but also in the form of broadsides, the work so far surpassed Mrs. Bradstreet's poems in public favor that the first edition was literally read to pieces and has entirely disappeared. The writer's potential poetic powers were also sacrificed to purposes of edification in two other poetical works: God's Controversy with New-England, written in 1662 but first printed in Proceedings, Jan. 1871–Mar. 1873, published by the Massachusetts Historical Society, v. 12, 1873, p. 83–93; and Meat Out of the Eater (1670).

80. The day of doom; or, A description of the great and last judgment. London, J. Sims, 1673. 92 p. RPJCB
The Literary History of the United States, v. 3, p. 773, and the Dictionary of American Biography, v. 20, p. 195, refer to an edition of 1662. The foregoing reference is to the earliest edition currently described in the National Union Catalog at the Library of Congress; successive references illustrate the vitality of the work and the range of time represented in the publication of various editions.

81. ——— Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Eng., J. White, 1711. 72 p. PS871.D3 1711 RBD

82. ——— With other poems. Also a memoir of the author, autobiography, and sketch of his funeral sermon by Rev. Cotton Mather . . . From the 6th ed., 1715. New York, American News Co., 1867. 119 p.
26–5364 PS871.D3 1867 RBD
Edited by John W. Dean and William H. Burr.

83. ——— With other poems. Edited with an introd. by Kenneth B. Murdock. New York, Spiral Press, 1929. xi, 94 p. illus.
30–11066 PS871.D3 1929

84. ROGER WILLIAMS, ca. 1603–1683

When Williams became a Separatist and as an ordained clergyman emigrated to New England in 1631, he sought a country in which to live according to Christ's teachings, as he read them in the Bible. However, according to orthodox Puritanism, his interpretations, being wrong, led him into various heretical beliefs. These included his conviction that the individual had a right to freedom of conscience without interference from civil magistrates, and that it was necessary to make the church democratic. He also held that the appropriation of land from the Indians without paying for it was a violation of human rights and therefore a sin. By virtue of unceasing and vociferous efforts to implement these convictions until they became the basis of action in Massachusetts, he finally came to be considered a disturber of the peace and was banished from the colony into the outlying wilderness. Going south to a section still occupied by Indians, whose lifelong friend he was, Williams became the founder of the Rhode Island colony. The writings in which he expressed his ideas were theological for the most part, involved, and long-winded; for that reason they have been difficult to read and have become so rare as to have been sometimes forgotten. But the elevation of his thought, the realism of his language, and the spaciousness of his ideas concerning freedom and authority caused his pioneer testimony on behalf of liberalism to pass into the stream of American democratic thought, from which, more than a century after he died, emerged the principles embodied in the Constitution of the United States. The significance of Williams for the American tradition is discussed by Perry Miller in his Roger Williams (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1953. 273 p.), a work that includes numerous extracts from Williams' writings, provided in a modern text for ease of reading, particularly with respect to spelling, capitalization, punctuation, and abbreviations.

85. A key into the language of America . . . London, G. Dexter, 1643. 197 p. RBD

Comments on various aspects of Indian life, accompanied by vocabularies suited to each aspect.

——— Reprint. In Rhode Island Historical Society. Collections. v. 1. Providence, 1827. p. 17–163. Rc–2948 F76.R47, v. 1

——— Reprint. 5th ed. Introd. by Howard M. Chapin. Providence, Rhode Island and Providence Plantation Tercentenary Committee, 1936. 205 p. 37–5003 E99.N16W7 PM2003.Z5W4 1936

86. The bloudy tenent, of persecution, for cause of conscience . . . [London?] 1644. 247 p. 10–12684 BV741.W58 1644 RBD

This polemic was attacked by John Cotton in his The Bloudy Tenent Washed and Made White in the Bloud of the Lambe (q. v.), to which Williams replied in The Bloody Tenent Yet More Bloody (London, C. Calvert, 1652. 320 p.).

87. Experiments of spiritual life and health. London, 1652. 59 p. OO

88. ——— Edited with a historical introd. by Winthrop S. Hudson. Philadelphia, Westminster Press, 1951. 103 p. 51–7794 BV4500.W6 1951

Devotional book which is a directory of that spiritual life in which the Puritan "acquired a sturdiness of character and inner serenity . . . [and] became the creator of a culture . . . that was destined to place its stamp upon the Western world for three centuries to come." Introduction, p. 23–24.

89. Works. In Narrangansett Club, Providence. Publications. (First series) v. 1–6. Providence [Providence Press Co., printers] 1866–74. 6 v. 3–20323 F76.N21

Subscribers' edition.

Chiefly reprints of the original editions of the works of Roger Williams.

No more published.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Biographical Introduction, by R. A. Guild. A key into the language of America, edited by J. H. Trumbull. Letter of John Cotton and Roger Williams' reply, edited by R. A. Guild. 1866.—v. 2. John Cotton's answer to Roger Williams, edited by J. L. Diman. Queries, of highest consideration, edited by R. A. Guild. 1867.—v. 3. The bloudy tenent of persecution, edited by S. L. Caldwell. 1867.—v. 4. The bloody tenent yet more bloody, edited by S. L. Caldwell. 1870.—v. 5. George Fox digg'd out of his burrowes, edited by J. L. Diman. 1872.—v. 6. The letters of Roger Williams, 1632–1682. Now first collected. Edited by J. R. Bartlett. 1874.

90. JOHN WINTHROP, 1588–1649

Winthrop, many times governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, began his journal by chronicling the events of the voyage to America. Once the destination had been reached, the journal became a record of public and private affairs in the colony during the remainder of his life. As such, it added to American letters a contemporary view of the New England character and conscience under Puritan domination, twin themes treated ever since by some of the best writers produced in the United States. Winthrop's other individual pieces include A Model of Christian Charity (In Massachusetts Historical Society. Collections, ser. 3, v. 7; 1838. Boston. p.

31–48), written about 1630 as a guide to the colonists in their attempt to live together in a cooperative society according to Biblical principles. His speech to the General Court, made after he was vindicated of a charge against him, contains his famous definition of liberty under authority; it may be found in Hosmer's edition of the Journal, v. 2, p. 237–239. An extraordinary correspondence with Margaret Tyndal, his third wife, reflects a particularly happy marriage of two strong Puritan personalities. These letters have been collected in Some Old Puritan Love Letters, edited by Joseph H. Twichell (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1893, 1894. 187 p.). Various love letters, official documents, family correspondence, and business communications are available in two additional sources: Robert C. Winthrop's Life and Letters of John Winthrop, 2d ed. (Boston, Little, Brown, 1869. 2 v.); and the Winthrop Papers (Boston, Massachusetts Historical Society, 1929–47. 5 v.). The last is frequently called an unsurpassed collection of colonial papers.

91. [Journal] A history of New England from 1630 to 1649. [Edited] by James Savage. New ed. with additions and corrections. Boston, Little, Brown, 1853. 2 v. 1–12052 F67.W783

A first edition of part of the text appeared as A Journal of the Transactions and Occurrences in the Settlement of Massachusetts and the Other New England Colonies . . . (Hartford, Conn., E. Babcock, 1790. 364 p.). James K. Hosmer also edited the text, calling it Winthrop's Journal, "History of New England" (New York, Scribner, 1908. 2 v. Original narratives of early American history [recently distributed by Barnes & Noble, New York]).

92. JOHN WISE, 1652–1725

A Harvard graduate who served several parishes in Massachusetts as pastor, Wise opposed Increase and Cotton Mather's plan for a central church government with authority over individual Congregational churches in New England. The earlier of his two works described below is a biting satire directed against the Mather proposals; the second treatise is a more formal and systematic presentation of his belief that in church as in state good government must be grounded in natural law, reason, and virtuous democratic practices. These were early expressions of views that became more and more prominent in American political theory until they were finally embodied in the Declaration of Independence. The first full-length study of Wise was made by George A. Cook in his John Wise, Early American Democrat (New York, King's Crown Press, 1952. 246 p.). It includes a bibliography of the author's writings and of primary and secondary sources for the study of his life and thought, as well as extensive documentation in the form of notes. Modern reprints of Wise's works are not available at this time.

93. The churches quarrel espoused . . . New York, W. Bradford, 1713. 116 p. PHi

94. A vindication of the government of New England churches. Boston, N. Boone, 1717. 105, 12 p. MH

95. ——— Boston, J. Boyles, 1772. 271, [12] p. 23–5885 BX7136.W6 1772a RBD

Includes The Churches Quarrel Espoused (p. [75]–180).

B. The Revolution and the New Nation (1764–1820)

The many crises of the Revolutionary era in America had a strong impact on its literature. The conflicts of ideas and interests, which finally culminated in a long war, had a disruptive effect on society, of which literature is the voice. Neighbors disagreed with neighbors; the economic balance was disturbed; education suffered; and uncertainty about survival itself troubled the minds of the people. All this anxiety and confusion did not contribute to that state of "emotion recollected in tranquillity" which is most favorable to creative writing; nor was it to be expected that a large audience under such circumstances would support the publication of works having literary rather than political interest.

The prevailing mood of the colonists, however, inspired much of such literary effort as was made. Poets became ballad-makers in praise of feats of arms. Satires and political allegories directed against the British were well received. The authorship of one war song might be a surer way to contemporary fame than the publication of several sustained but unexciting works from the same hand. At least one literary stylist and propagandist of genius produced political pamphlets that were avidly read. Much of the best writing of the period, indeed, was political in character. The remarkable men who were first the architects of the new Nation and later its statesmen and diplomats left a whole library of official and personal papers to enrich American letters. In their various assignments they wrote innumerable documents, engaged in extensive correspondence, delivered addresses, and drafted declarations expressed in clear, sound English prose that sometimes rose to heights of genuine literary style. For descriptions of some of these important expressions of the American spirit, even if not in a strict sense part of its literature, the reader is referred to Chapter VIII, General History. However, a few of the shorter pieces from these hands are included in the references that follow, by virtue of having attained the status of American classics.

The spirit that had helped to create a new nation finally passed over also into its literature, there to develop a new trend: nationalism. Writers began to raise their voices in praise of themes drawn from American life and experience. The advancing frontier, destined to excite authors of belles-lettres for generations, began to emerge as the setting for a few novels. Americans were encouraged, at least upon one occasion, to look to their own people to produce writers of the future that would equal in greatness any that belonged to England's past. A battery of American "firsts" appeared: the first tragedy by an American acted on the professional stage in America; the first American professional novelist at work; and the first social comedy introducing a Yankee character written and staged. In the midst of these innovations, the use in America of the Addisonian essay, the novel of Gothic horror or picaresque design, the play with a classical locale, and poetry written in rhymed couplets and poetic diction still pointed to continued reliance upon English and European models. But the transition from imported to native themes, forms, and styles was at last beginning to be made. This was a seedtime for American literature; the abundant harvest was to come later.

96. ABIGAIL (SMITH) ADAMS, 1744–1818

A notable letter-writer in her own or any generation, Mrs. Adams' life and fortunes placed her in a strategic position to observe and comment upon the social, political, and domestic scenes in America during the Revolutionary War and the early National period. Her residence in France and in Britain during her husband's diplomatic service in those countries resulted in correspondence describing manners and customs abroad, a type of writing that became increasingly popular in later periods of American literature. When John Adams was elected the first Vice President, and later the second President of the United States, Abigail was by his side, observing and recording in intimate letters her impressions of places, persons, and events. Her correspondence, therefore, provides an example of the art of letter-writing as practiced by an unusual 18th century New England woman; even more, it constitutes a documentary record of the civilization Mrs. Adams saw in the making during a fateful half-century of American life.

97. Letters. With an introductory memoir by her grandson, Charles Francis Adams [1807–1886] Boston, C. C. Little & J. Brown, 1840. lxiii, 447 p. 16–3756 E322.1.A3 RBD

98. ——— 4th ed., rev. and enl. Boston, Wilkins, Carter, 1848. lxi, 472 p. 16–5357 E322.1.A32
Includes letters bearing dates from 1761 to 1816.

99. Familiar letters of John Adams and his wife, Abigail Adams, during the Revolution. With a memoir of Mrs. Adams by Charles Francis Adams [1807–1886] New York, Hurd & Houghton, 1876. xxxii, 424 p. 4–16982 E322.A518

100. New letters, 1788–1801. Edited with an introd. by Stewart Mitchell. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. xiii, 281 p. 47–11763 E322.1.A37
Letters to Mrs. Adams' sister, Mary (Smith) Cranch; reprinted with a revised introduction from the Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society, Apr. 18, 1945–Oct. 17, 1945, new ser., v. 55, 1947, p. [95]–232, [299]–444.

101. JOEL BARLOW, 1754–1812

Born in rural Connecticut and educated at Yale, Barlow was to become a citizen of the world. His first important connection as a writer was with the Connecticut (or Hartford) Wits, or Yale Poets, as the informal group has been variously called. These men from the Hartford area were animated not only by a love of literature but also by their post-Revolutionary patriotism to initiate a truly national literature that would reflect American principles and accomplishments. It was this stimulus that led to the composition of Barlow's American epic. His prose works, chiefly political in character, were written in praise of democratic institutions supporting the cause of human rights throughout the world. During a residence of 17 years abroad, chiefly in Europe, he engaged in diplomatic assignments from the United States and also amassed a fortune from his commercial transactions. Fortified by his wealth, he built near Washington his estate, Kalorama, where he provided a sort of salon for the discussion of arts, letters, and the good of mankind. Included in the last of these categories was a cause that he promoted earnestly but unsuccessfully: that of an American national university, endowed by Congress, and dedicated to the discovery as well as the diffusion of knowledge. Important selections from Barlow's correspondence with his wife and others are found in Charles B. Todd's Life and Letters of Joel Barlow (New York, Putnam, 1886. 306 p.).

102. Hasty pudding: a poem. In three cantos. Written at Chambéry, in Savoy, January 1793 . . . [New Haven, Conn., 1796] 12 p. RPB

Whimsical mock-epic, spontaneously written in praise of a familiar American dish known as hasty pudding, or cornmeal mush.

103. Political writings. New ed. corr. New York, Mott & Lyon, 1796. xvi, 258 p.
9–28922 JC211.B27 RBD

CONTENTS.—Advice to the privileged orders in the several states of Europe [1792–1793].—A letter to the National Convention of France [1792].—A letter addressed to the people of Piedmont, on the advantages of the French Revolution [1795].—The conspiracy of kings; a poem addressed to the inhabitants of Europe from another quarter of the world [1792].

104. The Columbiad, a poem. Philadelphia, C. & A. Conrad; Baltimore, Conrad Lucas, 1807. 454 p. 2–25640 E120.B255 RBD

Epic in Miltonic style, based on the life of Christopher Columbus and portraying not only the future glories of America but also a vision of the coming together of nations into a league for the common good; an amplification of the author's The Vision of Columbus (Hartford, Conn., Hudson & Goodwin, 1787, 258 p.).

105. HUGH HENRY BRACKENRIDGE, 1748–1816

Brackenridge graduated from the College of New Jersey (afterwards Princeton University), when the American Revolution was brewing and a spirit of nationalism was beginning to develop. Two early dramas, The Battle of Bunkers-Hill (1776) and The Death of General Montgomery (1777), were patriotic in their inspiration. It was after he became a lawyer and a judge, with headquarters in Pittsburgh on the Western frontier, that he wrote the novel for which he is best known. Avoiding the models provided by sentimental, didactic, and Gothic novels that were the fashion in fiction at that time, Brackenridge took Don Quixote for his prototype. His long, picaresque narrative, arranged in episodes, portrays backwoods and frontier scenes and conditions with humor and irony. It was also used by the author to express his own anxieties and certain disillusionment concerning the trend of nationalism in the country. His satire was directed chiefly against excesses committed in the name of democracy, office-seekers unqualified to hold office, political incapacity, and social insecurity in a country so recently victorious in war. As a stylist, Brackenridge has been compared favorably with contemporary writers in England.

106. Modern chivalry: containing the adventures of Captain John Farrago and Teague O'Regan, his servant. Philadelphia, J. M'Culloch, 1792. 2 v. in 1. NN

First edition of the first part of the novel.

107. ——— Philadelphia, Johnson & Warner, 1815. 4 v.
6–15211 PS708.B5M6 1815 RBD

Final revised version of installments originally issued in 1792–93, 1797, 1804, 1805, and a fourth volume made up of new material.

108. ——— Edited with introd., chronology, and bibliography, by Claude M. Newlin. New York, American Book Co., 1937. xliv, 808 p. (American fiction series; general editor, Harry H. Clark) 37–27219 PS708.M5M6 1937

109. CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN, 1771–1810

Brown was the first native-born author to make a profession of novel-writing in America. Because of his connections with the periodicals of the period, both editorially and as a contributor, he has been called also the father of literary criticism in the United States. His work is particularly significant in the history of national literary development because in it he applied his theory that American literature should profit by and develop springs of action and interest that differed essentially from those of Europe. Although the themes used to carry out this idea were chosen for their qualities of Gothic horror, they were developed realistically. Didactic elements were added for moral instruction, but each of the novels written in 1799–1800 was infused with essentially romantic intensity and emotional appeal. So designed, the books satisfied the taste of the age and were read with approval in England and on the Continent, although interest in American writing was not widespread abroad at that time. Selections from Brown's diaries, letters, and the "rarest of his printed works" are included in his Life, undertaken by Paul Allen and completed by William Dunlap (Philadelphia, J. P. Parke, 1815. 2 v.). Recent biographical and critical studies are: The Sources and Influence of the Novels of Charles Brockden Brown, by Lulu R. Wiley (New York, Vantage Press, 1950. [387] p.); and David L. Clark's Charles Brockden Brown, Pioneer Voice of America (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1952. 363 p.). For the latter book, unpublished papers of the Brown family constitute an important source.

110. Wieland; or, The transformation. New York, H. Caritat, 1798. 298 p.
9–2504 PZ3.B814W RBD

Based in part on an actual murder committed by a New York farmer while under the influence of hallucinations.

111. ——— Together with Memoirs of Carwin the Biloquist, a fragment. Edited with an introd. by Fred Lewis Pattee. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1926. xlix, 351 p. (American authors series; general editor, Stanley T. Williams)
26–3794 PZ3.B814W9

112. Ormond; or, The secret witness. New York, H. Caritat, 1799. iv, 338 p.
A31–1124 CSmH

113. ——— Edited with introd., chronology, and bibliography, by Ernest Marchand. New York, American Book Co., 1937. li, 242 p. (American fiction series; general editor, Harry H. Clark)
37–4089 PZ3.B814O13

114. Edgar Huntley; or, Memoirs of a sleep-walker. Philadelphia, H. Maxwell, 1799. 3 v.
5–41074 PZ3.B814E RBD

Illustrates an early use of material drawn from frontier life, with its dangers from savage Indians and wild animals.

115. ——— Edited with an introd. by David Lee Clark. New York, Macmillan, 1928. xxiii, 308 p. (Modern readers' series)
28–13915 PZ3.B814E12

116. Arthur Mervyn; or, Memoirs of the year 1793. Philadelphia, H. Maxwell, 1799. 2 v.
6–18972 PZ3.B814A RBD

Volume 2 has imprint: New-York, Printed and sold by G. F. Hopkins, 1800.

A novel describing Philadelphia during the yellow fever epidemic in 1793.

117. Novels. Philadelphia, McKay, 1887. 6 v.
17–13039 to 17–13043 PZ3.B814

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Memoir. Wieland.—v. 2–3. Arthur Mervyn.—v. 4. Edgar Huntley.—v. 5. Jane Talbot.—v. 6. Ormond. Clara Howard.

118. TIMOTHY DWIGHT, 1752–1817

Dwight's interest in literature, first as a student and later a tutor at Yale College, led to a connection that encouraged his efforts to write. This association was with the Connecticut Wits, whose members tried to promote belletristic writing during the social and political upheavals of the Revolutionary period. Under that inspiration he eventually produced three poetical works: a very long epic showing the influences of Alexander Pope and John Milton, in which Biblical events and characters were presented with American characteristics; a laborious satire directed against the ideas of Voltaire, David Hume, and other skeptical thinkers of the 18th century; and a meditative, descriptive poem praising life in his own parish of Greenfield. Dwight's eminence as a clergyman and his outstanding contributions to education as a teacher and as president of Yale College tend to outweigh his poetic work, which is now chiefly of historical interest. In the literature of his country he is best remembered, perhaps, by two somewhat less ambitious pieces of writing: "Columbia," a war song written while he was a chaplain in the American army; and Travels in New England and New York (1821–1822), described in the section treating of Travel and Travelers.

119. The conquest of Canäan; a poem, in eleven books. Hartford [Conn.] E. Babcock, 1785. 304 p.
45–52941 PS739.C7 1785 RBD

Epic celebrating the Old Testament story of Joshua's conquest of Canaan.

120. The triumph of infidelity: a poem. Printed in the world [n. p.] 1788. 40 p.
AC901.H3, v. 56 RBD

Volume 56, no. 7, of the Hazard pamphlet collection.

121. Greenfield Hill: a poem, in seven parts. I. The prospect. II. The flourishing village. III. The burning of Fairfield. IV. The destruction of the Pequods. V. The clergyman's advice to the villagers. VI. The farmer's advice to the villagers. VII. The vision; or, Prospect of the future happiness of America. New York, Childs & Swaine, 1794. 183 p.
18–23749 AC901.D8, v. 48 RBD
AC901.M5, v. 314, no. 1 RBD

[Duane pamphlets, v. 48, no. 1; Miscellaneous pamphlets, v. 314, no. 1.]

122. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, 1706–1790

Printer, publisher, scientist, diplomat as popular abroad as at home, and statesman, Franklin made his chief contributions to American letters outside the limits of literary art as an end in itself. For that reason his collected works are entered with those of his peers under General History, and reference is made to his educational and scientific writings under those topics. In this section devoted to literature are described only his Memoirs (now called his Autobiography), a collection of family letters, and certain witty pieces that indicate his place among humorists. The style of these less formal works preserves the flavor of the 18th century English essayists—Addison and Steele among others—who were his masters in the art of writing. Taken in conjunction with Poor Richard's Almanack, with which Franklin was associated from 1732 to 1758, they reveal the author's clarity of thought and expression, his proverbial wisdom, and his ability to record for posterity basic ideas influential in establishing American civilization as it was at the beginning of the National period. Recent studies of Franklin's relation to the American heritage include: Verner W. Crane's Benjamin Franklin and a Rising People (Boston, Little, Brown, 1954. 219 p.) and I. Bernard Cohen's Benjamin Franklin: His Contribution to the American Tradition (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1953. 320 p.). The latter publication belongs to the Makers of the American tradition series and consists of a collection of pertinent selections from Franklin's writings, accompanied by Professor Cohen's commentaries and an extensive introduction.

123. [Autobiography] Mémoires de la vie privée de Benjamin Franklin, écrits par lui-même, et adressés á son fils . . . Paris, Buisson, 1791. [207] p. 7–7839 E802.6.F7F1 RBD

First edition of the Autobiography, to the year 1731, with additional material translated from [James Jones?] Wilmer's Memoirs of the Late Dr. Benjamin Franklin (London, A. Grant, 1790. 94 p.). Cf. Paul L. Ford's Franklin Bibliography (Brooklyn, 1889. 467 p.), no. 383.

124. ——— Memoirs of the life and writings of Benjamin Franklin . . . written by himself to a late period, and continued to the time of his death, by his grandson, William Temple Franklin . . . and a selection from his political, philosophical, and miscellaneous works. London, H. Colburn, 1818. 3 v. 19–14887 E302.F82 1818 RBD

The Autobiography, in incomplete form but with various additions by W. T. Franklin, appears in volume one.

125. ——— Edited from his manuscript, with notes and an introd., by John Bigelow. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1868. 409 p. 14–14054 E302.6.F7A2 1868 RBD

The first appearance of the work from Franklin's own copy, the first publication in English of the four parts, and the first publication of the "outline" prepared by Franklin as a guide to be used when writing his own life. See Ford's Franklin Bibliography, no. 423.

126. ——— Memoirs. Parallel text ed., comprising the texts of Franklin's original manuscript, the French translation by Louis Guillaume le Veillard, the French translation published by Buisson, and the version edited by William Temple Franklin, his grandson. Edited with an introd. and explanatory notes, by Max Farrand. Published in cooperation with the Huntington Library. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1949. xxxix, 422 p. 49–8616 E302.6.F7A2 1949a

"Mr. Farrand's Introduction is a reprint, with a few minor revisions, of his article, 'Benjamin Franklin's Memoirs,' which appeared in the Huntington Library Bulletin, No. 10, October 1936." The essay includes a detailed statement of the difficulties surrounding the effort to establish a true text of Franklin's own composition, without changes and emendations by other hands. Column one of this edition is based on the manuscript in Franklin's own handwriting, now in the Huntington Library. Comparison with versions in the other three columns, and the faithfulness of the original manuscript to Franklin's style of writing, provide the student with the standard version as it exists today.

127. ——— Now printed for the first time from the manuscript as Franklin wrote it, and including his preliminary outline; with an introd. by Carl Van Doren and drawings by William Sharp. New York, Heritage Press, 1951. xix, 233 p. 51–4833 E302.6.F7A2 1951

128. Satires & bagatelles. [Compiled by Paul McPharlin.] Detroit, Fine Book Circle, 1937. 139 p. 37–16487 PS745.A3M25

129. The letters of Benjamin Franklin & Jane Mecom, edited with an introd. by Carl Van Doren. Princeton, Published for the American Philosophical Society by Princeton University Press, 1950. xx, 380 p. (Memoirs of the American Philosophical Society, v. 27.)

50–10857 E302.6.F75A185
Q11.P612, v. 27

130. Franklin's wit & folly: The bagatelles. Richard E. Amacher [editor] New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1953. xiv, 188 p. 53–11052 PS750.B3 1953
Bibliography: p. 177–184.
A collection based on a partial list of Franklin's imprints from his private press at Passy; includes several serious pieces but omits a few of the humorous pieces, or bagatelles, among them some of the best known. Important for critical and textual commentaries.

131. Representative selections, with introd. bibliography, and notes, by Frank Luther Mott and Chester E. Jorgenson. New York, American Book Co., 1936. clxxxviii, 544 p. (American writers series) 36–10175 PS745.A3M7
Includes an exact facsimile of Poor Richard Improved, 1753 (p. 225–260), a volume of a serial later published as Poor Richard's Almanack, a title by which the whole set is commonly known. For selected bibliography of works by and about Franklin see p. cli–clxxxviii.

132. A Benjamin Franklin reader. Edited by Nathan G. Goodman. New York, Crowell, 1945. xxi, 818 p. 45–10550 PS745.A3G5
Contains the Autobiography in the John Bigelow text. Additional selections include: expressions of Franklin's religious beliefs; papers reflecting his interests as an editor and publisher; selections from Poor Richard's Almanack; essays and humorous pieces; family papers; and miscellaneous letters and documents.

133. Autobiographical writings; selected and edited by Carl Van Doren. New York, Viking Press, 1945. xvi, 810 p.
45–9128 E302.6.F7A2 1945
A selection in large part brought together from various existing collected editions of Franklin's works, but includes also: 50 letters and other papers omitted by the most recent collected edition known to Van Doren; and 50 pieces not previously printed in full. Notes accompanying the selections indicate the sources used in preparing the texts.

134. PHILIP MORIN FRENEAU, 1752–1832

Journalist, editor, sea captain, farmer, and "poet of the American Revolution," Freneau was completely devoted to America and its way of life, an allegiance most significantly made manifest in his poetical works. These he wrote in two veins: lyrical, imaginative, and reflective poems concerned with nature and human destiny; and patriotic or political verses for the times, characterized by the vigor of their satire. In the first category the poems were early documents of the romantic movement in American literature, which reached its height in the next century. The second group was characterized by poems celebrating America and her struggle for independence and democracy, or castigating enemies of these ideals, whether in Britain or at home. "Literary Importations," a poem apparently written in 1786, gives characteristic expression to his zeal for an American culture entirely divorced from English influence. Critics have said that Freneau had the finest poetic talent produced in America after Edward Taylor and before William Cullen Bryant—an endowment sacrified in part to the making of propaganda verses. The poet's religious and philosophical speculations are considered in Nelson F. Adkins' Philip Freneau and the Cosmic Enigma (New York, New York University Press, 1949. 84 p.).

135. Poems written chiefly during the late war. Philadelphia, F. Bailey. 1786. 407 p.
PS755.A1 1786 RBD

136. Poems written and published during the American Revolutionary War, and now republished from the original manuscripts; interspersed with translations from the ancients, and other pieces not heretofore in print. 3d ed. Philadelphia, L. R. Bailey, 1809. 2 v.
30–20889 PS755.A2 1809 RBD

137. A collection of poems on American affairs, and a variety of other subjects chiefly moral and political; written between the year 1797 and the present time. New York, D. Longworth, 1815. 2 v. PS755.A2 1815 RBD

138. The poems of Philip Freneau, poet of the American Revolution. Edited for the Princeton Historical Association by Fred Lewis Pattee. Princeton, N. J., The University Library, 1902–07. 3 v. 3–9603 PS755.A2 1902
"Bibliography of the poetry of Philip Freneau": v. 3, p. 407–417.
The editor explains (v. 1, p. vi–vii) that the edition includes the most significant of Freneau's poems arranged in order of their first printing and in some cases, particularly those of the poetical pamphlets dealing with the American Revolution, in their original form, not as cut down later by Freneau.

The editions of 1786, 1788, 1795, 1809, and 1815 constitute the chief sources used by the editor.

139. Poems. Edited with a critical introd. by Harry Hayden Clark. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1929. lxiii, 425 p. (American authors series; general editor, Stanley T. Williams)
29–21609 PS755.A5C6
"Selected reading list": p. lxi–lxiii.

140. Miscellaneous works containing his essays, and additional poems. Philadelphia, F. Bailey, 1788. xii, 429 p.
32–15552 PS755.A1 1788 RBD

141. Letters on various interesting and important subjects; many of which have appeared in the Aurora. Corr. and much enl. by Robert Slender, O. S. M. [pseud.] Philadelphia, Printed for the author, from the press of D. Hogan, 1799. viii, 142 p.
19–2090 AC901.T5, v. 7 RBD
PS757.L4 1799 RBD
[Thorndike pamphlets, v. 7, no. 14.]

142. ——— With an introd. and a bibliographical note by Harry Hayden Clark. New York, Scholars' Facsimiles & Reprints, 1943. vi p., facsim.: 142 p. 43–6720 PS757.L4 1799a
"Bibliographical note": p. vi.

143. Prose. Selected and edited by Philip M. Marsh. New Brunswick, N. J., Scarecrow Press, 1955. xii, 596 p.
55–14358 PS755.A5M3

144. THOMAS GODFREY, 1736–1763

Before the social and political upheavals of the Revolutionary period had begun to change a group of colonies into a nation, British models frequently were used by the few Americans writing in the belletristic tradition. Godfrey's literary output, small as it was, showed this influence. Debts to the Cavalier poets are apparent in his love songs, while The Court of Fancy (1762) was, according to his own statement, imitative of Chaucer and Pope. All the poems, however, showed a promise that might have been realized but for the writer's untimely death. His one play, a romantic drama located in Parthia at the beginning of the Christian era, is obviously in the Elizabethan manner, although its individual merits include sound construction and effective use of blank verse. It is interesting to note that his play was a genuine "first": the first tragedy written in America by an American that was acted on the professional stage in America. Members of the Philadelphia group of creative artists who were Godfrey's friends and associates included Benjamin West, the painter, and Francis Hopkinson, the poet and composer. Together they took part in laying foundations for American art, music, and literature upon which later generations were able to build.

145. Juvenile poems on various subjects. With The Prince of Parthia . . . To which is prefixed Some account of the author and his writings. Philadelphia, Printed by H. Miller, 1765. xxvi, 223 p. 34–35375 PS761.A1 1765 RBD
Posthumously published through the efforts of the author's mentor and admirer, William Smith, provost of the College of Philadelphia, and of his friend, Nathaniel Evans. Reprints of The Prince of Parthia include the following: one edited with commentary by Archibald Henderson (Boston, Little, Brown, 1917. 189 p.) and a second in Montrose J. Moses' Representative Plays by American Dramatists (no. 2347).

146. FRANCIS HOPKINSON, 1737–1791

Pennsylvania and New Jersey were the scenes of Hopkinson's multiple activities as merchant, lawyer, citizen, musician, writer, and cultivated amateur of science and art. While he received assignments of such importance as membership in the Continental Congress, in which he voted for the Declaration of Independence and became one of its signers, he continued to write. Songs, poems, essays, and ballads constitute characteristic examples of the forms in which he expressed his artistic, literary, and political interests. Since only a partial collection of his writings has been made, George E. Hastings' The Life and Works of Francis Hopkinson (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1926. [517] p.) has value not only for its critical comments but also for numerous excerpts from the writings, and for the bibliography it provides. Hopkinson's ardent patriotism and his use of native themes are evidence of a growing national spirit as the country emerged from colonial status to independent power.

147. A pretty story . . . By Peter Grievous, esquire, A. B. C. D. E. [pseud.] Williamsburg, [Va.], J. Pinkney, 1774. 16 p.
19–4136 E187.C72, v. 12 RBD
[Colonial pamphlets, v. 12, no. 9.]
A political satire on the administration of the British colonies in North America, and the causes of the Revolution.
First and 2d editions have imprint: Philadelphia, Printed and sold by John Dunlap, 1774.

Reprinted in 1857 and 1864 with title: The Old Farm and the New Farm: A Political Allegory.

148. Miscellaneous essays and occasional writings. Philadelphia, T. Dobson, 1792. 3 v.
5–30697 PS775.A1 1792 RBD

See v. 2, p. 146–160, for "A Letter on Whitewashing" [1785] and v. 3, p. 169–173, for "The Battle of the Kegs" [1779]. The former is an Addisonian essay satirizing American methods of house cleaning; the latter is a ballad on the American attempt to use kegs of gunpowder as floating mines against the British.

149. THOMAS JEFFERSON, 1743–1826

Jefferson's rank with the foremost statesmen of the United States automatically places the main body of his writings in the section of this bibliography devoted to the general history of the Nation. The one book described here consists of essays written in response to a series of questions that originated in an undertaking by the French Government to collect information about the several American states. The questions relating to Virginia were referred to Jefferson, and his answers constitute his Notes on the State of Virginia. The vigor and distinction of expression that characterized the book, its notable descriptions of the physical aspect of the state, the range and interest of its scientific observations, the views expressed on philosophy and morality, and the enlightenment evident in the writer's opinions about slavery and the Indians are among the elements that have established the book in its place with American literary classics.

150. Notes on the State of Virginia; written in the year 1781, somewhat corr. and enl. in the winter of 1782, for the use of a foreigner of distinction, in answer to certain queries proposed by him . . . 1782. [Paris, 1785] 391 p.
1–2904 F230.J40 RBD

First edition: 200 copies printed for private distribution.

151. Notes on the State of Virginia. Philadelphia, Prichard & Hall, 1788. 244 p.
Rc–2820 F230.J42 RBD

First American edition.

152. ——— In The writings of Thomas Jefferson. Collected and edited by Paul Leicester Ford. v. 3. New York, Putnam, 1892–99. p. 68–295. 2–5666 E302.J466, v. 3

153. ——— Edited with an introd. and notes by William Peden. Chapel Hill, Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture, Williamsburg, Va., by the University of North Carolina Press, 1955 [1954] xxv, 315 p. maps.
55–14659 F230.J5102 1955

154. THOMAS PAINE, 1737–1809

At heart a radical and a reformer, Paine had never been successful in earning a living in his native country, England. Having won an introduction from Benjamin Franklin, who was impressed by his abilities, he sought new opportunities in America. There he rapidly made connections that resulted in his becoming a journalist and a pamphleteer whose writings exerted a "prodigious" influence in the formation of public opinion favorable to the American Revolution. As an internationalist willing to participate always in the cause of human freedom from oppression, he was later associated with the moderate republicans in France, taking part with them in developing the French Revolution until it was taken over by violent elements and became the Terror. Returning to America, Paine found his earlier contributions frowned on by certain conservative leaders in the new republic. Since that time his character and his thought have been subjects of recurring, often uninformed, controversy. His reputation as a propagandist of genius is assured, however; and he takes his place among American men of letters on the basis of his accomplishments as a literary stylist. Thomas Jefferson, commenting on this aspect of Paine's work, wrote: "No writer has exceeded Paine in ease and familiarity of style, in perspicuity of expression, happiness of elucidation, and in simple and unassuming language."

155. Writings collected and edited by Moncure Conway. New York, Putnam, 1894–96. 4 v.
4–1936 JC177.A3 1894

Partial Contents.—v. 1, p. 67–120, Common sense [1776]; p. 168–380, The American crisis [1776–83].—v. 2, p. 258–389, The rights of man [1791]; p. 390–583, The rights of man, part second [1792].—v. 4, p. 1–84, The age of reason [1794]; p. 85–195, The age of reason, part second [1795].

156. The complete writings of Thomas Paine, collected and edited by Philip S. Foner, Ph. D., with a biographical essay, and notes and introductions presenting the historical background of Paine's writings. New York, Citadel Press, 1945. 2 v.
45–2289 JC177.A3 1945

157. Selections. Edited with an introd. by Arthur Wallace Peach. New York, Harcourt, Brace,

1928. liii, 378 p. (American authors series; general editor, Stanley T. Williams)
28–22448 JC177.A5 1928
Reading list: p. li–liii.

158. Representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Henry Hayden Clark. New York, American Book Co., 1944. cli, 436 p. (American writers series)
44–3959 JC177.A5 1944
"Selected bibliography": p. cxxv–cli.

159. Selected work of Tom Paine. Edited by Howard Fast. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1945. xiii, 338 p.
45–2364 JC177.A5 1945

160. Common sense, and other political writings. Edited with an introd. by Nelson F. Adkins. New York, Liberal Arts Press, 1953. liii, 184 p. (American heritage series, no. 5)
53–11326 JC177.A5 1953
Bibliography: p. l–liii.

161. SUSANNA (HASWELL) ROWSON, 1762–1824

During the Revolutionary period, writing in America reached its greatest distinction in the works of its statesmen, rather than in the sphere of belles-lettres. The art of fiction, particularly, lagged in its transit to the New World, where the battle for survival absorbed the energies of the people and where the Puritan tradition was against books that were not predominantly serious and edifying. As the 18th century wore on, however, an increasing appetite for imported fiction became apparent, with the result that sentimental and didactic novels began to be written in America for this waiting audience, composed chiefly of women. Among early books of this type, Mrs. Rowson's Charlotte Temple in its long history has achieved the status of one of the country's all-time best sellers. Born in England but permanently settled in America for the last 30 years of her life, the author produced a novel highly moral in tone, straightforward in narrative interest, and abundantly supplied with details of an exciting seduction. According to R. W. G. Vail's Susanna Haswell Rowson (Worcester, Mass., American Antiquarian Society, 1933. 116 p.), the book has gone through more than 200 editions and has been read possibly by half a million individuals. The vogue of novel-reading was deplored by the Nation's intellectuals, while the books were being devoured by their wives and mothers and daughters. In the case of Mrs. Rowson's most characteristic works, light is cast on 18th-century standards of morality for the two sexes, on the circumscribed lives and interests of average American women, and on the details of daily domestic life at the time.

162. Charlotte; a tale of truth. Philadelphia, M. Carey, 1794. 2 v. in 1. (87, 83 p.)
6–4924 PS2736.R3C5 RBD
First American edition, from the first edition published in London, 1790; later editions have title: Charlotte Temple.

163. Charlotte Temple; a tale of truth . . . With an historical and biographical introd., bibliography, etc., by Francis W. Halsey. New York, Funk & Wagnalls, 1905. cix, 131, 150 p. illus.
5–39587 PZ3.R799C30 RBD
"The best of all editions, including a long and valuable historical introduction, a bibliographical checklist of editions which, however, contains many errors and duplications, numerous footnotes, and seventeen illustrations."—Vail, p. 81.

164. Reuben and Rachel; or, Tales of old times. Boston, D. West, 1798. 2 v. in 1 (364 p.)
8–945 PZ3.R799Reu RBD
Historical and sentimental romance beginning with the life of Christopher Columbus and ending in 18th century America. An early example of an American novel introducing idealized Indian characters.

165. JOHN TRUMBULL, 1750–1831

Trumbull has been called the most gifted of the Connecticut Wits, with whom he was associated in efforts to improve education provided by Yale College and to promote a taste for literature in America. Since his own taste was for satire, his style was greatly influenced by such English writers as Samuel Butler and Jonathan Swift; but the content of what he wrote was American throughout. Although he wrote two series of prose essays satirizing the errors he observed in Connecticut dignitaries and the culture they were attempting to create, his principal medium was poetry. At the Yale commencement of 1770, he recited a poem attacking the existing curriculum and making a plea for replacing the heavy concentrations in mathematics, metaphysics, and logic by courses in the fine arts, particularly in "polite literature." In the section of the poem devoted to the future of American literature he prophesied that in his native land writers, born and nurtured there, would be the equals of England's Addison, Swift, and Shakespeare. The Progress of Dullness, a trilogy in verse, also satirized existing methods of education and emphasized the folly of contributing to the vanity and light-mindedness of women by depriving them of higher education. Trumbull's principal literary achievement, however, was the mock-epic, M'Fingal, a political satire against the British and in praise of American Whigs in relation to the Revolution. This work was enormously popular, being hawked about, as the author said, by peddlers and petty chapmen. Not only did it delight contemporary audiences, but it was also preserved for later generations in various mediums such as school readers. Thus, over an extended period of time, it was a poem not often surpassed in favor until Longfellow's poems became household words.

166. An essay on the use and advantages of the fine arts. Delivered at the public commencement in New Haven, Sept. 12, 1770. New Haven, Conn., T. & S. Green [1770] 16 p.
AC901.W8, v. 20 RBD
Wolcott pamphlets, v. 20, no. 5.

167. Poetical works. Containing M'Fingal [1782], a modern epic poem, rev. and corr., with copious explanatory notes; The progress of dullness [1772–1773]; and a collection of poems on various subjects, written before and during the Revolutionary War. Hartford, Conn., S. G. Goodrich, 1820. 2 v. 30–20909 PS852.A1 1820 RBD
A Memoir of the Author, said to be Trumbull's own autobiography, appears in volume one.
——— Reprint. In The Colonnade, v. 14, 1919–1922, pt. 2. New York, Andiron Club of New York City, 1922. p. [287]–538.
AP2.C662, v. 14
The reprint was edited by Arthur H. Nason.

168. ROYALL TYLER, 1757–1826

A lawyer who attained the dignity of becoming chief justice of the Supreme Court of Vermont, Tyler takes his place in the annals of American literature chiefly because he was the author of the first social comedy written and staged in the United States, for and about Americans. While it follows the design of Richard Brinsley Sheridan's The School for Scandal, seen by Tyler in its New York production, the prologue of his own play specifically states his purpose to provide a drama that Americans might call their own. The "contrast" from which the piece takes its title is between American character and society, portrayed as fundamentally simple and marked by "probity, virtue, and honor," and other characters and societies in which European polish is assumed to have produced a combination of sophistication, foppishness, and falseness. Born in Boston and educated at Harvard, Tyler was particularly well equipped to create his Yankee character, "Jonathan," whose combination of New England sturdiness and provincial simplicity was influential in establishing a "type" character portrayed in later popular "Yankee plays." The Contrast also has the merit of contributing to an understanding of the social history of New York towards the end of the 18th century, by detailed treatment of conversation, manners, dress, and atmosphere. Tyler was a prolific and witty contributor of essays and poems to the periodical press of the time. He has also to his credit several plays less important than The Contrast; a novel, The Algerine Captive (1797), based on the captivity of a member of his family enslaved by the Algerians; and Yankee in London (1809), a series of fictional letters accepted as authentic at the time.

169. The contrast, a comedy in five acts. Written by a citizen of the United States; performed with applause at the theatres in New-York, Philadelphia, and Maryland. Philadelphia, Prichard & Hall, 1790. 79 p.
7–27486 PS855.T7C6 1790 RBD
Produced in 1787.

170. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1920. xxxviii, 120 p. facsims.
21–824 PS855.T7C6 1920 RBD
Reprints may be located in various collections described in the section on Anthologies, as follows: Montrose J. Moses' Representative Plays by American Dramatists (no. 2347); Allan G. Halline's American Plays (no. 2337); and Arthur H. Quinn's Representative American Plays, 7th ed. (New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1953).

171. MASON LOCKE WEEMS, 1759–1825

One of the talents attributed to the eccentric "Parson" Weems is that of making facts perform antics according to his will. This gift was employed to the full in developing his fictionized biographies. While he wrote lives of William Penn and Benjamin Franklin, Weems exercised his imagination with particular expansiveness when dealing with the personalities and exploits of two Revolutionary generals: George Washington and Francis Marion. His "life" of Washington, issued as a small pamphlet the year after Washington's death, was later published in enlarged form and under several titles. It is said that the various editions of the work were represented by at least 84 printings within 30 years. The spread of these recurring publications throughout the United States contributed to creating in the public mind an idea of Washington the hero that became a mythical symbol of the greatness of America. Weems was an ordained clergyman whose greatest passion was for reading "good and improving books," and for 31 years his principal occupation was that of an itinerant bookseller. Traveling up and down the Atlantic seaboard and westward towards Pennsylvania, he distributed books that helped to keep reading alive among the scattered farms and towns of a country devoid of adequate means of communication. The letters written during his wanderings, particularly those addressed to Mathew Carey, the Philadelphia publisher, are significant documents in the history of American literary taste and of the spread of culture in the United States.

172. A history, of the life and death, virtues, and exploits, of General George Washington; dedicated to Mrs. Washington . . . George-Town [D. C.] Printed for the Rev. M. L. Weems by Green & English [1800] 80 p. NN

173. A history of the life and death, virtues, and exploits of General George Washington. Faithfully taken from authentic documents, and, now, in a 2d ed. improved . . . Philadelphia, Reprinted by John Bioren, for the author [1800] 82 p. 15–10673 E312.W347 RBD

174. The life of Washington the Great, enriched with a number of very curious anecdotes . . . 5th ed. Augusta, Reprinted by Geo. F. Randolph, 1806. 80 p. NN

Text rewritten; the story of the hatchet and the cherry tree appears here for the first time.

175. The life of George Washington; with curious anecdotes, equally honorable to himself and exemplary to his young countrymen. 10th ed., greatly improved. Philadelphia, M. Carey, 1810. 228 p. illus. 15–3829 E312.W372

176. A history of the life and death, virtues & exploits of General George Washington. [New York] Macy-Masius, 1927. 374 p. (An American bookshelf [2]) 27–27804 E312.W3894

"The present text is taken from one of the later editions . . ."—Editor's note signed: M. V. D. [i. e. Mark Van Doren].

177. Mason Locke Weems, his works and ways. In three volumes. [1] A bibliography left unfinished by Paul Leicester Ford. [2–3. Letters 1784–1825] Edited by Emily E. F. Skeel. New York, 1829. 3 v. illus. 29–3631 Z8962.S62

Most of the letters are addressed to Mathew Carey.

Sources consulted: v. 1, p. 345–385.

178. JOHN WOOLMAN, 1720–1772

Nearly 20 years before the signing of the Declaration of Independence, Woolman had already declared his belief that liberty was the natural right of all men equally. To the realization of that conviction he devoted his life, as a sort of itinerant apostle of a righteous social gospel for his country and the world. His was the strongest American voice raised in his time against Negro slavery; after he was dead his written words still spoke powerfully in support of the antislavery movement. The increase of greed leading to a materialistic philosophy of life, the employment of workers in dangerous trades, the conduct of schools—these and other problems in American society he sought to solve with wisdom in advance of his time. Written by this Quaker mystic who earned his bread by tailoring, the journal and essays he contributed to American literature give evidence of the impact of the Friends on the civilization of the country. Critics agree, moreover, that the journal is a classic of the inner life, as Franklin's almost contemporary autobiography is a classic record of a man at home in the 18th century world. No mention of Woolman as a writer, however brief, would be complete without the often-repeated advice from Charles Lamb to the Reader: "Get the writings of John Woolman by heart."

179. Journal. With an introd. by John G. Whittier. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1871. viii, 315 p. BX7795.W7A3 1871 RBD

180. ——— New century ed. London, Headley, 1900. ix, 336 p. 1–25198 BX7795.W7A3

Includes A Word of Remembrance and Caution to the Rich, other addenda, and a bibliography (p. 301–325).

181. ——— New York, Dutton, 1922. xix, 250 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys. Biography [no. 402]) 36–37445 AC1.E8, no. 402

Text based on the edition by John Greenleaf Whittier, with a few omissions; includes several additional pieces by Woolman.

Introduction by Vida D. Scudder.

List of the works of John Woolman: p. xix.

182. ——— Edited by Janet Whitney. Chicago, H. Regnery, 1950. [xv] 233 p. 50–10962 BX7795.W7A3 1950

183. ——— Edited and with introd. by Thomas S. Kepler. Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1954. xx, 235 p. (World devotional classics)
54–5339 BX7795.W7A3 1954

184. Works. In two parts. Philadelphia, J. Crukshank, 1774. xiv, 436 p.
36–21088 BX7617.W6 1774 RBD

The Journal constitutes part one; miscellaneous writings are contained in part two.

185. Journal and essays. Edited from the original manuscripts with a biographical introd. by Amelia Mott Gummere. New York, Macmillan, 1922. xxii, 643 p.
22–24117 BX7795.W7A3 1922

C. Nationalism, Sectionalism, and Schism (1820–1870)

Literature in America between 1820 and 1870 was the mirror of a society in which tremendous energy was at work. A surge of migration westward pushed the frontier past the fertile Middle West to the grainlands of the Middle Border and beyond. In 1848 the discovery of gold in California caused a rush to the Pacific Coast. Immigrants from Britain and Europe, attracted by the vision of a land of opportunity, came to America in great numbers, frequently to find themselves forced to sell their labor cheaply. But the availability of western lands and the rapidly expanding economy of the Nation as a whole enabled them to prosper and to remain, thus adding rich new elements to the culture of the United States. In the expanding economy transportation became a prime necessity. Horses and vehicles, long the only means of conveyance even for great distances, were replaced. Steamboats that plied the natural waterways and great canals built to float them then became the preferred carriers, only to be superseded in their turn by railroads that began to reach farther and farther across the continent. New and old sections of the country were conscious of the importance of their regions and of their mission to prosper even at the expense of other sections.

Tensions grew between sections, particularly between the industrial North and the agrarian South, with its rich plantation economy based on slave labor. While jealousies and conflicts of interests increased, slavery and its expansion into new states and territories became an issue upon which the public mind was inflamed. In 1851–52 Harriet Beecher Stowe wrote her powerful antislavery novel, Uncle Tom's Cabin, thereby helping to "loose the fateful lightning" that led to the conflagration of the Civil War. By 1865 sectional differences had been settled by force of arms. The South was in ruins; but slavery was gone; and Abraham Lincoln's persuasive plea for "a new birth of freedom" was being answered, slowly and with suffering, while the reconstruction of the South progressed.

During and after the years that saw such cataclysmic forces at work in American civilization, literature emerged into a phase of growing nationalism. James Fenimore Cooper's historical novels of bygone days in America, and Washington Irving's familiar essays, sketches, and folk tales of old New York State attracted delighted attention abroad as well as at home. Another development that was popular outside as well as within the United States was the emergence in literature of humor native to America. Such writings were often associated with the frontier and with the oddly assorted characters who gravitated there, uttering homely philosophies of life in strange dialects. The Puritan heritage of solemnity was thus mitigated.

Another Puritan and Calvinistic concept, that of "sinners in the hands of an angry God," also was changed by the Unitarian doctrines convincingly enunciated by William Ellery Channing, in which were set forth man's innate innocence and goodness and the love of God for humanity. The same trend of thought led to the optimism, self-reliance, utopianism, democracy, and belief in the Over-Soul associated with Ralph Waldo Emerson and his circle of Transcendentalists. The group under these influences included Nathaniel Hawthorne, Henry D. Thoreau, Herman Melville, and Walt Whitman. Their novels, short stories, essays, poems, and miscellaneous prose were of such excellence as to win for the period of their publication the term "American Renaissance."

A gradually widening diffusion of education, ever the accompaniment of a renaissance of culture, enlarged the audience of readers to whom a native literature appealed. Literary periodicals therefore increased in number, bringing in their train editors, critics, and contributors who formed groups of "literati." While not always individually important, these circles by their work provided mediums of publication for better writers and thus contributed to raising the level of reading interest. In formal education, Harvard, oldest of the Nation's universities, gathered into its faculties men of learning who were also writers of distinction. On the roster of such names Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, and Oliver Wendell Holmes stand high.

Even if time and space availed to assess more developments in American literature during these 50 years, the record would always be incomplete without recognition of the romanticism, more easily felt than defined, that pervaded much of the writing of the period. Cooper's noble Red Man, Longfellow's idealization of themes drawn from American history, the Transcendentalism of Emerson, Edgar Allan Poe's mystery and other worldliness, Melville's exotic South Pacific islanders, Whitman's chants of democracy and individualism, John Greenleaf Whittier's celebration of simple people and natural beauty, and the doctrine of "progressive improvement" which suffused the thought and attitudes of so many minor, and not a few major, writers, all reflect the romantic impulse simultaneously at work in Britain, Europe, and America. Thus out of colonialism, provincialism, and small beginnings, American literature entered the stream of world literature to enrich it permanently.

186. AMOS BRONSON ALCOTT, 1799–1888

The enormous mass of Alcott's journals constitutes the best part of his literary lifework. Published selections from these document the thoughts expressed in his lectures and his ideas about educational reform, philosophy, religion, and communal living at Fruitlands. A member of the Concord group and an intimate associate of Emerson and Thoreau, he was a mystic and a Transcendentalist of the most idealistic type. His place in American life and thought is treated in his biography, Pedlar's Progress, by Odell Shepard (Boston, Little, Brown, 1937. 546 p.).

187. Journals. Selected and edited by Odell Shepard. Boston, Little, Brown, 1938. 559 p.
38–27766 PS1013.A4 1938

188. LOUISA MAY ALCOTT, 1832–1888

Miss Alcott's books for children are the distillation of experiences shared by Amos Bronson Alcott's four daughters, of whom Louisa May was the second. The father's extreme Transcendentalism resulted in economic hardships for his family. These are chronicled as part of life in New England during and after the Civil War. Told with sentiment, humor, pathos, and realism the stories have been dear to every generation of American children and parents since they were written. A recent study of this author is Madeleine B. Stern's Louisa May Alcott (Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1950. 424 p.), in which see particularly the bibliography of sources consulted, p. 361–407.

189. Little women; or, Meg, Jo, Beth and Amy. Boston, Roberts, 1868–69. 2 v. ViU

Frequently reprinted in modern editions, as in the Modern Library of the world's best books series (New York, Modern Library, 1950. 596 p.).

190. TIMOTHY SHAY ARTHUR, 1809–1885

Full of the reforming spirit and devotion to good causes characteristic of the mid-nineteenth century in America, Arthur became a prolific writer of moralizing tales, particularly in support of the temperance movement. These were widely read and approved, as were the magazines he edited and published. Among the latter Arthur's Home Magazine and The Children's Hour were particularly successful.

191. Ten nights in a bar-room, and what I saw there. Philadelphia, J. W. Bradley, 1854. 240 p. MH

192. GEORGE WILLIAM BAGBY, 1828–1883

Bagby's lectures, sketches, and familiar essays frequently appeared first as letters and editorials in newspapers and periodicals with which the writer was connected as a journalist or as an editor. His work was done between 1854 and 1882 and much of it appeared as ephemera that is now rare or lost. The residue, best seen in a modern collected edition, is of three types: idealized portrayals of plantation life in Bagby's native state, Virginia, before the Civil War; realistic and humorous sketches in "country" dialect represented by the type of misspelling considered amusing at the time; and humorous, affectionate representations of the psychology and speech of Negro slaves.

193. The Old Virginia gentleman, and other sketches. Edited and arr. by his daughter, Ellen M. Bagby. [5th ed.] Richmond, Dietz Press, 1948. xxvii, 318 p.
48–11917 F230.B14 1948

Bibliography: p. [315]–318.

194. JOSEPH GLOVER BALDWIN, 1815–1864

Baldwin's sketches preserve impressions of his life as a lawyer during a practice of some 18 years in Mississippi and Alabama when both states were on the old southwestern frontier. The back woods lawyers, wildcat speculators, gamblers, braggarts, and brave men who were typical of the time and place are treated with satiric humor and realism in what has been called a minor American classic.

195. The flush times of Alabama and Mississippi. New York, Appleton, 1853. 330 p.
16–9738 F327.B18 RBD

196. ——— 2d ed. New York, Appleton, 1854. x, 330 p. 11–32574 F327.B182

197. ——— Americus, Ga., Americus Book Co., 1908. vii, 330 p. 16–11135 F327.B189

198. JAMES NELSON BARKER, 1784–1858

Barker's contribution to the development of American drama apparently was inspired by a belief in the art of theater as part of the cultural life of a nation. His was one of the first voices raised in praise of the use of national themes and against Americans remaining "mental colonists" of Great Britain. Applying his own theories, he wrote a play based on the Pocahontas story, a pioneer work in the long tradition of romanticizing that legend in particular and the Red Man in general. Barker's most substantial play, a tragedy in blank verse, also derived its plot from American colonial history, this time weaving together "superstitious" fears of witchcraft in Massachusetts and conflicts with Indians in the same area. The work illustrates an early treatment of themes derived from Puritan ideology that reappeared repeatedly in American literature. Tears and Smiles (produced 1807, published 1808) used the technique of a comedy of manners to satirize social life and customs in Philadelphia. The text of the original edition, not previously reprinted, is included in James Nelson Barker, 1784–1858 (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1929) p. 138–207, a study by Paul H. Musser.

199. The Indian princess; or, La belle sauvage. Philadelphia, G. E. Blake, 1808. 74 p.
1–2075 PS1065.B83I6 1808 RBD

A musical play called "an operatic melodrame." The music by John Bray is not included in this edition. For a reprint see Representative Plays by American Dramatists, edited by Montrose J. Moses (no. 2347).

200. The tragedy of Superstition. Carefully corrected from the prompt books of the Philadelphia theatre. By M. Lopez, prompter. [Philadelphia] A. R. Poole [1826] 68 p. (Lopez & Wemyss' edition. Acting American theatre [no. 3])
27–23186 PS1065.B83T7 1826

For reprints see American Plays, selected and edited by Allan G. Halline (no. 2337), and the seventh edition of Arthur H. Quinn's Representative American Plays.

201. ROBERT MONTGOMERY BIRD, 1806–1854

Author of blank verse dramas on classical themes, or inspired by Spanish colonial life in the New World, which were produced with marked success by Edwin Forrest, Bird is perhaps most frequently mentioned as a historical novelist of frontier life about the close of the Revolution. Written in the romantic tradition of good story telling, Nick of the Woods represents a deliberate effort to provide the correction of idealizations of "the noble savage" by giving realistic portrayals of uncivilized and cruel Indians and by emphasizing the contributions made by white pioneers to the westward transit of civilization in America. The book also records the exploits of a lawless frontiersman, "Roaring Ralph Stackpole."

202. Nick of the woods; or, The Jibbenainosay. A tale of Kentucky, by the author of Calavar. Philadelphia, Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1837. 2 v.
6–13129 PZ3.B532N RBD

203. ——— New ed., rev. by author. New York, Redfield, 1853. xi, 391 p.
8–34324 PZ3.B532N4

204. ——— Edited, with an introd., chronology, and bibliography, by Cecil B. Williams. New York, American Book Co., 1939. lxxv, 408 p. (American fiction series; general editor, H. H. Clark) 39–15203 PZ3.B532N15

"Selected bibliography": p. lxvi–lxxv.

The text is that of the edition of 1853. Cf. Preface, p. v.

205. Dramatic works. In Foust, Clement E. The life and dramatic works of Robert Montgomery Bird. New York, Knickerbocker Press, 1919. p. 169–722. 21–733 PS1099.B5Z72

Thesis (Ph. D.)—University of Pennsylvania.

Bibliography: p. 161–167.

"Of the four plays in this volume, Pelopidas, The Gladiator, and Oralloossa appear in print for the first time. The Broker of Bogota was first published in Prof. A. H. Quinn's recent volume, Representative American Plays [1917] . . ." Preface, p. vi.

206. GEORGE HENRY BOKER, 1823–1890

Boker was an American dramatist who turned to the history and literature of England, Spain, and Italy for inspiration. His noteworthy Francesca da Rimini, first produced in 1855, was revived with success as late as 1901. As a poet he is remembered not only for his posthumous Sonnets (1929) edited by Sculley Bradley, but also for Poems of the War (1864) composed chiefly as patriotic verses for publication in newspapers during the Civil War. "Our Heroic Themes," a poem read before the Phi Beta Kappa Society of Harvard University on July 20, 1865, contains an eloquent tribute to Lincoln.

207. Plays and poems. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1856. 2 v. CtY

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Plays: Calaynos; Anne Boleyn; Leonor de Guzman; Francesca da Rimini.—v. 2. Plays: The betrothal; The widow's marriage.—Poems.

208. ——— 2d ed. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1857. 2 v. 20–17126 PS1105.A1 1857

Francesca da Rimini is included in American Plays, edited by Allan G. Halline (no. 2337), and in Representative American Plays, 7th ed., edited by Arthur H. Quinn.

209. CHARLES FARRAR BROWNE ("ARTEMUS WARD"), 1834–1867

The lectures, newspaper columns, and books produced by Browne under his pseudonym of "Artemus Ward" became enormously popular and helped to contribute to the establishment of a tradition of native American humor which came to full fruition in Mark Twain's writings. Browne, through the pages of Punch, as well as on the lecture platform, also won sustained applause in England. His backwoods philosophers and Down East characters, whose sayings were enriched by absurd misspellings, were used by their creator to satirize sham and hypocrisy wherever discovered. Browne's humor was particularly admired by Abraham Lincoln.

210. Artemus Ward, his book. New York, Carleton, 1862. x, [17–262] p.
36–29489 PN6161.B735 1862 RBD

211. Artemus Ward; his travels. With comic illus. by Mullen. New York, Carleton, 1865. 231 p. 3–25798 PN6161.B737 1865 RBD

CONTENTS.—pt. 1. Miscellaneous.—pt. 2. Among the Mormans.

212. Complete works of Artemus Ward [pseud.] With a biographical sketch (by Melville D. Landon, "Eli Perkins") [Complete ed.] New York, Carleton, 1879. 347 p. CSmH

213. ——— Rev. ed. New York, G. W. Dillingham, 1898. 449 p. illus.
98–564 PN6161.B73 1898

214. Artemus Ward's best stories. Edited by Clifton Johnson; with an introd. by W. D. Howells. Illustrated by Frank A. Nankivell. New York, Harper, 1912. xv, 274 p.
12–22824 PN6161.B739

215. Selected works of Artemus Ward [pseud.] Edited with an introd. by Albert Jay Nock. New York, Boni, 1924. 295 p.
25–2376 PS1141.N6

216. WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, 1794–1878

During the early years of the 19th century the poets widely read in the United States were predominantly British. Scott, Burns, and Byron particularly appealed to the current taste for romance, sentiment, minstrelsy, and adventure. Not until the 1830's, after the publication of poems by the New Englander, Bryant, did American critics concede the arrival of a major national poet. Bryant's work is preeminently that of a poet who thought abstractly and reflectively about nature and man in relation one to the other, and whose expression has a classical quality. Interwoven in his poems are the universal themes of human freedom, suffering, death, faith, and immortality. His Lectures on Poetry, delivered in 1825, contains an eloquent and explicit statement of his poetic principles, which invites comparison with Poe's The Poetic Principle (1850). Bryant's influence on public opinion in America, literary and otherwise, was extended by his long career as a journalist, particularly during his editorship of the New York Evening Post, from 1829 to 1878. Throughout his life he was consistently a champion of the liberal position on national problems, such as slavery, free trade, and free speech.

217. Poems. Cambridge, Mass., Hilliard & Metcalf, 1821. 44 p.
21–13044 PS1150.E21 RBD

CONTENTS.—The ages.—To a waterfowl.—Translation of a fragment of Simonides.—Inscription for the entrance into a wood.—The yellow violet.—Song.—Green river.—Thanatopsis.

218. ——— New-York, E. Bliss, 1832. 240 p.
6–7137 PS1150.E32 RBD

Includes the eight poems published in 1821, and 81 others, most of which had appeared in different periodicals.

219. ——— Edited by Washington Irving. London, J. Andrews, 1832. xii, 235 p.
16–4995 PS1150.E32a RBD
First London edition, dedicated to Samuel Rogers, by Irving, and containing the same poems as the New York edition of the same date.

220. ——— Collected and arr. by the author. New York, Appleton [1876] 501 p. illus.
21–13049 PS1150.E76
Last edition which passed through Bryant's hands; includes final text of poems.

221. ——— Selected and edited with a commentary by Louis Untermeyer, and illustrated with engravings by Thomas W. Nason. New York, Limited Editions Club, 1947. xix, 298 p.
47–3186 PS1151.U5 RBD

222. Letters of a traveller; or, Notes of things seen in Europe and America. New York, Putnam, 1850. 442 p.
26–21283 G470.B8 1850 RBD

223. The life and works of William Cullen Bryant. New York, Appleton, 1883–84. 6 v.
17–16129 PS1150.E83
Edited by Parke Godwin.
CONTENTS.—1–2. A biography of William Cullen Bryant, with extracts from his private correspondence.—3–4. The poetical works . . .—5–6. Prose writings.

224. Poetical works. Roslyn ed.; with chronologies of Bryant's life and poems, and bibliography of his writings by Henry C. Sturges, and a memoir of his life by Richard Henry Stoddard. New York, Appleton, 1903. cxxx, 418 p.
3–22094 PS1150.F03

225. Representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Tremaine McDowell, New York, American Book Co., 1935. lxxxii, 426 p. (American writers series)
35–8651 PS1153.M25
"Selected bibliography": p. lxxiii–lxxxii.

226. WILLIAM ALEXANDER CARUTHERS, 1800 (ca.)–1846

Caruthers was one of several Southern writers of the period who turned to local history for the sources of novels. Two romances celebrate the past history of his native state, Virginia, through the use of such famous episodes as Bacon's Rebellion (1676) and Governor Alexander Spotswood's exploration in 1716 of what was then the western wilderness, now the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia. His first novel, The Kentuckian in New York (1834) is an epistolary work of contemporary sentiment and manners in which interests of the North and South are mingled. A recent biographical and bibliographical study of Caruthers has been made by Curtis C. Davis in his Chronicler of the Cavaliers (Richmond, Dietz Press, 1953. 570 p.).

227. The cavaliers of Virginia; or, The recluse of Jamestown. New York, Harper, 1834–35. 2 v. in 1. (228, 246 p.) 41–32194 PZ3.253Cav2
41–32194 PZ3.C253Cav2

228. The knights of the horseshoe. Wetumpka, Ala., C. Yancey, 1845. 248 p. PU

229. ——— New York, A. L. Burt [1928] 431 p. (Burt's library of the world's best books)
28–24158 PZ3.C253Kn8

230. WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING, 1780–1842

Channing's place in American literature is discussed at length by Robert E. Spiller in "A Case for W. E. Channing," The New England Quarterly, v. 3, Jan. 1930, p. 55–81. Briefly, it may be said that Channing in his "The Importance and Means of a National Literature," The Christian Examiner, 1830, advocated intellectual self-reliance in America seven years before Emerson's The American Scholar (1837) gave classic expression to the same idea. In his discourses, sermons, and essays he expressed his revolt from Calvinism, his interest in but qualified rejection of idealism, and his firm conviction of the loving-kindness of God and the inherent nobility of man. Thus he was instrumental in preparing the way for the Transcendentalism of the Concord circle, with which he was affiliated. As a writer, Channing was one of the few Americans of his time to win enthusiastic recognition in England. To avoid lengthy descriptions of pamphlets on a wide variety of subjects, reference is made below to his collected works. In these the student of religion in America will find essential material. Robert L. Patterson's The Philosophy of William Ellery Channing (New York, Bookman Associates, 1952. 298 p.) contributes to an understanding of his intellectual quality. David P. Edgell's William Ellery Channing (Boston, Beacon Press, 1955. 264 p.) has a twofold purpose: to reintroduce Channing as a man of his times in America; and to present an intellectual portrait of him which shows the nature of his thought and its significance, past and present. He has been called the apostle of Unitarianism in America.

231. Discourses, reviews, and miscellanies. Boston, Carter & Hendee, 1830. 603 p.
32–6508 BX9815.C45 RBD
Includes: "Remarks on the Character and Writings of John Milton," published in The Christian Examiner (1826); "Remarks on the Life and Character of Napoleon Bonaparte," pt. 1–2, The Christian Examiner (1827, 1828); and "The Moral Argument Against Calvinism," from The Christian Disciple (1820).

232. Slavery. Boston, J. Munroe, 1835. 167 p.
11–6662 E449.C454 RBD

233. Self-culture. An address introductory to the Franklin lectures, delivered at Boston, September, 1838. Boston, Dutton & Wentworth, 1838. 81 p. 5–42801 LC31.C5 RBD

234. Lecture on war. Boston, Dutton & Wentworth, 1839. ix, 50 p. 10–19810 RBD
Waterman pamphlets, v. 94, no. 13.

235. Lectures on the elevation of the labouring portion of the community. Boston, Ticknor, 1840. vi, 81 p. E9–1910 HD6961.C36

236. Works. 1st complete American ed. With an introd. [by the author] Boston, J. Munroe, 1841–43. 6 v. 33–1567 BX9815.C4 1841

237. ——— Boston, American Unitarian Association, 1903. 6 v. MeWC

238. ——— New and complete ed., rearranged, to which is added The perfect life. Boston, American Unitarian Association, 1903. 1060 p.
4–10382 BX9815.C4 1903

239. LYDIA MARIA (FRANCIS) CHILD, 1802–1880

Mrs. Child, who was born in Medford, Massachusetts, became part of a Boston and Cambridge group of Unitarians and Transcendentalists. Her novels, written at an early age, are didactic, sentimental tales emphasizing American patriotism in colonial and Revolutionary times; one of them celebrates the "noble savage" Hobomok. She wrote a variety of books designed for women and to explore their special interests. To various stories and books for children she added a periodical which she edited, The Juvenile Miscellany (1826–1834). For more than 30 years she was one of the most vocal champions of the abolition of slavery. As a reformer Mrs. Child designed her writings also as propaganda against social injustices and various evils she found in American society, notably capital punishment and unfair wage scales. A Biography of Lydia Maria Child by Bernice G. Lambert (College Park, Md., 1953) was submitted to the University of Maryland as a doctoral dissertation. It comprises a typescript of 182 leaves, of which leaves 173–182 are devoted to a bibliography of Mrs. Child's writings classified by type.

240. An appeal in favor of that class of Americans called Africans. Boston, Allen & Ticknor, 1833. 232 p. 11–4047 E449.C53 RBD

241. Hobomok, a tale of early times. By an American. Boston, Cummings, Hilliard, 1824. 188 p. 6–20980 PZ3.C437H RBD

242. Letters from New-York. New York, C. S. Francis, 1843. ix, 276 p.
19–6724 F128.44.C53

243. ——— Second series. New York, C. S. Francis, 1845. [ix]–xii, 287 p.
28–559 F128.44.C534
First edition, published 1844.

244. Letters. With a biographical introd. by John G. Whittier and an appendix by Wendell Phillips. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1883. xxv, 280 p. 21–21177 PS1293.Z8 1883
Collected and arranged by Harriet Winslow Sewall.
Bibliography: p. 272–274.

245. JOHN ESTEN COOKE, 1830–1886

The plantation tradition in Virginia, the Civil War, and idealization of the South are themes that dominate the romantic historical novels of John Esten Cooke. He was also one of the biographers who contributed to the growth of the Robert E. Lee and "Stonewall" Jackson legends and was the author of various pieces of historical writing that glorified Virginia.

246. The Virginia comedians; or, Old day in the Old Dominion. New York, Appleton, 1854. 2 v. 12–19565 PZ3.C775Vi RBD

247. Surry of Eagle's-Nest; or, The memoirs of a staff-officer serving in Virginia. New York, Bunce & Huntington, 1866. viii, 484 p.
34–4938 PS1382.S8 1866 RBD
Includes four illustrations by Winslow Homer.

248. ——— New York, M. A. Donohue [1937?] 484 p. 38–1585 PZ3.C775Su8

249. Mohun; or, The last days of Lee and his paladins. New York, F. J. Huntington, 1869. 509 p. UCL18–3023 ViU

250. ——— Charlottesville, Va., Historical Pub. Co., 1936. 376 p. 36–25555 PZ3.C775Mo9

251. My Lady Pokahontas. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1885. 190 p. 6–27178 PS1382.M9 1885 RBD

252. JAMES FENIMORE COOPER, 1789–1851

Cooper was one of the first professional literary men produced in the United States. With Irving and Channing he won enthusiastic acceptance in England and on the Continent, where his books were translated into numerous European languages. From his early home in Cooperstown, New York, he had observed the migration westward towards new frontiers. This firsthand knowledge enabled him to give historical realism to his otherwise romantic novels of hunters, trappers, woodsmen, Indians, frontier life, and the American Revolution. His service as a youth in a merchant ship and also in the United States Navy equipped him to write The History of the Navy of the United States of America (1839) and to impart to his numerous novels about life at sea an authentic feeling of ships and men in action. After he moved to New York and had experienced its club life and the more sophisticated atmosphere of the growing city, Cooper felt an urge to know England and the Continent of Europe also. During a residence of seven years abroad, he wrote and spoke as an interpreter of America. Upon his return to the United States he published several travel books which stimulated American interest in the Old World. Writing as he did at a time when the United States had sufficiently come of age to begin some self-examination of its own culture, his penetrating, often critical books on social and political questions were and are significant in relation to the temper of his age. While Cooper has been best remembered for his contribution to the romantic tradition in historical fiction, of which Sir Walter Scott was the great English exponent at the time, critics now tend to emphasize the importance of the American writer's books that reflect conservative social and political opinions in his country at midpoint of the 19th century. The latter aspects of his work are most comprehensively treated in Robert E. Spiller's Fenimore Cooper, Critic of His Times (New York, Minton, Balch, 1931. 337 p.). For a more recent critique of his writings and a general biographical study see James Grossman's James Fenimore Cooper (New York, Sloane, 1949. 273 p. American men of letters series).

253. The spy; a tale of the neutral ground. New York, Wiley & Halstead, 1821. 2 v. CtY

Relations between Loyalists and patriots during the American Revolution provide the background for this, the author's second novel and first literary success.

254. ——— Rev., corr., and . . . with a new introd., notes, etc., by the author. London, R. Bentley, 1849. xi, 410 p. (Standard novels, 3) 6–32152 PZ3.C786Sp11

255. ——— With an introd. by Tremaine McDowell . . . New York, Scribner, 1931. xivii, 508 p. (Modern student's library) 31–32070 PZ3.C786Sp55

Brief bibliography: p. [viii]

256. The pilot; a tale of the sea. New York, C. Wiley, 1823. 2 v. 6–29865 PZ3.C786Pi RBD

257. ——— With the latest revision and corrections of the author. New York, Stringer & Townsend, 1856. x, 486 p. (Choice works of Cooper. Revised and corrected series, v. 7) 26–24687 PZ3.C786Pi9

258. The pioneers; or, The sources of the Susquehanna. New York, C. Wiley, 1823. 2 v. NN

First of the "Leatherstocking Tales." In order of composition followed by The Last of the Mohicans (1826); The Prairie (1827); The Pathfinder (1840); and The Deerslayer (1841). Frontier novels usually thought to contain the author's most unforgettable characters, whites and Indians. In reading sequence The Deerslayer should come first and be followed by The Last of the Mohicans.

259. ——— Rev., corr. and . . . with a new introd., notes, etc. by the author. London, H. Colburn & R. Bentley, 1832. xi, 460 p. (Standard novels, no. 14) 6–29701 PZ3.C786Pi05

260. ——— New York, Dutton, 1929. xv, 444 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys. Fiction [no. 171]) 36–37033 AC1.E8, no. 171

First published in this edition, 1907; reprinted . . . 1929. Bibliography: p. viii–ix.

261. Notions of the Americans: picked up by a travelling bachelor. Philadelphia, Carey, Lea & Carey, 1828. 2 v.
1–26767 E165.C77 RBD

262. A letter to his countrymen. New York, J. Wiley, 1834. 116 p.
10–8765 E381.C76 RBD

263. Gleanings in Europe: England, by an American. Philadelphia, Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1837. 2 v. in 1 (270, 260 p.)
2–30337 DA625.C777 RBD
English edition issued the same year under title: England. With Sketches of Society in the Metropolis. Published, also in the same year, in Paris as Recollections of Europe.

264. Gleanings in Europe. Edited by Robert E. Spiller. New York, Oxford University Press, 1928–30. 2 v. 28–18308 D919.C8
CONTENTS.—1. France.—2. England.

265. The American democrat; or, Hints on the social and civic relations of the United States of America. Cooperstown, N. Y., H. & E. Phinney, 1838. 192 p. 9–21770 JK216.C72 RBD

266. ——— Edited with an introd. by H. L. Mencken. New York, Knopf, 1931. xx, 184 p. (Americana deserta)
31–25625 JK216.C72 1931

267. ——— With an introd. by H. L. Mencken, and an introductory note by Robert E. Spiller. New York, Vintage Books, 1956. xxviii, 190 p. (A Vintage book, K26) 56–13687 JK216.C72 1956

268. Satanstoe; or, The Littlepage manuscripts. New York, Burgess, Stringer, 1845. 2 v.
6–29679 PZ3.C786S RBD
First novel in the Littlepage manuscripts trilogy, continued in The Chainbearer (1845) and The Redskins (1846), works treating of the antirent troubles between wealthy landlords and tenants or squatters in New York; valuable also for its treatment of New York society and customs of the period.

269. ——— Edited, with introd., chronology, and bibliography, by Robert E. Spiller and Joseph D. Coppock . . . New York, American Book Co., 1937. xli, 424 p. (American fiction series; general editor, H. H. Clark)
37–4084 PZ3.C786S18
Selected bibliography: p. xxxiii–xli.

270. Correspondence. Edited by his grandson, James Fenimore Cooper . . . New Haven, Yale University Press, 1922. 2 v. (776 p.)
22–21436 PS1431.A3
Partial collection of the author's letters, to which have been added numerous letters to him.

271. Cooper's novels. New York, W. A. Townsend, 1859–61. 32 v. Volume 1 published 1861. NN
Illustrated from drawings by F. O. C. Darley.
Represents the first effort to make a definitive edition; influenced the preparation of various later editions and remains an important text; lacks only Ned Myers among the full-length novels, but omits certain other prose pieces and short stories. Cf. Literary History of the United States (no. 2460).

272. Works. [Mohawk ed.] New York, Putnam, 1912. 32 v.
12–31598 PS1400.F12

273. Representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Robert E. Spiller. New York, American Book Co., 1936. cii, 350 p. (American writers series) 36–10603 PS1403.S6
"Selected bibliography": p. lxxxix–cii.

274. RICHARD HENRY DANA, 1815–1882

Dana, while a Harvard undergraduate, had trouble with his eyes and was sent to sea on a merchant ship as part of his cure. Ten years after his return to his normal environment, he used the journal kept when he was "before the mast" to produce an American classic in which the hardships of a seaman's life in the 1830's were recounted with such power that the book was influential in reforming some of the more brutal punishments to which sailors were subjected at the time. It may be read for a comparison to Herman Melville's White-Jacket (1850).

275. Two years before the mast. New York, Harper, 1840. 483 p. (Harper's family library, no. 106) 5–22627 G540.D2 1840 RBD
Frequently reprinted at popular prices, as in Everyman's library edition (New York, Dutton, 1930. 338 p.). Also published in conjunction with a biographical sketch of the author by his grandson, H. W. L. Dana (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1948. 338 p. Great illustrated classics series).

276. An autobiographical sketch (1815–1842). Edited by Robert F. Metzdorf, with an introd. by Norman Holmes Pearson. Hamden, Conn., Shoe String Press, 1953. x, 119 p.
53–13472 E415.9.D15A15

First publication in its entirety of a sketch written by Dana in 1842.

". . . the great mass of the material [Dana's papers] still lies fallow in the collections of the Massachusetts Historical Society. That the papers of Dana will someday be printed in extenso seems inevitable; he is the Boswell of Boston, in a sense, and his journal, letters, and speeches provide a key to the social, literary, and political history of Massachusetts in the mid-nineteenth century."—Preface, p. ix.

277. JOHN WILLIAM DE FOREST, 1826–1906

The rise of realism in the American novel after the middle of the 19th century, usually associated with the work of William Dean Howells, was anticipated in the novels of a Connecticut officer in the Union Army, J. W. De Forest. He wrote vigorously and factually of life in the South, without romantic overtones, and dealt honestly with the mistakes and miseries of the Civil War. Later his Honest John Vane (1875) and Playing the Mischief (1875) exposed the political corruption following the war. His personal reminiscences of life in the army, originally issued serially in the 1860's, have been republished by the Yale University Press as: A Volunteer's Adventures (1946); and A Union Officer in the Reconstruction (1948).

278. Miss Ravenel's conversion from secession to loyalty. New York, Harper, 1867. 521 p.
42–43995 PS1525.D5M5 1867 RBD

279. ——— New York, Harper, 1939. xvi, 466 p. 39–19903 PZ3.D363Mi
See particularly the Introduction by Gordon S. Haight (p. xvi) in which is quoted William D. Howell's opinion that De Forest deserves to be "lastingly recognized as one of the masters of American fiction."

280. RALPH WALDO EMERSON, 1803–1882

Emerson reached maturity in the full tide of 19th-century romanticism, material prosperity, and westward expansion in the United States. He came from New England roots planted in America about fourteen years after the first settlement in Massachusetts. His background derived from some ancestors who were Puritan clergymen and from others who were shrewd Yankees engaged in trade; his education was obtained at the Boston Latin School, Harvard College, and the Harvard Divinity School. Following his graduation from the last of these institutions he passed into the Unitarian ministry, but resigned in less than four years because of doctrinal differences. Before he was 32 years of age he settled permanently in Concord. From that quiet village his intellectual interests ranged far. He became a philosopher in his own right, a Platonist with keen interests in the sacred books of the East, and in the literature of German idealism. Montaigne and Shakespeare were his lifelong enthusiasms. Poetic form and substance held his continued interest. During his travels in Europe he formed a lasting friendship with Carlyle and a not uncritical admiration for England. At home he was the center of the Transcendentalist circle in Concord. In that capacity he influenced writers as dissimilar as H. D. Thoreau, Jones Very, Nathaniel Hawthorne, and Walt Whitman. Although he avoided the extreme views of some of his circle and took no part in the communal settlements of Brook Farm and Fruitlands, he contributed to and edited the Transcendentalist organ, The Dial (1840–1844). Throughout his career he proclaimed to America and the world his philosophy of idealism, optimism, individualism, self-reliance, moral intuition, and the Over-Soul. His message was given by means of public lectures, in essays, and in poems. On the basis of all these he became a leading citizen and a formative force not only in American life but also in the creation of a national literature for the United States.

281. Nature. Boston, J. Munroe, 1836. 95 p.
34–25488 PS1613.A1 1836 RBD
Published anonymously, this first of Emerson's books contained the essence of the Transcendental philosophy that he elaborated in later works.

282. ——— New ed. Boston, J. Munroe, 1849. 74 p. 34–25487 PS1613.A1 1849 RBD

283. [The American scholar] An oration delivered before the Phi Beta Kappa Society . . . [of Harvard College] Boston, J. Munroe, 1837. 26 p. 24–24542 PS1623.O7 1837 RBD
Frequently called the declaration of independence of American intellectual life.

284. An address delivered before the senior class in Divinity College, Cambridge, Sunday evening, 15 July, 1838. Boston, J. Munroe, 1838. 31 p.
4–36592 BX9842.E55 1838 RBD
AC901.W3, v. 4 RBD
Republished as The Divinity School Address and issued in its fifth printing by the American Unitarian Association in Boston, 1928.

285. Essays: [first series] Boston, J. Munroe, 1841. 303 p.
22–17721 PS1608.A2 1841 RBD

CONTENTS.—History.—Self-reliance.—Compensation.—Spiritual laws.—Love.—Friendship.—Prudence.—Heroism.—The Over-Soul.—Circles.—Intellect.—Art.

286. Essays: second series. Boston, J. Munroe, 1844. 313 p.
9–27870 PS1608.A3 1844 RBD
CONTENTS.—The poet.—Experience.—Character.—Manners.—Gifts.—Nature.—Politics.—Nominalist and realist.—New England reformers; lecture at Amory Hall.

287. Essays, first and second series; with introd. by Irwin Edman. New York, Crowell, 1951. 438 p. 51–7280 PS1608.A1 1951

288. Poems. Boston, J. Munroe, 1847. 251 p.
1–582 PS1624.A1 1847 RBD
First American edition; first English edition published slightly earlier in the same year (London, Chapman, 1847. 199 p. PS1624.A1 1847a).

289. ——— Household ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1892. vi, 324 p. (Household edition of the poets) 48–43255 PS1624.A1 1892
"Contains nearly all the pieces included in the Poems and May-Day of former editions . . . Also, some pieces never before published are here given in an Appendix."
First published in 1883 as v. 9 of the Riverside edition of Emerson's Complete Works.

290. ——— Selected and edited with a commentary, by Louis Untermeyer; illustrated with water-colors by Richard & Doris Beer. New York, Heritage Press, 1945. xvi, 238 p. (American poets, edited by Louis Untermeyer)
45–6422 PS1624.A17 1945 RBD

291. English traits. Boston, Phillips, Sampson, 1856. 312 p.
3–2575 DA625.E54 1856 RBD
Shows the reaction to the character and quality of the English people, by an American living at the middle of the 19th century.

292. The conduct of life. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1860. 288 p.
36–15513 PS1606.A1 1860 RBD
CONTENTS.—Fate.—Power.—Wealth.—Culture.—Behavior.—Worship.—Considerations by the way.—Beauty.—Illusions.

293. The conduct of life, Nature, and other essays. New York, Dutton, 1927. xi, 308 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys. Essays and belles lettres, no. 322)
36–37199 AC1.E8, no. 322

294. Journals of Ralph Waldo Emerson, with annotations, edited by Edward Waldo Emerson and Waldo Emerson Forbes. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1909–14. 10 v.
9–29980 PS1631.A3 1909
CONTENTS. — 1. 1820–1824. — 2. 1824–1832. — 3. 1833–1835.—4. 1836–1838.—5. 1838–1841.—6. 1841–1844—7. 1845–1948.—8. 1849–1855.—9. 1856–1863.—10. 1864–1876.

295. The heart of Emerson's journals, edited by Bliss Perry. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1926. ix, 357 p. 26–15215 PS1631.A3 1926

296. Letters; edited by Ralph L. Rusk. New York, Columbia University Press, 1939. 6 v.
39–12289 PS1631.A3 1939

297. Complete works. Centenary ed. With a biographical introd. and notes by Edward Waldo Emerson, and a general index. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1903. 12 v. NcD
The set in the Library of Congress has imprint dates ©1903–21 (33–21674 PS1600.FO3a).

298. English traits, Representative men & other essays. New York, Dutton, 1932. ix, 374 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys. Essays and belles lettres, no. 279)
36–37246 AC1.E8, no. 279

299. Representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Frederic I. Carpenter. New York, American Book Co., 1934. lvii, 456 p. (American writers series) 34–7266 PS1602.C3
"The text of Emerson's prose and verse included in the present volume is that of the Centenary edition, which incorporates the author's final revisions."—Preface.
"Selected bibliography": p. xlix–lvi.

300. Complete essays and other writings, edited, with a biographical introd., by Brooks Atkinson. Foreword by Tremaine McDowell. New York, Modern Library, 1950. xxvii, 930 p. (Modern Library college editions, T14)
50–12215 PS1600.F50
Bibliography: p. xxvii.

301. Basic selections from Emerson; essays, poems & apothegms. Edited by Eduard C. Lindeman. New York, New American Library, 1954. 215 p. (A Mentor book, M 102)
54–6005 PS1603.L5

Another recent collection in inexpensive format was edited by Robert E. Spiller and announced for publication in 1957, by Appleton-Century-Crofts in that firm's classics series.

Recent contributions to the voluminous critical studies of Emerson's life and thought include:

302. Carpenter, Frederic I. Emerson handbook. New York, Hendricks House, 1953. xiv, 268 p. (Handbooks of American literature)
53–2274 PS1631.C34

303. Hopkins, Vivian C. Spires of form; a study of Emerson's aesthetic theory. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1951. x, 276 p.
51–9713 PS1642.A3H6
Bibliography: p. [252]–256.

304. Paul, Sherman. Emerson's angle of vision; man and nature in American experience. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. viii, 268 p. 52–5039 PS1638.P3
Bibliographical references included in "Notes": p. [233]–258.

305. Rusk, Ralph L. The life of Ralph Waldo Emerson. New York, Scribner, 1949. ix, 592 p. 49–9006 PS1631.R78
"Index and bibliography": p. 553–592.

306. Whicher, Stephen E. Freedom and fate; an inner life of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1953. 203 p. 53–9552 PS1631.W5
Includes bibliography.

307. TIMOTHY FLINT, 1780–1840

Traveler, clergyman, editor, and novelist, Flint was born in Massachusetts and educated at Harvard. He brought to his missionary journeys and other expeditions, in the Mississippi Valley and beyond, the same intellectual enthusiasm for the wilderness and for advancing the frontier that inspired other men of his period to carry civilization westward. His Recollections make available a contemporary source for learning the reactions of an educated, idealistic man of the time to the rigors as well as excitements of pioneering, thus contributing to an understanding of an important phase in the social and economic development of the United States. His novels entitle him to be classed with the founders of Western fiction in America.

308. Recollections of the last ten years. Boston, Cummings, Hilliard, 1826. 395 p.
1–8704 F353.F63

309. ——— Edited, with an introd., by C. Hartley Grattan. New York, Knopf, 1932. xix, 380 p. (Americana deserta)
32–26991 F353.F632

310. Biographical memoir of Daniel Boone, the first settler of Kentucky. Interspersed with incidents in the early annals of the country. Cincinnati, N. & G. Guilford, 1833. viii, 267 p. illus.
7–10441 F454.B744

311. Francis Berrian; or, The Mexican patriot. Boston, Cummings, Hilliard, 1826. 2 v.
CtY
Romance portraying a New Englander in Mexico during the revolutionary years of the 1820's.

312. The Shoshonee Valley. Cincinnati, E. H. Flint, 1830. 2 v.
6–39999 PZ3.F649S RBD
Novel introducing Rocky Mountain trappers and fur traders, or "mountain men."

313. (SARAH) MARGARET FULLER (MARCHESA D'OSSOLI), 1810–1850

A New England child prodigy, who later became a legend because of her melodramatic life, Margaret Fuller was an American pioneer of her period—a journalist, traveler in Europe and America, critic, lecturer, feminist, Transcendentalist, and social reformer—in whose work the awakening literary and social conscience of the time had a significant manifestation. During her brief editorship (1840–42) of The Dial (1840–44) she developed it as a liberal literary review and secured for it contributions from some of the best writers of the country. As part of her work with Horace Greeley on the New York Tribune she criticized the leading authors of England and America, not always kindly, but with ability. Her translations, particularly from the German, reached the small audience prepared for this material. Her "conversations," or informal lectures on ideas and events, were influential in developing opinions among the intelligentsia. Before her untimely death she became a citizen of the world, at home in foreign literary circles and an adherent of Mazzini in the Roman Revolution. Although severely bowdlerized by her distinguished editors, R. W. Emerson, W. H. Channing, and J. F. Clarke, her Memoirs (Boston, Phillips, Sampson, 1852, 2 v.) still provide a useful source for the study of intellectual America in the mid-nineteenth century.

314. Summer on the lakes, in 1843. Boston, C. C. Little & J. Brown, 1844. 256 p.
Rc-1714 F551.O84 RBD

Account of a trip through the Middle West and Great Lakes country and of the "unfolding, noble energies" anticipated by the writer in the United States, as migrations from the East to the West and back again were continued.

315. Woman in the nineteenth century. New York, Greeley & McElrath, 1845. 201 p.
28-22266 HQ1154.O8 1845 RBD

"A reproduction, modified and expanded, of an article published in The Dial, Boston, July 1843, under the title of 'The Great Lawsuit. Man versus Men: Woman versus Women'."—Preface.

A pioneer work, which reached an audience in England as well as in America, and which was instrumental in forwarding the woman's movement.

316. ——— Edited by her brother, Arthur B. Fuller. New and complete ed., with introd. by Horace Greeley. Boston, Roberts, 1874. 420 p.
7-36542 HQ1154.O86

317. Papers on literature and art. New York, Wiley & Putnam, 1846. 2 v. in 1. (Wiley and Putnam's library of American books. [no. 19-20])
24-11830 PS2504.P3

"American Literature: Its Position in the Present Time, and Prospects for the Future," appears in pt. 2, p. [122]-165.

318. Writings. Selected and edited by Mason Wade. New York, Viking Press, 1941. 608 p.
41-6756 PS2501.W3

"Bibliography of published writings of Margaret Fuller": p. [593]-600.

319. JAMES HALL, 1793-1868

Hall, a Philadelphian who migrated westward in 1820, became active as a lawyer (later a judge), financier, editor, and writer in a region between the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers. His sketches, legends, stories, and historical miscellanies portray with realism colored by romance the Indians and whites, manners and customs, and daily events of life when that section of country was part of the American frontier. He was also coauthor with Thomas L. McKenney of the History of the Indian Tribes of North America (Philadelphia, E. C. Biddle, 1836-44. 3 v.).

320. Letters from the West. London, H. Colburn, 1828. 385 p.
13-23470 F353.H16 RBD

Includes descriptions of scenery, manners, and customs associated with life in the Mississippi Valley, and gives various anecdotes of frontier life in the same region.

321. Sketches of history, life, and manners in the West. Cincinnati, Hubbard & Edmands, 1834. 263 p.
1-8652 F351.H17 RBD

Of this edition apparently only volume 1 was published. It was reissued in a 2-volume edition in 1835. Deals with the valleys of the Mississippi and Ohio Rivers.

322. Legends of the West. [Author's rev. ed.] New York, Putnam, 1853. 435 p.
35-33761 PS1779.H16L4 1853

Chiefly a collection of short tales and sketches, of which the first edition was published in 1832. Includes a novel, The Harpe's Head (1833), published also under the title, Kentucky.

323. FITZ-GREENE HALLECK, 1790-1867

Halleck, a Connecticut minor poet long identified with New York literary circles, perpetuated in America the romantic tradition of which Byron, Campbell, and Scott were representative in Britain. In the 1830's he was second only to Bryant in popular favor in the United States. His "Croacker Poems," written in collaboration with Joseph Rodman Drake, to satirize local writers, artists, scientists, and politicians, made him famous overnight. His shorter poems, some of which were written in enthusiasm for European affairs engendered by a trip abroad, are his most lasting achievements. Among these, "Burns" and "Marco Bozzaris" are typical. "On the Death Of Joseph Rodman Drake" is remembered as a poet's devoted tribute to another poet who was his friend. Halleck's poems on native American themes include "The Field of the Grounded Arms," celebrating the American victory at Saratoga during the Revolutionary War, and "Red Jacket," a eulogy of an Indian chief of the Tuscaroras.

324. Alnwick Castle, with other poems. New York, G. & C. Carvill, 1827. 64 p.
17-11659 PS1782.A5 1827 RBD

325. ——— New-York, Harper, 1845. 104 p.
26-854 PS1782.A51845 RBD

326. Poetical works. Now first collected. New York, Appleton, 1847. 280 p. illus.
26-6565 PS1780.A2 1847

327. ——— New York, Appleton, 1859. 238 p.
26-6570 PS1780.A2 1859

328. The poetical writings of Fitz-Greene Halleck, with extracts from those of Joseph Rodman Drake. Edited by James Grant Wilson. New York, Appleton, 1869. xviii, 389 p.
15–18389 PS1780.A2 1869

329. Life and letters. By James Grant Wilson. New York, Appleton, 1869. 607 p.
26–6572 PS1783.W5

330. GEORGE WASHINGTON HARRIS ("SUT LOVINGOOD"), 1814–1869

Harris' humorous sketches and tall tales celebrate the practical jokes and exploits of a hero, Sut Lovingood, from the mountains of East Tennessee. Written in the local dialect, they draw their inspiration from the manners and customs of the region in the middle of the 19th century.

331. Sut Lovingood. Yarns spun by a "nat'ral born durn'd fool." New York, Dick & Fitzgerald, 1867. xv, 299 p.
41–19505 PN6161.H3235 RBD

332. ——— Edited with an introd. by Brom Weber. New York, Grove Press, 1954. [xxxiv] 262 p. 54–10739 PS1799.H87S8
This edition comprises stories selected from the foregoing collection of 1867 and also the text of the author's "Sut Lovingood Travels with Old Abe Lincoln." The latter sketches were originally published in the Nashville Union and American, Feb. 28, Mar. 2 and 5, 1861.

333. NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE, 1804–1864

Hawthorne was a descendant of one of the stern judges of witchcraft in Salem, Massachusetts, in the 17th century. In that same town Hawthorne was born, spent most of his youth, and developed as a writer. Later, he was associated particularly with Concord, where he was a cool and detached observer of the Transcendentalist group of which Emerson was the center. In fact he repented early of his own "Transcendental wild oats," an experience that led to the writing of The Blithedale Romance (1852). Revolting from what he felt to be the easy optimism and naive otherworldliness of the Transcendentalists, he turned for the themes of his novels and tales to early times in New England, when life was dominated by Puritanism and particularly by Calvinistic theology. These matters were dealt with by Hawthorne not as a historical novelist, but as a writer on timeless and universal themes having to do with the presence of evil in the world, the inevitable consequences of sin, the cruelty of dogmatism, and the necessity of morality. His work was accomplished under the stimulus of a powerful imagination, and in his longer books resulted in what he called romances, rather than novels. However, the adventures of which he wrote, frequently using symbolism and allegory, were primarily those of the human soul and were not in celebration of experiences necessarily particular to any given time or place. His reactions to a residence of more than five years in England, part of the time as consul at Liverpool, were given in his English notebooks. A shorter stay in Italy led to the choice of Rome as the setting for his romance, The Marble Faun (1860), in which the plot traces the aftereffects of a crime and the dawn of conscience in a child of nature. The author's own mind and life may be studied profitably in his posthumously published notebooks. His contemporary critics included Herman Melville, upon whom the impact of Hawthorne's masterpiece, The Scarlet Letter, was contributory to the writing of Moby Dick, and Edgar Allan Poe, whose review of the second series of Twice-Told Tales, published in Graham's Magazine, v. 20, Apr.–May, 1842, p. 254, 298–300, not only discussed the technique of Hawthorne's short stories and sketches, but included also a formulation of Poe's own theories of the short story as a form of literary art.

334. Twice-told tales. Boston, American Stationers Co., 1837. 334 p.
9–2689 PS1870.A1 1837 RBD
First edition of the first series.

335. ——— Boston, J. Munroe, 1842. 2 v. MH
Second edition of the first series; first edition of the second series.

336. ——— A new ed. Boston, Ticknor, Reed, & Fields, 1851. 2 v.
7–3872 PS1870.A1 1851 RBD

337. ——— New-York, Dutton, 1932. xvi, 357 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys. Fiction [no. 531])
36–37338 AC1.E8, no. 531

338. Mosses from an old manse. New York, Wiley & Putnam, 1846. 2 v. in 1. (207, 211 p.) (Wiley and Putnam's library of American books, no. 17–18)
7–3870 PS1863.A1 1846 RBD

339. ——— New ed., carefully rev. by the author. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1854. 2 v.
6–15467 PS1863.A1 1854 RBD

340. ——— Salem ed. With an introd. by George Parsons Lathrop. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1893 [°1882] 277 p.
54–50422 PS1863.A1 1893
A contemporary Houghton Mifflin edition is announced for publication in July 1956.

341. The scarlet letter, a romance. Boston, Ticknor, Reed, & Fields, 1850. 322 p.
7–3785 PS1868.A1 1850 RBD

342. ——— Introd. by Austin Warren. New York, Rinehart, 1947. xiii, 251 p. (Rinehart editions, 1) 48–1188 PZ3.H318Sc 82

343. ——— With an introd. by Newton Arvin. New York, Harper, 1950. xiii, 278 p. (Harper's modern classics)
50–6269 PZ3.H318Sc 86

344. ——— Introd. by John C. Gerber. New York, Modern Library, 1950. xxxiv, 300 p. (Modern Library college editions, T21)
50–12245 PZ3.H318Sc 87
Bibliography: p. xxxiii–xxxiv.

345. The house of the seven gables, a romance. Boston, Ticknor, Reed, & Fields, 1851. vi, 344 p. 7–3868 PS1861.A1 1851 RBD
For Hawthorne's distinction between a romance and a novel, see p. [iii]–iv.

346. ——— New York, Dutton, 1930. xv, 310 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys [no. 176]) 36–37232 AC1.E8, no. 176

347. ——— With illus. reproducing drawings for early editions . . . [and] an introductory biographical sketch of the author and anecdotal captions by Basil Davenport. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1950. xiii, 335 p. (Great illustrated classics) 50–6979 PZ3.H318Ho 68

348. The heart of Hawthorne's journals. Edited by Newton Arvin. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1929. xiv, 345 p. 29–10491 PS1881.A25

349. The American notebooks, based upon the original manuscripts in the Pierpont Morgan Library, and edited by Randall Stewart. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1932. xcvi, 350 p.
32–28143 PS1865.A1 1932
"Originally prepared as a doctoral dissertation at Yale University [1930]"—Preface, p. ix.
Includes the passages omitted in the edition edited by Mrs. Hawthorne and published under title: Passages from the American Note-Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne.

350. The English notebooks, based upon the original manuscripts in the Pierpont Morgan Library and edited by Randall Stewart. New York, Modern Language Association of America, 1941. xliv, 667 p. (The Modern Language Association of America. General series, 13)
41–21963 PS1881.A43
Includes the passages omitted in the edition edited by Mrs. Hawthorne and published under title: Passages from the English Note-Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne.
"Continues the work which was begun with . . . [the editor's] edition of The American Notebooks (Yale University Press, 1932) and which will be completed with an edition of The Italian Notebooks, now being prepared by Mr. Norman Holmes Pearson."—Preface.
"Published with the cooperation of Brown University."
Bibliographical references included in "Notes" (p. [623]–654).

351. Complete works, with introductory notes by George Parsons Lathrop and illustrated with etchings by Blum, Church, Dielman, Gifford, Shirlaw, and Turner. [Riverside ed. Cambridge, Mass., Printed at the Riverside Press, 1883] 12 v. illus.
PPTu

352. ——— [Riverside ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1887–88] 12 v. illus.
42–26389 PS1850.E87

353. Complete writings. [Old Manse ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1900] 22 v. illus. NcD

354. ——— Autographed ed. [Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1900] 22 v. illus.
13–21420 PS1850.Foo

355. Representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Austin Warren. New York, American Book Co., 1934. xci, 368 p. (American writers series)
34–10889 PS1852.W3 1934
"Selected bibliography": p. lxxv–lxxxix.

356. Complete novels and selected tales. Edited, with an introd. by Norman Holmes Pearson. New York, Modern Library, 1937. 1223 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books)
37–28752 PZ3.H318Com

357. The portable Hawthorne. Edited with an introd. and notes, by Malcolm Cowley. New York, Viking Press, 1948. vi, 634 p. (The Viking portable library, 38) 48–7869 PS1852.C6
"A very short bibliography": p. 633–634.

358. The best of Hawthorne. Edited with introd. and notes by Mark Van Doren. New York, Ronald Press, 1951. v. 436 p.
51–9259 PS1852.V3
Bibliography: p. 435–436.

359. Selected tales and sketches. Introd. by Hyatt H. Waggoner. New York, Rinehart, 1950. xxx, 410 p. (Rinehart editions, 33)
50–14223 PS1852.W25
"A bibliographical note": p. xxvii–xxviii.

During the past several years students of Hawthorne have made available new light on his work. These studies include:

360. Davidson, Edward H. Hawthorne's last phase. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1949. xiv, 174 p. (Yale studies in English, v. III)
49–1858 PS1882.D37
PR 13.Y3, v. III
Bibliography: p. [163]–168.

361. Fogle, Richard H. Hawthorne's fiction: the light & the dark. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1952. ix, 219 p.
52–4268 PS1888.F6
Bibliography: p. 207–214.

362. Stein, William B. Hawthorne's Faust, a study of the Devil archetype. Gainesville, University of Florida Press, 1953. vii, 172 p.
53–9337 PS1892.D4S75
Bibliography: p. 167–168.

363. Van Doren, Mark. Nathaniel Hawthorne. New York, Sloane, 1949. xiii, 285 p. (American men of letters series)
49–8394 PS1881.V3
Bibliographical note: p. 269–273.

364. Waggoner, Hyatt H. Hawthorne, a critical study. Cambridge, Mass., Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1955. 268 p.
54–9778 PS1888.W3

365. CHARLES FENNO HOFFMAN, 1806–1884

Hoffman, a New York editor, novelist, and writer of musical verses, whose personality Poe admired, was one of the cultivated easterners who traveled in what was then the far western part of the United States. By the publication of his observations and impressions of places, events, and characteristic types among the population, he contributed to a growing interest in the frontier. His novel Greyslaer (1840) celebrated the famous Beauchamp murder case, known also as the Kentucky Tragedy, and was successfully produced as a play in the year of its publication. Hoffman's Poems were collected and edited by his nephew, Edward Fenno Hoffman (Philadelphia, Porter & Coates, 1873. 238 p.).

366. A winter in the West. By a New Yorker. New York, Harper, 1835. 2 v.
1–16856 F484.3.H68 RBD
Narrative of a journey through Pennsylvania, the Old Northwest, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia.

367. Wild scenes in the forest and prairie. London, R. Bentley, 1839. 2 v.
7–6147 PZ3.H674W

368. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, 1809–1894

A Boston Brahmin who counted Mrs. Anne Bradstreet among his ancestors, Holmes found in his native city a satisfying hub of the universe. His familiar essays, full of revelations of the writer's life and personality, were a characteristic and popular feature of The Atlantic Monthly, for which Holmes supplied the name when the journal was founded. As a poet he dealt with historic and patriotic themes, as in "Old Ironsides," and with spiritual and imaginative ideas, characteristically expressed in "The Chambered Nautilus." He also exercised a talent for writing light verse, of which "The Deacon's Masterpiece" is an example. Characterized by humor interspersed with pathos, common sense, moral uprightness, and love of his country and his region, his literary work preserves the flavor of the time and place in which he lived. As a physician for many years on the medical faculty of Harvard University he attacked ignorance and prejudice in matters of health and became the author of medical essays and monographs which show that he made at least one important contribution to the improvement of medical science. His few novels dealt with psychopathological themes, which anticipate later theories of psychoanalysis and psychiatry.

369. Poems. Boston, Otis, Broaders, 1836. xiv, 163 p. 26–858 PS1955.A1 1836 RBD

370. Complete poetical works. Cambridge ed. [edited by Horace E. Scudder] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1895. xxi, 352 p.
4–13823 PS1955.A1 1895

371. The autocrat of the breakfast-table. Boston, Phillips, Sampson, 1858. 373 p.
17–4959 PS1964.A1 1858 RBD

372. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1895. xxiv, 321 p. (The Riverside literature series. [no. 81]) 17-4960 PS1964.A1 1895
Has subtitle: Everyman his own Boswell; includes a biographical sketch.

373. ——— Edited with an introd. by Franklin T. Baker. New York, Macmillan, 1928. xxv, 369 p. (The modern readers' series) 28-26745 PS1964.A1 1928

374. ——— New York, Dutton, 1931. x, 300 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys. Essays. [no. 66]) 36-37070 AC1.E8, no. 66

375. Elsie Venner; a romance of destiny. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1861. 2 v. 7-5180 PS1960.A1 1861 RBD
First published under title The Professor's Story in The Atlantic Monthly, Jan. 1860–Apr. 1861, not December 1859 as stated in [publishers'] preface; the novel in which Holmes defined his concept of a Brahmin caste in New England.
In order to isolate the medical and psychiatric elements in Elsie Venner and Holmes' other novels, The Guardian Angel and A Mortal Antipathy, Clarence P. Oberndorf has brought together abridgments and annotations of each book under the title, The Psychiatric Novels of Oliver Wendell Holmes (New York, Columbia University Press, 1943. 268 p.).
Houghton Mifflin (Boston) has recently announced that the firm has in preparation a republication of Elsie Venner.

376. Writings. [Riverside ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1891–95] 13 v. 4-16396 PS1950.E93

377. Works. [Standard library ed.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1892–96. 15 v. NjP
Contents of v. 1–13 correspond to contents of Riverside edition. Life and Letters, by John T. Morse constitute v. 14–15. The student of Holmes' work will wish also to consult Thomas F. Currier's A Bibliography of Oliver Wendell Holmes (New York, New York University Press, 1953. 707 p.), which was edited for the Bibliographical Society of America by Eleanor M. Tilton.

378. Representative selections, with introduction, bibliography, and notes by S. I. Hayakawa and Howard Mumford Jones. New York, American Book Co., 1939. cxxix, 472 p. (American writers series) 39-21102 PS1953.H4
"Selected bibliography": p. cxvii–cxxix.

379. JOHNSON JONES HOOPER, 1815–1862

"Simon Suggs," a Southern frontier type of gambler and rogue, was created by Hooper for use in the Alabama newspapers with which he was connected as journalist and editor. The deeds and sayings of this fictitious sharper, through which the author expressed his own humor and irony, were widely popular. Some of the adventures were reprinted as far afield as New York, in the Spirit of the Times (1831–1861). The life and times of Hooper are discussed, and an extensive bibliography is supplied in William S. Hoole's Alias Simon Suggs (University, Ala., University of Alabama Press, 1952. xxii, 283 p.).

380. Some adventures of Captain Simon Suggs, late of the Tallapoosa Volunteers; together with "Taking the Census," and other Alabama sketches. By a country editor. With a portrait from life, and other illus., by Darley. Philadelphia, Carey & Hart, 1846. 201 p. 7-5263 PZ3.H7664So
First edition published in 1845. Cf. Hoole, p. 58. Simon Suggs' Adventures is the title of a later edition (Philadelphia, T. B. Peterson, 1881. 217 p.).

381. WASHINGTON IRVING, 1783–1859

Irving, a cosmopolitan and man of fashion, had his beginnings in New York when the city was developing as a financial and cultural center. His early work satirized New York society and history with a burlesque touch. As his style developed it was characterized by elegance and gentle humor which have endeared it to admirers of such English essayists as Addison, Steele, and Lamb. However, his taste for sentiment, legends, and landscape, all frequently infused with melancholy, brought him into the romantic tradition. Many years spent abroad as a businessman, traveler, and diplomat enlarged his circle of literary friends and admirers, which included Scott, Coleridge, and Byron, among others. The Europeanization of his outlook influenced him to bring into the bounds of American literature such contributions as his The Life and Voyages of Columbus (1828) and his book of romantic Spanish legends and sketches, The Alhambra (1832). After one of his returns to the United States he contributed to the literature developing from the exploration of the western frontier A Tour of the Prairies, included in The Crayon Miscellany (1835). His Life of George Washington in 5 volumes (1855–59) portrays his subject as the central figure in the beginning of the Nation. Irving has been called the first American literary man to win genuine recognition abroad and the writer who, in such pieces as "Rip Van Winkle" and "The Legend of Sleepy Hollow," fathered the American short story, which Hawthorne, Poe, and their successors developed.

382. A history of New York from the beginning of the world to the end of the Dutch dynasty. By Diedrich Knickerbocker [pseud.] New York, Inskeep & Bradford, 1809. 2 v.
4–18970 F122.170 RBD

383. Diedrich Knickerbocker's A history of New York. Edited with a critical introd. by Stanley Williams and Tremaine McDowell. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1927. lxxvii, 475 p. (American authors series; general editor, S. T. Williams) 27–2639 F122.1.I834

384. The sketch book of Geoffrey Crayon, gent. [pseud.] New York, C. S. Van Winkle, 1819–20. 7 pts. CtY
This is the work that includes his celebrated story, "Rip Van Winkle."

385. ——— 2d ed. New York, C. S. Van Winkle, 1819–20. 7 pts. in 2 v.
7–9492 PS2066.A1 1819a RBD

386. ——— New York, Dutton, 1936. x, 368 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys [no. 117]) 36–37106 AC1.E8, no. 117
Bibliography: p. viii.

387. ——— Introd. and descriptive captions by Harry Hansen. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1954. 391 p. illus. (Great illustrated classics)
54–3604 PS2066.A1 1954

388. Bracebridge Hall; or, The humourists. A medley, by Geoffrey Crayon, gent. [pseud.] New York, C. S. Van Winkle, 1822. 2 v.
4–34448 PS2057.A1 1822 RBD

389. ——— Handy volume ed. New York, Putnam, 1910. 2 v. in 1. IU

390. Tales of a traveller. London, J. Murray, 1824. 2 v.
1–1258 PS2070.A1 1824 RBD
First American edition published also in 1824, by C. S. Van Winkle.

391. Astoria; or, Anecdotes of an enterprise beyond the Rocky Mountains. Philadelphia, Carey, Lea & Blanchard, 1836. 2 v.
Rc–371 F880.I71 RBD
Belongs to the literature of overland journeys to the Northwest, the fur trade in Oregon, and the Pacific Fur Company.
Available (1954) from Binfords & Mort, 124 N. W. 9th Avenue, Portland, Oregon, publishers of books of interest in connection with the Pacific Northwest.

392. Letters to Henry Brevoort. Edited, with an introd., by George S. Hellman. New York, Putnam, 1915. 2 v. 15–22260 PS2081.A4 1915
Republished in 1918 in one volume (462 p.).

393. The journals of Washington Irving (hitherto unpublished) Edited by William P. Trent and George S. Hellman. Boston, Bibliophile Society, 1919. 3 v. 20–1680 PS2081.A3 1919
Covers the years from July 1815 to July 1842.
Stanley T. Williams has edited the following volumes of journals:
Journal of Washington Irving, 1823–1824. (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1931. 278 p.)
Journal, 1803, by Washington Irving (London and New York, Oxford University Press, 1934. 48 p.)
Journal of Washington Irving, 1828, and miscellaneous notes on Moorish legend and history. (New York, American Book Co., 1937. 80 p.)

394. Works. New ed. rev. New York, Putnam, 1848–51. 15 v. 1–1239 PS2050.E49
Vols. 1–11, 14: "New edition revised"; v. 1–10, 15: "Author's revised edition."

395. ——— Kinderhook ed. New York, Putnam [c1850–1880] 10 v.
16–16979 PS2050.E50a

396. ——— Hudson ed. New York, Putnam [c1856]–89. 27 v. CtY

397. ——— Author's rev. ed. New York, Putnam, 1863–66. 21 v. MH

398. ——— Knickerbocker ed. New York, Putnam, 1891–97. 40 v. OCU
Dates of publication found in the foregoing entries have been transcribed from cards in the National Union Catalog and the Main Catalog of the Library of Congress and do not necessarily represent the first publication of each edition described. For original publication dates see Stanley T. Williams and Mary E. Edge's A Bibliography of the Writings of Washington Irving (New York, Oxford University Press, 1936. p. 2–4).

399. Representative selections, with introductions, bibliography, and notes, by Henry A. Pochmann. New York, American Book Co., 1934. cxiv, 380 p. (American writers series)
34–29352 PS2053.P6
"Selected bibliography": p. xciii–cx.

400. Selected writings. Edited, with an introd., by Saxe Commins. New York, Modern Library, 1945. xix, 669 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books [240])
45–37863 PS2052.C6

401. Selected prose. Edited with an introd. by Stanley T. Williams. New York, Rinehart, 1950. xxiv, 423 p. (Rinehart editions, 41)
50–10714 PS2052.W5
"Biographical and bibliographical note": p. xxi–xxii.

402. SYLVESTER JUDD, 1813–1853

Lowell, in A Fable for Critics, called Judd's Margaret "the first Yankee book with the soul of Down East in it." This authentic local flavor was derived from the author's experiences when, removing from Massachusetts where he was reared, he settled in Augusta, Maine, as clergyman of a Unitarian church. His local interests were reflected not only in a few historical and genealogical works, but also particularly in his regional romances of rural New England. These he used to record descriptions of the landscapes he loved and as a medium for expressing his religious Transcendental, and social views. His writings also include Richard Edney (1850), a novel, and Philo, an Evangeliad (1850), a didactic poem.

403. Margaret; a tale of the real and ideal. Boston, Jordan & Wiley, 1845. 460 p.
7–3525 PZ3.J885M RBD

404. ——— Rev. ed. Boston, Phillips, Sampson, 1851. 2 v. 3–22366 PZ3.J885M3

405. JOHN PENDLETON KENNEDY, 1795–1870

Of combined Maryland and Virginia ancestry, Kennedy had a cosmopolitan circle of acquaintances in the North and in Europe, and took part in public life both locally and nationally. He was a pioneer writer about plantation life in Old Virginia, which he presented in Swallow Barn, a series of urbane sketches reminiscent of the writings of his friend, Washington Irving. His historical novels of frontier life in Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas in the colonial and Revolutionary periods are factually true but thoroughly representative of the tide of romanticism rising in his time. It is said that he advised Thackeray, whom he met on his travels, concerning local color for The Virginians. He was also instrumental in securing recognition for Edgar Allan Poe.

406. Swallow Barn; or, A sojourn in the Old Dominion [by Mark Littleton, pseud.] Philadelphia, Carey & Lea, 1832. 2 v.
7–3061 PZ3.K383S RBD

407. ——— Rev. ed., with twenty illus. by Strother. New York, Putnam, 1851. 506 p.
3–28156 PZ3.K383S2

408. ——— Edited with an introd. by Jay B. Hubbell. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1929. xxxiv, 422 p. (American authors series; general editor, S. T. Williams) 29–9094 PZ3.K383S9
"The text followed is that of the second edition, revised by Kennedy . . . in 1851."—Note on text.
Selected reading list: p. xxxiii–xxxiv.

409. Horse-Shoe Robinson; a tale of the Tory ascendency, by . . . [Mark Littleton, pseud.] Philadelphia, Carey, Lea, & Blanchard, 1835. 2 v.
3–16071 PZ3.K383H RBD

410. ——— Rev. ed. New York, Putnam, 1852. xiv, 598 p. 3–19517 PZ3.K383H3

411. ——— Edited, with introd., chronology, and bibliography, by Ernest E. Leisy. New York, American Book Co., 1937. xxxii, 550 p. (American fiction series; general editor, H. H. Clark) 37–4088 PZ3.K383H26
Selected bibliography: p. xxix–xxxii.

412. Rob of the Bowl; a legend of St. Inigoe's. By the author of "Swallow barn." Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard, 1838. 2 v.
7–12839 PS2162.R6 1838 RBD

413. ——— Rev. ed. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1860. 432 p. 7–10956 PZ3.K383R2

414. At home and abroad; a series of essays: with a journal in Europe in 1867–8. [New York] Putnam, 1872. 415 p.
3–30553 PS2162.A7 1872

415. CAROLINE MATILDA (STANSBURY) KIRKLAND, 1801–1864

Edgar Allan Poe, in the section devoted to Mrs. Kirkland in his "The Literati of New York City" (1846) said: "Unquestionably she is one of our best writers, has a province of her own, and in that province has few equals." Her province was that of portraying community types, manners and customs, misfortunes, and virtues observed by a cultivated New York woman during three years spent in sharing with others the making of a frontier settlement at Pinckney, Michigan. Writing with candor and realism unusual at the time, with tartness, but with humanity, Mrs. Kirkland recorded a phase of American civilization which was soon to pass. Her fictional sketches are also an early landmark in the use of the small town as a recurring theme in the national literature.

416. A new home—who'll follow? or, Glimpses of western life. By Mrs. Mary Clavers [pseud.] New York, C. S. Francis, 1839. 317 p.
13–9373 PZ3.K635N3 RBD
Reissued as Our New Home in the West (New York, Miller, 1872. 298 p.).

417. ———; or Life in the clearings. Edited and with an introd. by John Nerber. New York, Putnam, 1953. 308 p. 53–12508 PZ3.K635N8
"This editing of A New Home, and those portions of Forest Life [1842] which by substance belong to the earlier narrative . . . is designed only as an introduction for the modern reader to a delightful and nearly forgotten classic of another day."—Introduction, p. 16.

418. Forest life. By the author of A new home. New York, C. S. Francis, 1844. 2 v.
7–13208 PZ3.K635F RBD
First edition published 1842.

419. ABRAHAM LINCOLN, 1809–1865

Lincoln's place in the American heritage is with the Nation's statesmen. His collected writings are therefore entered in the section of this bibliography devoted to references on General History, where they stand beside the works of Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, and their successors. In this section on Literature it has been considered sufficient to suggest only briefer collections, in which Lincoln, the literary artist, may be observed at work, varying his style from the homely and simple to the stately and rhetorical, and throughout clearly revealing the mind and heart of mid-nineteenth century America at its best.

420. Abraham Lincoln, his speeches and writings. Edited with critical and analytical notes by Roy P. Basler. Pref. by Carl Sandburg. New York, World Pub. Co., 1946. xxx, 843 p.
53–28573 E457.92 1946
"Lincoln's Development as a Writer," p. 1–49, contains the editor's analysis of Lincoln's literary craftsmanship and accomplishments.
Sources and bibliography: p. 807–822.
Generally the most accurate text available aside from the Collected Works (1953).

421. The life and writings of Abraham Lincoln. Edited, and with a biographical essay, by Philip Van D. Stern; with an introd., "Lincoln in his writings," by Allan Nevins. New York, Modern Library, 1942. xxvi, 863 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books. [Modern Library giants])
43–16859 E457.92
A useful collection in spite of the fact that the text follows the sometimes unreliable Nicolay and Hay Complete Works.

422. DAVID ROSS LOCKE ("PETROLEUM V. NASBY"), 1833–1888

Locke, a humorist in the tradition of Charles Farrar Browne, wrote under the pseudonym of "Petroleum V. Nasby." Many of his pieces were issued individually in Ohio newspapers with which he was connected as a journalist or editor. Various collections were later published in book form. For some of his work Thomas Nast, the famous cartoonist, supplied illustrations. Locke's satires, marked by ridiculous spelling, gross distortions of grammar, puns, horseplay, and jokes of all kinds were useful war propaganda and political campaign literature in the North during and after the Civil War. They were eagerly read by a large audience, which included President Lincoln. His posthumous novel, The Demagogue (1891), castigated political corruption in Ohio.

423. The Nasby papers . . . [by] Petroleum V. Nasby [pseud.] Indianapolis, C. O. Perrine, 1864. 64 p. 5–40609 E647.L75 RBD

424. "Swingin round the cirkle." By Petroleum V. Nasby [pseud.] Illustrated by Thomas Nast. Boston, Lea & Shepard, 1867. 299 p.
8–1248 PN6161.L638 1867 RBD
A briefer work having the same title was published by the American News Company, New York, 1866, 38 p.

425. The struggles (social, financial and political) of Petroleum V. Nasby [pseud.] . . . With an introd. by Hon. Charles Sumner. Illustrated by Thomas Nast. Boston, I. N. Richardson, 1872. 720 p. 12–6202 PN6161.L637 RBD Sumner's introduction emphasizes Lincoln's enthusiasm for Locke's work.

426. Nasby in exile. Toledo, Ohio, Locke Pub. Co., 1882. xv, 672 p. 3–15519 D919.L81
Comments shrewdly on manners and customs observed during six months of travel in the British Isles, France, Germany, Switzerland, and Belgium. Originally published from week to week in the Toledo Blade.

427. HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW, 1807–1882

New Englander of Pilgrim descent, student and traveler in Europe, Harvard professor of modern languages and belles-lettres, but most of all a poet, Longfellow in his work displayed technical skill in versification, ability to tell a story, simplicity, sweetness, and emphasis on morality. A romantic poet, he derived inspiration from America's historic past, particularly from Indian lore and colonial history, from European folklore, and from the quiet tenor of everyday life. His narrative poems, some of the longest in American literature, have a vigorous sweep; his ballads are stirring; and his sonnets are thought by some critics to be among his best achievements. Longfellow is a national poet because he gave America the poetry it was ready and able to appreciate, so that his poems entered into the minds of the people and became household words even to schoolchildren. Through his work, which was widely translated abroad, Europe became increasingly aware of American literature, while Americans profited by the influences of older cultures transmitted in his poems. A recent and highly favorable study of Longfellow's place in American literature is found in Edward C. Wagenknecht's Longfellow; a Full-Length Portrait (New York, Longmans, Green, 1955. 370 p.).

428. Ballads and other poems. Cambridge, Mass., J. Owen, 1842. 132 p.
8–26999 PS2255.A1 1842 RBD
First edition issued December 1841.

429. Evangeline, a tale of Acadie. Boston, Ticknor, 1847. 163 p.
10–5566 PS2263.A1 1847 RBD

430. Kavanagh, a tale. Boston, Ticknor, Reed, & Fields, 1849. 188 p.
7–14788 PS2273.K3 1849 RBD
Includes (chapter 20) an expression of Longfellow's sense of the debt owed by American writers to their intellectual inheritance from Europe; also sets forth his belief in the importance of international and universal interests to a growing national literature; a short novel frequently autobiographical.

431. The seaside and the fireside. Boston, Ticknor, Reed, & Fields, 1850. 141 p.
6–46541 PS2266.A1 1850 RBD
First edition published December 1849.

432. The song of Hiawatha. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1855. 316 p.
6–46545 PS2267.A1 1855 RBD

433. The courtship of Miles Standish, and other poems. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1858. 215 p. 6–46552 PS2262.A1 1858 RBD
"Birds of Passage": p. [117]–209.

434. Tales of a wayside inn. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1863. 225 p.
6–46546 PS2269.A1 1863 RBD

435. The masque of Pandora, and other poems. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1875. 146 p.
6–46553 PS2271.M3 1875 RBD

436. Complete works. Rev. ed. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1866. 7 v.
8–22190 PS2250.E66 RBD

437. Complete poetical and prose works. Riverside ed. [Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1886–93.] 11 v.
CONTENTS:
Prose works, with bibliographical and critical notes. [1886] 2 v.
28–14051 PS2272.A1 1886
Poetical works, with bibliographical and critical notes. [1886] 6 v. 28–11440 PS2250.E86a
The Divine comedy of Dante Alighieri, translated by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. [1892–93] 3 v.
30–3804 PQ4315.L7 1892
Published originally in 1886.

438. Works, with bibliographical and critical notes and his life, with extracts from his journals and correspondence; edited by Samuel Longfellow. [Standard library ed.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1886–91. 14 v. MdBJ

439. Complete writings. Craigie ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1932?] 11 v.
33–35334 PS2250.F32a
Includes illustrations by J. S. Sargent, J. La Farge, E. W. Longfellow, and others. First published in 1904.

440. Complete poetical works. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1893?] 689 p. (Cambridge edition of the poets; edited by H. E. Scudder) OO

441. ——— Cambridge ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [°1903] xxi, 689 p. (Cambridge edition of the poets; edited by H. E. Scudder)
40–22245 PS2250.FO3a
"Biographical Sketch" signed: H. E. S. [i. e., Horace Elisha Scudder].

442. Representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Odell Shepard. New York, American Book Co., 1934. lxiv, 371 p. (American writers series) 34–13240 PS2252.S37
"Selected bibliography": p. lvii–lxii.

443. The poems of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, selected, and edited with a commentary, by Louis Untermeyer. New York, Heritage Press, 1943. xxiii, 444 p. illus. (The American poets; edited by Louis Untermeyer)
43–12592 PS2252.U5

444. Favorite poems; with an introd. by Henry Seidel Canby. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1947. xx, 395 p. illus.
47–11080 PS2252.C3

445. AUGUSTUS BALDWIN LONGSTREET, 1790–1870

Realism and humor are joined in Longstreet's robust newspaper sketches of country and backwoods life in Georgia while the state was still part of the frontier. They provide an early example of earthy humor, frequently expressed in local dialect, which appealed to American taste and set a fashion that culminated in the work of humorists of the West after the Civil War, notably in that of Mark Twain.

446. Georgia scenes, characters, incidents, &c., in the first half century of the Republic. By a native Georgian. Augusta, Ga. Printed at the S. R. Sentinel Office, 1835. 235 p.
17–6124 PZ3.L866G2 RBD

447. ——— 2d ed. With original illus. New York, Harper, 1850. 214 p.
18–17312 PZ3.L866G10 RBD

448. ——— New ed., from new plates, with the original illus. New York, Harper, 1897. 297 p. 8–26638 PZ3.L866G20

449. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, 1819–1891

Lowell, one of the famous group of literary men in New England which included Holmes and Longfellow among others, was notable for his versatility. As a man of the world he was a traveler, at home in England and on the Continent, and as a diplomat at the Spanish and British courts. In these capacities he was noticeably successful in interpreting American democratic ideals to other countries and in bringing back to the United States reflections of the cultural heritage of older nations. He was erudite in humanistic disciplines, so that he was a logical choice to succeed Longfellow in the professorship of modern languages and belles-lettres at Harvard. When The Atlantic Monthly was founded in 1857 he was appointed editor, an office he held until 1861, when the importance of that literary journal was already established. He was also for some years joint editor of The North American Review and was a voluminous contributor to the periodical press of the country. As a writer he was a poet skilled in the techniques of versification, a critic, a humorist, a master of letter-writing and the familiar essay. His ardent interest in public affairs was expressed in his work for the abolition of slavery. Because of his many-sided interests, he is regarded by some critics as the representative American writer of his period. A detailed study of Lowell's early literary career and his literary output, "within the human context of its origins," is found in Leon Howard's Victorian Knight-Errant (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1952. 388 p.).

450. Poems. Cambridge, Mass., J. Owen, 1844 [1843] 279 p. PS2305.A1 1844 RBD

451. ——— Cambridge, Mass., J. Owen, 1844. 279 p. 7–2790 PS2305.A1 1844a RBD
Reissue of first edition of the same date.

452. ——— Second series. Cambridge, Mass., G. Nichols, 1848 [1847] viii, 184 p.
6–18395 PS2305.A1 1847 RBD

453. Complete poetical works [edited by Horace E. Scudder] Cambridge ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1896. xvii, 492 p.
4–13831 PS2305.A1 1896

454. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1917. xvii, 492 p. (Cambridge edition of the poets)
40–37872 PS2300.F17

455. The vision of Sir Launfal. Cambridge, Mass., G. Nichols, 1848. 27 p.
24–17590 PS2312.A1 1848 RBD
Characterized by interpretations of nature observed in the New England countryside, by moral teachings concerning the brotherhood of man, and by some of Lowell's most skillful versification; the work that established his reputation as a poet.

456. The Biglow papers [first series] . . . by Homer Wilbur, A. M., pastor of the First Church in Jaalam . . . Cambridge, Mass., G. Nichols, 1848. xxxii, 163 p.
6–7135 PS2306.A1 1848 RBD
At head of title: Meliboeus-Hipponax.

457. ——— Second series. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1867. lxxx, 258 p.
23–16620 PS2306.A1 1867 RBD
At head of title: Meliboeus-Hipponax.
Satiric pieces, predominantly in verse written in Yankee dialect, called forth by the writer's strong reactions to national problems such as the War with Mexico, the annexation of Texas, slavery, and the preservation of the Union.

458. [A fable for critics] Reader! walk up at once (it will soon be too late) and buy at a perfectly ruinous rate A fable for critics . . . [New York] Putnam [1848] 78 p.
8–26997 PS2309.A1 1848 RBD
Rhymed criticisms of contemporary American authors, somewhat in the manner of Lord Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809).

459. Ode recited at the commemoration of the living and dead soldiers of Harvard University, July 21, 1865. Cambridge, Mass., Priv. print., 1865. 25 p.
50–53826 PS2314.O3 RBD
"Fifty copies printed. No. 22."
Immediately after the poem was read Lowell added to it a tribute to Abraham Lincoln as a symbol of democracy and "the first American."

460. Democracy, and other addresses. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1887. 245 p.
23–16635 PS2322.D4 1887 RBD
The address on democracy, delivered in Birmingham, England, in 1884, is an example of the way in which Lowell became a spokesman for American life and institutions to other countries; also included is his "Harvard Anniversary" address (1886) which sets forth his views on the functions of education in a democracy.

461. American ideas for English readers, with introd. by Henry Stone. Boston, J. G. Cupples, ℗1892. xv, 94 p.
33–37837 PS2322.A5 1892 RBD
Eleven addresses delivered in England from November 6, 1880, to December 23, 1888.

462. Letters. Edited by Charles Eliot Norton. New York, Harper, 1894. 2 v.
4–17167 PS2331.A3N6
Norton later edited an enlarged collection of the Letters, which was included as volumes 14–16 in both the Elmwood and the de luxe editions of Lowell's Complete Writings. More recently M. A. De Wolfe Howe edited New Letters of James Russell Lowell (New York, Harper, 1932. 364 p.).

463. Anti-slavery papers. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1902. 2 v.
2–27437 E449.L91
More than 50 articles published in newspapers between 1844 and 1850; edited from the manuscripts by W. B. Parker but not included in the collected works cited below.

464. Uncollected poems; edited by Thelma M. Smith. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1950. xxv, 291 p.
50–10335 PS2305.S5
Bibliography: p. [281]–283.
Poems rejected by Lowell from his early volumes are not included; but the editor has attempted to collect other printed poems omitted from the Elmwood edition, of which there were a substantial number. No claim is made that these are among the poet's best. It is believed by the editor, however, that the student of Lowell and of American life in the 19th century will find ideas of genuine interest in them. Cf. Preface, p. vii, and Introduction, p. ix.

465. Writings. [Large paper ed.] [Cambridge, Riverside Press, 1890–92] 12 v.
23–16621 PS2300.E90
Originally in 10 vols., revised by author; v. [11–12] not numbered, added later by C. E. Norton.
CONTENTS.—v. 1–4. Literary essays.—v. 5. Political essays.—v. 6. Literary and political addresses.—v. 7–10. Poems.— [v. 11] Latest literary essays and addresses. 1891.—[v. 12] The old English dramatists. 1892.

466. Complete writings [Elmwood ed.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1904. 16 v.
OC1
Includes Horace E. Scudder's Life of James Russell Lowell, 2 v., and Lowell's Letters, edited by C. E. Norton, 3 v.

467. ——— Ed. de luxe. [Cambridge, Printed at the Riverside Press, 1904] 16 v.
4–22260 PS2300.F04
Volumes 8, 14–16, edited by C. E. Norton.
CONTENTS.—v. 1. Fireside travels.—v. 2. My study windows.—v. 3–5. Among my books.—v. 6. Political essays.—v. 7. Literary and political addresses.—v. 8. Latest literary essays. The old English dramatists.—v. 9–13. The poetical works.—v. 14–16. Letters, ed. by C. E. Norton.

468. Representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Harry Hayden Clark and Norman Foerster. New York, American Book Co., 1947. clxvi, 498 p. (American writers series)
47–671 PS2302.C5
Bibliography: p. cxliii–clxvi.

469. Essays, poems and letters. Selected and edited by William Smith Clark II. New York, Odyssey Press, 1948. liv, 424 p. (Odyssey series in literature) 48–9571 PS2302.C53
Selected bibliography: p. l–liv.

470. HERMAN MELVILLE, 1819–1891

When Melville was a young boy without financial prospects he went to sea to mend his fortunes, being in turn cabin boy, whaler, and enlisted man on a United States frigate. His experiences during this period constituted his higher education and gave him a wealth of material utilized during his career as a writer. The kindness and simplicity of native life in the South Pacific Islands impressed him greatly, as did the arrogance and cruelty of various Americans encountered in his seafaring years. Finally he became a democrat of the most thoroughgoing kind, a strong individualist, a passionate advocate of social justice, a hater of shams and of the evils inherent in slavery, imperialism, and the "divine rights" theory of property. The ferment of these ideas and the impact of his friendship with Hawthorne contributed to the writing of his masterpiece, Moby-Dick. This classic of adventures encountered in the pursuit of whales by New England whalemen is also a metaphysical and symbolic portrayal of the forces of evil that lie in wait for human souls. As such it reflects the climate of thought represented by the work of Emerson, Hawthorne, Thoreau, and Whitman.

471. Typee: a peep at Polynesian life. During a four months' residence in a valley of the Marquesas. New York, Wiley & Putnam, 1846. 2 pts. in 1 v. (325 p.) (Wiley & Putnam's library of American books [no. 13])
3–27253 PS2384.T8 1846b RBD
Sequel: Omoo.
Romantic fictional narrative of the simple, happy life enjoyed by the cannibal natives and of the hero's exotic adventures among them.

472. ——— London, New York, H. Milford, 1924. xvi, 338 p. (The World's classics, 274) 25–26583 PZ3.M498T24

473. ——— New York, Dutton, 1930. x, 286 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys. Fiction, no. 180) 36–37236 AC1.E8, no. 180

474. ——— With an introd. by Raymond M. Weaver and illus. by Miguel Covarrubias. New York, Limited Editions Club, 1935. xxviii, 409 p. 35–16595 PS2384.T8 1935 RBD

475. ——— Illustrated by Mead Schaeffer. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1951. viii, 289 p.
51–5640 PZ3.M498T35
"Sequel containing The Story of Toby": p. 270–283.

476. Omoo: a narrative of adventures in the South Seas. New York, Harper, 1847. xv, [17]–389 p. 42–33235 PS2384.O6 1847a RBD Sequel to Typee.

477. ——— New York, Dutton, 1925. xiv, 328 p. (Everyman's library, edited by Ernest Rhys. Fiction [no. 297])
36–37148 AC1.E8, no. 297
Bibliography: p. vii.

478. Mardi: and a voyage thither. New York, Harper, 1849. 2 v.
7–17954 PS2384.M3 1849 RBD
Allegorical romance located in an imaginary world somewhere in Polynesia, in which the writer gives expression to the social, religious, political, and philosophical questions with which he was concerned; these were later much more powerfully developed in Moby-Dick. It is the subject of Merrell R. Davis' monograph, Melville's Mardi, a Chartless Voyage (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1952. 240 p. Yale studies in English, v. 119).

479. White-jacket; or, The world in a man-of-war. New York, Harper, 1850. vii, [9]–465 p.
42–30911 PS2384.W5 RBD
Fictional account of the writer's service on the U. S. man-of-war, United States, and of the abuses, particularly flogging, to which the seamen were subjected; may be contrasted with R. H. Dana's Two Years Before the Mast (1840).

480. ——— With an introd. by Carl Van Doren. London, Oxford University Press, 1929. xx, 380 p. (World's classics, 253)
33–22938 PZ3.M498W36

481. Moby-Dick; or, The whale. New York, Harper, 1851. xxiii, 634 p.
7–17953 PS2384.M6 1851 RBD
An annotated edition of the text of the American first edition has been prepared by Willard Thorp (New York, Oxford University Press, 1947. 532 p.); another edition has an introduction by Newton Arvin (New York, Rinehart, 1948. 566 p.).

Arvin is also the author of Melville's critical biography in the American men of letters series (New York, Sloane, 1950. 316 p.). The Trying-Out of Moby-Dick, by Howard P. Vincent, joint editor of the novel in the Complete Works of Melville, was published by Houghton Mifflin (1949. 400 p.); it "combines a study of the whaling sources of Moby-Dick, with an account of its composition, and suggestions concerning its interpretation and meaning." Milton O. Percival's A Reading of Moby-Dick (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1950. [136] p.) provides an analysis of the text as an allegory of the problem of good and evil.

Among convenient editions of the novel in reprint series may be mentioned the following:

482. ——— Introd. by Leon Howard. New York, Modern Library, 1950. xxxi, 565 p. (Modern Library college editions, T20)
50–11914 PZ3.M498Mo61
Bibliographical note: p. xxvii.

483. ——— Introd. by Sherman Paul. New York, Dutton, 1950. xxxv, 664 p. (Everyman's library, 179A. Fiction)
50–58247 PZ3.M498Mo62
An introductory bibliography of Melville's works appears on p. [666–667].

484. The piazza tales. New York, Dix & Edwards, 1856. 431 p.
7–17952 PS2384.P4 1856 RBD
CONTENTS.—The piazza.—Bartleby.—Benito Cereno.—The lightning-rod man.—The Encantadas; or, Enchanted islands.—The bell-tower.
For a new edition see entry under Complete Works.

485. The confidence-man: his masquerade. New York, Dix, Edwards, 1857. vi, 394 p.
7–17956 PS2384.C6 1857 RBD
For a new edition see entry under Complete Works.

486. Battle-pieces and aspects of the war. New York, Harper, 1866. x, 272 p.
A18–98 PS2384.B3 1866 RBD
Poems that commemorate events of the Civil War from Manassas to the victory of the Union forces; includes a supplement in prose dealing with the existing political situation.

487. Billy Budd, and other prose pieces. Edited by Raymond [M.] Weaver. London, Constable, 1924. 399 p. (The works of Herman Melville. Standard edition, v. 13)
24–29693 PS2380.F22, v. 13 RBD
First publication of the novel that was written shortly before the author's death; a story of valor and tragedy in the life of an American sailor. The complete text of the work, with variant readings based on Melville manuscripts, was edited by F. Barron Freeman ([Cambridge, Mass.] Harvard University Press, 1948. 381 p.). An opera in four acts by Benjamin Britten was inspired by the novel, as was a play in three acts by Louis O. Coxe and Robert Chapman (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1951. 56 p.).
The volume includes also Melville's long, enthusiastic essay on Hawthorne's work, entitled "Hawthorne and His Mosses," in which he compared Hawthorne to Shakespeare and made the famous statements: "Men, not very much inferior to Shakespeare, are this day being born on the banks of the Ohio . . . Let America, then, prize and cherish her writers; yea, let her glorify them. . . . And while she has good kith and kin of her own, to take to her bosom, let her not lavish her embraces upon the household of an alien."

488. Poems, containing Battle-pieces and aspects of the war, John Marr and other sailors, Timoleon, etc., and Miscellaneous poems. London, Constable, 1924. xii, 434 p. (The works of Herman Melville. Standard edition, v. 16)
25–16079 PS2380.F22, v. 16 RBD
For a new edition see entry under Complete Works.

489. Journal of a visit to Europe and the Levant, October 11, 1856–May 6, 1857. Edited by Howard C. Horsford. Princeton, N. J., Princeton University Press, 1955. xiv, 299 p. (Princeton studies in English, no. 35)
54–5005 D919.M58 1955
Bibliography: p. xiii–xiv.
An earlier and very limited edition of Melville's journal for this period is found in Journal Up the Straits, edited by Raymond M. Weaver (New York, The Colophon, 1935. 182 p.). The first publication of two original notebooks, edited by Eleanor M. Metcalf, appeared as Journal of a Visit to London and the Continent, 1849–1850 (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1948. 189 p.).

490. Works. Standard ed. London, Constable, 1922–24. 16 v. PS2380.F22 RBD

491. [Complete works] New York, Hendricks House, 1947.
Note changes of publisher in contents described below:

Collected poems. Edited by Howard P. Vincent. Chicago, Packard, 1947. 548 p. (Complete works, 14) 47–4470 PS2382.V5

Piazza tales. Edited by Egbert S. Oliver. New York, Hendricks House, 1948. 256 p. (Complete works, 9) 48–9243 PS2384.P4 1948

Pierre; or, The ambiguities. Edited by Henry A. Murray. New York, Hendricks House, 1949. 514 p. (Complete works, 7) 49–3233 PZ3.M498P13

Moby-Dick; or, The whale. Edited by Luther S. Mansfield and Howard P. Vincent. New York, Hendricks House, 1952. 851 p. (Complete works) 52–6994 PZ3.M498Mo64

Bibliographical references included in the "Index" (p. 833–851).

The confidence-man: his masquerade. Edited by Elizabeth S. Foster. New York, Hendricks House, 1954. xcv, 392 p. 55–188 PZ3.M498Cp3

Includes an introduction with footnotes; explanatory notes (p. 287–367) based chiefly on the editor's doctoral dissertation on the origin and meaning of the work (Yale, 1942); textual notes (p. 367–371); and an Appendix (p. 372–392). Volume number, series note, and blue buckram binding, characteristic details usually found in volumes constituting Complete Works, are absent in the copy described above. It is, therefore, possibly designed to serve as a trade edition having minor variations from the more elaborate set of Complete Works.

492. Representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Willard Thorp. New York, American Book Co., 1938. clxi, 437 p. (American writers series) 38–18635 PS2382.T5

"Selected bibliography": p. cxxxiii–clxi.

493. Complete stories. Edited with an introd. and notes, by Jay Leyda. New York, Random House, 1949. xxxiv, 472 p. 49–8911 PZ3.M498Co

Includes the short stories in The Piazza Tales and all Melville's known short fiction, the product of his writing in the mid-1850's. Cf. Introduction, p. xxix.

494. Selected tales and poems. Edited with an introd. by Richard Chase. New York, Rinehart, 1950. xxiv, 417 p. (Rinehart editions, 36) 51–244 PS2382.C4

Bibliography: p. [xxi].

495. The portable Melville. Edited, and with an introd., by Jay Leyda. New York, Viking Press, 1952. xxii, 746 p. (The Viking portable library [58]) 52–6308 PS2382.L4

". . . this collection has . . . strung the work selected along the thread of the life that produced it . . . Thus ordered, even the portion of his work included here shows unity of purpose and consistency of imagery, though these did not govern the selection."—Introduction, p. xiv.

496. Selected writings: complete short stories, Typee [and] Billy Budd, foretopman. New York, Modern Library, 1952. 903 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books) 51–14537 PS2382.M6

A voluminous literature has been inspired by Melville and his writings. Contributions made to these studies within recent years include the following:

497. Chase, Richard V. Herman Melville, a critical study. New York, Macmillan, 1949. xiii, 305 p. 49–11341 PS2386.C5

Work addressed to scholars, having as its thesis Melville's use of myth and symbol; also emphasized his use of American folklore and background.

498. Gilman, William H. Melville's early life and Redburn. New York, New York University Press, 1951. ix, 378 p. 51–12126 PS2386.G46

Bibliographical references included in "Notes" (p. [289]–368).

499. Hillway, Tyrus, ed. Moby-Dick centennial essays. Edited for the Melville Society, with an introd. by Tyrus Hillway and Luther S. Mansfield. Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1953. xiv, 182 p. 53–12917 PS2384.M62H4

500. Howard, Leon. Herman Melville, a biography. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1951. xi, 354 p. 51–62667 PS2386.H6

501. Leyda, Jay, ed. The Melville log; a documentary life of Herman Melville, 1819–1891. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1951. 2 v. (xxxiv, 899 p.) 51–13799 PS2386.L4

"The sources": v. 2, p. 841–858.

502. Metcalf, Eleanor M., ed. Herman Melville, cycle and epicycle. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. xvii, 311 p. 52–9393 PS2386.M46

"Letters by, to, and about Melville . . . with . . . commentary by Melville's granddaughter."—Dust jacket.

503. Rosenberry, Edward H. Melville and the comic spirit. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1955. x, 211 p. 55–10976 PS2387.R64

Bibliography: p. [201]–205.

504. Stone, Geoffrey. Melville. New York, Sheed & Ward, 1949. ix, 336 p. (Great writers of the world [4]) 49-48538 PS2386.S8
Bibliography: p. 320-326.
Presents the Roman Catholic point of view.

505. Wright, Nathalia. Melville's use of the Bible. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1949. 203 p. (Duke University publications) 49-9775 PS2388.B5W7

506. DONALD GRANT MITCHELL ("IK MARVEL"), 1822-1908

A frequent contributor to literary periodicals, a traveler, and a consul abroad, Mitchell conveyed his impressions of Europe and America to American readers in articles and books. He developed a type of fictional essay of sentiment and reflection that enjoyed marked popularity at the mid-century point and later. His most substantial literary work, however, resulted from his passion for nature, landscape gardening, and farming. His experiences in these connections resulted in several books about life at his country home.

507. Reveries of a bachelor; or, A book of the heart. By Ik Marvel [pseud.] New York, Baker & Scribner, 1850. 298 p. 4-8631 PZ3.M692 RBD

508. ——— Illus. by C. B. Falls. New York, Holborn House, 1931. 222 p. 32-2038 PS2404.R4 1931

509. My farm of Edgewood: a country book. By the author of Reveries of a bachelor. New York, Scribner, 1863. x, 319 p. 22-15237 S521.M65 1863

510. Works. [Edgewood ed.] New York, Scribner, 1907. 15 v. illus. 7-31247 PS2400.A2 1907

511. JAMES KIRKE PAULDING, 1778-1860

A collaborator of William and Washington Irving in writing Salmagundi (first series, 1807-8), Paulding's favorite genre, like that of his contemporary, Cooper, was the historical novel of colonial, Revolutionary, and frontier life. Most successful as a novelist of the Dutch in New York, he was also an essayist, poet, dramatist, and humorist of the "tall-tale" school. Since his politics were those of a liberal democrat, and because he was a strong advocate of an agrarian civilization, he was naturally sympathetic toward the South. His position on the issue of slavery was moderate but without approval. An ardent patriot, whose family fortunes had been ruined in the Revolutionary War, he was engaged from time to time in writing sarcastic replies to criticisms by British travelers in the United States. He was an advocate of a "National Literature," true to nature and reality in America, not marred by the addition of "high-seasoned dishes of foreign cookery."

512. The United States and England. New York, A. H. Inskeep, 1815. 115 p. 9-24530 E164.I48 RBD AC901.B3, v. 57 RBD
One of a series of controversial, sometimes satiric, works in which the author answers British critics of America; includes also material on politics, government, social life, and customs in the United States.

513. Letters from the South. New York, J. Eastburn, 1817. 2 v. Rc-2430 F230.P32 RBD

514. The Dutchman's fireside. A tale. New York, Harper, 1831. 2 v. (Harper's stereotype ed.) 7-34069 PZ3.P282Du RBD

515. ——— New York, University Pub. Co., 1900. 128 p. (Standard literature series [no. 44]) 0-5518 PZ3.P282Du12

516. Westward Ho! A tale. New-York, J. & J. Harper, 1832. 2 v. 7-33782 PZ3.P282W RBD
Novel on the theme of Virginians pioneering in Kentucky.

517. American comedies. By J. K. Paulding and William Irving Paulding. Philadelphia, Carey & Hart, 1847. 295 p. 28-14875 PS2527.A5 1847 RBD
The first only is by J. K. Paulding.
CONTENTS.—The Bucktails; or, Americans in England.—The noble exile.—Madmen all; or, The cure of love.—Antipathies; or, The enthusiasts by the ears.

518. The lion of the West. Edited and with an introd. by James N. Tidwell. Stanford, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1954. 64 p. 54-12970 PS2527.L5 1954
First publication of a play which won the prize offered by James H. Hackett, an actor-producer, for "an original comedy whereof an American should be the leading character." First revised by John A. Stone, and later by William B. Bernard, who changed the title to The Kentuckian; or, A Trip to New York, the play was acted successfully from time to time for some 20 years. The manuscript disappeared from view and only now, after nearly a hundred years, it has been located and reproduced from two texts identified as A and B. Said to be the first American comedy to use an uncouth frontiersman as its central character. Cf. Introduction, p. 7–11.

519. Works. [New York, Harper, 1834–37] 14 v. in 7. MiU

520. EDGAR ALLAN POE, 1809–1849

In Poe's tragic life the center of interest was not political, social, or philosophical. His art of literary composition and the tales and poems he wrote brought into the mainstream of American romanticism his own love of beauty, mysticism, intensity, and preoccupation with death. In all these absorptions he was influenced by Byron, Shelley, and Coleridge. He is known for his major contribution to the development of the short story as a form of literary art. Modern mystery and horror stories, and often science fiction and even detective stories, owe much to his beginnings, though often unworthily. His lyric poetry is known throughout the civilized world and particularly in Europe, where his work has been repeatedly translated and where he has long been acclaimed a genius of the first order. As a frequent contributor to periodicals and himself the editor of several, he was instrumental in the rise of literary criticism in America, particularly by his "The Philosophy of Composition" (1846), "The Rationale of Verse" (1843, 1848), "The Poetic Principle" (1850), and by miscellaneous reviews, essays, and studies, a number of which are gathered in his The Literati (1850). Not by any definition a writer concerned with purveying peculiarly "American" themes for a democratic American audience, he nevertheless attained a high position in the national literature by values in his work that are universal. Among the individuals and groups that bear his impress are Ambrose Bierce, Hart Crane, Robert Louis Stevenson, and many of the late 19th- and 20th-century French poets, including Charles Baudelaire. Baudelaire on Poe, critical papers translated and edited by Lois and Francis E. Hyslop (State College, Pa., Bald Eagle Press, 1952. 175 p.), brings together in convenient form the essays which, together with Baudelaire's translations of Poe, contributed much to the latter's reputation abroad.

521. Tamerlane and other poems, by a Bostonian. Boston, C. F. S. Thomas, 1827. 40 p. PU

522. ——— Reproduced in facsimile from the ed. of 1827, with an introd. by Thomas Ollive Mabbott. New York, Published for The Facsimile Text Society by Columbia University Press, 1941. lxvi p., facsim.: 2 p. l., [iii]–iv, [5]–40 p. (The Facsimile Text Society. Publication no. 51)
41–5881 PS2610.T3 1827b

523. Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and minor poems. Baltimore, Hatch & Dunning, 1829. 71 p.
54–50784 PS2610.A6 1829 RBD

524. ——— Reproduced from the ed. of 1829, with a bibliographical note by Thomas Ollive Mabbott. New York, Published for The Facsimile Text Society by Columbia University Press, 1933. facsim.: 71 p. (The Facsimile Text Society, ser. 1: Language and literature, v. 9)
33–3804 PS2610.A6 1829b RBD

525. Poems. 2d ed. New York, E. Bliss, 1831. 124 p. 55–46240 PS2605.A1 1831 RBD

Poe called this a second edition because he considered it a revision of Al Aaraaf (1829). The inclusion of new material, however, has caused critics to consider it the first edition of a separate work.

526. ——— Reproduced from the ed. of 1831, with a bibliographical note by Killis Campbell. New York, Published for The Facsimile Text Society by Columbia University Press, 1936. facsim.: 124 p. (The Facsimile Text Society. Publication no. 35) 36–8568 PS2605.A1 1831a

Reproduced from the copy in the Harvard College Library.

CONTENTS.—Dedication.—Letter to Mr. ———. —Introduction.—To Helen.—Israfel.—The doomed city.—Fairyland.—Irene.—A pæan.—The valley Nis.—Al Aaraaf.—Tamerlane.

527. ——— Edited by Killis Campbell. Boston, Ginn, 1917. lxvi, 332 p.
17–24169 PS2605.A1 1917a

528 Tales of the grotesque and arabesque. Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard, 1840. 2 v.
7–35802 PS2612.A1 1840 RBD

529 Tales. New York, Wiley & Putnam, 1845. 228 p. 45–41682 PS2612.A1 1845

CONTENTS.—The gold-bug.—The black cat.—Mesmeric revelation.—Lionizing.—The fall of the house of Usher.—A descent into the maelström.—The colloquy of Monos and Una.—The conversation of Eiros and Charmion.—The murders in the Rue Morgue.—The mystery of Marie Rogêt.—The purloined letter.—The man in the crowd.

530. The raven and other poems. New York, Wiley & Putnam, 1845. 91 p. (Wiley and Putnam library of American books [no. 8])
18–13432 PS2609.A1 1845a RBD
"The Raven" was first published in the Evening Mirror (New York) v. 1, no. 97, Jan. 29, 1845, p. [4]. The present collection contains nearly all of the poetry written by Poe up to this time.

531. Eureka: a prose poem. New York, Putnam, 1848. 143 p.
18–11047 PS2620.A1 1848 RBD
Elaboration of his lecture on the "Cosmogony of the Universe," delivered in the New York Society Library, Feb. 3, 1848.

532. Letters. Edited by John Ward Ostrom. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1948. 2 v. (xxviii, 664 p.) 48–9083 PS2631.A374
"A continuation and an expansion of the editor's A Check List of Letters to and from Poe, published as no. 4 in the Bibliographical series . . . of the University of Virginia."
"Bibliography and list of manuscript collections": p. [547]–557.

533. Complete works. Edited by James A. Harrison. [Virginia ed.] New York, Crowell, 1902. 17 v. 2–20043 PS2601.H3 RBD
"Bibliography of the writings of Edgar A. Poe": v. 16, p. [355]–379.
CONTENTS.—v. 1. Biography [by James A. Harrison]—v. 2–6. Tales.—v. 7. Poems.—v. 8–13. Literary criticism.—v. 14. Essays and miscellanies.—v. 15. Literati. Autography.—v. 16. Marginalia. Eureka.—v. 17. Poe and his friends. Letters relating to Poe.

534. Representative selections, with introductions, bibliography, and notes; begun by Margaret Alterton and completed by Hardin Craig. New York, American Book Co., 1935. cxxxvi, 563 p. (American writers series) 35–11900 PS2603.A6
"Selected bibliography": p. cxix–cxxxiii.

535. Edgar Allan Poe, selected and edited, with an introd. and notes, by Philip Van Doren Stern. New York, Viking Press, 1945. xxxviii, 664 p. (The Viking portable library)
45–8508 PS2602.S75

536. Complete poems and stories, with selections from his critical writings. With an introd. and explanatory notes by Arthur Hobson Quinn; texts established, with bibliographical notes, by Edward H. O'Neill. Illustrated by E. McKnight Kauffer. New York, Knopf, 1946. 2 v. (542, 543–1092 p.) 46–7971 PS2601.Q5
"Bibliographical and textual notes": v. 2, p. [1055]–1087. Bibliography: v. 2, p. [1089]–1092.

537. Selected prose and poetry. Edited, with an introd. by W. H. Auden. New York, Rinehart, 1950. xxvi, 528 p. (Rinehart editions, 42)
51–2058 PS2602.A8
"Textual and bibliographical note": p. xxi–xxiii.

538. Selected poetry and prose. Edited with an introd. by T. O. Mabbott. New York, Modern Library, 1951. xix, 428 p. (Modern Library college editions, T58)
51–5396 PS2602.M3
Bibliography: p. xv–xvi.
Text based chiefly on Harrison's Virginia edition of Poe's works. Includes among the prose pieces the following: Instinct vs Reason—A Black Cat [recently discovered]; The Philosophy of Composition [1846]; Tale-Writing—Twice-Told Tales [etc.] by Nathaniel Hawthorne [1842]; and The Poetic Principle, a lecture frequently delivered by Poe but not published until 1850.

Among recent historical and critical studies that contribute to an understanding of Poe's place in American literature are the following:

539. Braddy, Haldeen. Glorious incense; the fulfillment of Edgar Allan Poe. Washington, Scarecrow Press, 1953. 234 p.
53–7181 PS2631.B7
Includes bibliography.
Designed as a survey of critical writing about Poe, ca. 1850–1950, and an evaluation of the survival value of his work. For John Ostrom's criticism see American Literature, v. 25, Jan. 1954, p. 508–509.

540. Chivers, Thomas Holley. Life of Poe; edited with an introd. by Richard Beale Davis, from the mss. in the Henry E. Huntington Library, San Marino, Calif. New York, Dutton, 1952. 127 p.
52–5295 PS2631.C53
Bibliographical references included in "Explanatory notes" (p. 101–121).

541. Fagin, Nathan B. The histrionic Mr. Poe. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1949. xiii, 289 p. 49–9270 PS2631.F3
Bibliography: p. 241–254.

542. HENRY WHEELER SHAW ("JOSH BILLINGS"), 1818–1885

Shaw's aphorisms and stories, published under the pseudonym of "Josh Billings," were part of the humorous literature that rose in popularity in the mid-nineteenth century, to which Lincoln and other notables were devoted. Born in Massachusetts, Shaw traveled and worked as a steamboat captain in what was then the West, and finally settled in New York. These varied experiences gave him wide familiarity with the sayings, jokes, and folk speech of different regions. They formed the background from which his social satire developed, and for the dialects and outlandish spellings that gave delight to his readers. His popularity was such that for 10 years he was able to maintain Josh Billings' Farmer's Allminax (1870–80) as a repository for his proverbial wit and wisdom. He was also much in demand as a lecturer, thus foreshadowing Mark Twain's later success with spoken humor.

543. Josh Billings, hiz sayings. With comic illus. New York, Carleton, 1866. 232 p.
12–10995 PN6161.S535 RBD
Not the first publication of the sayings, but issued after his adoption of unusual spelling had increased the popularity of his work.

544. Complete works. With one hundred illus. by Thomas Nast and others, and a biographical introd. Rev. ed. Chicago, M. A. Donohue, 1919. xxxii, 504 p.
36–34515 PN6161.S5317 1919

545. Uncle Sam's Uncle Josh: or, Josh Billings on practically everything, distilled from Josh's rum-and-tansy New England wit by Donald Day. Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 243 p.
53–5263 PS2806.D3

546. WILLIAM GILMORE SIMMS, 1806–1870

It has been suggested that Simms might be called the Cooper of the South, because he achieved recognition second only to Cooper's when writing in the same genre. Using Georgia, Mississippi, and Kentucky, but principally his native South Carolina, as the settings for his romantic novels, he treated three subjects derived from American history: the frontier; Indian warfare; and the Revolutionary War. Concerning the last subject his work is most fully sustained, although his frontier criminals are powerfully if sensationally portrayed, and his treatment of Indian character is informed and dramatic. His minor and comic characters, particularly the well-known Lieutenant Porgy, are counted among his best achievements. Simms' place in literature is that of a novelist; but in the additional capacities of editor, commentator on society and politics, biographer, and poet he became known to contemporary northern "literati." His theory of American writing emphasized the development of a literature culturally emancipated from that of England and devoted chiefly to themes native to the United States.

547. The partisan; a tale of the Revolution. New York, Harper, 1835. 2 v.
8–13055 PS2848.P2 1835 RBD
First of a trilogy on the South Carolina campaigns in the Revolutionary War; continued in Mellichampe (New York, Harper, 1836. 2 v.), which in turn was followed by Katharine Walton (Philadelphia, A. Hart, 1851. 2 v.).

548. The Yemassee. A romance of Carolina. New York, Harper, 1835. 2 v.
8–8999 PS2848.Y5 1835 RBD

549. ——— Edited, with introd., chronology, and bibliography, by Alexander Cowie. New York, American Book Co., 1937. xliv, 406 p. (American fiction series; general editor, H. H. Clark) 37–4083 PZ3.S592Y34
Indian warfare in South Carolina provides the theme. In Cowie's edition the text is that of the 1853 edition, which was slightly corrected by the author.

550. Beauchampe; or, The Kentucky tragedy. Philadelphia, Lea & Blanchard, 1842. 2 v.
29–25298 PZ3.S592B2 RBD
Plot is based on the same murder case that was the inspiration of C. F. Hoffman's Greyslaer (1840); later Simms wrote Charlemont (New York, Redfield, 1856. 447 p.) for which Beauchampe serves as a sequel. Both are frontier or border novels.

551. Views and reviews in American literature, history and fiction. 1st [and 2d] series. New York, Wiley & Putnam, 1845. 2 v. in 1. (238, 184 p.) (Wiley and Putnam's library of American books [no. 9]) 30–17221 PS2850.V5 1845 RBD

552. The forayers; or, The raid of the dog-days. New York, Redfield, 1855. 560 p.
8–13063 PS2848.F6 1855 RBD
This book and its sequel Eutaw (New York, Redfield, 1856. 582 p.) are novels of the American Revolution. The action takes place in South Carolina.

553. ——— New and rev. ed. New York, J. W. Lovell, 1885. 560 p. (Lovell's library, v. 13, no. 697) 10–1290 PS2848.F6 1885 RBD

554. Letters; collected and edited by Mary C. Simms Oliphant, Alfred Taylor Odell [and] T. C. Duncan Eaves. Introd. by Donald Davidson. Biograpical sketch by Alexander S. Salley. Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1952–55. 4 v. 52–2352 PS2853.A4 1952

Bibliographical footnotes.
CONTENTS.—v. 1. 1830–1844.—v. 2. 1845–1849.—v. 3. 1850–1857.—v. 4. 1858–1866.
To be completed with the publication of volume 5.

555. Works. Uniform ed. Illustrated by Darley. New York, W. J. Widdleton, 1853–66. 20 v. NRU
Volumes 8–13 have half title: Border novels and romances of the South, v. 1–6.
Incomplete collection, omitting particularly biographical, historical, critical, and miscellaneous writings.

556. CHARLES HENRY SMITH ("BILL ARP"), 1826–1903

Smith, a Georgia lawyer, politician, and planter, was a Confederate officer in the Civil War, and was for many years a contributor to the Atlanta Constitution. He wrote partly in the illiterate dialect of a "Cracker," and partly in more literary style as a rustic philosopher and satirist whom he called "Bill Arp." His sketches and stories, however humorous, give an insight into Southern problems and attitudes during the war and Reconstruction and into the racial and agrarian questions that troubled his region. Tolerance, narrative skill, good feeling, and some clever delineations of character have contributed to the preservation of his reputation as a humorist of a type exemplified in the 20th century by Will Rogers (1879–1935). Autobiographical elements are present in Smith's Bill Arp: From the Uncivil War to Date (1930). The Farm and the Fireside (1891) contains "sketches of domestic life in war and peace."

557. Bill Arp, so called. A side show of the southern side of the war. Illustrated by M. A. Sullivan. New York, Metropolitan Record Office, 1866. 204 p. 12–14838 PN6161.S653 RBD
Parts of the book are written in the form of letters addressed to Abraham Lincoln, "Artemus Ward," and others.

558. SEBA SMITH ("MAJOR JACK DOWNING"), 1792–1868

A true Yankee from the state of Maine, Smith used his invention, a homely country character named Jack Downing, as the mouthpiece for his own humorous but shrewd judgments of faults in contemporary politics and life during the era of Jacksonian democracy. Characterized by portrayals of peculiarities in the speech and manners of rural New England, Smith's work captured the attention of a large audience and was instrumental in establishing a genre used by his immediate successors as well as by such more recent humorists as Finley Peter Dunne and Will Rogers.

559. The life and writings of Major Jack Downing [pseud.] of Downingville, away Down East in the State of Maine. Boston, Lilly, Wait, Colman & Holden, 1833. xii, 260 p. 12–5647 PS2876.L68 1833 RBD Comprises material originally published in the Portland Daily Courier, a newspaper founded by Smith.

560. ——— 3d ed. Boston, Lilly, Wait, Colman & Holden, 1834. xvi, 288 p. 30–29693 PS2876.L68 1834 RBD

561. Way Down East; or, Portraitures of Yankee life. By Seba Smith, the original Major Jack Downing. New York, J. C. Derby, 1854. 384 p. 3–24500 PS2876.W3 1854 RBD
Tales having New England local color interest. Smith had numerous imitators who even borrowed the name of Major Downing as their own pseudonym; hence the claim to original authorship in the foregoing entry.

562. HARRIET (BEECHER) STOWE, 1811–1896

To the crusade for the abolition of slavery in America one of the most effective contributions was Mrs. Stowe's novel, Uncle Tom's Cabin. Melodramatic and sentimental, it nevertheless possessed the power to appeal to the conscience of the world and thus became a highly significant document of the controversy over slavery. The book has been many times dramatized and has had a phenomenal record as a best seller in England, on the Continent, and in the United States, long after the abuses it was written to uncover had ceased to exist. Mrs. Stowe was a tireless and voluminous writer of miscellaneous works. These include regional novels, sketches, and stories, sometimes expressed in New England dialect, and having as their local particularly Maine, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. Numerous autobiographical and biographical elements in them reflect Calvinistic influences in the writer's background. The books are also characterized by realism concerning village and seafaring life prevalent in New England in the 18th century, a period that the author believed to be seminal in the life of the region and America. Charles H. Foster in The Rungless Ladder: Harriet Beecher Stowe and New England Puritanism (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1954. 278 p.) concludes that Mrs. Stowe's most important achievement was her ability to give readers a clear sense of New England Puritanism, while arousing sympathy based on understanding of its causes and results.

563. Uncle Tom's cabin; or, Life among the lowly. Boston, J. P. Jewett, 1852. 2 v.
12–15048 PZ3.S89Un RBD
First published in the National Era at Washington from June 1851 to April 1852.

564. ——— Thirtieth thousand. Boston, J. P. Jewett, 1852. 2 v.
18–16942 PS2954.U5 1852c RBD

565. ——— New ed. With an introductory account of the work by the author. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1887 [°1879] xlii, 500 p.
51–48701 PZ3.S89Un30

566. ——— With an introd. by Raymond [M.] Weaver. New York, Limited Editions Club, 1938. xv, 294 p.
39–14273 PS2954.U5 1938 RBD
Illustrated by Miguel Covarrubias.

567. ——— With introductory remarks and captions by Langston Hughes. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1952. 442 p. illus. (Great illustrated classics) 52–12396 PZ3.S89Un77

568. The minister's wooing. New York, Derby & Jackson, 1859. 578 p.
8–16122 PS2954.M5 1859 RBD

569. ——— 24th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1887. 578 p. 12–37862 PZ3.S89Mi8

570. The pearl of Orr's Island: a story of the coast of Maine. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1862. 437 p. 8–16118 PZ3.S89P

571. ——— 30th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1890. 437 p. 8–16117 PZ3.S89P30

572. Oldtown folks. Boston, Fields, Osgood, 1869. viii, 608 p. 8–16119 PZ3.S890

573. ——— 25th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1883. viii, 608 p.
42–27103 PZ3.S8903

574. Sam Lawson's Oldtown fireside stories. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1872. 216 p.
8–16114 PZ3.S89s

575. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1899. 287 p. 0–701 PZ3.S89S4
Includes four additional pieces.

576. Poganuc people: their loves and lives. New York, Fords, Howard, & Hulbert [1878] 375 p. 8–16115 PZ3.S89Po

577. Life of Harriet Beecher Stowe, compiled from her letters and journals by her son, Charles Edward Stowe. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1889. xii, 530 p. illus. 16–7887 PS2956.A3 1889
See also Life and Letters of Harriet Beecher Stowe, edited by Annie Fields (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1897. 406 p. 4–17386 PS2956.F5 1897).

578. Writings, with biographical introductions . . . [Cambridge, Mass., Riverside Press, 1896] 16 v. illus. 28–5720 PS2950.E96a RBD

579. DANIEL PIERCE THOMPSON, 1795–1868

A devoted citizen of Vermont, with strong antiquarian interests, Thompson wrote some half-dozen historical novels on themes such as frontier life in the state and on patriotism in Vermont during the American Revolution. His work belongs to the tradition inaugurated in America by Cooper and illustrates the spread of interest in historical "romances" concerned with different parts of the country.

580. The Green Mountain Boys. Montpelier, Vt., E. P. Walton, 1839. 2 v. CtY
Ethan Allen's capture of Fort Ticonderoga is featured in the work, which is said to have gone through 50 editions before 1860; for many years it was considered a classic American historical novel for boys.

581. ——— New York, J. W. Lovell [1882] 2 v. in 1 (360 p.) (Lovell's library, v. 1, no. 21)
CA10–1621 PZ3.T3725Gr7

582. ——— New York, T. Nelson, 1927. 485 p. illus. 27–27787 PZ3.T3725Gr20

583. Locke Amsden; or, The schoolmaster, a tale. Boston, B. B. Mussey, 1847. 231 p.
49–32096 PZ3.T3725Lo
Regional novel influenced by the author's early struggles to secure an education and by his boyhood experiences of life and labor on a remote Vermont farm under pioneer conditions.

584. ——— Boston, Hall & Whiting, 1881. 231 p. MB

585. HENRY DAVID THOREAU, 1817–1862

Thoreau, a natural "solitary" and member of Emerson's Concord circle of Transcendentalists, in his own experience realized many of the ideals of his associates in the group. In view of that fact, the 39 notebooks containing his journal, which came to light after his death, constitute not only his own spiritual autobiography but also a highly individual record of literary thought in New England at the time of the American Renaissance. Fruitlands and Brook Farm failed as Transcendentalist experiments in communal living; but Thoreau's individual venture at Walden Pond enabled him to push the doctrine of simplification to its limits and to add a classic to the literature of his region. Nature, with which he was perhaps more intimate than with any human being, provided him, as Emerson thought it should, with the enjoyment of "an original relation to the universe." From that relation he derived the inspiration for his most sustained literary work. The results are preserved in several volumes of prose showing the discipline of wide reading, particularly in English literature of the 17th century. As a political thinker and a social philosopher he expressed his belief in freedom and individualism, even when the search for these objectives of the good life involved civil disobedience. Like Emerson, Thoreau was a poet, whose poems, according to his own dictum, are "a piece of very private history, which unostentatiously lets us into the secret of a man's life." For his contributions to The Dial and other journals, and for his longer publications in their earlier appearances, Thoreau received qualified approval, chiefly from the Concord circle. Writing shortly after his death Lowell mixed praise with blame for his oddities, in almost equal proportions. But time has reversed the earlier verdicts. On the basis of his notable additions to an authentic American literary tradition his reputation has grown steadily among the reputations of world figures in literature.

586. [Civil disobedience] Resistance to civil government; a lecture delivered in 1847. In Aesthetic papers, edited by Elizabeth P. Peabody. New York, Putnam, 1849. p. 189–213.
5–3424 AP2.A27 RBD

For useful reprints of this essay, see the last entry under Walden below, and volumes of selections listed by Bode, Canby, Cargill, and Crawford.

587. A week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers. Boston, J. Munroe; New York, Putnam, 1849. 413 p. 8–14408 F72.C5T4 RBD

588. ——— Edited with an introd. by Odell Shepard. New York, Scribner, 1921. xxviii, 292 p. (Modern student's library [edited by W. D. Howe]) 21–9999 F72.C5T56

589. Walden; or, Life in the woods. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1854. 357 p.
15–2573 PS3048.A1 1854 RBD

A Centennial Check-List of the Editions of Henry David Thoreau's Walden has been prepared by Walter R. Harding (Charlottesville, Va., University of Virginia Press, 1954. 32 p.).

590. ——— With an introd. by Joseph Wood Krutch. New York, Harper, 1950. xii, 440 p. (Harper's modern classics)
50–6285 PS3048.A1 1950a

591. Walden and other writings. Edited with an introd. by Brooks Atkinson. New York, Modern Library, 1937. xx, 732 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books) 37–28676 PS3042.A7

Issued 1950 as T35 in Modern Library college editions.

592. Walden, and selected essays. Introd. by George F. Whicher. Chicago, Packard, 1947. xxii, 483 p. (University classics)
47–7258 PS3042.W5

593. Walden; or, Life in the woods. On the duty of civil disobedience. Introd. by Norman Holmes Pearson. New York, Rinehart, 1948. xii, 304 p. (Rinehart editions, 8)
48–8445 PS3048.A1 1948

594. The Maine woods. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1864. 328 p. 1–8882 F27.P5T43 RBD

Edited by Sophia Thoreau and William E. Channing.

The first of the papers was published in the Union Magazine, New York, in 1848; the second in The Atlantic Monthly in 1858; and the last is here first printed.

CONTENTS.—Ktaadn.—Chesuncook.—The Allegash and east branch.

595. ——— With an introd. by Annie Russell Marble. New York, Crowell, 1906. xv, 359 p. (Handy volume classics) 6–23057 F24.T494

596. Cape Cod. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1865. 252 p. 3–21052 F72.C3T37 RBD

Edited by Sophia Thoreau and William Ellery Channing; first four chapters published in Putnam's Magazine in 1855; the fifth and eighth chapters appeared in The Atlantic Monthly in October and December 1864.

597. ——— With an introd. by Annie Russell Marble. New York, Crowell, 1907. xiii, 263 p. (Astor prose series) 7–37720 F72.C3T42

598. Collected poems. Edited by Carl Bode. Chicago, Packard, 1943. xxi, 385 p. 43–12271 PS3041.B6 1943a
First critical edition.

599. Writings. With bibliographical introductions and full indexes. In ten volumes. [Riverside ed.] [Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1894–95] 11 v. 4–13875 PS3040.E94
Volumes 5–8 edited by Harrison G. O. Blake.
First collected edition; introductory notes by Horace E. Scudder. The Familiar Letters (1894) edited by Franklin B. Sanborn, were added as an 11th volume. Cf. Francis H. Allen, A Bibliography of Henry David Thoreau (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1908).

600. ——— [Manuscript ed.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1906. 20 v. 6–4618 PS3040.F06
Volume [6] includes Familiar Letters edited by Franklin B. Sanborn, enl. ed.; volumes [7–20] contain Thoreau's Journal, edited by Bradford Torrey.

601. ——— [Walden ed.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1906. 20 v. MH
The standard Walden edition was printed from the plates of the Manuscript edition. Cf. Literary History of the United States (no. 2460).

602. ——— [New Riverside ed.] With bibliographical introd. and full indexes. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1932?] 11 v. 33–16767 PS3040.F32

603. The heart of Thoreau's journals, edited by Odell Shepard. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1927. xiii, 348 p. 27–23170 PS3053.A25 1927

604. Henry David Thoreau; representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Bartholow V. Crawford. New York, American Book Co., ©1934. lxxii, 379 p. (American writers series) 34–23823 PS3042.C7
"Selected bibliography": p. lix–lxix.

605. Works. Cambridge ed. Selected and edited by Henry S. Canby. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1937. xviii, 848 p. 37–28734 PS3042.C3 1937
"Selected bibliography": p. [847]–848.

606. Works. With a biographical sketch by Ralph Waldo Emerson. New York, Crowell, 1940. 31, [2], 440, 319, [2], 492, 423 p. 40–27855 PS3040.F40
CONTENTS.—Biographical sketch, by R. W. Emerson.—Walden.—Cape Cod.—A week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers.—The Maine woods.

607. The portable Thoreau. Edited, and with an introd., by Carl Bode. New York, Viking Press, 1947. viii, 696 p. (The Viking portable library) 47–1945 PS3042.B65
Bibliography: p. 695–696.

608. Selected writings on nature and liberty; edited with an introd., by Oscar Cargill. New York, Liberal Arts Press [1953, ©1952] xx, 163 p. (The American heritage series, no. 3) 53–942 PS3042.C34
"A reader's vocabulary, edited by Dr. Fritz A. H. Leuchs" published as supplement (28 p.) and inserted at end.
Bibliography: p. xix–xx.

Recent studies that document contemporary critical opinion concerning Thoreau include:

609. Cook, Reginald L. Passage to Walden. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1949. xvi, 238 p. 49–8084 PS3057.N3C6
Essays aiming to "penetrate the essential quality and evoke the richness of his correspondence with nature."

610. Harding, Walter R., ed. Thoreau: a century of criticism. Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press, 1954. 205 p. 55–116 PS3054.H3
Twenty-four essays by such varied writers as J. R. Lowell, R. W. Emerson, R. L. Stevenson, Henry Miller, and Alfred Kazin.

611. Seybold, Ethel. Thoreau; the quest and the classics. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1951. x, 148 p. (Yale studies in English, v. 116) 51–1771 PS3057.L55S4 PR13.Y3, v. 116
Bibliographical footnotes.
Begun as a dissertation with the aim of investigating Thoreau's classicism, the work is also designed as an inquiry into the essential meaning of his life and thought. See also Appendixes as follows: "Classical Books Used by Thoreau," p. [91]–102; "Classical Quotations in Thoreau," p. [103]–123; and "Index of Classical Quotations, References, and Allusions," p. [124]–141.

612. THOMAS BANGS THORPE, 1815–1878

Born and educated in Massachusetts, Thorpe for reasons of health spent nearly 20 years of his life in Louisiana. During that time he formed a deep affection for the South and for the whole southwestern frontier, over which he traveled widely. An artist and portrait painter patronized by distinguished people, an informed student of politics, a historian of sorts, and an editor and promoter of newspapers, Thorpe brought unusual powers of observation and understanding to bear on what he saw about him. The prairies, forests, animals, country people, speech, manners, and folklore of the region fascinated him. The stories and sketches that preserve his firsthand impressions are characterized by romance, realism, and robust humor.

613. The hive of "the bee-hunter," a repository of sketches, including peculiar American character, scenery, and rural sports. New York, Appleton, 1854. 312 p. illus.
15–11538 F396.T5 RBD
Includes "Tom Owen, the Bee-Hunter," p. [47]–53; and Thorpe's most admired tale, "The Big Bear of Arkansas," p. [72]–93, which was first written for and published in the Spirit of the Times (New York, 1831–61), v. 9, Mar. 27, 1841, p. 43–44.

614. HENRY TIMROD, 1828–1867

Timrod was a member of a literary group in Charleston, South Carolina, where he was associated with Simms and Hayne. His "Theory of Poetry" (1863–64), first published in The Atlantic Monthly, v. 96, Sept. 1905, p. 313–326, sets forth objections to Poe's definitions of poetry and indicates the serious interest in poetics felt by the southern group before the Civil War. Timrod's one volume of verse published in those years reveals his characteristically sensitive response to nature. Later, animated by intense love of the South, he became the poet of the Confederacy. His odes and other poems of the war years express the powerful emotions of the Southern people, in verse forms influenced by English romantic poetry of the 19th century.

615. Poems. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1860. 130 p. 39–13915 PS3070.A2 1860 RBD

616. The poems of Henry Timrod. Edited, with a sketch of the poet's life, by Paul H. Hayne. New York, E. J. Hale, 1873. 205 p.
8–24837 PS3070.A2 1873 RBD

617. ——— Memorial ed. With memoir and portrait. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1899. xxxviii, 193 p. 99–1766 PS3070.A2 1899

618. Essays. Edited with an introd. by Edd Winfield Parks. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1942. vi, 184 p. 42–18682 PS3071.P3
Deals with literature in the South, and particularly with theories of poetical form and composition.

619. WALT WHITMAN, 1819–1892

English, Dutch, and Quaker strains converged in Whitman's heredity. The son of a New York farmer turned carpenter, he was formally educated only through the elementary grades. He was in turn office boy, printer, itinerant country school teacher, and journalist. At the age of thirty-six he put on sale the first edition of his poems, Leaves of Grass. In this and successive editions, it is clear that Whitman saw nature "with every leaf a miracle," and human beings, including the lowly and the common, as the very stuff of which poetry could be made "to define America, her athletic democracy." He took inspiration from the Concord circle and from the general, liberal romanticism of the first half of the 19th century; but by natural bent he became a forerunner of the realism that began to characterize American literature after 1870. The poetic technique he developed also had old derivations and new foreshadowings. A source of the cadences heard in his poetry is found in the majestic lines of the King James Bible; his loose rhythmic form was the fountainhead of the "free verse" of the 1920's. Language as used in America fascinated him, and the "barbaric yawp" of which he boasted included slang, oddly worded catalogs of things, strained invocations, mongrel words, and tags from foreign languages. At the other extreme, however, his diction often approaches classic purity. In a mixture of both modes, he chanted the glory of democracy, the beauty of love and comradeship, the life of the American people, and the infinite variety of the country. The result was shocking to most American readers of the period, who equated it with vulgarity. His pungent vocabulary, forceful style, bathos joined to beauty, egotism, license, and boisterous optimism for a long time offended the refined and elegant members of society. Some of his poems dealing with sex were so startlingly direct that to Thoreau they sounded "as if the beasts spoke." On the other hand, the middle classes, whose spokesman Whitman desired to be, were puzzled and put off by his mysticism and Transcendentalism. In spite of the contradictory elements in his work, time has accorded him a high place in American letters, as well as among the greatest spokesmen for democracy. His force was such that it has been felt around the world.

620. Leaves of grass. Brooklyn, 1855. 95 p.
3–23679 PS3201 1855 RBD
First edition.
Includes the famous first preface, omitted in the same form from later editions. In it Whitman glorifies the United States as being in themselves the greatest poem, extols the poet as a seer, and calls the highest poetic art that which is simplest and most natural.
From 1855 to 1881 when the poet made the final revision of the text, Leaves of Grass grew in succeeding editions from its original slender dimensions to a work of 438 pages. For the history and significance of this evolution see Gay W. Allen's Walt Whitman Handbook (Chicago, Packard, 1946), p. 104–235, and Oscar L. Trigg's "The Growth of 'Leaves of Grass'," found in The Complete Writings of Walt Whitman, book-lover's Camden edition, "Prose Works," v. 7, i.e. v. [10] of The Complete Writings, p. 99–134.

621. ——— Brooklyn, 1856. 384 p.
3–23702 PS3201 1856 RBD
Second edition.
Published by Fowler and Wells, New York, without publisher's statement on the title page; sale was later abandoned by the firm on account of criticism.
Adds 20 new poems to 12 in the first edition and has lettered on the backstrip: "I greet you at the beginning of a great career, R. W. Emerson." This unauthorized quotation was taken from a letter written by Emerson to acknowledge a complimentary copy of the first edition.

622. ——— Boston, Thayer & Eldridge, Year 85 of the States. (1860–61), 456 p.
3–23678 PS3201 1860 RBD
Third edition.
Includes 124 new poems, with revisions of those found in the two earlier editions.

623. ——— New York [W. E. Chapin] 1867. 338, 72, 24, 36 p.
3–23703 PS3201 1867 RBD
Fourth edition.
Includes Drum-Taps (1865; Sequel to Drum-Taps (1865–66); and Songs Before Parting. The Sequel to Drum-Taps contains the elegiacs on Lincoln, notably "When Lilacs Last in the Door-Yard Bloom'd" and "O Captain! My Captain!".

624. ——— Washington [New York, J. S. Redfield] 1871. 384 p.
14–7865 PS3201 1871 RBD
Fifth edition.
Includes Drum-Taps; Marches Now the War Is Over; and Songs of Parting.

625. ——— Author's ed. Camden, N. J., 1882. 382 p. 43–36897 PS3201 1882b RBD
Issued from the plates of the "suppressed edition" (Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1881–82). Edition which received the poet's last textual revisions and in which final titles and the order of arrangement were assigned to the poems.

626. Leaves of grass; including Sands at seventy, 1st annex, Good-bye my fancy, 2nd annex. "A backward glance o'er travel'd roads" . . . Philadelphia, McKay, 1891–92. 438 p.
3–15387 PS3201.1891 RBD
Last edition that received the author's personal supervision; known as the "Deathbed edition."

627. Leaves of grass. Edited by Emory Holloway, from the text of the ed. authorized and editorially supervised by his literary executors, Richard Maurice Bucke, Thomas B. Harned, and Horace L. Traubel. Inclusive ed. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1954 [©1926] xx, 682 p.
54–4961 PS3201 1954a
Includes Whitman's discarded poems, chiefly from the Putnam edition of The Complete Writings (1902), and his significant prefaces, i. e., those of 1855, 1872, 1876, and "A Backward Glance O'er Travel'd Roads" preface to November Boughs (1888).

628. Leaves of grass, and selected prose. Edited with an introd. by Sculley Bradley. New York, Rinehart, 1949. xxx, 568 p. (Rinehart editions, 28) 49–49650 PS3200.F49a

629. Leaves of grass. With an introd. by Oscar Cargill. New York, Harper, 1950. xxxi, 537 p. (Harper's modern classics)
50–6167 PS3201 1950

630. ——— With an introd. by Sculley Bradley, New York, New American Library, 1954. 430 p. (A Mentor book, Ms 117)
54–10986 PS3201 1954

631. Democratic vistas. Washington, 1871. 84 p.
12–12831 E168.W61 RBD
At head of title: Memoranda.
On cover: New York, J. S. Redfield, publisher.
Copyrighted 1870, by Walt Whitman.
Prose work essential to an understanding of the poet's theories concerning literature, democracy, and "personalism," or individualism.

632. ——— With an introd. by John Valente. New York, Liberal Arts Press, 1949. xvii, 69 p. (Little library of liberal arts, no. 9)
49-3309 PS3213.A2V3
"Selected bibliography": p. xvii.
Mr. Valente is Executive Secretary of the Walt Whitman Project of Brooklyn College.

633. Specimen days & Collect. Philadelphia, R. Welsh, 1882-83. 374 p.
CA12-1030 PS3220.A1 1882 RBD
A revised edition published on London, 1887, under title: Specimen Days in America. Cf. Carolyn Wells, A Concise Bibliography of Walt Whitman (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1922).
For the most part comprises four types of prose descriptions: (1) genealogical and autobiographical information; (2) realistic memoranda taken from notebooks kept by Whitman during his experiences in camps and hospitals during the Civil War (1862-65); (3) idyllic expressions of delight in nature observed on the banks of Timber Creek while recovering from a paralytic stroke suffered in 1873; and (4) recollections of people, places, and literary figures and friends, such as Carlyle, Poe, Longfellow, and Emerson.

634. Specimen days in America. London, H. Milford, Oxford University Press, 1932. xiv, 317 p. (The World's Classics, no. 371)
32-28186 PS3220.A1 1932

635. Specimen days, Democratic vistas, and other prose, edited by Louise Pound. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1935. liii, 370 p. (Doubleday-Doran series in literature)
35-8359 PS3202 1935
"Selected bibliography": p. xlvii-lii.

636. Complete poems & prose of Walt Whitman, 1855-1888; authenticated & personal book (handled by W. W.) Portraits from life, autograph. [Philadelphia, Ferguson, 1888] 382, 374, 140, 2 p. 43-36870 PS3200.E88 RBD
"Edition: Six hundred. Number one hundred forty."—Ms. note on verso of 2d preliminary leaf.

637. The complete writings of Walt Whitman. Issued under the editorial supervision of his literary executors, Richard Maurice Bucke, Thomas B. Harned, and Horace L. Traubel; with additional bibliographical and critical material prepared by Oscar Lovell Triggs, Ph.D. New York, Putnam [1902] 10 v. illus. 2-25501 PS3200.F02 RBD
"The book-lover's Camden edition."
Limited edition of 500 signed and numbered sets. This set not numbered.
Bibliography of Walt Whitman, compiled by O. L. Triggs: v. [10], p. 135-233.
CONTENTS.—v. [1-3] Leaves of grass.—v. [4-10] The complete prose works.

638. Complete prose works. Philadelphia, McKay, 1892. viii, 522 p.
22-22228 PS3202 1892 RBD
CONTENTS.—Specimen d a y s.—Collect.—November boughs.—Good-bye, my fancy.—Some laggards yet.—Memoranda.

639. Complete poetry & selected prose and letters, edited by Emory Holloway. London, Nonesuch Press, 1938. xxxix, 1116 p.
38-27614 PS3200.F38
"Biographical and bibliographical chronology": p. xxxi-xxxix. Published also in New York by Random House (1938).

640. Walt Whitman; representative selections, with introd. bibliography, and notes by Floyd Stovall. Rev. ed. New York, American Book Co., ℗1939. lxvi, 480 p. (American writers series)
40-1112 PS3204.S8 1939
"Selected bibliography": p. liii-lxiii.

641. Walt Whitman, selected and with notes by Mark Van Doren. New York, Viking Press, 1945. 698 p. (The Viking portable library)
45-6887 PS3203.V3

642. The complete poetry and prose of Walt Whitman, as prepared by him for the Deathbed edition. With an introd. by Malcolm Cowley. New York, Pellegrini & Cudahy, 1948. 2 v. (The American classics series. New York)
48-10006 PS3200.F48
——— Reprint. Garden City, N. Y., Garden City Books, 1954, ℗1948. 482, 538 p. (World famous classics) 54-7937

643. Faint clews & indirections; manuscripts of Walt Whitman and his family. Edited by Clarence Gohdes and Rollo G. Silver. Durham, Duke University Press, 1949. x, 250 p.
49-10012 PS3200.F49
"Contains the previously unpublished manuscripts of Walt Whitman and a selection from the Whitman family letters now in the Trent Collection in the Library of Duke University."

644. The best of Whitman, edited with an introd. and notes by Harold W. Blodgett. New York, Ronald Press Co., 1953. x, 478 p.
52-12519 PS3203.B6
Bibliography: p. 467-471.

645. Poems; selections with critical aids. Edited by Gay Wilson Allen and Charles T. Davis. New York, New York University Press, 1955. x, 280 p. 55–8234 PS3203.A5
Bibliography: p. 273–276.

646. The Whitman reader. Edited, with an introd., by Maxwell Geismar. New York, Pocket Books, 1955. 507 p. (Cardinal edition, GC–25) 55–23536 PS3203.G4
Includes bibliography.
The centenary of the publication of Leaves of Grass in 1955, and the years immediately preceding that date, were marked by the appearance of a large number of critical and biographical studies of Whitman. Among these are found the following:

647. Allen, Gay W. The solitary singer; a critical biography of Walt Whitman. New York, Macmillan, 1955. xii, 616 p. illus. 55–114 PS3231.A69
Bibliographical references included in "Notes" (p. 545–594).

648. Allen, Gay W., ed. Walt Whitman abroad; critical essays from Germany, France, Scandinavia, Russia, Italy, Spain, and Latin America, Israel, Japan, and India. Syracuse, N. Y., Syracuse University Press, 1955. xii, 290 p. 55–5511 PS3238.A75
Essays are given in English translations; British essays are omitted, reference being made to Harold Blodgett's Walt Whitman in England (Ithaca, N. Y., Cornell University Press, 1934. 244 p.). Includes bibliographical references.

649. Beaver, Joseph. Walt Whitman, poet of science. New York, King's Crown Press, 1951. xv, 178 p. 51–288 PS3242.S3B4
Bibliography: p. [171]–174.

650. Briggs, Arthur E. Walt Whitman: thinker and artist. New York, Philosophical Library, 1952. 489 p. 52–13025 PS3231.B7

651. Chase, Richard V. Walt Whitman reconsidered. New York, Sloane, 1955. 191 p. 55–6326 PS3231.C47

652. Clark, Leadie M. Walt Whitman's concept of the American common man. New York, Philosophical Library, 1955. 178 p. 55–14638 PS3242.A5C62
Thesis—University of Illinois.

653. Eby, Edwin H. A concordance of Walt Whitman's Leaves of grass and selected prose writings. Seattle, University of Washington Press, 1949–54. 5 v. A50–9002rev PS3245.E2

654. Faner, Robert D. Walt Whitman & opera. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1951. xi, 249 p. 51–7724 PS3242.M8F3
Bibliography: p. 237–244.

655. Freedman, Florence B., ed. Walt Whitman looks at the schools. New York, King's Crown Press, 1950. xii, 278 p. 51–9067 PS3204.F7
The editor's thesis—Columbia University.
Includes articles on schools and the education of youth that appeared in the Brooklyn Evening Star and the Brooklyn Daily Eagle.
Bibliography: p. [261]–272.

656. Hindus, Milton, ed. Leaves of grass one hundred years after; new essays. Stanford, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1955. 149 p. 54–11783 PS3231.H5
Among the contributors are: William Carlos Williams, Richard Chase, Leslie Fiedler, Kenneth Burke, David Daiches, and J. Middleton Murry.

657. Rubin, Joseph J., and Charles H. Brown, eds. Walt Whitman of the New York Aurora, editor at twenty-two. A collection of recently discovered writings. State College, Pa., Bald Eagle Press, 1950. viii, 147 p. 50–14220 PS3203.R8

658. Traubel, Horace. With Walt Whitman in Camden. Boston, Small, Maynard, 1906–53. 4 v. illus. 8–5603 PS3232.T7
Volume 2 has imprint: New York, D. Appleton; volume 3, New York, M. Kennerley; volume 4, Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press.

659. U. S. Library of Congress. Reference Dept. Walt Whitman; a catalog based upon the collections of the Library of Congress. With Notes on Whitman collections and collectors [by Charles E. Feinberg] Washington, 1955. xviii, 147 p. 55–60006 Z8971.5.U62 Z663.2.W3

660. U. S. Library of Congress. Reference Dept. Walt Whitman: man, poet, philosopher; three lectures presented under the auspices of the Gertrude Clarke Whittall Poetry and Literature Fund. Washington, 1955. 53 p. 55–60021 PS3231.U52 Z663.2.W32
CONTENTS.—The man, by G. W. Allen.—The poet, by M. Van Doren.—The philosopher, by D. Daiches.

661. Willard, Charles B. Whitman's American fame, the growth of his reputation in America after 1892. Providence, Brown University, 1950. 269 p. (Brown University studies, v. 12. Americana series, no. 3) 50–5345rev PS3238.W55
Thesis—Brown University.
Bibliography: p. [253]–257.

662. JOHN GREENLEAF WHITTIER, 1807–1892

Whittier, in the poems for which he is valued today, preserved in the medium of his simple style the natural beauties peculiar to New England landscapes and the idyllic elements he found to be characteristic of simple lives in the same countryside. The historic past of his native state, Massachusetts, where his family had lived continuously since 1638, also provided themes congenial to him. A Quaker, he produced some of America's best religious poetry. A few of the choicest hymns in use today are by him. His early romantic inspiration came in part from his admiration of Robert Burns' poems, an influence that persisted, since The Cotter's Saturday Night finds a sort of American analogue in Whittier's narrative poem, Snow-Bound (1866). During his long life Whittier wrote in many forms. He contributed to newspapers and periodicals, became an editor, wrote miscellaneous prose, and to the detriment of his own literary career became for a time a propagandist in verse and prose for the abolition of slavery. His literary work, however, which again predominated from the 1860's forward, brought him various honors and attracted to him numerous visitors and friends. A carefully documented study of Whittier's life and accomplishments is provided by John A. Pollard's John Greenleaf Whittier, Friend of Man (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1949. 615 p.).

663. Justice and expediency; or, Slavery considered with a view to its rightful and effectual remedy, abolition. Haverhill, Mass., C. P. Thayer, 1833. 23 p. 7–22881 E449.W61 RBD
A pamphlet in prose.

664. Voices of freedom. 7th and complete ed. Philadelphia, T. S. Cavender; Boston, Waite, Pierce, 1846. vi, 192 p.
40–1460 PS3269.V6 1846 RBD

665. Leaves from Margaret Smith's journal. Boston, Ticknor, Reed, & Fields, 1849. 224 p.
7–22150 PS3272.L4 1849 RBD
Early history of Massachusetts woven into a fictitious diary of an English visitor purporting to spend part of two years in the Colony.

666. In war time, and other poems. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1864. vi, 152 p.
7–21853 PS3259.I5 1864 RBD
First edition published in November 1863.

667. Snow-bound. A winter idyl. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1866. 51 p.
7–21855 PS3266.A1 1866 RBD

668. The tent on the beach, and other poems. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1867. 172 p.
7–21865 PS3268.A1 1867 RBD

669. Among the hills, and other poems. Boston, Fields, Osgood, 1869. 100 p.
7–21844 PS3255.A4 1869 RBD

670. Writings. Riverside ed. [Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1888–89] 7 v.
7–22147 PS3250.E88
". . . the later (1894) issue is the standard library edition . . ." Literary History of the United States (no. 2460).

671. Complete poetical works. Cambridge ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1894. xxii, 542 p. (Cambridge edition of the poets)
47–39698 PS3250.E94a
Edited with biographical sketch, by Horace E. Scudder.

672. Life and letters, by Samuel T. Pickard. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1894. 2 v. (802 p.) 4–17396 PS3281.P5 1894a
Bibliography: v. 2, p. 787–790.

Based on material assembled by Whittier for the use of a possible biographer; includes a large collection of letters, representing nearly every year of the poet's life. Cf. Preface, p. [iii]. Other collections of Whittier's letters have also been made; among the more substantial of these are Whittier's Correspondence from the Oak Knoll Collection, edited by John Albree (Salem, Mass., Essex Book and Print Club, 1911. 295 p.); and Whittier's Unknown Romance; Letters to Elizabeth Lloyd, with an introduction by Marie V. Denervaud (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1922. 72 p.).

673. Poems. Selected and edited with a commentary by Louis Untermeyer, and illustrated with pencil drawings by R. J. Holden. New York, Limited Editions Club, 1945. xx, 333 p.
46–1204 PS3252.U5

674. NATHANIEL PARKER WILLIS, 1806–1867

Willis was a prolific writer. As journalist, editor, and professional man of letters he worked in such varied literary forms as poetry, sketches, short stories, familiar essays, novels, and dramas. He was in turn romantic, sentimental, chatty, urbane, discursive, and extravagant in his writing. His long residence abroad as a foreign correspondent for American journals and his cordial reception in fashionable and literary circles in England and on the Continent enabled him to become an unofficial cultural representative from the New World to the Old, and vice versa. It has been said that after the works of Irving and Cooper his most nearly responded to the taste of American readers in the 1830's and 1840's.

675. À l'abri; or, The tent pitch'd. New York, S. Colman, 1839. 172 p.
14–3402 F127.T6W7 RBD

Written in the form of a series of letters from the Valley of the Susquehannah River, New York, to embody impressions of that region where the writer's home, Glenmary, was located. Later republished in a volume of prose and poetry entitled Letters from Under a Bridge (London, G. Virtue, 1840. 333 p.).

676. Tortesa, the usurer. New York, S. Colman, 1839. 149 p. (Colman's dramatic library)
PS3324.T6 1839

Play dealing with medieval Florence; romantic comedy in blank verse successfully produced in the United States and in England.

677. Pencillings by the way. 1st complete ed. New York, Morris & Willis, 1844. 216 p. (The mirror library, no. 27)
5–6529 AP2.N651 RBD

Originally published in The New-York Mirror, Feb. 13, 1832–Jan. 14, 1836, as a series of reports on residence and travel abroad, in Europe, England, and Asia Minor.

678. ——— London, T. W. Laurie, 1942. 522 p. (Live books resurrected, edited by L. S. Jast)
43–16544 D919.W738 1942

679. Poems of early and after years. Illus. by E. Leutze. Philadelphia, Carey & Hart, 1848. 410 p.
49–35203 PS3324.P4 1848

Revised and corrected by the author. Cf. Preface, p. i.

680. Poems, sacred, passionate, and humorous. Complete ed. New York, Clark & Maynard, 1869. xvi, 380 p. 12–40407 PS3324.P6 1869

Biographical sketch: p. [iii]–xii.

681. Poems. London and New York, G. Routledge, 1891. xvi, 304 p.
2–8744 PS3324.P3 1891

Includes a brief memoir of the author and poems grouped under the following headings: "Scriptual," "Religious," "College Poems," "City Poems," and "Miscellaneous Poems."

682. Prose writings. Selected by Henry A. Beers. New York, Scribner, 1885. xvi, 365 p.
12–40465 PS3322.B4

D. The Gilded Age and After (1871–1914)

The boom times that came after the Civil War, marked by vulgarity and moral laxity, formed an era named and satirized by Samuel Langhorne Clemens and Charles Dudley Warner in their book, The Gilded Age (1873). A "war to waste" ended and was followed by "a peace to corrupt." In these years and many that came after them politics reeked of scandals resulting from graft and the spoils system. Speculation, particularly in connection with railroad building, was wild and ruthless. With the extension of railroads and the increased business made possible by the new means of transportation cities grew greatly in size. In the large industrial centers that resulted the mansions of the rich looked down on slums in which were housed the poor, whose labor made possible the wealth of their employers. A new aristocracy of money arose in the land, having "robber barons" of industry for its nobility. Even the passage of time and the improvement in public morals after the Gilded Age did not bring about thoroughgoing reforms. Soon after the turn of the century "muckrakers" uncovered so much corruption in great corporations and in all levels of government that they launched a movement to better conditions by creating a literature of articles and books exposing what they had found.

Industrial expansion and commercial development were only two of the forces operating to change American civilization after the Civil War.

Among other powerful influences that played upon the United States at this time must be counted the long-continued migration westward, to which attention was called in the preceding section. In the period currently considered this movement of the people brought about, more and more completely, the settlement of the Far West and the Southwest, until no farther frontier was left to beckon. The courage and endurance that conquered mountains and deserts were reflected in the character of the culture developed in the western regions. The United States, so long oriented to Britain and Europe by virtue of being centered on the Atlantic seaboard, now encompassed within its own borders an area and a variety of conditions—climatic, geographic, economic, social—with which the Nation as a whole, willy-nilly, found it necessary to reckon. The old order had burst at the seams; a new order, larger, cruder, more heterogeneous, richer, more promising, was being put together.

Henry Adams, whose intellectual autobiography is one of the important documents of the period, complained bitterly of the disunity and confusion he found in his time, attributing these faults to the multiplicity of stresses under which American civilization labored. He thought his centenary might come (in 1938) before one might hope to "find a world that sensitive and timid natures could regard without a shudder." Justifiable as Mr. Adams' shudders may have been, American literature in his period reached a new level of productivity. Many more people became professional writers; more aspects of life in the United States were represented in literature; a few new literary forms were exploited; and several new trends were originated which have been influential ever since.

With respect to literary forms, the short story now came into new prominence. Developed earlier chiefly by Irving, Hawthorne, and Poe, it was now a favored medium used by nearly half of the writers selected to represent the period. One of the striking innovations in these stories was the increased emphasis on portrayal of characteristics peculiar to a number of different places and regions. Local color was provided through details of dress, food, manners, customs, and dialects of various sections. Cowboys on the trial with their herds, housewives in hamlets on the Maine coast, mountaineers in their backwoods isolation, Creole folk on the bayous of Louisiana, and miners in western camps were only a few of the many American groups allowed to speak in their own idiom through these stories. Likewise, poets and versemakers turned to dialect and vernacular writing to sing of unlettered dwellers on the frontier, of simple country people, old-fashioned Negroes on plantations "before the war," and smalltown life in general.

Humorous writing and lecturing, so much in vogue around the time of the Civil War, were still popular and were also identified with the school of local color and vernacular writing. This trend was sustained in part by journalists who were forerunners of today's columnists. By means of newspaper articles and miscellanies, which were collected later and published as books, the journalists told tall tales, made jokes, and commented on the passing scene after the manner of crackerbox philosophers who spoke colloquially or in dialect. Some of these pieces were designed chiefly to amuse; some, while retaining their humorous character, were used to convey penetrating criticisms of human nature, society, national problems, and foreign relations. Prominent among the best works of the period are the voluminous writings of Mark Twain, humorist, novelist, and exponent of the American spirit to the world.

In even the briefest comment on literature produced in America between 1871 and 1914, it is essential to notice one trend so marked that it is mentioned frequently as characterizing the whole period: the trend toward realism. As the term is used, however, realism is a semantic house of many mansions. Its first enthusiastic proponent, William Dean Howells, thought that conditions of American life at the time invited the artist (including the writer) to the study and appreciation of what was common rather than exclusive. The arts, he contended, must become democratic, and the artist must continually ask himself, "Is it true?" when evaluating his material. Novels (excluding Hawthorne's) that were primarily romantic, or those having a strong sentimental cast, he would eliminate from categories of importance, on the score that they were good reading only when the reader was sick or when he was silly. Fiction as an art, Howells believed, must be concerned with what is actual, observable, and true to facts, though not necessarily, or even properly perhaps, grim or unpleasant facts. Grimness, however, crept into the work of one of Howells' disciples, Hamlin Garland, who called his literary theory "veritism." Henry James, by confining his search for realism to the minds and spirits of expatriated Americans and members of good society in the Eastern United States, was able to handle, on the level of psychological realism, a number of themes which were beyond the pale of either the realism of Howells or the veritism of Garland. Various other novelists of the time looked about them—at city life, at industry, at poverty, at a competitive society—and found in these and other elements of American life much that was ugly, shocking, and violent.. Such conditions they exploited in their novels and stories, sometimes realistically, sometimes with Zolaesque exaggeration. From this type of realism, fed by a growing consciousness of social problems, it was only a step to the deterministic naturalism of Theodore Dreiser and other writers belonging to the next period.

683. ANDY ADAMS, 1859–1935

Adams' semi-autobiographical fiction deals chiefly with what he calls "the Old Trail days," of the 1880's, when hundreds of herds of cattle were driven on trails extending from Texas as far north as Montana. The heroes of these migrations were cowboys whom Adams knew at firsthand because he was one of them. The still undeveloped country through which their way often led, the speech and manner of the special breed of men attracted to the life of a cowboy, the attitude of these men to the horses they rode and the cattle they drove, and the stories they told each other when the day's work ended are portrayed by the author less as a literary expression than as an authentic record of personal experience. Sympathy, affection, and humorous realism characterize his books, which derive their chief value from the fact that they retain the flavor of a bygone phase of American life, changed forever by the extension of railroads and the social and economic development of what had long been western frontier country.

684. The log of a cowboy. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1903. 387 p. 3–12817 PZ3.A21L

685. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1927. 324 p. (Riverside bookshelf)
27–20251 PZ3.A21L5

"In preparing this classic of frontier literature for The Riverside Bookshelf the number of chapters has been reduced by three."—Publisher's note, preceding table of contents.

686. The outlet. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1905. x, 371 p. 5–8678 PZ3.A21O

A work that complements The Log of a Cowboy by introducing the same kinds of characters and events, with the addition of elements connected with sharp practices of railway promoters and builders.

687. Cattle brands; a collection of western campfire stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1906. 316 p. 6–9625 PZ3.A21C

Includes "The Story of a Poker Steer," considered a classic by J. Frank Dobie, writing on Adams in the Southwest Review, v. 11, Jan. 1926, p. 92–101, 96.

688. HENRY ADAMS, 1838–1918

Henry Adams came of distinguished Massachusetts ancestry, which included a grandfather and a great-grandfather who were Presidents of the United States, and a father, Charles Francis Adams, whose secretary Henry was while the father served as minister to Great Britain during the Civil War. A traveler, scholar, editor of the North American Review, historian of the United States, teacher at Harvard, and associate of many notable contemporaries, Adams contributed to the literature of his country by means of novels, essays, a book of travel, familiar letters, and particularly through The Education of Henry Adams. An appreciative evaluation of Adams and his writings, accompanied by quotations from and summaries of most of his works, has been addressed to the general reader by Robert A. Hume in his Runaway Star (Ithaca, N. Y., Cornell University Press, 1951. 270 p.). The most recent and extensive biography is Elizabeth Stevenson's Henry Adams; a Biography (New York, Macmillan, 1955. 425 p.).

689. Democracy, an American novel. New York, Holt, 1880. 374 p. (Leisure-hour series, no. 112) 7–12165 PS1004.A4D4 1880 RBD

Variously attributed by different authorities to Henry Adams, John Hay, and Clarence King. Cf. William R. Thayer, Life and Letters of John Hay (Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1915]) v. 2, p. 58–59. The authorship of Adams is affirmed by the publisher Henry Holt in the Unpartizan Review, no. 29, Jan.–Mar., 1921, p. 156; and Literary Review, Dec. 24, 1920.

An anonymous satiric novel on political corruption in Washington and on the state of society there after the Civil War.

690. ——— New York, Farrar, Straus & Young, 1952. 246 p. 52–3211 PZ3.A2137D12

"An attractive new edition; without editorial apparatus."—American Literature, v. 24, Jan. 1953, p. 575.

691. Esther, a novel, by Frances Snow Compton [pseud.] New York, Holt, 1884. 302 p. (American novel series, no. 3)
6–30382 PS1004.A4E8 1884 RBD

New York society, the influences of art, and of religion in the contemporary life of the period are themes developed in this novel.

692. ——— With an introd. by Robert E. Spiller. New York, Scholars' Facsimiles & Reprints, 1938. xxv p., facsim.: 302 p.
38–18393 PZ3.A2137E8

677676 O–63–6

Facsimile of the original (1884) edition. Bibliographical note: p. xxiii–xxv.

693. Mont Saint Michel and Chartres. Washington, 1904. vi, 355 p.
5–1469 DC20.A2 RBD
First result of the author's plan to study forces operating in history and to relate them at two periods of time. The hundred years from 1150 to 1250 and the achievements of this century are presented as an epoch when "man held the highest idea of himself as a unit in a unified universe" and when faith in the Virgin Mary operated as the greatest force felt in the Western world.

694. ——— With an introd. by Ralph Adams Cram. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1936. xiv, 397 p. illus. 36–27246 DC20.A2 1936
A popular edition is described in Houghton Mifflin's A Complete Catalog of Publications (Cambridge, Mass., 1955. p. [1]).

695. The education of Henry Adams. Washington, 1907. 453 p. E175.5.A17 RBD
Correlative study to Mont Saint Michel and Chartres. In it Adams' philosophy of history is developed through the device of writing an autobiography that is a commentary on the multiplicity of forces operating in the late 19th century to bring disunity and confusion, instead of unity, in intellectual, political, social, and general cultural aspects of American life. The work shows the influence on Adams of Darwin's theory of evolution and reflects his pessimism in the face of increased materialism that followed the rapid spread of industrialism in the United States.

696. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1918. x, 519 p. 18–18517 E175.5.A172
"This volume, written in 1905 . . . was privately printed . . . in 1906 . . . The Massachusetts Historical Society now publishes the 'Education' as it was printed in 1907, with only such marginal corrections as the author made."—Editor's preface, signed: Henry Cabot Lodge.

697. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1930. 517 p. (The Riverside library)
32–23054 E175.5.A17423

698. ——— Introd. by James Truslow Adams. New York, Modern Library, 1931. x, 517 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books)
31–30066 E175.5.A17424

699. Letters. Edited by Worthington Chauncey Ford. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1930–38. 2 v.
30–25080 E175.5.A1743

700. Selected letters. Edited with an introd. by Newton Arvin. New York, Farrar, Straus & Young, 1951. xxxiv, 279 p. (Great letters series)
51–7883 E175.5.A17433

701. GEORGE ADE, 1866–1944

Reared in rural Indiana and later a columnist on the Chicago Record, Ade brought to his career as a writer an intimate knowledge of country life, small towns, plain citizens, and city magnates of the Middle West. His humorous fables, essays, and stories "of the streets and of the town" preserve his shrewd, realistic judgments of midwestern life at the turn of the 19th century. The use of slang and local vernacular in his writing imparts a special flavor to the social scene depicted in his work. Ade's book for the comic opera, The Sultan of Sulu, produced in 1902 and published in 1903, and a play, The College Widow, first acted in 1904 and published in 1924, were among his most successful contributions to the stage.

702. Fables in slang. Chicago, H. S. Stone, 1900. 201 p. illus.
45–26353 PS1006.A6F27 1900 RBD

703. More fables. Chicago, H. S. Stone, 1900. 218 p. illus. 0–6497 PZ3.A228M RBD

704. Stories of the streets and of the town, from the Chicago Record, 1893–1900. Edited with an introd. by Franklin J. Meine. Chicago, Caxton Club, 1941. xxx, 278 p. illus.
41–24958 PS1006.A6S7 1941
Bibliography: p. 277–278.

705. The permanent Ade; the living writings of George Ade. Edited by Fred C. Kelly. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1947. 347 p.
47–30391 PS1006.A6A6 1947
Includes selections from the author's fables, stories, and essays, together with Marse Covington (©1918), a one-act play, and The Sultan of Sulu.

706. THOMAS BAILEY ALDRICH, 1836–1907

Aldrich wrote a classic account of New England boyhood in The Story of a Bad Boy, a humorous, fictional autobiography of his own youth in Portsmouth, New Hampshire. In his maturity he found an ideally congenial environment when he settled in Boston, where be became a protégé of the literary group of which Longfellow was the center. There, in 1881, he succeeded William Dean Howells as editor of The Atlantic Monthly. Although Aldrich wrote polished verse as well as several novels and plays, his best medium was the short story.

707. The story of a bad boy. Boston, Fields, Osgood, 1870. 261 p. illus.
48–32255 PZ7.A37St03 RBD

708. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1923. 279 p. (Riverside bookshelf)
23–15255 PZ3.A365St014

709. ——— With an introd. by V[ictor] L. O. Chittick. New York, Macmillan, 1930. xxii, 238 p. (Modern readers' series)
30–14665 PZ7.A37St024

710. ——— New York, Pantheon Books, 1951. 232 p. illus. 51–13435 PZ7.A37St040

711. Marjorie Daw, and other people. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1873. 272 p.
6–499 PZ3.A365Ma3
CONTENTS.—Marjorie Daw.—A Rivermouth romance.—Quite so.—A young desperado.—Miss Mehetabel's son.—A struggle for life.—The friend of my youth.—Mademoiselle Olympe Zabriski.—Père Antoine's date-palm.

712. Marjorie Daw. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1908. 123 p. 8–29734 PZ3.A365Ma10

713. From Ponkapog to Pesth. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1883. 267 p.
3–15938 D919.A36
A contribution to the literature of European travel that responded to America's growing interest in its European origins.

714. A book of songs and sonnets selected from the poems of Thomas Bailey Aldrich. [Cambridge] Riverside Press, 1906. 113 p.
6–17863 PS1022.R5 1906 RBD
The writer's final selection of what he considered his best poems.

715. Writings. [Ponkapog ed.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1907. 9 v. illus.
7–41488 PS1020.F07

716. JAMES LANE ALLEN, 1849–1925

Allen's works ranged from romantic sketches, short stories, and sentimental fiction to problem novels dealing with religious fundamentalism, the impact of Darwin's theory of evolution, farm life, and the confusion in social conventions and standards after the Civil War. The author's belief in the intimacy of man's relation with nature pervades his writing, for which Kentucky provides the setting. His place in American literature is fully discussed in Grant C. Knight's James Lane Allen and the Genteel Tradition (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1935. 313 p.).

717. The blue-grass region of Kentucky, and other Kentucky articles. New York, Harper, 1892. 322 p. 1Rc–2635 F457.B6A4 RBD

718. The reign of law; a tale of the Kentucky hemp fields. New York, Macmillan, 1900. 385 p. illus. 0–3311 PZ3.A427R

719. The mettle of the pasture. New York, Macmillan, 1903. 448 p.
3–15441 PS1034.M4 1903 RBD

720. ——— New York, Grosset & Dunlap, 1912. 448 p. (Macmillan's standard library)
38–35068 PZ3.A4

721. GERTRUDE FRANKLIN (HORN) ATHERTON, 1857–1948

The history of California, including the Spanish influence on its culture, inspired Mrs. Atherton's most enduring work. Her popular novels of American life in other localities and periods were frequently sensational but also contained elements of the realism that began to develop as a trend in the fiction of the early 1900's. Adventures of a Novelist (1932) is her autobiography.

722. Senator North. New York, J. Lane, 1900. 367 p. 6–4520 PS1042.S4 1900 RBD
A novel of political life in Washington and of tensions in relations between Negroes and whites.

723. The conqueror. New York, Macmillan, 1902. xiv, 546 p. 2–8117 PZ3.A869Co
Biographical novel of which Alexander Hamilton is the hero. Currently published by J. P. Lippincott, East Washington Square, Philadelphia, Pa.

724. The conqueror; a dramatized biography of Alexander Hamilton. New York, Stokes [°1916] xii, 536 p. 18–13115 PZ3.869Co5
"Twenty-fourth edition (from new plates with revisions)."

725. The splendid idle forties; stories of old California. New York, Macmillan, 1902. 389 p.
2–24242 PZ3.A869Sp
A revised and enlarged edition of a volume issued in 1894 under the title: Before the Gringo Came.

726. EDWARD BELLAMY, 1850–1898

Bellamy began his career as a writer when the United States was feeling the full impact of increasing industrialization after the Civil War. The social and economic conflicts of the period stimulated the thinking reflected in his novels and finally led him to imagine a remedy for inequalities among the people by postulating a state of society in which all citizens would be as free and equal in their material and cultural lives as in the political sphere where their rights were protected by the American form of government. He gave literary expression to these ideas in his Utopian romance, Looking Backward. This novel, purporting to portray a cooperative economic and social life enjoyed in Boston, Massachusetts, in the year 2000, A. D., is said to have sold nearly a million copies in the ten years following its publication. It contributed to the temporary spread of a socialist doctrine advocating the nationalization of all industry. In support of his ideas Bellamy became a publicist and a propagandist. He was also the founder and editor of a reforming journal, The New Nation (1891–94). His Selected Writings on Religion and Society has been announced as published by the Liberal Arts Press, 153 West 72d Street, New York, N. Y., in its American heritage series.

727. Dr. Heidenhoff's process. New York, Appleton, 1880. 140 p. (Appleton's new handy-volume series, 54) 6–11697 PZ3.B417Do

Early novel of the psychiatric type in which Bellamy introduced a fantasy that foreshadowed modern "shock" therapy currently used in some psychological disorders.

728. Looking backward, 2000–1887. Boston, Ticknor, 1888. 470 p. 6–11710 HX811 1887.B2

The sequel, Equality (1897), is considered more of a tract than a novel.

729. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1931?] xxi, 337 p. (Riverside library) 34–10625 HX811 1887.B32

Introduction by Heywood Broun.

730. ——— Introd. by Frederic R. White. Chicago, Packard, 1946. xxxviii, 233 p. (University classics) 46–4182 H–811 1887.B327

Selected bibliography: p. xxxvii–xxxviii.

731. ——— With an introd. by Robert L. Shurter. New York, Modern Library, 1951. xxvi, 276 p. (Modern Library college editions, T42) 51–2252 HX811 1887.B33

Bibliography: p. xxii–xxiii.

732. AMBROSE (GWINNETT) BIERCE, 1842–1914?

After the Civil War, in which Bierce served with distinction, he settled in California. There, as a journalist writing for various weeklies, he achieved a reputation as arbiter of literary fashion on the Pacific Coast. Later, as a contributor to the San Francisco Sunday Examiner, his witty, satirical column justified the title, "Bitter Bierce." He was a devotee of the bohemian life and an apostle of a pessimism verging on nihilism. Bierce's most enduring work is found in his realistic short stories about war and in his tales of the supernatural and the horrible. These show certain kinship with the stories of Poe and Bret Harte. Paul Fatout's Ambrose Bierce, the Devil's Lexicographer (Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1951. 349 p.) supplies new details for an understanding of the author. These were derived from study of manuscripts and other source materials. Fatout maintains the thesis that Bierce's social satires and criticisms constitute his most important work. These were collected and published in book form in The Cynic's Word Book (1906) and republished in 1911 as The Devil's Dictionary.

733. Can such things be? New York, Cassell [c1893] 320 p. 6–13103 PZ3.B479C RBD

Short stories chiefly of the Civil War and the California frontier.

734. ——— Washington, Neale Pub. Co., 1903. 320 p. 3–9331 PZ3.B479C2

735. In the midst of life; tales of soldiers and civilians. New York, Putnam, 1898. vi, 362 p. 6–13102 PZ3.B479I

First published under title: Tales of Soldiers and Civilians (1891).

736. ——— New York, Boni & Liveright, 1918. 403 p. 35–33432 PZ3.B479I6

737. ——— Introd. by George Sterling. New York, Modern Library [c1927] xvi, 403 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books) 27–19196 PZ3.B479I10

738. Letters. Edited by Bertha Clark Pope. With a memoir by George Sterling. San Francisco, Book Club of California, 1922. xlvii, 204 p. 23–7856 PS1097.Z5A3 1922a

739. Collected writings. With an introd. by Clifton Fadiman. New York, Citadel Press, 1946. xix, 810 p. 47–30068 PS1097.A1 1946

CONTENTS.—Ambrose Bierce: portrait of a misanthrope, by Clifton Fadiman.—In the midst of life, tales of soldiers and civilians.—The devil's dictionary.—Can such things be?—Fantastic fables.—The monk and the hangman's daughter.—Negligible tales.—The parenticide club.

740. JOHN BURROUGHS, 1837–1921

Burroughs, a student of Emerson, Thoreau, and Whitman, derived from these writers ideas that influenced his own interest in the natural world. Surrounded by the beauties of the Catskill region in New York, where he lived for many years, he cultivated the habit of close observation of out-of-door life, recording his impressions in literary essays on natural history. These had a decided vogue in the United States for a number of years. Literary Values (1902) is Burroughs' contribution to critical theory respecting literature in America. It includes his essay, "Democracy in Literature." His life and achievements may be further explored through works described in the section on Biography.

741. Locusts and wild honey. Boston, Houghton, Osgood, 1879. 253 p.
5–2474 QH81.B94 1879

CONTENTS.—The pastoral bees.—Sharp eyes.—Strawberries.—Is it going to rain?—Speckled trout.—Birds and birds.—A bed of boughs.—Birds'-nesting.—The halcyon in Canada.

742. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin [°1907] 235 p. 7–1956 QH81.B94 1907

743. Writings. [Riverby ed.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin [°1904]–22. 23 v. NNU

744. John Burroughs' America; selections from the writings of the Hudson River naturalist. Edited with an introd. by Farida A. Wiley. Foreword by Julian Burroughs. New York, Devin-Adair, 1951. 304 p. illus. 51–13897 QH81.B963 1951

745. GEORGE WASHINGTON CABLE, 1844–1925

Cable's antiquarian knowledge of his native New Orleans supplied the source upon which he drew when in 1879–80 he brought into the literature of the South a new romantic regional element in his portrayal of Creoles in Louisiana before the Civil War. A special flavor is imparted to his early work by the use of Creole dialect. Among his less successful later writings were novels such as Dr. Sevier (1885), a story of hardships and struggles experienced in New Orleans during and after the Civil War, and Bonaventure (1888), which introduces descendants of the Acadians. The tragic deportation of these unfortunate people from Nova Scotia to Louisiana and elsewhere previously had been celebrated by Longfellow in his Evangeline. A recent work, Twins of Genius, by Guy A. Cardwell (East Lansing, Michigan State College Press, 1953. 134 p.), compares the literary influence of Cable and Clemens, discusses their joint lecturing tour in the 1880's and reviews the association of the two writers. Letters of Mark Twain, Cable, and others are found on p. [79]–112.

746. Old Creole days. New York, Scribner, 1879. 229 p. 6–22271 PZ3.C11O

747. ——— With an introd. by Lucy Leffingwell Cable Biklé. New York, Scribner, 1937. xv, 303 p. 37–10499 PZ3.C11O18

Madame Delphine (1880), added to the collection of stories in an edition of 1883, is found also in this new edition which followed eight earlier editions. Cf. Introduction, p. v.

748. ——— Together with The scenes of Cable's romances, by Lafcadio Hearn; a prologue by Edward Larocque Tinker and illus. in color by John O'Hara Cosgrave II. New York, Limited Editions Club, 1943. xxxi, 224 p.
43–17083 PS1244.O6 1943 RBD

CONTENTS.—Jean-ah Poquelin.—'Tite Poulette.—"Posson Jone'."—Père Raphaël.—Madame Delphine.—Belles Demoiselles plantation.—Madame Délicieuse.—Café des exilés.—'Sieur George.

749. The Grandissimes, a story of Creole life. New York, Scribner, 1880. 448 p.
43–17083 PS1244.O6 1943 RBD

One section of the novel is entitled "The Story of Bras-Coupé," which is a revision of an earlier story of that title. It has been called a stronger indictment of slavery than can be found in Uncle Tom's Cabin.

750. ——— New York, Scribner, 1916. ix, 448 p. 16–16158 PZ3.C11Gr10

751. George W. Cable; his life and letters, by his daughter, Lucy Leffingwell Cable Biklé. New York, Scribner, 1928. xvi, 306 p. illus.
28–24845 PS1246.B5

Bibliography: p. 303–306.

752. Turner, Arlin. George W. Cable, a biography. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1956. 391 p. 46–9165 PS1246.T8

753. WILL CARLETON, 1845–1912

Carleton began writing for the periodical press when there was a vogue for sentimental versifying about plain people, particularly those living on farms or in rural communities. His pieces, written in language designed to be thought colloquial, were addressed to an audience interested in folk ballads. "Over the Hills to the Poor House" is a typical example of his style. Ten or more collections of his work, issued between 1871 and 1908, won for him the reputation of being the "people's laureate" of his region in the Middle West. These volumes, including Farm Legends (1875) and City Ballads (1885), sold on a wave of popularity that lasted into the 20th century.

754. Farm ballads. New York, Harper, 1873. 108 p. 13–15969 PS1257.F3 1873 RBD

755. ——— New ed. from new plates. New York, Harper, 1901. viii, 147 p. 1–30460 PS1257.F3 1901

756. CHARLES WADDELL CHESNUTT, 1858–1932

A Negro writer best known for his short stories in dialect about his race in America before and after the Civil War, Chesnutt was also the author of several novels, among them The House Behind the Cedars (1900) and The Marrow of Tradition (1901), works that sought to deal frankly and fairly with the problems of Negroes in contemporary society in the United States. An intimate view of the author's struggles and achievements, interspersed with his correspondence, has been supplied by his daughter, Helen M. Chesnutt, in her Charles Waddell Chesnutt, Pioneer of the Color Line (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1952. 324 p.).

757. The conjure woman. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1899. 229 p. 4–15426 PZ3.C4253C

"'The Conjurer's Revenge' is reprinted from the Overland Monthly."

CONTENTS.—The goophered grapevine.—Po' Sandy.—Mars Jeems's nightmare.—The conjurer's revenge.—Sis' Becky's pickaninny.—The gray wolf's ha'nt.—Hot-foot Hannibal.

758. The wife of his youth, and other stories of the color line. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1899. 323 p. illus. 0–113 PZ3.C4253W

759. KATE (O'FLAHERTY) CHOPIN, 1851–1904

Mrs. Chopin belonged to the local color school. Her themes were drawn from dramatic events resulting from the relations of Creoles, Negroes, and Cajuns (the last reputed to be of Acadian French descent) in remote sections of Louisiana. From long residence among these people, she knew the cadence of their speech, the landscape through which they moved, and the humor, pathos, and tragedy implicit in their daily lives. Much of Mrs. Chopin's work is said to remain uncollected, but the two volumes of short stories that exist are enough to establish her quality. A biographical, critical, and bibliographical study of the author is provided by Daniel S. Rankin in his Kate Chopin and Her Creole Stories (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1932. 313 p.). This book was issued also as a doctoral dissertation submitted at the University of Pennsylvania. It includes reprints of selected short stories and numerous excerpts from Mrs. Chopin's miscellaneous writings.

760. Bayou folk. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1894. 313 p. 4–15082 PZ3.C456B

Twenty-three short stories, including "Désirée's Baby"; "Madame Célestin's Divorce"; and "A Gentleman of Bayou Têche."

761. A night in Acadie. Chicago, Way & Williams, 1897. 416 p. 6–20969 PS1294.C63A7 RBD

Short stories.

762. WINSTON CHURCHILL, 1871–1947

Written at a time when the rise of realism was a dominant mood in American literature, Churchill's romantic historical novels glorifying the Nation's past illustrated a countercurrent to the prevailing trend. In his later work, however, Churchill chose contemporary political, industrial, and religious themes for his novels, as in The Inside of the Cup (1913) and The Dwelling Place of Light (1917). These failed to win the popular success achieved by his earlier books.

763. The crisis. New York, Macmillan, 1901. 522 p. illus. 1–31838 PS1297.C7 1901 RBD

Concerns results of the conflict of Northern and Southern sympathies in St. Louis, Missouri, during the Civil War, and the final outcome of the struggle in the whole country. Abraham Lincoln, one of the historical characters introduced, is effectively portrayed.

764. ——— New York, Macmillan, 1914. ix, 522 p. illus. 16–6481 PZ3.C474Cr6

765. ——— Edited by Walter Barnes; rev. by H[arold] Y. Moffett. New York, Macmillan, 1930. xxii, 750 p. illus. (New pocket classics) 30–13104 PZ3.C474Cr15

A dramatization of the novel was published earlier (New York, French, c1927. 96 p.).

766. The crossing. New York, Macmillan, 1904. 598 p. illus. 4–11535 PZ3.C474Cs

Deals with pioneer life on the frontier in Kentucky and the significance of that section in relation to the Revolutionary War.

767. ——— New York, Macmillan, 1912. vii, 598 p. illus. 16–6482 PZ3.C474Cs6

768. SAMUEL LANGHORNE CLEMENS ("MARK TWAIN"), 1835–1910

Mark Twain, without formal education after his 13th year, was first a frontier boy on the banks of the Mississippi River, then a printer's apprentice, and later a journeyman printer in the Middle West, New York, and Philadelphia. Next he became an expert pilot of steamboats plying the Mississippi. Then came an unsuccessful interlude as a prospector and speculator in Nevada, an impasse from which he escaped by becoming a journalist, first in Nevada and later in California. From these beginnings he emerged as a public lecturer of immense popularity at home and abroad, a commentator from firsthand knowledge on life in Europe and the Orient, a humorist on the grand scale, and one of the most important of the country's novelists. He lived an American saga in which provincialism and sophistication, poverty and riches, failure and success were mingled. From the experiences gained in such a life he drew the substance of books that have been read scarcely less avidly in Europe and Latin America than in the United States. He used a literary style compounded of simple words, vigorous expressions, and colloquial language having the rhythm of speech used in what was then the American West; and he frequently employed many local-color details, particularly those of life along the Mississippi. There was also in his work an element of sentimental romanticism, a quality which found probably its most open expression in the fictional biography, Personal Recollections of Joan of Arc (1896). In his more characteristic writing wit, irony, fun, and satire were used consciously for purposes of entertainment, and may from time to time have obscured his serious reflections on the civilization of which he was a part. He hated hypocrisy and meanness; suffering inflicted on the bodies or minds of helpless people enraged him; and the sorrowful and tragic aspects of life overwhelmed him. In the end the man usually considered the greatest exponent of the comic spirit in American literature finished his career in a mood of pessimistic naturalism.

769. The innocents abroad. Hartford, Conn., American Pub. Co., 1869. xviii, 651 p. illus. 4–28129 PS1312.A1 1869 RBD

A mock-serious autobiographical account of a pilgrimage to Europe and the Holy Land; frequently satirizes the Old World, while proclaiming the superiority of America. A work that belongs to the author's beginning period as a writer of humorous books.

770. ——— New York, Harper, c1911. 2 v. in 1. (377, 446 p.) 15–22628 PS1312.A1 1911

Biographical criticism by Brander Matthews, p. v–xxxiii.

771. ——— With an introd. by Albert Bigelow Paine. New York, Macmillan, 1927. xvi, 537 p. (Modern readers' series) 27–12406 PS1312.A1 1927

772. Roughing it. Hartford, Conn., American Pub. Co.; Chicago, F. G. Gilman, 1872. xviii, 591 p. illus. 6–21353 PS1318.A1 1872 RBD

Saga of boom towns, silver rushes, land-grabbing, and boisterous living on the Western frontier in the early 1860's.

773. ——— New York, Harper, 1913. 2 v. in 1. ([287, 330] p.) 28–1234 PS1318.A1 1913

774. ——— Introd. by Rodman W. Paul. New York, Rinehart, 1953. xviii, 333 p. (Rinehart editions, 61) 52–13058 PS1318.A1 1953

"This text is a verbatim reprint of the first sixty-one chapters of the first edition, as originally published at Hartford in 1872 . . . the present edition thus breaks off at the end of Mark Twain's western adventures . . ." Introduction, p. xvi, xvii.

775. The gilded age; a tale of to-day, by Mark Twain (Samuel L. Clemens) and Charles Dudley Warner. Hartford, Conn., American Pub. Co., 1873. 574 p. illus. NN

Satiric novel which gave the title to the period after the Civil War when political corruption and economic exploitation were recurring elements in American experience.

776. ——— Hartford, Conn., American Pub. Co., 1874. 574 p. illus.
17–6111 PZ3.C59G2 RBD

777. ——— New York, Harper, 1915. 2 v. in 1. ([320, 337] p.) 28–1683 PZ3.C59G16

778. The adventures of Tom Sawyer. Hartford, Conn., American Pub. Co.; San Francisco, A. Roman, 1876. xvi, 274 p.
34–25476 PS1306.A1 1876 RBD
Classic representation of youth in the Mississippi River country during the mid-nineteenth century; the first work of the author's second and major period.

779. ——— New York, Harper, 1903. xiii, 328 p. 4–22487 PZ3.C59Ad5

780. ——— With an introd. by Dr. Percy Boynton. New York, Harper, 1920. xxiv, 290 p. (Harper's modern classics)
20–3262 PZ3.C59Ad16

781. ——— The text edited and with an introd. by Bernard De Voto, with a prologue, "Boy's manuscript," printed for the first time. Illustrated with drawings by Thomas Hart Benton. Cambridge, Mass., Printed for members of the Limited Editions Club at the University Press, 1939. xxx, 340 p. 40–5879 PS1306.A1 1939 RBD

782. The adventures of Tom Sawyer and The adventures of Huckleberry Finn. New York, Modern Library, 1940. x, 591 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books)
41–5104 PZ3.C59Adv

783. The adventures of Tom Sawyer and Adventures of Huckleberry Finn. Introd. by William Donahey. Chicago, Spencer Press, 1953. 191, 254 p. illus. 53–1325 PZ3.C59Ad63
Said to be an exact reprint of the first edition of each work.

784. Life on the Mississippi. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1883. 624 p. illus.
3–25501 F353.C63 RBD
Reminiscences and descriptions, realistic, ironic, and romantic, of the author's experiences as a river pilot.

785. ——— New York, Harper, 1899. Biographical ed. xii, 465 p. 99–5381 F353.C636

786. ——— With an introd. by Dixon Wecter. New York, Harper, 1950. xvi, 526 p. (Harper's modern classics)
50–6261 F353.C6456 1950

787. The adventures of Huckleberry Finn (Tom Sawyer's comrade) London, Chatto & Windus, 1884. xvi, 438 p. illus.
35–20965 PS1305.A1 1884 RBD
Sequel to The Adventures of Tom Sawyer; picaresque story of boy life in the Mississippi River region; also reflects the author's revolt from the injustice and abuse of human rights evident in race relations and class distinctions at the time. Frequently cited as Mark Twain's most notable book.

788. ——— New York, C. L. Webster, 1885. 366 p. illus. 31–35230 PZ3.C59A RBD

789. ——— New ed. from new plates. New York, Harper, 1896. xi, 338 p.
3–19534 PZ3.C59A4

790. ——— Edited, with an introd., by Bernard De Voto. Illustrated by Thomas Hart Benton. New York, Limited Editions Club, 1942. lxxvi, 396 p. 42–17247 PS1305.A1 1942 RBD

791. ——— With introductions by Brander Matthews and Dixon Wecter. New York, Harper, 1948. xxv, 404 p. (Harper's modern classics) 48–2019 PZ3.C59A51

792. ——— Introd. by Lionel Trilling. New York, Rinehart, 1948. xxii, 293 p. (Rinehart editions, 11) 48–8523 PZ3.C59A52

793. ——— Descriptive captions and introductory remarks by Stanley T. Williams. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1953. vi, 312 p. illus. (Great illustrated classics) 53–9538 PZ3.C59A57

794. A Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's court. New York, C. L. Webster, 1889. xv, 575 p. illus. 3–19531 PS1308.A1 1889 RBD
The feudal society of King Arthur's Britain provides the setting for the writer's portrayal of the knightly virtues of the age contrasted with its miseries. In spite of constant humorous overtones, the book embodies a serious social satire designed to show the merits of a democratic society and the defects of one based on outmoded ideas of rank and privilege in a country where class differences are emphasized.

795. ——— New York, Harper [1925?] ix, 449 p. 25–27463 PZ3.C59Co8
Carried in Harper's current list.

796. ——— With an introd. by Carl Van Doren. Illustrated by Honoré Guilbeau. New York, Heritage Press, 1948. vii, 269 p.
49–1558 PS1308.A1 1948

797. ——— New York, Modern Library [1949, ©1917] vi, 450 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books) 49–9037 PZ3.C59Co17

798. The man that corrupted Hadleyburg, and other stories and essays. New York, Harper [1900] 398 p.
13–9365 PS1322.M25 1900 RBD

CONTENTS.—The man that corrupted Hadleyburg.—My début as a literary person.—From the "London Times" of 1904.—At the appetite-cure.—My first lie, and how I got out of it.—Is he living or is he dead?—The Esquimau maiden's romance.—How to tell a story.—About play-acting.—Concerning the Jews.—Stirring them in Austria.—The Austrian Edison keeping school again.—Travelling with a reformer.—Private history of the "Jumping frog" story.—My boyhood dreams.

The story that gives the name to the collection is a typical expression of the author's last, or naturalistic, period.

799. ——— New York, Harper, 1917. 364 p.
28–1680 PZ3.C59M9

800. Mark Twain's letters, arr. with comment, by Albert Bigelow Paine. New York, Harper, 1917. 2 v. ([856] p.) illus.
17–30756 PS1331.A3 1917

801. The love letters of Mark Twain. Edited and with an introd. by Dixon Wecter. New York, Harper, 1949. 374 p. 49–11711 PS1331.A3C6

Letters to Olivia Langdon Clemens, written between 1868 and 1904.

802. Mark Twain to Mrs. Fairbanks. Edited by Dixon Wecter. San Marino, Calif., Huntington Library, 1949. xxx, 286 p. (Huntington Library publications) 49–9860 PS1331.A3F3

Bibliographical footnotes are supplied with the letters.

803. Writings. Author's national ed. New York, Harper, 1869–1909. 25 v. A10–453 OC1

804. ——— Autograph ed. Hartford, Conn., American Pub. Co. [1899–1900] 22 v.
0–2689 PS1300.E99

805. ——— [Author's national ed.] New York, Harper, 1899–1910. 25 v. NN

806. ——— [Underwood ed.] Hartford, Conn., American Pub. Co. [1901–07] 25 v.
8–20712 PZ3.C592

807. ——— [Author's national ed. New York, Harper, 1907–18] 25 v.
20–19321 PZ3.C596

808. ——— New York, G. Wells, 1922–25. 37 v. CtY

Definitive edition.
Introductions signed: Albert Bigelow Paine.

809. Mark Twain's works. New York, Harper, 1933. 29 v. in 23. MiU

810. Representative selections, with introd. and bibliography by Fred Lewis Pattee. New York, American Book Co., 1935. lxiii, 459 p. (American writers series) 35–9143 PS1303.P35

Selected bibliography: p. liii–lxi.

811. The favorite works of Mark Twain. De luxe ed. [rev.] New York, Garden City Pub. Co., 1939. xxiv, 1178 p. 39–27117 PS1302.G3

Includes complete texts of Life on the Mississippi, The Adventures of Tom Sawyer, The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn, and A Connecticut Yankee at King Arthur's Court. Various excerpts are added from other works. The text is specially edited from The Family Mark Twain, published by Harper.

812. The portable Mark Twain. Edited by Bernard De Voto. New York, Viking Press. 1946. vii, 786 p. (Viking portable library)
46–6686 PS1302.D4

Continuing interest in Mark Twain's contribution to American literature has been made evident in recent years by studies that include the following:

813. Allen, Jerry. The adventures of Mark Twain. Boston, Little, Brown, 1954. 359 p. illus. 54–6873 PS1331.A7 1954

Designed as a biographical introduction for the general reader; includes some fictional treatment of factual material.

814. Andrews, Kenneth R. Nook Farm, Mark Twain's Hartford circle. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1950. xii, 288 p. illus.
50–9751 PS1334.A6

Bibliography: p. [271]–280.

815. Bellamy, Gladys C. Mark Twain as a literary artist. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1950. xiii, 396 p. illus.
50–4775 PS1338.B4
Bibliography: p. 377–382.

816. Branch, Edgar M. The literary apprenticeship of Mark Twain, with selections from his apprentice writing. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1950. xiv, 325 p. 50–7851 PS1332.B7
Bibliographical references included in "Notes" (p. 271–302).

817. Canby, Henry Seidel. Turn west, turn east: Mark Twain and Henry James. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1951. xii, 318 p.
51–14000 PS1331.C25
Bibliography: p. 301–303.

818. De Voto, Bernard. Mark Twain's America. Cambridge, Houghton Mifflin, 1951 [°1932] xvi, 351 p. illus. 51–6160 PS1331.D4 1951
Bibliography: p. [323]–339.
Republication of a work that, in treating of Mark Twain's environment before he came East, also provides a view of the frontier as a primary element in American cultural history.

819. Scott, Arthur L., ed. Mark Twain, selected criticism. Edited with an introd. Dallas, Southern Methodist University Press [1955] xii, 289 p. 55–12080 PS1331.S3
"Guide to Mark Twain bibliographies": p. 286–289. Bibliographical footnotes.
Includes thirty-four critical articles published in English between 1867 and 1951. For articles in foreign languages the reader is referred to Roger Asselineau's The Literary Reputation of Mark Twain from 1910 to 1950 (Paris, Librairie Marcel Didier, 1954. 242 p.).

820. Wecter, Dixon. Sam Clemens of Hannibal. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. ix, 335 p.
52–5258 PS1332.W4
Bibliography: p. 317–322.
Posthumous publication of the completed portion of a biography planned to be definitive; written by the third editor of the Mark Twain Estate. Covers ancestry, early family life, and youth up to age eighteen in Hannibal, Missouri; hence deals with the places and the period from which Clemens later drew the inspiration for his best work.

821. STEPHEN CRANE, 1871–1900

In a period when gentility and the happy ending were particularly popular among American readers, Crane was decidedly an innovator when he wrote a short novel having a prostitute as the heroine. However, not until the publication of his Civil War novel, The Red Badge of Courage, which portrayed the realities of the battlefield as faithfully in words as Mathew B. Brady did in photographs, was his reputation established as an initiator of realism in American literature. He was a prolific and uneven writer of short stories as well as novels and of poems that in the absence of conventional rhymes may be called free verse. Irony and naturalism were present in his best work, and his themes frequently dealt with suffering, mutilation, terror, and death. Various writers in America whom he is said to have influenced include Willa Cather, Ernest Hemingway, Theodore Dreiser, and F. Scott Fitzgerald. A recent biographical and critical study of Crane is provided by John Berryman's Stephen Crane (New York, Sloane, 1950, xv, 347 p. American men of letters series).

822. Maggie, a girl of the streets, by Johnston Smith [pseud.] [New York, Priv. print., 1893] 163 p. CtY

823. ——— New York, Appleton, 1896. vi, 158 p. 6–30866 PZ3.C852M RBD
Second edition revised by the author.

824. ——— Together with George's mother [1896] and "The blue hotel" [1899] With an introd. by Henry Hazlitt. New York, Knopf, 1931. xi, 218 p. 31–28140 PZ3.C852Mag

825. The red badge of courage; an episode of the American Civil War. New York, Appleton, 1895 [°1894] 233 p.
49–36615 PS1449.C85R3 1895 RBD

826. ——— New ed., with port. and pref. New York, Appleton, 1900. x, 233 p.
0–3652 PZ3.C852R2
Preface contains biographical notice.

827. ——— Illustrated by John Steuart Curry, with an introd. by Carl Van Doren. New York, Heritage Press, 1944. xiii, 170 p.
44–6216 PS1449.C85R3

828. ——— Introd. by Robert Wooster Stallman. New York, Modern Library, 1951. xlv, 266 p. (Modern Library college editions, T45)
51–2278 PZ3.C852R12
Bibliography: p. xlii–xlv.

829. ——— Edited and introduced by John T. Winterich. With Civil War photographs

[taken by Mathew B. Brady] London, Folio Society [1951] 159 p. 52–2542 PZ3.C852R14
"The present edition of The Red Badge of Courage contains material from the original manuscript which has never appeared in print before."—"A Note on this Edition," p. 21.

830. The open boat, and other tales of adventure. New York, Doubleday & McClure, 1889. 336 p. 6–30865 PZ3.C8520 RBD

831. War is kind. Drawings by W. Bradley. New York, Stokes, 1899. 96 p. 99–1667 PS1449.C85
Poems.

832. Works. Edited by Wilson Follett. New York, Knopf [°1925–26] 12 v. 25–25565 PS1449.C85 1925 RBD
Introductions by Amy Lowell, Willa Cather, Henry L. Mencken, Sherwood Anderson, and others.

833. Collected poems. Edited by Wilson Follett. New York, Knopf, 1930. 132 p. 30–9605 PS1449.C85A17 1930

834. Twenty stories. Selected, with an introd., by Carl Van Doren. New York, Knopf, 1940. xvii, 507 p. 40–30097 PZ3.C852Tw
Notes: p. 501–507.

835. Selected prose and poetry. Edited with an introd. by William M. Gibson. New York, Rinehart, 1950. xix, 230 p. (Rinehart editions, 47) 50–10711 PS1449.C85A6 1950
"Textual and bibliographical note": p. xvii.
Includes among other selections Maggie, "The Bride Comes to Yellow Sky" (1898), "The Monster" (1899), and poems from The Black Riders (1895), War Is Kind (1899), and "Three Poems" from Collected Poems (1930).
Another Rinehart collection is announced for future publication: The Red Badge of Courage and Selected Prose and Poetry.

836. Stephen Crane: an omnibus. Edited, with introd. and notes, by Robert Wooster Stallman. New York, Knopf, 1952. xlv, 703 p. 52–6416 PS1449.C85A6 1952
Bibliography: p. 697–703.
Brings together texts of the novels, Maggie, George's Mother, and The Red Badge of Courage; ten short stories; sixteen poems; and fifty-seven new letters accompanied by reprints of various letters previously published. Crane's contribution to journalism is represented by four articles. Cf. Editor's Foreword, p. vii.

837. Stories and tales. Edited by Robert Wooster Stallman. New York, Vintage Books, 1955. xxxii, 350 p. (A Vintage book, K–10) 55–159 PZ3.C852St
Bibliography: p. 347–350.
Includes Maggie and George's Mother in addition to selected short stories.

838. EMILY DICKINSON, 1830–1886

Emily Dickinson lived out her 56 years of life in the college town of Amherst, Massachusetts, where she grew to maturity under the domination of a father who came from a New England family of Calvinistic convictions. By the age of 36 Miss Dickinson had achieved a withdrawal from the world that culminated in a life of complete retirement within the family home and grounds. In this seclusion of her physical person her mind and imagination were extremely active, with the result that hundreds of brief lyrics on love, death, nature, and God, as well as many letters, poured from her pen. These reveal an intense inner life that continues to challenge interest and arouse speculation on the part of numerous critics. Her poems are highly original, often cryptic, sometimes gay, and frequently witty. In them economy in the use of words is carried to the point of frugality. They are characterized by a strong metaphysical interest, daring metaphors, imagery, conceits, and by much irregularity in meter and rhyme. Hers was a poetic voice as new when her poems began to be published posthumously as Whitman's had been when Leaves of Grass appeared in 1855.

839. Poems [first series] Edited by two of her friends, Mabel Loomis Todd and T. W. Higginson. Boston, Roberts, 1890. xii. 152 p. 3–18785 PS1541.P6 1890 RBD

840. Poems, second series. Edited by two of her friends, T. W. Higginson and Mabel Loomis Todd. Boston, Roberts, 1891. 230 p. 3–18788 PS1541.P62 1891 RBD

841. Poems, third series. Edited by Mabel Loomis Todd. Boston, Roberts, 1896. vii, 200 p. 3–18787 PS1541.P63 1896 RBD

842. Poems. Edited by Martha Dickinson Bianchi and Alfred Leete Hampson; introd. by Alfred Leete Hampson. Boston, Little, Brown, 1937. xi, 484 p. 37–2949 PS1541.A1 1937
"In the present edition all the poems of the preceding collections of poems are included in a single volume."—Introduction, p. x.

843. Bolts of melody; new poems. Edited by Mabel Loomis Todd and Millicent Todd Bingham. New York, Harper, 1945. xxix, 352 p.
45–35045 PS1541.A137

844. Selected poems. With an introd. by Conrad Aiken. New York, Modern Library, 1948. xvi, 231 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books [25]) 48–9350 PS1541.A6 1948a
Selected Poems, edited by Conrad Aiken, was published in London by J. Cape, 1924, in 272 p.

845. Poems. Selected and edited with a commentary by Louis Untermeyer. Illustrated by Helen Sewell. New York, Heritage Press, 1952. xxviii, 284 p. (American poets)
53–1806 PS1541.A6 1952a
Based on the Limited Editions Club edition of the same year.

846. Poems; including variant readings critically compared with all known manuscripts. Edited by Thomas H. Johnson. Cambridge, Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1955. 3 v. (lxviii, 1266 p.) facsims.
54–8631 PS1541.A1 1955
Inclusive scholars' edition of the poet's complete poetical work. In an extensive introduction the editor discusses historical and stylistic developments found in the poems.
Editions of the poems before Bolts of Melody failed to set accuracy of the text as a primary consideration.

847. Letters. Edited by Mabel Loomis Todd. Boston, Roberts, 1894. 2 v. illus.
24–22101 PS1541.Z5A3
Includes 102 additional poems or parts of poems.

848. ——— New and enl. ed. Edited by Mabel Loomis Todd. New York, Harper, 1931. xxxi, 457 p. illus. 31–32229 PS1541.Z5A3 1931

849. ——— Edited by Mabel Loomis Todd, with an introd. by Mark Van Doren. Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1951. xxiv, 389 p. illus.
51–9898 PS1541.Z5A3 1951

850. Letters to Dr. and Mrs. Josiah Gilbert Holland. Edited by their granddaughter, Theodora Van Wagenen Ward. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1951. vii, 252 p. illus.
51–10236 PS1541.Z5A36

Understanding of Emily Dickinson's life and art has been greatly broadened in the past ten years by the availability of various new critical and biographical studies, which include the following:

851. Bingham, Millicent (Todd). Ancestors' brocades; the literary debut of Emily Dickinson. New York, Harper, 1945. xiii, 464 p. illus.
45–35042 PS1541.Z5B53
"Early Reviews of Books by Emily Dickinson, 1890–1896": p. 406–411. "Books by Emily Dickinson, a Partial List of Editions of Books Brought Out by Mabel Loomis Todd and Thomas Wentworth Higginson": p. 412–415. Includes an important analysis of difficulties to be faced in preparing a definitive edition of the poems.

852. Bingham, Millicent (Todd). Emily Dickinson, a revelation. New York, Harper, 1954. 109 p. illus. 54–12227 PS1541.Z5B54
Includes some unpublished letters, and some late poems by Emily Dickinson. On the basis of this material, supplemented by extensive research, the writer identifies the last great love of Emily's life as her father's friend, Otis Phillips Lord, a prominent judge in Massachusetts.

853. Bingham, Millicent (Todd). Emily Dickinson's home; letters of Edward Dickinson [Emily's father] and his family. With documentation and comment by Millicent Todd Bingham. New York, Harper, 1955. xvii, 600 p. illus.
55–6573 PS1541.Z5B543
Includes bibliographies.

854. Chase, Richard V. Emily Dickinson. New York, Sloane, 1951. xii, 328 p. (The American men of letters series)
51–14929 PS1541.Z5C5
"Bibliographical note": p. 313–317.

855. Johnson, Thomas H. Emily Dickinson: an interpretive biography. Cambridge, Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1955. 276 p. illus.
55–9439 PS1541.Z5J6

856. PAUL LAURENCE DUNBAR, 1872–1906

Dunbar, born in Ohio to parents who had formerly been slaves, owes his significance in American literature chiefly to his poems and short stories in Negro dialect. In the majority of these he memorialized the humor and also the pathos of the old-fashioned plantation Negro, giving his themes the idealization used by various other writers, and particularly by Thomas Nelson Page. Dunbar also wrote traditional romantic poems in conventional English and novels, such as The Sport of the Gods (1902).

857. Lyrics of lowly life. With an introd. by W. D. Howells. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1896. xx, 208 p. 4–13820 PS1556.L6 1896

858. Lyrics of the hearthside. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1899. x, 227 p.
99–1025 PS1556.L7 1899

859. Life and works; containing his complete poetical works, his best short stories, numerous anecdotes, and a complete biography of the famous poet. By Lida Keck Wiggins, and an introd. by William Dean Howells. Naperville, Ill., Memphis, Tenn., J. L. Nichols [°1907] 430 p. illus.
7–13414 PS1557.W5

860. Best stories. Selected and edited with an introd. by Benjamin Brawley. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1938. xvii, 258 p.
38–5603 PZ3.D911Be
Selections are taken from the following collections of short stories: Folks from Dixie (1898); The Strength of Gideon (1900); In Old Plantation Days (1903); and The Heart of Happy Hollow (1904).

861. Complete poems. With the introd. to Lyrics of lowly life by W. D. Howells. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1940. xxxii, 289 p.
40–34708 PS1556.A1 1940
Previously issued in 1913.

862. FINLEY PETER DUNNE ("MR. DOOLEY"), 1867–1936

Dunne, a Chicago newspaper reporter and later an editor, created a crackerbox philosopher, "Mr. Dooley," who, speaking in the brogue of Irish immigrants, became the author's medium for expressing his own serious views on social, political, and foreign affairs. The essays were enormously popular, first as newspaper columns and later in the form of books. "Josh Billings," "Artemus Ward," and Will Rogers are representative figures in the tradition of American writing to which Dunne belonged.

863. Mr. Dooley in peace and in war. Boston, Small, Maynard, 1898. xviii, 260 p.
98–1501 PN6161.D82 1898

864. Mr. Dooley in the hearts of his countrymen. Boston, Small, Maynard, 1899. xi, 285 p.
99–5065 PN6161.D825

865. Mr. Dooley at his best. Edited by Elmer Ellis; with foreword by Franklin P. Adams. New York, Scrfibner, 1938. xxvi, 291 p.
38–27991 PN6161.D818

866. Mr. Dooley: now and forever, created by Finley Peter Dunne. Selected, with commentary and introd. by Louis Filler. Stanford, Calif., Academic Reprints, 1954. xv, 298 p. (American culture and economics series, no. 4)
54–12399 PN6161.D817
Includes material from the 1898, 1899 publications cited above, and also from What Dooley Says (1898); Mr. Dooley's Philosophy (1900); Mr. Dooley's Opinions (1901); Observations by Mr. Dooley (1902); Dissertations by Mr. Dooley (1906); and Mr. Dooley Says (1910).

867. EDWARD EGGLESTON, 1837–1902

Eggleston, largely a self-educated man, was a Methodist clergyman, an editor, and a historian as well as a novelist. He was inspired to apply to the writing of fiction the idea that a good artist paints subjects chosen from his own environment. His birth and early years in the Middle West had made him familiar with Southern Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, and with the "Hoosier" dialect used there in the early part of the 19th century; consequently it was to this part of the country that he turned for his material. His novels and stories, once popular, suffer from melodramatic plots, poor characterization, forced humor, and sentimentality. Historically, however, they give early evidence of the trends in American literature after the Civil War towards increasing interest in the speech and social conditions of common men, in realistic rather than romantic themes, and in the local color of regions remote from the older centers of culture in the East.

868. The Hoosier schoolmaster. New York, Orange Judd [°1871] 226 p.
3–19544 PS1582.H62 1871 RBD
Title varies: The Hoosier Schoolmaster; a Novel; The Hoosier Schoolmaster; a Story of Backwoods Life in Indiana.

869. ——— New and rev. ed. New York, Orange Judd, 1893. 218 p. illus.
3–19546 PZ3.E29H8

870. ——— Rev. with an introd. and notes . . . by the author. New York, Grosset & Dunlap [°1913] 281 p. 40–152 PZ3.E29H8

871. ——— With an introd. by Emory Holloway. New York, Macmillan, 1928. xxviii, 203 p. (Modern readers' series)
28–25351 PZ3.E29H15

872. The circuit rider. New York, J. B. Ford, 1874. 332 p. 6–37566 PZ3.E29C

873. ——— New York, Scribner, 1902. 332 p. 2–11134 PZ3.E29C7

874. Roxy. New York, Scribner, 1878. viii, 432 p. 4–22067 PZ3.E29R

875. ——— New York, Scribner, 1906. viii, 432 p. 6–27714 PZ3.E29R2

876. The Graysons; a story of Illinois. New York, Century [1888] 362 p. illus. 4–15098 PS1582.G7 1888 RBD

Includes a courtroom scene in which Abraham Lincoln, as counsel for the defense, plays a leading part.

877. The Graysons; a story of Abraham Lincoln. New York, Century, 1918 [©1915] 362 p. illus. 53–49456 PS1582.G7 1918 RBD

Published also under title: The Graysons; a Story of Illinois.

878. EUGENE FIELD, 1850–1895

From 1883 to 1895 Field pioneered in a new type of newspaper column, which he called "Sharps and Flats." It appeared regularly in the Chicago Morning News (afterwards called the Chicago Record). Sometimes written in real or manufactured dialect and slang, the column was a mélange of jokes, gossip about persons or events, idealistic short stories, lullabies, parodies, familiar verses particularly for or about children, political sarcasm, and miscellaneous humorous pieces. It is said that most of what he published in book form, as for example A Little Book of Western Verse (1889) and A Little Book of Profitable Tales (1889), had appeared first in his column. He is remembered particularly for his innovations in journalistic literature and for the appeal his verses had to the taste of his period, a time when James Whitcomb Riley also attracted a large audience.

879. Poems. Complete ed. New York, Scribner, 1915. xii, 553 p. 16–6502 PS1665.A2 1915

880. Writings in prose and verse. New York, Scribner, 1898–1901. 12 v. illus. 32–2826 PS1665.A2 1898

"Eugene Field; a Memory," by Roswell Martin Field, v. 1, p. ix–xlvii.

Vols. 1–10, 1898; v. 11–12, 1901.

Introductions by Joel Chandler Harris, Edward Everett Hale, and others.

Reissued by Scribner in 1911.

881. MARY E. (WILKINS) FREEMAN, 1852–1930

The name of Mrs. Freeman, a writer whose early and most successful short stories are set in rural New England, is frequently linked with the names of Harriet Beecher Stowe and Sarah Orne Jewett as belonging to the school of local color writing about that region. However, her own objectivity, economy, and force applied to the delineation of her characters, their environment, and the society of which they were a part constitute her individual contribution to the realistic American dialect story of the late 19th century. Mrs. Freeman's stories, concerned chiefly with frustration and repression in provincial Massachusetts circles, forcefully convey her own view of life as essentially tragic.

882. A humble romance, and other stories. New York, Harper, 1887. iv, 436 p. 1–2478 PZ3.F88Hu

Twenty-eight short stories.

883. A New England nun, and other stories. New York, Harper, 1891. iv, 468 p. 4–15108 PZ3.F88N

Twenty-four short stories.

884. ——— With an introd. by Professor Fred Lewis Pattee. New York, Harper [©1920] xxvi, 468 p. (Harper's modern classics) 20–18608 PZ3.F88N6

885. Edgewater people. New York, Harper [©1918] 314 p. 18–21528 PZ3.F88Ed PS1712.E4

Includes twelve short stories.

886. Best stories. Selected and with an introd. by Henry Wysham Lanier. New York, Harper, 1927. xi, 465 p. 27–5840 PZ3.F88Be

887. HENRY BLAKE FULLER, 1857–1929

A Chicago banker, journalist, and novelist, Fuller wrote at a time when Chicago was going through a period of rapid social change, marked by expansion, material wealth, social ambition, and municipal corruption. Fuller knew this life so intimately that it naturally provided the material for his novels and short stories. These were written in the tradition of realism associated with the work of William Dean Howells, lacking as they did the naturalistic view of American society later developed by Theodore Dreiser. In another and different mood Fuller reacted to a number of trips abroad by writing various volumes that record his enjoyment of Europe, among them The Chevalier of Pensieri-Vani (1890), a gently humorous book, half fact, half fancy, about experiences in Italy.

888. The cliff-dwellers, a novel. New York, Harper, 1893. 324 p. illus.
6–44578 PZ3.F957Cl

889. With the procession, a novel. New York, Harper, 1895. 336 p.
6–44576 PZ3.F957Wi

890. HAMLIN GARLAND, 1860–1940

After a boyhood devoted to a man's labor on family farms in Wisconsin, Iowa, and Dakota Territory, Garland went as a young man to Boston. There he came under the influence of William Dean Howells and imbibed the latter's theories of literary realism. Garland, however, soon went beyond his preceptor's position by evolving his own literary theory. This he called "veritism." Its principal tenets included: a national American literature purged of imitations of older literatures; realism faithful not merely to facts but to the writer's impressions of truth underlying the facts; themes drawn from the author's own experiences, whether agreeable or not; and local color dependent upon intimate knowledge of the place or region depicted. In the best of Garland's work he remained true to these principles. His short stories of farm life in the Middle West, often grim but also powerful, contributed to the marked success of the short story as a literary form at the end of the 19th century. A series of autobiographical works, dealing with the Middle Border in relation to his own family, chronicles the influence of the frontier on three generations of middle-class Americans.

891. Main-traveled roads; six Mississippi Valley stories. Boston, Arena Pub. Co., 1891. 260 p. 17–26999 PS1732.M3 1891 RBD

892. ——— New ed., with additional stories. New York, Macmillan, 1899. ix, 299 p.
99–4062 PZ3.G18M4

893. ——— Sunset ed. New York, Harper [1909?] 299 p. 19–5047 PZ3.G18M5
CONTENTS.—Introduction by W. D. Howells.—A branch road.—Up the coolly.—Among the cornrows.—The return of a private.—Under the lion's paw.—The creamery man.—A day's pleasure.—Mrs. Ripley's trip.—Uncle Ethan Ripley.

894. ——— With illus. by Constance Garland. New York, Harper, 1930. 406 p.
30–28187 PZ3.G18M10
Includes six additional stories.

895. ——— Edited with an introd. by Thomas A. Bledsoe. New York, Rinehart, 1954. 185 p. (Rinehart editions, 66) 54–5867 PZ3.G18M13

896. Crumbling idols; twelve essays on art, dealing chiefly with literature, painting and the drama. Chicago, Stone & Kimball, 1894. ix, 192 p.
27–20780 PS1732.C7 1894
CONTENTS.—Provincialism.—New fields.—The question of success.—Literary prophecy.—Local color in art.—The local novel.—The drift of the drama.—The influence of Ibsen.—Impressionism.—Literary centres.—Literary masters.—A recapitulatory afterword.

897. ——— With an introd. by Robert E. Spiller. Gainesville, Fla., Scholars' Facsimiles & Reprints, 1952. viii, 192 p.
52–9716 PS1732.C7 1952

898. A son of the Middle Border. New York, Macmillan, 1917. 467 p. illus.
17–22272 PS1733.A4
Second in a series, in point of chronology, the first being The Trail-Makers of the Middle Border (1926); the third, A Daughter of the Middle Border (1921, Pulitzer Prize, 1922); and the fourth Back-Trailers from the Middle Border (1928).
Currently reprinted by the same publisher.

899. ——— New York, Grosset & Dunlap, 1928, ©1917. v, 466 p.
48–35778 PS1733.A47 1928

900. EDWARD EVERETT HALE, 1822–1909

Hale was a Unitarian clergyman of distinguished New England ancestry and connections, whose long life was spent in or near Boston. His voluminous writings, which included essays, addresses, short stories, novels, sermons, books of travel, and other literary forms, reveal his catholic interest in miscellaneous fields—literature, history, antiquities, government, the opening of the Middle West, European culture, and practical ethics, among others. His works are now significant chiefly as records of the mind and character of a man widely known and appreciated in his time and place.

901. The man without a country. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1865. 23 p.
15–3174 PS1772.M3 1865 RBD

Published first in The Atlantic Monthly, Dec. 1863, to combat Northern or "Copperhead" sympathy with the Confederacy during the Civil War and to inspire patriotism in a united nation, the story has been republished frequently, both separately and in short story collections.

902. ——— [Limited ed.] Boston, J. S. Smith [°1897] xx, 59 p. 6–46184 PZ3.H13M6
Includes author's account of the background and circumstances of the writing and publication of the story, and of its subsequent history.

903. ——— New ed. With an introd. in the year of the war with Spain. Boston, Little, Brown, 1898. xxxii, 59 p. 98–238 PZ3.H13M7

904. ——— New ed., with an introd. in the year of the war with Spain. Boston, Little, Brown, 1923. xxxii, 59 p. 27–7343 PZ3.H13M30

905. ——— With an introd. by Carl Van Doren and illus. by Edward A. Wilson. New York, Limited Editions Club, 1936. x, 55 p.
36–18845 PS1772.M3 1936 RBD

906. A New England boyhood. New York, Cassell [1893] xxv, 267 p. illus.
4–16961 F73.44.H15
Describes a Boston boyhood before the middle of the 19th century, giving details of a happy home life, social and religious experiences, the reading of the New England children at the time, and student life at Harvard.

907. ——— A new ed. With foreword by Edwin D. Mead. Boston, Little, Brown, 1927. xxxii, 208 p. illus. 27–19168 PS1773.A2 1927

908. Works. Library ed. [Boston, Little, Brown, 1898–1901] 10 v. 99–5408 PS1770.A2 1898

909. The man without a country, and other stories. Edited with introd. and notes by Samuel Marion Tucker. New York, Macmillan, 1910. xxviii, 200 p. ([Macmillan's pocket American and English classics])
10–22723 PZ3.H13M25

910. JOEL CHANDLER HARRIS, 1848–1908

Harris' position as an author derives from his contribution to Negro folk literature in America, typified by the Uncle Remus stories and rhymes first published in the Atlanta Constitution, a newspaper with which Harris was associated from 1876 to 1900. The first collected edition was received enthusiastically, not only in the South but also in the North, where it gave evidence of the vitality of Southern literature after limitations imposed on it by the Civil War. This and successive collections made their appeal through their modern treatment of animal mythology as well as through their gentle humor, plantation Negro dialect, and popular philosophy. The stories Harris wrote about mountaineers, freed Negroes, and poor whites in his native Georgia, while less well-known than the Uncle Remus stories, have an authentic local color and a democratic realism that differ sharply and with salutary effect from Thomas Nelson Page and George William Bagby's romantic glorification of Southern plantation life before the Civil War. For useful data on Harris' life and contributions see Stella Brewer Brooke's Joel Chandler Harris, Folklorist (Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1950. 182 p.).

911. Uncle Remus, his songs and his sayings. New York, Appleton, 1881. 231 p. illus.
7–2896 PZ3.H242Un3
Described as "the folk-lore of the old plantation." First published in 1880.
CONTENTS.—Legends of the old plantation.—Plantation proverbs.—His songs.—A story of the war.—His sayings.

912. ——— New and rev. ed., with one hundred and twelve illust. by A. B. Frost. New York, Appleton, 1895. xxi, 265 p.
7–2897 PZ3.H242Un3

913. ——— New and rev. ed., with 112 illus. by A. B. Frost. New York, Appleton-Century, 1947. xxi, 270 p. 47–5732 PZ7.H242Un40
Based on the author's revision of 1895.

914. Nights with Uncle Remus. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1883. xxxvi, 416 p. illus.
8–23921 PZ3.H242N
Subtitle: Myths and legends of the old plantation.

915. ——— 22d ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [°1883] xxxvi, 416 p. illus.
42–26420 PZ3.H242N2

916. ——— With illus. by Milo Winter. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1917. viii, 338 p.
17–25512 PZ3.H242N4

917. Mingo, and other sketches in black and white. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1884. 273 p.
12–32982 PZ3.H242Mi
CONTENTS.—Mingo: a sketch of life in middle Georgia.—At Teague Poteet's: a sketch of the Hog Mountain range.—Blue Dave.—A piece of land.

918. ——— 7th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1898. 273 p. OOxM

919. ——— New York, Mckinlay, Stone & Mackenzie ['1912] 273 p. (The booklovers ed.) ViU

920. Free Joe, and other Georgia sketches. New York, Scribner, 1887. 236 p.
7–3663 PZ3.H242F
CONTENTS.—Free Joe.—Little Compton.—Aunt Fountain's prisoner.—Trouble on Lost Mountain.—Azalia.

921. ——— New York, Scribner, 1906. 236 p. NN

922. Uncle Remus and his friends; old plantation stories, songs, and ballads, with sketches of Negro character. Illustrated by A. B. Frost. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1892. xv, 357 p.
7–2895 PZ7.H242Unh3

923. Joel Chandler Harris: editor and essayist. Edited by Julia Collier Harris. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1931. 429 p.
31–31655 PS1801.H3
Comprises miscellaneous literary, political, and social writings.

924. The favorite Uncle Remus. Illustrated by A. B. Frost. Selected, arr. & edited by George Van Santvoord and Archibald C. Coolidge. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1948. viii, 310 p.
48–1944 PZ7.H242Fav
Published in celebration of the centenary of the author's birth. This is one of many reprints of selections made available from time to time.

925. The complete tales of Uncle Remus. Compiled by Richard Chase. With illus. by Arthur Burdette Frost [and others] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1955. xxxii, 875 p.
54–12233 PZ7.H242Co
"The tales in this edition have been left as Mr. Harris wrote them. Our concern has been with the folktales only, and not with the songs, rhymed versions of the tales, proverbs, and character sketches . . ." Foreword, p. xiii.

926. (FRANCIS) BRET HARTE, 1836–1902

Journalist, parodist, poet, literary critic, and finally literary hack, Harte has been called the father of the local color movement in American literature and the originator of a new genre in short story writing, whose influence may be traced in the work of such dissimilar writers as Mark Twain, Ambrose Bierce, and O. Henry. Departing from the genteel tradition so long dominant in the literature produced in New England, he took as his province the rough life of the frontier after it had advanced to California under the impetus provided by the discovery of gold in that region in 1848. His characters were for the most part miners, gamblers, rascals, and adventurers of all kinds. These men and women he brought to life with a certain romantic, sentimental glow for sophisticated audiences in the East and abroad, who immediately made his work the literary fashion of the 1870's. While he remained a good craftsman, his repeated use of his original themes dulled the appetite for the work he continued to turn out until he died.

927. The Luck of Roaring Camp, and other sketches. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1869] 256 p. (The Riverside library) NcD

928. ——— Boston, Fields, Osgood, 1870. 239 p. PS1827.A1 1870 RBD

929. ——— Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1871. 256 p.
25–28034 PS1827.A1 1871 RBD

930. The Luck of Roaring Camp, and other stories. [3d ed.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1886. 279 p. (The Riverside Aldine series)
3–26184 PZ3.H252L13
CONTENTS.—The luck of Roaring Camp.—M'liss.—The outcasts of Poker Flat.—Miggles.—Tennessee's partner.—The idyll of Red Gulch.—How Santa Claus came to Simpson's Bar.—The fool of Five Forks.—The romance of Madroño Hollow.—The Princess Bob and her friends.

931. The Luck of Roaring Camp, and selected stories and poems. Edited with an introd. by George R. Stewart, Jr. New York, Macmillan, 1928. xx, 188 p. (The modern readers' series)
28–7034 PZ3.H252L25

932. The Luck of Roaring Camp, and other sketches. Chicago, Fountain Press, 1949. viii, 309 p. illus. (World's greatest literature)
50–5573 PZ3.H252L40

933. Poems. Boston, Fields, Osgood, 1871. vi, 152 p. 24–6284 PS1830 1871 RBD
Includes a group of dialect poems (p. 49–88). Among them is "Plain Language from Truthful James," which became the rage after its initial publication in the Overland Monthly, Sept. 1870; republished at times under the title, "The Heathen Chinee," it has been called "the most spectacular poem in the Pike language." See annotation under the name of John (Milton) Hay for comment on this form of vernacular verse.

934. ——— Household ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1902] x, 321 p.
3-463 PS1830 1902

935. Works. Riverside ed. Collected and rev. by the author. [Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1894-1900] 6 v. PPLas

936. The writings of Bret Harte. Standard library ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [°1896-1903] 19 v. illus. A13-1720 PS1820.E96a
A Riverside edition was published by Houghton Mifflin in 20 v., °1896-°1914, of which v. 20 has the title: Stories and Prose and Other Uncollected Writings.

937. Bret Harte's stories of the old West. Selected by Wilhelmina Harper and Aimée M. Peters; illus. by Paul Brown. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1940. 322 p. 40-34192 PZ3.H242Stc
CONTENTS.—The Luck of Roaring Camp.—The outcasts of Poker Flat.—Tennessee's partner.—How Santa Claus came to Simpson's Bar.—Highwater mark.—M'liss.—An ingenue of the Sierras.—A ward of Colonel Starbottle's.—Miggles.—A knight-errant of the foothills.—Dick Boyle's business card.—Plain language from truthful James.

938. Bret Harte; representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Joseph B. Harrison. New York, American Book Co., 1941. cxxviii, 416 p. (American writers series)
41-11710 PS1822.H3
"Selected bibliography": p. cxiii-cxxviii.

939. Selected stories of Bret Harte: The Luck of Roaring Camp, The outcasts of Poker Flat, Tennessee's partner, M'liss, and other tales. New York, Caxton House, 1946. ix, 306 p. (Caxton library of the world's greatest literature)
46-1319 PZ3.H252Se

940. Best short stories. Edited, and with an introd. by Robert N. Linscott. New York, Modern Library, 1947. x, 517 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books [250])
47-30278 PZ3.H252Bg

941. JOHN (MILTON) HAY, 1838-1905

Hay and Bret Harte were pioneers in writing humorous or sentimental vernacular poetry glorifying people or events on the frontier. In these verses their aim was to reproduce the speech and sketch the characteristics of unlettered residents of the Middle West, identified during the California Gold Rush as "Pikes" or "Pikers" because so many of them migrated from the counties of Pike in Illinois, Missouri, Arkansas, and other states. Hay, who was eventually Secretary of State, a cosmopolitan, and a member of Henry Adams' circle in Washington, later discounted the importance of his few ballads in Pike dialect. However, they were so constantly read and recited that they attained the status of folk poems. As such they contributed to setting a pattern in verse that was used over and over again, notably by James Whitcomb Riley. Hay also wrote numerous conventional poems on romantic themes. His prose works included: Castilian Days (1871), travel sketches of European experiences written for Americans interested in the Old World; The Bread-Winners (1884), a novel reflecting conservative upper-class ideas concerning labor unions and private enterprise; and Abraham Lincoln (1890), a monumental biographical work written jointly with John G. Nicolay.

942. Pike County ballads and other pieces. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1871. 167 p.
25-15310 PS1902.P5 1871 RBD
Includes "Jim Bludso" and "Little Breeches," both published originally in the New York Tribune, a newspaper with which Hay was connected for some years in an editorial capacity.

943. ——— 15th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1882 [°1871] 167 p.
50-47091 PS1902.P5 1882

944. Complete poetical works, including many poems now first collected, with an introd. by Clarence L. Hay. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1916. xiii, 271 p. 16-22653 PS1900.A2 1916
Large-paper edition.
"The Pike County Ballads": p. 3-[25].

945. LAFCADIO HEARN, 1850-1904

Hearn was born on the Greek island of Leukas and died in Japan a naturalized citizen of that country. The middle period of his life, however, was spent as a journalist in the United States. There he was set apart from the more conventional writers of the period by his prevailing interest in perfecting a polished but ornate literary style and in developing an impressionistic method of treating themes that were often exotic. His sketches, essays, stories, and novels of life and society in New Orleans and the West Indies are contributions to the local color literature of these places.

Numerous other volumes record his observations of Japanese manners and customs. These were designed to interpret his adopted country to the Western world.

946. Chita; a memory of Last Island. New York, Harper, 1889. 204 p.
7–5049 PZ3.H351C RBD

Short novel centering around the story of a Creole child carried away by a tidal wave that overwhelmed one of the coastal islands south of Louisiana.

947. ——— New York, Harper [c1917] 204 p. ViU

948. ——— New York, Harper [1938] MH

949. Youma; the story of a West-Indian slave. New York, Harper, 1890. 193 p.
7–5043 PZ3.H351Y RBD

The heroism and death of a Negro slave, for the sake of the white Creole child in her care, provide the plot of the novel; said to be based on an actual occurrence in the slave insurrection of 1848 on the island of Martinique.

950. ——— New York, Harper [1915] MH

951. Writings. Large-paper ed. [Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1922] 16 v. illus.
23–7259 PS1915.A2 1922 RBD

Introduction by Ferris Greenslet: v. 1, p. xiii–[xxx].

Partial Contents.—1. Leaves from the diary of an impressionist, Creole sketches and Some Chinese ghosts.—2. Stray leaves from strange literature and Fantastics and other fancies.—3. Two years in the French West Indies, v. 1. Appendix: Some Creole melodies.—4. Two years in the French West Indies, v. 2. Chita and Youma.—5–6. Glimpses of unfamiliar Japan.—9. Exotics and retrospectives and In ghostly Japan.—11. Kotto and Kwaidan.—12. Japan, an attempt at interpretation.

952. ——— [Koizumi ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1923] 16 v. illus. NN

Contents comparable to those of the large-paper edition, with slight variations in statements of a few titles.

953. The life and letters of Lafcadio Hearn, by Elizabeth (Bisland) [Wetmore] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1906. 2 v. illus.
6–44374 PS1918.W4

The work is made up chiefly of Hearn's letters, preceded by a brief biography. His letters are found also in v. 13–16 of his Writings. Japanese Letters, also edited by Elizabeth Bisland Wetmore, comprises v. 16.

954. Creole sketches. Edited by Charles Woodward Hutson, with illus. by the author. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1924. xxv, 201 p.
24–10002 F380.C9H3

955. Selected writings. Edited by Henry Goodman, with an introd. by Malcolm Cowley. New York, Citadel Press, 1949. viii, 566 p.
49–11635 PS1916.G6

Contents.—Lafcadio Hearn, by Malcolm Cowley.—Editor's introduction.—Kwaidan.—Some Chinese ghosts.—Chita.—American sketches [from Cincinnati, New Orleans, and the Caribbean].—Japan: Stories of Japanese life; Travel; Folk culture; Essays; Weird tales.—Sources.—Bibliography [books and articles about Hearn] p. 564–566.

956. ROBERT HERRICK, 1868–1938

Herrick, for 30 years a professor of English at the University of Chicago, observed around him the advent of increased industrialization, expanding business, and accelerated economic competition. Results of the operation of these forces, found in the ethical and social character of middle class life in the capital city of the Middle West, were the themes he developed in a succession of realistic novels. His novel Together (1908) reflects his reaction to the changing relations of men and women in such a society. Sometimes (1933), a satirical Utopian novel, postulates a remote future in which the characters, freed from acquisitiveness, might develop creative personalities and a good life. Herrick was a humanist and an intellectual, rather than a self-conscious reformer. That fact perhaps accounts for the analytical, sometimes undramatic, quality of his work and for its neglect by general readers.

957. The memoirs of an American citizen. New York, Macmillan, 1905. xi, 351 p.
5–23023 PZ3.H435Me

First published in The Saturday Evening Post (1905), the novel provides a realistic portrait of a self-made capitalist, antedating Dreiser's The Financier by seven years.

958. Clark's field. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1914. 477 p. 14–11043 PZ3.H435Cl

959. EDGAR WATSON HOWE, 1853–1937

Owner and editor of the Daily Globe of Atchison, Kansas, from 1877 to 1911, and afterwards of

E. W. Howe's Monthly, Howe enjoyed a national reputation on account of the brief paragraphs and aphorisms contributed by him in his editorial capacity. He was also the author of a novel in which the treatment of smalltown life constituted a pioneer work of unrelieved realism. It forecast the trend towards naturalistic writing on the same theme culminating in Sherwood Anderson's Winesburg, Ohio (1919) and its successors in the 1920's. Howe's autobiography, Plain People (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1929. 317 p.), also is a contribution to the realistic regional literature of the Middle West.

960. The story of a country town. Atchison, Kans., Howe, 1883. 226 p.
45-45006 PZ3.H8364S
Privately printed by the author after being rejected by several publishers.

961. ——— With an appreciation by William Dean Howells. New York, Harper [1917] 413 p. illus. MB

962. ——— New York, A. & C. Boni, 1926. 413 p. (The American library)
26-26999 PZ3.H8364S8

963. ——— New York, Dodd, Mead, 1927. xiii, 361 p. illus. 28-2241 PZ3.H8364S9
Includes a Foreword which gives a history of the original and subsequent publications of the book, its reception by critics, and the author's comments about the background of his novel.

964. WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS, 1837-1920

Formal education ended for Howells when he left elementary school to set type for his father's smalltown newspaper in Hamilton, Ohio. Before his death at the age of eighty-three he had refused professorships at Johns Hopkins and Harvard, had received honorary degrees from Columbia, Yale, Oxford, and Princeton, and was familiarly known as the "Dean" of American writers. A partial list of the many experiences by which his education was extended includes: journalism in Ohio; a United States consulship in Venice, where he became an unofficial reporter on European life for newspapers and periodicals at home; a ten-year term as editor-in-chief of The Atlantic Monthly; and a long connection with Harper's Magazine, as an editorial writer and critic. For many of these years he was the friend of the leading writers of his period, as well as the mentor of those who showed promise in his chosen field. Having formulated what was probably the first well-defined theory of literary realism enunciated in the United States, he applied it in a variety of literary forms. These included autobiographical works having Ohio and New England regional interest, critical essays, travel sketches addressed to the contemporary American interest in European culture, and many novels. Naturalistic elements were excluded from the realism of his fiction, which emphasized the commonplace and avoided sordid incidents or a pessimistic philosophy of life. The novels tended, rather, to be decorous if shrewd expressions of the author's reactions to the middle-class life he knew at first hand. Different themes were conspicuous in his novels at different stages in his development. These included courtship and marriage, the impress of Italian civilization on Americans visiting or living in that country, the impact of different social classes on each other in a city such as Boston, and the need of social change in the United States along socialistic lines. Howells' books have been called documents of the cultural and social history of his time.

965. A modern instance. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1882. 514 p. 4-8624 PZ3.H24Mo
A study of married life, and the result of degeneration of the husband's character.

966. ——— 26th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [189-?] 514 p. 4-15124 PZ3.H84Mo26
Fourteenth edition published 1887.
Currently published by Houghton Mifflin in the Riverside college classics series.

967. The rise of Silas Lapham. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [°1884] 515 p.
47-35488 PS2025.R5 1885 RBD
Concerned with Boston society and the relation of a group of the nouveaux riches to certain impoverished aristocrats; popularly considered Howells' best social novel.

968. ——— Centenary ed. With introd. by Booth Tarkington. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1937. xiv, 380 p. 37-9254 PZ3.H84Ri29

969. ——— Introd. by George [Warren] Arms. New York, Rinehart, 1949. xviii, 394 p. (Rinehart editions, 19) 49-4871 PZ3.H84Ri35

970. ——— Introd. by Harry Hayden Clark. New York, Modern Library, 1951. xxii, 324 p. (Modern Library college editions, T56)
51-5402 PZ3.H84Ri37

971. Indian summer. Boston, Ticknor, 1886. 395 p. 7-5771 PZ3.H84In
An international novel portraying American characters living abroad, a theme used also in many of the novels by Henry James. James L. Woodress in his Howells & Italy (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1952. 223 p.) studies the influence on Howells of his life in Italy.

972. ——— New introd. by William M. Gibson. New York, Dutton, 1951. xxii, 317 p. (Everyman's library 654A. Fiction)
51–7375 PZ3.H84In15
Bibliography: p. xxi–xxii.

973. A hazard of new fortunes. New York, Harper [1889] 2 v. MH
An economic novel that introduces the clash in New York between capitalistic interests of industrialists and the interests of workers on various levels; illustrates the author's growing belief in socialism, a development influenced by his study of Tolstoy and other Russian writers.

974. ——— Edinburgh, D. Douglas, 1889. 2 v.
42–32100 PZ3.H84Ha1c

975. ——— Introd. by Alexander Harvey. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1917. 2 v. in 1. (Modern Library of the world's best books)
19–9539 PZ3.H84Ha6

976. ——— New introd. by George Warren Arms. New York, Dutton, 1952. 552 p. (Everyman's library, 646A. Fiction)
52–5309 PZ3.H84Ha10

977. Criticism and fiction. New York, Harper, 1891. 188 p. 18–1642 PN81.H6
Gives Howells' defense of realism in imaginative writing. Everett Carter's Howells and the Age of Realism (Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1954. 307 p.) is a current estimate of realism in the author's work.

978. A traveler from Altruria. New York, Harper, 1894. 318 p. 7–5756 PZ3.H84Tr
With its sequel, Through the Eye of the Needle (1907), this "romance" illustrates the author's concern over paradoxes in American society produced by inequalities of wealth and opportunity. Possible solutions are indicated by comparison with the fictitious Utopian republic of Altruria.

979. Literary friends and acquaintance; a personal retrospect of American authorship. New York, Harper, 1900. viii, 287 p.
0–6798 PS2033.A6 1900
CONTENTS.—My first visit to New England.—First impressions of literary New York.—Roundabout to Boston.—Literary Boston as I knew it.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.—The white Mr. Longfellow.—Studies of Lowell.—Cambridge neighbors.

980. The Leatherwood god. New York, Century, 1916. 236 p. illus.
16–22401 PZ3.H84Le
Regional novel of Ohio before the middle of the 19th century, and the impact on a pioneer community of a man who proclaims himself a god; based on a historical incident.

981. Life in letters. Edited by Mildred Howells. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1928. 2 v. illus. 28–28879 PS2033.A67 1928
A bibliography of the works of William Dean Howells: v. 2, p. 403–409.

982. Selected writings. Edited, with an introd. by Henry Steele Commager. New York, Random House, 1950. xvii, 946 p.
50–9450 PS2022.C6 1950
CONTENTS.—The rise of Silas Lapham (1885).—A modern instance (1882).—A boy's town (1890).—My Mark Twain (1910).

983. Representative selections. Introd., bibliography, and notes, by Clara Marburg Kirk and Rudolf Kirk. New York, American Book Co., 1950. ccv, 394 p. (American writers series).
50–13680 PS2022.K5
Includes a particularly detailed introduction, a bibliography of biographical and critical writings about Howells, and a chronological table of his life and works.

984. HELEN MARIA (FISKE) HUNT JACKSON ("H. H."), 1831–1885

Mrs. Jackson, one of the numerous "literary ladies" active in the 1870's and 1880's, wrote books for children and contributed her "bits" as she called them to the growing literature of travel in Europe and the Far West that was greatly in demand during this period. Her poetry also was admired by her contemporaries, among whom Emerson must be included. She is best remembered now, however, for the writing she did under the impetus of her moral indignation caused by injustices in the treatment of Indians by the United States Government. Some literary interest and curiosity also attach to her connection with Emily Dickinson, and the locale of Amherst, Massachusetts, where both of them were reared and where Mrs. Jackson placed the setting of her novel, Mercy Philbrick's Choice (1876). A short story, "Esther Wynn's Love-Letters," published in the first series of a collection called Saxe Holm's Stories (1874–1878) includes in its plot various incidents that resemble characteristic features of Miss Dickinson's experience.

985. Ramona; a story. Boston, Roberts, 1884. 490 p. 1-1275 PZ3.J143R
Romance that reveals the conflicts of interest between old Spanish and new American elements in California as a result of westward migrations during the middle decades of the 19th century; also eloquently champions California Indians mistreated by Americans. The latter theme was factually developed in the author's historical study, A Century of Dishonor (1881, 1885).

986. HENRY JAMES, 1843-1916

The senior Henry James' "progressive" ideas of education made the son a cosmopolitan in his boyhood, with the result that the younger Henry settled permanently in England while still in his early thirties. By expatriating himself in this way he found an environment more favorable for perfecting his art of writing. The theories he developed and the techniques of writing that he evolved are described in his critical works. These include the early essay, The Art of Fiction (1884), and the prefaces he wrote in 1907-8 for the New York edition of his novels and stories. At one stage of his career he believed drama should be his chosen form of expression. His plays, however, were not successful "theatre," consequently fiction remained his chief medium. The "international" novels and short stories, his most distinctive contribution to American literature, portray Americans of James' own class exposed to tensions resulting from alien standards encountered when they seek for a higher level of social and cultural life in the Old World than that provided by their own country. The author's analysis of motives and actions observed under these conditions was that of an artist who was also profoundly concerned with the ethical and moral issues involved in human relationships. As his friend, William Dean Howells, is called a realist of the commonplace, so James is frequently described as a psychological realist. He also repeatedly treated American characters on their native ground. The latter novels and stories open vistas for viewing the social, intellectual, and ethical qualities he found in life on the eastern seaboard of the United States, notably in New York, Boston, and Newport. In spite of his American origins and interests, James' roots in English life had grown deep during his long residence in England. In 1915, less than a year before his death, he made an act of devotion to the Allied cause in the First World War and to his adopted country by becoming a naturalized British subject.

987. The American. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1877. 473 p. 7-7560 PS2116.A6 1877 RBD
International novel in which an American's wealth does not enable him to overcome the opposition of a conventional French family to his marriage to a daughter of the house.

988. ——— Introd. by Joseph Warren Beach. New York, Rinehart, 1949. 360 p. (Rinehart editions, 16) 49-10371 PZ3.J234Ame3

989. The portrait of a lady. London, Macmillan, 1881. 3 v. 23-319 PS2116.P6 1881 RBD
Appeared originally in Macmillan's Magazine, Oct. 1880-Nov. 1881, and in The Atlantic Monthly, Nov. 1880-Dec. 1881.
Considered the chief novel in James' earlier and more direct manner, the book provides an intellectual and moral representation of an American woman unhappily married to an American expatriate in Europe. While the action takes place abroad, the character of the "lady," rather than the international aspect of the setting, is central in the plot.

990. ——— 18th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1897. 529 p. 5-15127 PZ3.J234Po5
Leon Edel is the editor of a new edition (1956) designed for inclusion in Houghton Mifflin's Riverside classics series.

991. ——— Introd. by Fred B. Millett. New York, Modern Library, 1951. 2 v. in 1. (Modern Library college editions, T47) 51-2261 PZ3.J234Po35
Bibliography: p. xxxvi-xxxvii.

992. The Bostonians. London, Macmillan, 1886. 3 v. 23-165 PS2116.B6 1886 RBD
Originally appeared in the Century Magazine from Feb. 1885 to Feb. 1886; satirical representation of the American passion for good causes, in this case that of women's rights, and the hysterical infatuation of a grown woman for a young girl under her influence; a realistic novel of Boston life in the 1880's, and the author's longest narrative in which the locale and characters are uniformly American.

993. ——— London and New York, Macmillan, 1886. 449 p. 4-15126 PS2116.B6 1886a RBD

994. ——— [Introd. by Philip Rahv] New York, Dial Press, 1945. ix, 378 p. 45-9737 PZ3.J234Bo10
Included also in American Novels and Stories, edited by F. O. Matthiessen (no. 1008).

995. ——— Introd. by Irving Howe. New York, Modern Library, 1956. xxviii, 464 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books [16])
56–5414 PZ3.J234Bo15

996. The wings of the dove. New York, Scribner, 1902. 2 v.
2–20827 PS2116.W5 1902 RBD
International novel in which the designs of an English couple are made of no effect by the nobility of the mortally ill American heroine; frequently called the author's greatest book; written in his noted final style characterized by intricate ideas, delicate perceptions, and implied impressions conveyed through an arrangement of words and sentences that calls for attentive participation from the reader.

997. ——— New York, Scribner, 1945. xxx, 329, 439 p. 45–9835 PZ3.J234Wi10
Published also as number 244 in the Modern Library of the world's best books.

998. The ambassadors. New York, Harper, 1903. 431 p. 3–28287 PS2116.A5 1903 RBD
A novel that was originally published in the North American Review, Jan.–Dec. 1903. The "ambassadors" are portrayed as emissaries of a wealthy woman in Massachusetts, who prevails upon them to undertake a mission to Europe in the hope of persuading a young American to break the ties he has formed with a fascinating French woman, in order to return to manage the family business in America. With The Wings of the Dove and The Golden Bowl this novel forms what has been called a spiritual trilogy in James' last phase.

999. ——— With an introd. by Martin W. Sampson. New York, Harper [c1930] xv, 431 p. (Harper's modern classics)
30–34411 PZ3.J234Amb4
Currently published also in Harper's college edition.

1000. The golden bowl. New York, Scribner, 1904. 2 v. 4–32321 PZ3.J234Go
James' last long novel, in which an international marriage between a fabulously rich American girl and an impoverished Italian nobleman resulted in grievous suffering for all the principal characters.

1001. ——— Introd. by R. P. Blackmur. New York, Grove Press, 1952 [c1932] xxi, 412, 377 p. 52–9331 PZ3.J234Go6

1002. The American scene. New York, Harper, 1907. vi, 442 p. 7–5704 F106.J27 RBD
CONTENTS.—New England: an autumn impression.—New York revisited.—New York and the Hudson: a spring impression.—New York: social notes.—The Bowery and thereabouts.—The sense of Newport.—Boston.—Concord and Salem.—Philadelphia.—Baltimore.—Washington.—Richmond.—Charleston.—Florida.

1003. ——— Edited, with an introd., by W. H. Auden. New York, Scribner, 1946. xxx, 501 p. illus. 46–25289 F106.J273
"Saratoga," "Newport," and "Niagara," taken from Portraits of Places, are added to the contents of this edition.

1004. Novels and tales. New York ed. [New York, Scribner, 1907–17] 26 v.
7–41582 PS2110.F07
Includes numerous revisions of texts and provides a series of prefaces to volumes 1–24. These contain important critical material concerning the structural technique of fiction. The prefaces were afterwards republished in a group, with an introduction by Richard P. Blackmur, as The Art of the Novel (New York, Scribner, 1934. xli, 348 p.). Volume 25, The Ivory Tower, and volume 26, The Sense of the Past, were left unfinished when the author died. They were edited for publication by Percy Lubbock. Volume 26 is lacking in the Library of Congress.

1005. Letters. Selected and edited by Percy Lubbock. New York, Scribner, 1920. 2 v. illus. 20–6773 PS2123.A5 1920

1006. Selected letters. Edited with an introd. by Leon Edel. New York, Farrar, Straus & Cudahy [1955] xxxiv, 235 p. (Great letters series)
55–11183 PS2123.A43

1007. Great short novels. Edited with an introd. & comments by Philip Rahv. New York, Dial Press, 1944. xiii, 799 p.
44–47807 PZ3.J234Gr
CONTENTS.—Madame de Mauves.—Daisy Miller.—An international episode.—The siege of London.—Lady Barberina.—The author of Beltraffio.—The Aspern papers.—The pupil.—The turn of the screw.—The beast in the jungle.

1008. American novels and stories. Edited, and with an introd., by F. O. Matthiessen. New York, Knopf, 1947. xxvi, 993 p.
47–1392 PZ3.J234An
CONTENTS.—The story of a year.—The Europeans.—Washington Square.—The point of view.—A New England winter.—Pandora.—The Bostonians.—"Europe."—Julia Bride.—The jolly corner.—Crapy Cornelia.—A round of visits.—The ivory tower.

1009. Notebooks. Edited by F. O. Matthiessen and Kenneth B. Murdock. New York, Oxford University Press, 1947. xxviii, 425 p.
47–11461 PS2123.A4
CONTENTS.—Chronological list of James' chief publications.—Notebook 1–9.—The 'B. B.' case and 'Mrs. Max.'—Preliminary sketch for The sense of the past.—Project for The ambassadors.

1010. The art of fiction, and other essays; with an introd. by Morris Roberts. New York, Oxford University Press, 1948. xxiv, 240 p.
48–6136 PN3499.J25
PARTIAL CONTENTS.—The art of fiction.—The new novel.—Criticism.—Emerson.

1011. Short stories. Selected and edited, with an introd. by Clifton Fadiman. New York, Modern Library, 1948. xx, 644 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books. Modern Library giants)
48–9351 PZ3.J234Sh4

1012. Ghostly tales. Edited with an introd. by Leon Edel. New Brunswick, Rutgers University Press, 1948 [i. e. 1949] xxxiv, 765 p.
49–7759 PZ3.J234Gh
CONTENTS.—The romance of certain old clothes.—De Grey: a romance.—The last of the Valerii.—The ghostly rental.—Sir Edmund Orme.—Nona Vincent.—The private life.—Sir Dominick Ferrand.—Owen Wingrave.—The altar of the dead.—The friends of the friends.—The turn of the screw.—The real right thing.—The great good place.—Maud-Evelyn.—The third person.—The beast in the jungle.—The jolly corner.

1013. Complete plays. Edited by Leon Edel. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1949. 846 p. illus.
49–10769 PS2111.E4
First collected edition of the complete plays, together with an unfinished scenario and various notes and prefaces. Cf. Foreword, p. 9.

1014. Selected fiction. Edited with an introd. and notes by Leon Edel. New York, Dutton, 1953. xxiv, 609 p. (Everyman's library, 649A. Fiction)
53–8253 PZ3.J234Sb
Bibliography: p. xxi–xxiv.
Includes Daisy Miller, Washington Square, The Aspern Papers, The Pupil, The Beast in the Jungle, The Jolly Corner, and The Art of Fiction, as well as prefaces and additional commentary by James.

1015. Autobiography. Edited with an introd. by Frederick W. Dupee. New York, Criterion Books, 1956. 622 p. illus. 56–6211 PS2123.A3
Brings together James' three autobiographical works: A Small Boy and Others (1913); Notes of a Son and Brother (1914); and The Middle Years, edited by Percy Lubbock (1917)—a collection which greatly enriches the student's understanding of the author, his American beginnings, and the 19th century civilization he portrayed in his novels and other prose writings.

Recent critical works that continue to indicate the important place occupied by James in American literature include the following:

1016. Beach, Joseph Warren. The method of Henry James. [Enl. ed., with corrections] Philadelphia, A. Saifer, 1954. 299 p.
55–1809 PS2124.B4 1954
Consists of the original text of the first edition (1918) but adds a lengthy introduction that reviews recent critical discussions of James' work by Ezra Pound, Van Wyck Brooks, Edmund Wilson, Leon Edel, and others.

1017. Canby, Henry Seidel. Turn west, turn east: Mark Twain and Henry James. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1951. xii, 318 p.
51–14000 PS1331.C25
Bibliography: p. 301–303.

1018. Dupee, Frederick W. Henry James. New York, Sloane, 1951. xiii, 301 p. (The American men of letters series)
51–2012 PS2123.D8

1019. ——— ——— 2d ed., rev. and enl. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1956. 265 p. (Doubleday anchor books, A68)
56–5971 PS2123.D8 1956

1020. Edel, Leon J. Henry James. [v. 1] The untried years, 1843–1870. Philadelphia, Lippincott [1953] 350 p. 53–5421 PS2123.E33
Bibliographical references included in "Notes": [v. 1] p. 345–351.
This is the first part of a study planned for completion in three volumes.

1021. Le Clair, Robert C. Young Henry James, 1843–1870. New York, Bookman Associates, 1955. 469 p. 55–3467 PS2123.L4

1022. Stevenson, Elizabeth. The crooked corridor; a study of Henry James. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 172 p. 49–11903 PS2123.S8
"Bibliographical note": p. 164–166.
Deals with James' fiction.

1023. SARAH ORNE JEWETT, 1849–1909

Mrs. Stowe in her local color sketches and stories of New England sought to preserve the qualities of the region that she believed constituted its greatness and justified its influence in America and "on the civilized world." Writing in the same genre a generation later, Miss Jewett found her inspiration in the coastal countryside of Maine and in the courage, even nobility, of the people living there after the great shipping trade was dead and industries in the towns, or westward migrations, had drawn off many of the most vigorous young people. Miss Jewett's art included the ability to use the beauty of the landscape as a background for the underlying drama in apparently commonplace lives. This effect she achieved with classic economy and restraint.

Clara C. Weber and Carl J. Weber have compiled A Bibliography of the Published Writings of Sarah Orne Jewett (Waterville, Me., Colby College Press, 1949. xi, 105 p. Colby College monographs, no. 18).

1024. Deephaven. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1877. 255 p. 34–25494 PS2132.D4 1877 RBD

A collection of local color stories published earlier in The Atlantic Monthly.

1025. ——— 14th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1885. 255 p. 44–10710 PZ3.J55De2

1026. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1905] 255 p. 5–1185 PZ3.J55De7

1027. The country of the pointed firs. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1896. 213 p. 7–9931 PZ3.J55Co

1028. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin [°1910] 269 p. 10–23633 PZ3.J55Co5

1029. The country of the pointed firs, and other stories. Selected and arr. with a pref. by Willa Cather. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1954. 320 p. (Doubleday anchor books, A26) 54–3594 PZ3.J55Co7

Reprinted in full by arrangement with Houghton Mifflin from The Best Stories of Sarah Orne Jewett (q. v.).

1030. Stories and tales. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [1910] 7 v. A11–1493 PU

1031. The best stories of Sarah Orne Jewett. Selected and arr. with a pref. by Willa Cather. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1925. 2 v. 25–13439 PS2130.A2 1925

At head of title: The Mayflower edition.

1032. GRACE ELIZABETH KING, 1851 or 1852–1932

The complex culture of New Orleans and its surrounding plantations, in which American, French, and Negro elements and dialects were mingled, provided the local color of Miss King's short stories, novels, and histories. These exploited the same material used earlier by G. W. Cable and ministered to the appreciation of Southern regional writing that developed after the Reconstruction period, following the Civil War.

1033. Tales of a time and place. New York, Harper, 1892. 303 p. 4–15133 PZ3.K583T

CONTENTS.—Bayou l'Ombre.—Bonne Maman.—Madrilène; or The festival of the dead.—The Christmas story of a little church.

1034. Balcony stories. New York, Century, 1893. 245 p. illus. 7–12167 PZ3.K583B

1035. ——— New York, Macmillan, 1925. 296 p. illus. 25–19107 PZ3.K583B6

New edition with new stories.

CONTENTS.—The balcony.—A drama of three.—La grande demoiselle.—Mimi's marriage.—The miracle chapel.—The story of a day.—Anne Marie and Jeanne Marie.—A crippled hope.—"One of us."—The little convent girl.—Grandmother's grandmother.—The old lady's restoration.—A delicate affair.—Pupasse.—Grandmamma.—Joe.

1036. New Orleans; the place and the people. New York, Macmillan, 1895. xxi, 404 p. illus. 1–8773 F379.N5K5

1037. Memories of a southern woman of letters. New York, Macmillan, 1932, 398 p. 32–29668 PS2178.A4 1932

1038. SIDNEY LANIER, 1842–1881

Lanier was a musician as well as a poet. Since he believed that the laws governing the two arts were in effect identical, he constantly experimented when writing poetry in an effort to substantiate his thesis. While he is known best for "The Marshes of Glynn," "The Song of the Chattahoochee," and other regional poems celebrating the landscape of his native state, Georgia, his writing also reveals his strong social consciousness. Poems having the latter interest include "Corn," in part a tribute to the dignity of work on the land, and "The Symphony," a protest against over-commercialism in America, with its attendant economic and social evils. In collaboration with his brother he also pioneered in the field of folk poetry written in Negro dialect and in the "Cracker" dialect used by poor whites in Georgia. Although Lanier was a Confederate veteran, who ardently loved the South and whose untimely death may be attributed to hardships suffered during the Civil War and the Reconstruction period, his ultimate loyalty was to the nation as a whole. He did not glorify the old plantation tradition of his native region, but rather, as in his essay "The New South" (1880), he acclaimed the rise of the independent small farmer.

1039. Poems. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1877. 94 p. 4-31102 PS2205.E77
Made up for the most part of poems previously published in Lippincott's Magazine.

1040. ——— Edited by his wife [Mary (Day) Lanier] with a memorial by William Hayes Ward. New York, Scribner, 1884. 252 p. CtY

1041. ——— New ed. New York, Scribner, 1891. xli, 260 p. 4-13827 PS2205.E91

1042. ——— New ed. New York, Scribner, 1916. xli, 262 p. 17-1199 PS2205.F16

1043. ——— New ed. New York, Scribner, 1920. xlii, 262 p. 35-33093 PS2205.F20
Bibliography: p. [xlii].

1044. The science of English verse. New York, Scribner, 1880. xxii, 315 p.
6-24737 PE1505.L2 1880
Exposition of Lanier's theory of prosody and an expression of the 19th century interest in the interrelation of the arts.

1045. ——— New York, Scribner [°1922] xxii, 315 p. illus. (music)
40-23579 PE1505.L2 1922

1046. The centennial edition of the works of Sidney Lanier. [Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1945] 10 v. illus. (incl. music), facsims. (incl. music) A46-2793 PS220.F45
General editor: Charles R. Anderson.
Bibliography, compiled by Philip Graham and Frieda C. Thies: v. 6, p. [377]-412.
Partial Contents.—1. Poems and Poem outlines, edited by C. R. Anderson.—2. The science of English verse and Essays on music, edited by P. F. Baum.—4. The English novel and Essays on literature, edited by Clarence Gohdes and Kemp Malone.—5. Tiger-lilies and Southern prose, edited by Garland Greever, assisted by Cecil Abernethy.—6. Florida and miscellaneous prose, edited by Philip Graham.—7-10. Letters, edited by Charles R. Anderson and Aubrey H. Starke.
First uniform collection of Lanier's poetry and prose; a scholar's edition that includes much previously unpublished or uncollected material.

1047. Selected poems. With a pref. by Stark Young. New York, Scribner, 1947. xvii, 146 p. 47-11957 PS2205.F47

1048. JACK (JOHN GRIFFITH) LONDON, 1876-1916

Jack London read widely, if uncritically, in the works of Karl Marx, Herbert Spencer, and Friedrich Nietzsche. From his reading he derived and reconciled various conflicting doctrines concerning social revolution, biological determinism, and the superman. His Marxist ideas he preached as radical remedies for the social and economic injustice of the time, which the Progressive Movement of the same general period was seeking to remedy by legislation. London's varied experiences in California and elsewhere—among other activities were those of an oyster pirate in San Francisco Bay, a sailor, a mill worker, a seeker for gold in the Klondike, a hobo, and a war correspondent—gave him rich sources for the plots and subjects of some 50 books written in 16 years. The Alaskan frontier in particular provided the locale for some of his most successful short stories. The spectacular success of his fiction resulted from the taste of the time, which demanded romantic adventure stories that he was admirably equipped to write. Naturalism, however, was also an element in his work. It is found in the violence and brutality of his supermen, the struggles of Alaskan Indians and white adventurers to conquer the Northern wilderness, and the grim details which abound in a number of his books. His socialistic tracts, among them War of the Classes (1905) and Revolution and Other Essays (1910) explain his conversion to socialism and illustrate his contribution to it as a cause. These polemical works, as well as his novels and short stories, have been translated into numerous foreign languages and widely read outside the United States.

1049. The son of the wolf. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1900. 251 p.
0-2266. PZ3.L846So
Tales of courage, hardship, and brutality in the Far North, which won recognition for the author.

1050. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1930. 251 p. 31-26194 PZ3.L846So4
Currently published by Houghton Mifflin in the Riverside library series.

1051. The call of the wild. New York, Macmillan, 1903. 231 p. illus. 3–16822 PZ3.L846C2

Story of a dog's return to the joys of freedom and wildness as leader of a wolf pack, recounted with poetic intensity. It is estimated that a million and a half copies were sold before 1945, something that puts the book fairly high among American best-sellers. Currently available from Macmillan, and from Pocket Books, Rockefeller Center, New York, as Pocket Book 593.

1052. The call of the wild and other stories. With an introd. by Frank Luther Mott. New York, Macmillan, 1935. xxxv p., 268 p. illus. (Modern readers' series) 35–27143 PZ3.L846C33

CONTENTS.—The call of the wild.—To build a fire.—The heathen.—The strength of the strong.

1053. The people of the abyss. New York, Macmillan, 1903. xiii, 319 p. illus. 3–26616 HV4088.L8L8 1903a

Issued by the same publisher in 1903 without illustrations.

A brief visit to England gave London the material for attacking the evils of poverty suffered by underprivileged residents of the city of London; a book of propaganda for social betterment.

1054. The sea-wolf. New York, Macmillan, 1904. vii, 366 p. 4–30593 PZ3.L846Se2

The life, brutalities, and miserable end of a sea captain who represents London's interest in primitive "supermen" are mingled in this book with adventure and romance.

Macmillan announces a contemporary edition in the company's catalog for 1954; available also as number 325 from Pocket Books, Rockefeller Center, New York.

1055. The iron heel. New York, Macmillan, 1907. xiv, 354 p. 7–3084 PS3523.J46I7 1907 RBD

Novel describing a hypothetical future organization of capitalistic monopolies in the United States into a fascistic government, its final overthrow by the socialists, and the halcyon period of collectivism that would result.

1056. Martin Eden. New York, Macmillan, 1909. 411 p. 9–22752 PZ3.L846M

Autobiographical novel revealing the torments and struggles experienced by a writer in conflict with conventional social and political standards, particularly with reference to money as the criterion of success. The ultimate suicide of the hero intensifies the effect of grimness and tragedy in the book.

1057. ——— New York, Penguin Books, 1946. 346 p. (Penguin books, 587) 46–8611 PZ3.L846Mar4

1058. Lost Face. New York, Macmillan, 1910. vii, 240 p. 10–6488 PZ3.L846Lo

CONTENTS.—Lost Face.—Trust.—To build a fire.—That Spot.—Flush of Gold.—The passing of Marcus O'Brien.—The wit of Porportuk.

1059. [Novels and tales] New York, Macmillan, 1925–29. 21 v. NNC

On cover: Sonoma edition.

1060. Best short stories. Garden City, N. Y., Sun Dial Press, 1945. 311 p. 45–3930 PZ3.L846Be

1061. EDWIN MARKHAM, 1852–1940

A California shepherd and farm laborer who acquired sufficient education to become a school teacher, Markham awoke to find himself famous upon the publication of his "The Man with the Hoe," a poem in blank verse inspired by Jean François Millet's painting "L'Homme à la Houe." As a protest against the exploitation of the landless laborer, the poem became a sort of focus for humanitarian impulses and the stirrings of social unrest felt in the United States at the turn of the 19th century. It was also widely distributed abroad. The title poem of Markham's Lincoln and Other Poems (New York, McClure, Phillips, 1901. 125 p.) eulogizes Abraham Lincoln as the common man cast in heroic mold.

1062. The man with the hoe, and other poems. New York, Doubleday & McClure, 1899. 134 p. 99–2566 PS2362.M3 1899

1063. Poems, selected and arr. by Charles L. Wallis. New York, Harper, 1950. xviii, 198 p. 50–7489 PS2360.A5W3

1064. JOAQUIN MILLER (CINCINNATUS HINER MILLER), 1839? or 1841?–1913

Miller, a flamboyant American with a flair for the spectacular, went to the Far West in his teens and therefore knew, more intimately than most of his contemporaries, the life of the Pacific Coast in the heyday of its development after 1849. For nearly 40 years he was a prolific miscellaneous writer; but poetry was his chosen form of expression. Songs of the Sierras (1871) includes many of his best poems. His significance comes less from the quality of his writing than because he pioneered as a poet in giving literary expression to the characteristic landscape of a region and to the life of the people who had pioneered in its development. A readable narrative that presents Miller's unusual personality effectively is M. Marion Marberry's biography of the writer, entitled Splendid Poseur (New York, Crowell, 1953. 310 p.).

1065. Life amongst the Modocs: unwritten history. London, R. Bentley, 1873. viii, 400 p.
A22–655 E99.M7M59

Also published under titles: Unwritten History: Life Amongst the Modocs, Hartford, 1874; Paquita, the Indian Heroine, Hartford, 1881; My Own Story, Chicago, 1890; My Life Among the Indians, Chicago, 1892; and Joaquin Miller's Romantic Life Amongst the Red Indians, London, 1898.

1066. Joaquin Miller's poems. [Bear ed.] San Francisco, Whitaker & Ray, 1909–10. 6 v.
9–9533 PS2395.A2 1909

CONTENTS.—v. 1. An introduction, etc.—v. 2. Songs of the Sierras.—v. 3. Songs of the sunlands.—v. 4. Songs of Italy and others.—v. 5. Songs of the American seas.—v. 6. Poetic plays.

1067. Poetical works. Edited with an introd. and notes by Stuart P. Sherman. New York, Putnam, 1923. xii, 587 p.
23–7262 PS2395.A2 1923

Selections.

1068. Overland in a covered wagon; an autobiography. Edited by Sidney G. Firman, illus. by Esther M. Mattson. New York, Appleton, 1930. 129 p.
30–31468 PS2398.A2 1930

Appeared originally as the introduction to the Bear edition of his poems (q. v.). Has been called the most accurate record he left of his life and work; has also been called "useful but untrustworthy."

1069. WILLIAM VAUGHN MOODY, 1869–1910

A humanist and a university teacher of English, Moody in some of his poems reacted against social, economic, and political faults in American life to which his patriotism made him particularly sensitive. Among these poems "An Ode in Time of Hesitation" and "On a Soldier Fallen in the Philippines" reveal his opposition to imperialism in foreign policy. Two prose plays, The Great Divide (1909) and The Faith Healer (1909) are essentially dramas of revolt against the Puritan cast of thought surviving in America and the subservience of the people to what he considered worn-out social laws and customs. In the first play the West is made the symbol of freedom and happiness, the East that of repression. An unfinished trilogy of symbolic plays in verse, of which The Fire-Bringer (1904) was designed as the first part, and The Masque of Judgment (1900) as the second, explores the relation of the soul to God and the ultimate meaning of human life.

1070. Poems and plays. With an introd. by John M. Manly. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1912. 2 v.
12–26319 PS2425.A2 1912

CONTENTS.—1. Poems and poetic dramas.—2. Prose plays.

For reprints of selected poems see the entry that follows immediately. The Great Divide is reprinted in Thomas H. Dickinson's Chief Contemporary Dramatists, 1st ser. (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1915, 1922), p. 283–315. The Faith Healer appears in Arthur H. Quinn's Representative American Plays, 7th ed.

1071. Selected poems. Edited by Robert Morss Lovett. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, ©1931. xcii, 243 p. (Riverside college classics)
31–8586 PS2426.L6

1072. JOHN MUIR, 1838–1914

Muir, who was born in Scotland, became a naturalist, whose predominant interests centered about the geology and botany of America. As a child he was brought to Wisconsin, where he spent a laborious youth on his father's farm. Poverty and hardship, however, did not stifle his increasing joy in nature. This joy developed into the passion that inspired his lifework—that of studying and describing the beauties and wonders of the visible world, particularly the glaciers, mountains, and forests of the Far West. It has been said that, like Robinson Jeffers at a later time, Muir looked at California and knew he had come home. However, he traversed other great areas of the United States on foot, gaining firsthand experiences that he transmitted through books that became popular among substantial sections of the American people. His writings concerning the goodly natural heritage of the country thus became a factor in the growth of a movement for the conservation of forests and the development of national parks. In this movement Muir played a formative part.

1073. The mountains of California. New York, Century, 1894. xiii, 381 p. illus.
Rc–874 F866.M95

1074. ——— Illustrated by preliminary sketches and photographs furnished by the author. New and enl. ed. New York, Century, 1911. xiv, 389 p. 11–12846 F866.M96

1075. Our national parks. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1901. 370 p. illus. 1–26282 E160.M95

1076. ——— New and enl. ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1909. x, 382 p. illus. 9–28411 E160.M954

1077. The Yosemite. New York, Century, 1912. x, 284 p. illus. 12–11005 F868.Y6M9

1078. The story of my boyhood and youth. With illus. from sketches by the author. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1913. 293 p. 13–5573 QH31.M9A35

Deals with the writer's experience of frontier and pioneer life in Wisconsin.

1079. A thousand-mile walk to the Gulf. Large-paper ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1916. xxvi, 219 p. illus. 16–23580 F215.M95

Posthumously published journal kept while making a tour on foot from Indiana to the Gulf of Mexico; includes details of flora, forests, physical geography, and inhabitants of the sections through which he passed. Edited by William F. Badè.

1080. John of the mountains; the unpublished journals of John Muir. Edited by Linnie Marsh Wolfe. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1938. xxii, 459 p. illus. 38–27397 QH105.C2M8

1081. Writings. Sierra ed. [Boston, Houghton, Mifflin, ℗1915–24] 10 v. illus. CtY

Edited by William Frederic Badè, whose Life and Letters of John Muir comprise v. 9–10 of this edition and also of the Manuscript edition.

1082. ——— Manuscript ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1916–24. 10 v. illus. NcD

Edited by William Frederic Badè.

1083. The wilderness world of John Muir. With an introd. and interpretive comments by Edwin Way Teale; illustrated by Henry B. Kane. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1954. xx, 332 p. 54–9040 QH31.M9A37

Selections from Muir's writings.

1084. MARY NOAILLES MURFREE. ("CHARLES EGBERT CRADDOCK"), 1850–1922

Originally published in Lippincott's Magazine and The Atlantic Monthly, Miss Murfree's early local color stories of life in the Cumberland and Great Smoky Mountains of Tennessee won an enthusiastic audience on the score of their originality. These and other stories, subsequently made available in collections, are characterized by meticulous details of dress, food, and manners, by elaborate descriptions of scenery, and by complicated spelling used to reproduce the sound of local dialect. The hardships and loneliness of the segment of the American people known as mountaineers are emphasized.

1085. In the Tennessee mountains, by Charles Egbert Craddock [pseud.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1884. 322 p. 7–4450 PZ3.M943It

1086. ——— 13th ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1886. 322 p. 34–37791 PZ3.M943It13

1087. The prophet of the Great Smoky Mountains, by Charles Egbert Craddock [pseud.] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1885. 308 p. 4–15142 PZ3.M943Pr

1088. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin [℗1913] 308 p. 16–25045 PZ3.M943Pr4

1089. (BENJAMIN) FRANK(LIN) NORRIS 1870–1902

One of the younger novelists encouraged by Howells, Norris was influenced by reading Zola and turned away from realism according to Howells' definitions to evolve his own theories, which led him to pioneer in naturalistic writing. He insisted, however, that only by what he called "romantic" imagination and insight could the novelist penetrate to depths below surface appearances, with which realism, he believed, was concerned. Since the depths included many violent, sordid, and unlovely elements, he asserted that these also were fit subjects for "romantic" writing—a doctrine followed in his own principal works perhaps with undue fidelity. The author's favorite locale was California and his favorite period was the contemporary. Historically it is interesting to note that Norris' endorsement of Dreiser's Sister Carrie won a publisher for that novel some 12 years before the demand for gentility in fiction declined sufficiently to make the book acceptable.

1090. McTeague. New York, Doubleday & McClure, 1899. 442 p.
99-1053 PZ3.N792Ma RBD
Called by the author "a story of San Francisco." The novel portrays the disintegration of character under influence of financial greed.

1091. ——— Introd. by Henry S. Pancoast. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1918. xiv, 442 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books)
23-7733 PZ3.N792Ma3

1092. ——— Edited with an introd. by Carvel Collins. New York, Rinehart, 1950. xix, 324 p. (Rinehart editions, 40)
50-12507 PZ3.N792Ma8
Bibliography: p. xix.

1093. The octopus. New York, Doubleday, Page, 1901. 652 p. (His The epic of the wheat [1]) 1-31483 PS2472.03 1901 RBD
Deals with the war between the wheat grower in California and the railroad trust; shows man at the mercy of forces in society beyond his control; continued in The Pit. Latest reissue by Doubleday and Company, 1947.

1094. The pit. New York, Doubleday, Page, 1903. 421 p. (His The epic of the wheat [2]) 3-1580 PZ3.N792P
Special presentation edition.
Has as its theme the financial ruin of a Chicago speculator when the natural law of growth operates to produce a surplus of wheat. The Wolf, planned as a third volume in the trilogy but never written, was to have centered in the export of wheat for food in famine areas abroad.

1095. ——— New York, Modern Library, 1934. 403 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books) 34-28425 PZ3.N792P10

1096. The responsibilities of the novelist, and other literary essays. New York, Doubleday, Page, 1903. 311 p. 3-23411 PN3324.N6
Includes expositions of Norris' theories of novel writing.

1097. Complete works. New York, Doubleday, Page, 1903. 7 v.
15-22323 PS2470.A2 1903 RBD
Golden Gate edition.

1098. The Argonaut manuscript limited ed. of Frank Norris's works. [Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1928] 10 v. illus.
29-5199 PS2470.A2 1928 RBD

1099. THOMAS NELSON PAGE, 1853-1922

A phenomenon in American life at the close of the Reconstruction period following the Civil War was the shift from an attitude of condemnation of the South, represented in writings by abolitionists, to sentimentality concerning Southern life and its typical institutions. Thomas Nelson Page, American ambassador to Italy and biographer of Robert E. Lee, in his novels, short stories, and essays, romanticized plantation life and the contentment of Negro slaves under the old regime in Virginia. His artistic ability made his works popular in the North as well as in the South, even though his purpose evidently was to leave on record a favorable portrayal of the economic and social order permanently destroyed by the war and its aftermath.

1100. In Ole Virginia. New York, Scribner, 1887. 230 p. 7-35797 PZ3.P154In
Subtitle: Marse Chan and other stories.
CONTENTS.—Marse Chan.—"Unc' Edinburg's drowndin'."—Meh Lady.—Ole 'stracted.—"No haid pawn."—Polly.

1101. ——— Illustrated by W. T. Smedley, B. W. Clinedinst, C. S. Reinhart, A. B. Frost, Howard Pyle, and A. Castaigne. New York, Scribner, 1896. xi, 275 p. 4-15145 PZ3.P145In3

1102. ——— New York, Scribner, 1910. 230 p.
12-31300 PZ3.P145In6

1103. The Old South; essays social and political. New York, Scribner, 1892. ix, 344 p.
3-31223 F206.P13
CONTENTS.—The Old South.—Authorship in the South before the war.—Glimpse of life in colonial Virginia.—Social life in old Virginia before the war.—Two old colonial places.—The old Virginia lawyer.—The want of a history of the southern people.—The Negro question.

1104. ——— With a new pref., by [the author] Chautauqua, N. Y., Chautauqua Press, 1919. viii, 344 p. (Chautauqua home reading series)
19-13150 F206.P135

1105. Red Rock; a chronicle of Reconstruction. New York, Scribner, 1898. xv, 584 p.
98-1252 PZ3.P145Re

1106. Novels, stories, sketches and poems. [Plantation ed.] New York, Scribner, 1906-18. 18 v. illus. 6-39735 PS2510.F06

1107. DAVID GRAHAM PHILLIPS, 1867–1911

For more than a decade Phillips had been a successful journalist, first with the New York Sun, then with the New York World, when free-lance work placed him among the "muckrakers." This term was applied to various writers who were seeking to arouse the country to economic, political, and social abuses that had crept into American life with the spread of industrialism and the growing power of financial tycoons. Between 1901 and 1911, Phillips wrote more than 20 novels. The Deluge (1905) dealt with the manipulation of the stock market by Wall Street magnates; The Plum Tree (1905) had as its theme the machinations of politicians; and Susan Lennox: Her Fall and Rise, posthumously published in 1917, revealed the author's concern about marital problems and the relations of the sexes in American society. Since all of his novels were written to expose and reform wrongs, rather than as literature, they are significant chiefly because they are documents of the social movements of his period.

1108. The great god Success, a novel by J. Graham [pseud.] New York, Stokes, 1901, 299 p.
1–24902 PZ3.P543Gre

Has as its theme the gradual corruption of an honest and able journalist by ambition for power and money.

1109. The second generation. New York, Appleton, 1907. 334 p. 7–4160 PZ3.P543Se

Advances the idea that a rich man's children degenerate under the expectation of their inheritance, but may be restored if forced to earn their own living.

1110. ——— New York, Appleton, 1919. 334 p.
20–16461 PZ3.P543Se9

1111. WILLIAM SYDNEY PORTER ("O. HENRY"), 1862–1910

An author said to have written as many as 65 short stories in one year, O. Henry's mild irony, sentiment, pathos, and humor were expressed in simple vernacular language, frequently interlarded with the slang of the day. He achieved the effects for which he is best known by applying a few formulas to produce unexpected, or trick, endings of human-interest stories dealing with characters as diverse as adventurers in Latin America, Texas ranches, and (preferably) clerks occupying back bedrooms in New York lodging houses. As a raconteur might tell a story in passing, he wrote of comic or tragic episodes in the lives of these otherwise ordinary people. At a time when enthusiasm for the short story was at its height in America, his work was enormously popular. Afterwards, the estimates of his characterizations and thought declined under the rigorous methods of criticism developed in the contemporary period. A recent study of his life and work is E. Hudson Long's O. Henry (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1949. 158 p.).

1112. Cabbages and kings, by O. Henry [pseud.] New York, McClure, Phillips, 1904. 344 p.
4–32750 PZ3.P835C

First published collection of the author's stories. These are concerned with Latin America.

1113. ——— New York, Penguin Books, 1946. 184 p. (Penguin books, 595)
47–18969 PZ3.P835C15

1114. The four million. New York, McClure, Phillips, 1906. 261 p.
6–12856 PZ3.P835F

A collection of the New York stories that includes two of the best known of all the author's stories: "The Gift of the Magi"; and "The Furnished Room."

1115. ——— With a note by Burges Johnson. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1925. xix, 215 p. 25–21919 PZ3.P835F14

At head of title: O. Henry biographical edition.

1116. The voice of the city; further stories of the four million. New York, McClure, 1908. 243 p. 8–17555 PZ3.P835V

Republished from the New York World and Ainslee's Magazine.

1117. ——— With a note by Archibald Sessions. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1925. xii, 222 p. 25–21593 PZ3.P835V11

At head of title: O. Henry biographical edition.

1118. The voice of the city and other stories. A selection, with an introd., by Clifton Fadiman; with illus. by George Grosz. New York, Limited Editions Club, 1935. xi, 220 p.
35–11910 PS2649.P5V6 1935 RBD

1119. Options. New York, Harper, 1909. 323 p.
9–27747 PZ3.P735Op

1120. ——— With a note by Maximilian Foster. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1925. ix, 259 p. 25–23723 PZ3.P835Op10

At head of title: O. Henry biographical edition.

1121. Complete writings. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1917. 14 v. illus.
17–31460 PS2649.P5 1917
Edition de luxe.

1122. Complete works. Foreword by Harry Hansen. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1953. 2 v. (xiii, 1692 p.) 53–6098 PS2649.P5 1953

1123. Selected stories. Edited by C. Alphonso Smith. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1922. xvi, 225 p. 22–11515 PZ3.P835Sel

1124. Best short stories. Selected, and with an introd., by Bennett A. Cerf and Van H. Cartmell. New York, Modern Library, 1945. x, 338 p. (Modern Library of the world's best books)
45–35106 PZ3.P835Be2

1125. The pocket book of O. Henry [pseud.] thirty short stories, edited and with an introd. by Harry Hansen. New York, Pocket Books [1948] xii, 291 p. (Pocket book 510)
48–9815 PZ3.P835Po

1126. JAMES WHITCOMB RILEY, 1849–1916

After "Pike" speech was reproduced effectively by John Hay and Bret Harte in their folk ballads, dialect verses attained a distinct vogue in the United States. The most popular writer in this genre was Riley, whose The Old Swimmin'-Hole and 'Leven More Poems (1883) included pieces first published in the Indianapolis Journal while the writer was on the staff of that newspaper. Not all of his poems were written in dialect, but the most distinctive ones are expressed in an accurate reproduction of the Hoosier speech of his native Indiana. They are poems of sentiment, humor, and pathos that celebrate simple themes drawn from childhood, nature, farm life, and neighborliness among plain people in the Middle West. "When the Frost is on the Punkin," "Little Orphant Annie," and "The Old Man and Jim" are typical of individual poems immediately beloved by a large public, for whom they had the appeal of folk ballads. Riley's reputation was enhanced by his frequent appearance as a reader of his own poems with the humorous lecturer, "Bill" Nye. During the latter part of the 19th century sophisticated as well as less critical audiences delighted in this form of entertainment, which Mark Twain elevated to an art.

1127. Poems and prose sketches. [Homestead ed.] New York, Scribner, 1897–1914. 16 v. (The works of James Whitcomb Riley)
4–13835 PS2700.E97

Among the volumes reissued in this edition those most popular since their first publication include the following: Afterwhiles (1887); Rhymes of Childhood (1890); and Poems Here at Home (1893).

1128. Complete works, in which the poems, including a number heretofore unpublished, are arr. in the order in which they were written, together with photographs, bibliographic notes and a life sketch of the author. Collected and edited by Edmund Henry Eitel. Biographical ed. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1913. 6 v.
13–26127 PS2701.E5
Bibliography: v. 6, p. [409]–466.

1129. Complete works, including poems and prose sketches, many of which have not heretofore been published . . . [Memorial ed.] Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1916. 10 v. (2801 p.) illus.
16–25215 PS2700.F16

1130. Complete poetical works. Pref. by Donald Culross Peattie. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1937. xxix, 886 p. 38–8805 PS2700.F37
Reprint of a reissue of the Biographical edition.

1131. ——— De luxe ed. New York, Garden City Pub. Co., 1941. xxix, 886 p.
41–51661 PS2700.F41
Music: p. 656–657.
A contemporary survey of Riley's place in American literature is provided in the reference that follows.

1132. Nolan, Jeannette (Covert), Horace Gregory, and James T. Farrell. Poet of the people; an evaluation of James Whitcomb Riley. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1951. 106 p.
51–3048 PS2706.N6
CONTENTS.—Riley as a children's poet, by J. C. Nolan.—James Whitcomb Riley, a Victorian American, by H. Gregory.—The frontier and James Whitcomb Riley, by J. T. Farrell.
Essays presented originally as a symposium at Indiana University, in 1949, during the centennial celebration of Riley's birth. Without forgetting the significance in the American scene of ballads and folk poetry and Riley's place in that connection, the essayists were asked to separate the traditions and sentiments surrounding the man from the merits of his work as a poet.

1133. IRWIN RUSSELL, 1853–1879

A minor but authentic poet born in Mississippi, Russell is known for his early use for literary purposes of Negro themes and dialect, through which he showed a sympathetic awareness of Negro character and speech.

1134. Poems. New-York, Century [c1888] xi, 109 p. 11–18675 PS2740.A2 1888
Introduction by Joel Chandler Harris.
Lacks some nine poems included in the collection described in the following entry.

1135. Christmas-night in the quarters, and other poems. With an introd. by Joel Chandler Harris, and an historical sketch by Maurice Garland Fulton. New York, Century, 1917. xxxiv, 182 p. illus. 17–29251 PS2740.A2 1917

1136. CHARLES DUDLEY WARNER, 1829–1900

Warner has been called a transitional figure in American literature. When he wrote of his boyhood, or about his travels in Europe, the Orient, and the United States, or described in familiar essays the joys of nature and a garden, his style was reminiscent of Washington Irving's mellowness and grace. Over the years, however, as the hard-working editor of the Hartford Courant, he developed for other types of writing a vigorous, natural journalistic style suited to the spirit of the late 19th century. His literary criticism, advocating a distinctly American approach, was collected in such volumes as The Relation of Literature to Life (1896) and Fashions in Literature (1902). He expressed a conservative Northern view; nevertheless he used his connection with Harper's Magazine to find a medium of publication for minor Southern authors, such as Grace King. Social criticism in his work is confined chiefly to his novels. One of these, The Gilded Age (1873), was written in collaboration with S. L. Clemens (q. v.). Warner made a genuine contribution to the history of American literature through his general editorship of the first series entitled "American Men of Letters," for which he wrote the volume on Washington Irving, and to literary appreciation in general through his editorial work on the first edition of the Library of the World's Best Literature (New York, Peale & Hill [c1896–c97] 30 v.).

1137. My summer in a garden. Boston, Fields, Osgood, 1871. xii, 183 p.
22–10088 PS3152.M6 1871
Includes an introductory letter by Henry Ward Beecher.

1138. ——— With illus. by F. O. C. Darley. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1898. 212 p.
98–1695 PS3152.M6 1898

1139. Being a boy. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1878. vi, 244p. illus.
CA12–1071 PS3152.B4 1878

1140. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin [c1905] vi, 244 p. illus.
5–33975 PS3152.B4 1905

1141. ——— Boston, Houghton Mifflin [c1919] 186 p. (The Riverside literature series)
38–29713 PS3152.B4 1919
This edition is without the illustrations by Clifton Johnson.

1142. A little journey in the world. New York, Harper, 1889. 396 p.
8–33715 PZ3.W243L
Originally published in Harper's Monthly, as a serial, in 1888; first of a trilogy of novels that includes also The Golden House (1895) and That Fortune (1899), all of which deal with the temptations and difficulties attendant upon the acquisition, possession, and loss of wealth.

1143. ——— New York, Harper, 1894. 396 p. (Harper's Franklin Square library, no. 747)
13–12913 PZ3.W243L2

1144. Complete writings. [Backlog ed. Edited by Thomas R. Lounsbury] Hartford, Conn., American Pub. Co., 1904. 15 v. illus.
4–32205 PS3150.A2 1904

1145. OWEN WISTER, 1860–1938

A Pennsylvania-born graduate of Harvard University, Wister utilized several trips West in search of health to provide him with material for his stories of cowpunchers, combined in Lin McLean (1898), and also used for his later successful novel, The Virginian. Both books illustrated the repeated return of American writers to themes drawn from pioneer or rugged life in the West, and also capitalized on an interest in the strenuous life that was abroad in the land during the presidency of Theodore Roosevelt. Mr. Wister's strong, plain heroes and their refined brides of the 1870's and 1880's, surrounded by dangers and inevitable adventures in the great open spaces of the Wyoming cattle country of that time, appealed to the American taste of the period for novels of action that were at the same time highly romantic. A survival of this interest may be seen in the contemporary popularity of the "western." Lady Baltimore (1906), a novel of society in Charleston, South Carolina, about the turn of the 19th century, is treated with a light touch and sympathetic delicacy.

1146. The Virginian; a horseman of the plains. New York, Macmillan, 1902. xiii, 504 p.
2–14431 PZ3.W768V

1147. ——— New ed. With . . . drawings from western scenes by Frederic Remington. New York, Macmillan, 1911. xv, 506 p.
11–26412 PZ3.W768V10

1148. ——— With an introd. by Struthers Burt and illus. by William Meyers. Los Angeles, Printed for members of the Limited Editions Club by the Plantin Press, 1951. xix, 437 p.
51–37493 PS3345.V5 1951 RBD

For a current publication of The Virginian see the New pocket classics series, issued by Macmillan.

1149. CONSTANCE FENIMORE WOOLSON, 1840–1894

Following the pattern set by her great-uncle, James Fenimore Cooper, Miss Woolson called her shorter pieces "sketches." They are, in fact, early and exceptionally realistic local color stories, chiefly about life around the Great Lakes (in Ohio and Michigan) and in the South, where the writer became familiar with characteristic localities in Florida, the Carolinas, and Virginia. Her work was welcomed by editors of the best periodicals at the time that Bret Harte's stories were in vogue. It won sufficient recognition to be republished later in collections and has given her a secure place among regional writers of the 1870's and 1880's. Several novels, written after she left the United States to live in Italy, are increasingly concerned with psychological problems resulting from the interplay of character and circumstance, an interest that Miss Woolson may have developed from her mentor, Henry James.

1150. Castle Nowhere: lake-country sketches. Boston, J. R. Osgood, 1875. 386 p.
8–37232 PZ3.W888C

1151. Rodman the keeper: southern sketches. New York, Appleton, 1880. 339 p.
8–37226 PZ3.W888R

Originally published in The Atlantic Monthly, Appletons' Journal, and other periodicals; stories of the South under Reconstruction. Written with sympathy but also objectivity by a Northerner, they are said to have influenced the development in the North of interest in Southern literature.

1152. Constance Fenimore Woolson; arr. and edited by Clare Benedict. London, Ellis, 1932. xvi, 560 p. illus 32–22803 PS3360.A5B4

Bibliography begun by the author and completed by the editor: p. 550–553.

A reprint of volume 2 of Clare Benedict's larger work, Five Generations (London, Ellis [1930?] 3 v.). Includes part of an article dealing with Miss Woolson, taken from Henry James' Partial Portraits (1888), together with extracts from her correspondence, articles, and miscellaneous writings. In Appendix A, p. 413–549, is found a selection of her poems and stories.

E. The First World War and the Great Depression (1915–1939)

Between April 1917 and November 1918, some two million soldiers went to Europe to take their country's part in a world war. The aftermath of that war was a decade of inflated prosperity leading to an orgy of speculation on the stock market, which in turn was followed by a depression so severe as to create an army of unemployed that numbered, according to various estimates, between 12 and 15 million former workers. It is not surprising that war and financial collapse, twin peaks of disaster, should mark the period as one in which frustration, disillusionment, pessimism, and cynicism colored American attitudes. No more surprising is the fact that each crisis colored the period in its own way, so that, except for purposes of convenience, it might be regarded legitimately as two periods. First, with the rapidly accelerating tempo of life in the twenties, a decade became an age, the "Jazz Age," filled with speed, excitement, and self-expression. These characteristic manifestations of the spirit of the time inevitably were reflected in literature. But later when the depression struck, American writing took on an increasingly serious tone and many writers accepted the theory that all literature should have a message for a world that was in sore trouble. Seriousness and social reform became the watchwords.

Although the messages to be found in much of the best writing done in the 19th century in the United States were still applicable, and were in fact rediscovered and reiterated by the not always original moderns, the "genteel" book was vigorously rejected on the score of prudery and hypocrisy. A generation, in which emotions of fear and uncertainty engendered by war had been fostered by economic misfortune, found little that was congenial in the Puritan heritage of respectability and gentility founded on solid prosperity. Observation of crass materialism and injustices to minority or underprivileged groups gave rise to strong social indignation. A climate of liberal opinion arose that was favorable to social and economic reforms instituted within the period.

During the same span of time the country also felt an impact from the acceleration of other forces already operating to change its way of life. Science and invention had replaced horses with horsepower, and registered automobiles in the United States rose to a number nearly equal to one for every five Americans. The populace, so far as it was able, took to the roads. These roads in turn were extended and improved to carry the constantly increasing volume of traffic to which the restlessness of the "Jazz Age" contributed. When distances were too great to make motoring feasible, communication across state and national boundaries was made possible by a growing system of telephones. Radio programs broadcast identical information and entertainment over wide areas. The powerful motion picture industry, offering its wares in local theaters from one end of the country to another, created a kind of mass sophistication that had its own effects on manners, morals, and customs, as did the inexpensive magazines sold across the land. By the end of the period, travel by airplane had become as common as travel by automobile had been at its beginning. All these facilities for mobility and easy communication of ideas contributed greatly to a modification of the sectionalism that had up to this time been present in American culture. Provincialism also decreased with the emergence of the United States as a great power among the nations of the world. Reciprocity of esthetic and philosophical ideas between Europe and America increased, with notable effects on American literature.

The growing complexity of American life at this time had its counterpart in the literature produced in the years between the coming of the First World War and the end of the country's worst depression. The ever-present struggle of man with his environment and his dissatisfaction with the state of being "a stranger and afraid, in a world I never made" found their most complete expression in fiction. Realism, so characteristic of novels and stories written in the preceding period, continued as a prevailing trend, which, however, tended to shade into pessimistic, behavioristic naturalism, exemplified by the work of Theodore Dreiser and James T. Farrell, or the more complex, "Freudian" naturalism of Sherwood Anderson or William Faulkner. Social criticism as a factor in literature became a prime force in the thirties, when almost all literature was for a while judged in terms of its message and social value. All this is not to say, however, that writing according to an older and more conventional pattern did not win wide approval during the period. Regionalism, with new social and spiritual overtones, was present in the novels of Ellen Glasgow and Willa Cather. Historical novels portraying America's past continued to attract enthusiastic audiences and became, with the trend toward more and more realism, frequently the product of research as careful as that traditionally lavished only on definitive history.

Among the most startling literary developments of a period in which so many men were ill at ease was the rebirth of interest in the art of poetry, despite its decline in market sales. Here again, as in the case of fiction, experimentation and to some extent realism were at the heart of the revival; but experimentation as well as realism took many forms and progressed through various degrees: Edwin Arlington Robinson and Robert Frost, using conservative poetic forms for freshly realistic and occasionally hardbitten portraits and utterances, which assumed, particularly in the work of Frost, symbolic dimensions; Carl Sandburg, Vachel Lindsay, and Edgar Lee Masters, each with a new rhythm and a different slant on "the American Dream"; Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, Wallace Stevens, E. E. Cummings, and William Carlos Williams, in each of whom experimentalism reached a highly personal poetic style in an effort to express the individual human condition in its universal proportions and significance. This experimental movement, with its numerous cross-currents of schools, fostered by a succession of "little magazines" which frequently represented also new philosophical, social, and economic views, developed a surprising number of poets. These joined the novelists in making themselves felt as social critics no less than as creative artists. Whatever value time may place eventually on the work of poets writing in this era, the fact remains that it constitutes a second renaissance of poetry in the development of American literature.

Emphasis inevitably has been placed on prose fiction and poetry, in which much of the best work of the period was done. However, Eugene O'Neill, America's leading playwright, wrote all but a very few of his plays during these years, and a number of other playwrights produced works of literary as well as theatrical distinction. Outstanding work in other forms also was produced, notably in humor, the general essay, and criticism, which now entered the field as literature in its own right. Criticism has not been represented in this section, except when the author has been included for his other work, but critical writings have received detailed treatment in the chapter devoted to Literary History and Criticism.

1153. LÉONIE ADAMS, 1899–

As a lyric poet Miss Adams has won immediate and continuing recognition from critics for her mastery of technical poetic forms, new and old; for her sensitive response to nature; and for the mystical quality in her perceptions.

1154. Poems: a selection. New York, Funk & Wagnalls, 1954. 128 p.
54–6356 PS3501.D285A6 1954
Part II of this volume (p. 52–124) includes poems previously published in the poet's earlier works: Those Not Elect (1925) and High Falcon (1929).

1155. SAMUEL HOPKINS ADAMS, 1871–

Adams is probably best known for his fiction, much of which depicts 19th-century life in the Erie Canal area of New York State. Conservative and "victorian" in approach, as in the novel Siege (1924), he has often tried to infuse a degree of modernism in his work, as in Plunder (1948), a fictional-political commentary which is a satirical account, in a highly conversational style, about a crude, star-spangled-American demagogue who almost becomes dictator. He has also written short stories, as in From a Bench in Our Square (1922), which deals with New York City, where he was for some time a journalist. He has also published a number of biographies, works of history, commentary, and juvenile books. He was early associated with the muckraking movement and wrote The Great American Fraud (1906, 1905), an influential revelation of medical quackery at the turn of the century. His later work tends to be pervaded by a gentle humor.

1156. Revelry. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1926. 318 p. 26–21303 PZ3.A217Re2
A novel about the political corruption in Washington during the Harding administration.

1157. Canal town. New York, Random House, 1944. 465 p. 44–40112 PZ3.A217Can
A novel evoking Palmyra, N. Y., in 1820.

1158. Banner by the wayside. New York, Random House, 1947. 442 p.
47–1795 PZ3.A217Ban
A novel centering about a group of entertainers touring the Erie Canal area in the mid-nineteenth century.

1159. Sunrise to sunset. New York, Random House, 1950. 373 p.
50–7919 PZ3.A217Sv
A novel using a setting in and around the cotton mills of Troy, New York, in the 1830's.

1160. Grandfather stories. New York, Random House, 1955. 312 p.
55–6657 PZ3.A217Gr
A retelling of memories of the Erie Canal country as told to the author by his grandfathers; depicts early 19th-century New York State.

1161. CONRAD POTTER AIKEN, 1889–

Poet, novelist, short story writer, and critic, Conrad Aiken's work has been influenced by Freudian concepts, the writings of James Joyce, and the stream-of-consciousness technique in general. His novels in particular illustrate these influences. His poetry is characterized by a melodic quality indicative of his interest in the relation between poetry and music. In 1930 he received the Pulitzer prize for poetry for his Selected Poems (1929).

1162. Blue voyage. New York, Scribner, 1927. 318 p. 27–15974 PZ3.A2912Bl
Using the stream-of-consciousness technique, Aiken has in this novel produced a study of life as presented to the mind of a writer on a transatlantic liner.

1163. Great circle. New York, Scribner, 1933. 335 p. 33–12047 PZ3.A2912Gr
A psychological novel centering about a man whose wife has been having a love affair with his friend. Meetings with a psychoanalyst are introduced to trace the origin of the main character's present situation.

1164. Short stories. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1950. 416 p.
50–9750 PZ3.A2912Sh

1165. Ushant, an essay. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1952. 365 p.
52–9071 PS3501.I5Z53
A psychoanalytic autobiography of the poet, reconstructed in a series of flashbacks.

1166. Collected poems. New York, Oxford University Press, 1953. 895 p.
53–9180 PS4501.I5A17 1953

This collection contains those poems which Aiken wished to preserve. They are arranged approximately in order of composition, rather than of publication. The poems selected are from previous volumes such as Turns and Movies (1916), Punch: The Immortal Liar (1921), John Deth, a Metaphysical Legend (1930), The Coming Forth by Day of Osiris Jones (1931), Preludes for Memnon (1931), Landscape West of Eden (1934), Time in the Rock (1936), And in the Human Heart (1940), Brownstone Eclogues (1942), The Soldier (1944), The Kid (1947), and The Divine Pilgrim (1949).

1167. HERVEY ALLEN, 1889–1949

Diarist and fiction writer of World War I, and a leader among those who fostered a rebirth of interest in the art of poetry in the South, Mr. Allen was also the author of the scholarly biography, Israfel; the Life and Times of Edgar Allan Poe (1926). He is better known, however, for his influence in advancing the vogue of the historical novel in America.

1168. Carolina chansons; legends of the low country, by Du Bose Heyward and Hervey Allen. New York, Macmillan, 1922. 131 p.
22–24847 PS3515.E98C3 1922

1169. Anthony Adverse; decorations by Alla McNab. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1933. 1224 p. 33–27189 PZ3.A4264An
Picaresque novel which spans the life of the hero in Europe, Africa, and America, from 1775 to 1825; some two million copies have been sold.

1170. Toward the flame; a war diary. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1934. 282 p.
34–4704 D570.9.A53 1934

1171. The forest and the fort. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1943. 344 p.
43–4731 PZ3.A4264Fo
First of three parts of a historical novel planned in five parts. The series, left incomplete by the author's death, was, with a fragment of the fourth part, edited by Julie Eidesheim and published as The City in the Dawn (1950). Its theme is 18th-century pioneer life on the American frontier.

1172. MAXWELL ANDERSON, 1888–

This dramatist's interests vary from satirizing political corruption in the United States, as in Both Your Houses (1933), which won the Pulitzer prize, to recreating for American audiences episodes in their British and European heritage, as in Elizabeth the Queen (1930), Mary of Scotland (1933), and Joan of Lorraine (1946; rev. ed. 1947). One of the more important influences of some thirty-odd plays he has written in as many years is the interest they have created in the use of poetry as a dramatic medium on the stage.

1173. Winterset; a play in three acts. Washington, Anderson House, 1935. 134 p.
35–27431 PS3501.N256W5 1935a
Deals with the problem of justice and reflects a more universal aspect of his earlier interest in the Sacco-Vanzetti case, which inspired his Gods of the Lightning (1928).

1174. Eleven verse plays, 1929–1939. [New York] Harcourt, Brace, 1940. [1321] p.
40–27679 PS3501.N256 1940
CONTENTS.—Elizabeth the queen.—Night over Taos.—Mary of Scotland.—Valley Forge.—Winterset.—The Wingless victory.—High Tor.—The masque of kings.—The feast of ortolans.—Second overture.—Key Largo.

1175. Off Broadway. New York, Sloane, 1947. 91 p. 47–30369 PN2021.A54
Collection of critical essays and lectures; see particularly "Poetry in the Theater," p. 47–54, and "The Uses of Poetry," p. 87–91, for Mr. Anderson's theories concerning the place of poetry in the contemporary theater.

1176. Barefoot in Athens. New York, Sloane, 1951. 101 p. 51–13750 PS3501.N256B27
Freedom of opinion in relation to democracy, the theme of the play, gives timeliness to this dramatic presentation of the life and death of Socrates at the end of the fifth century, B. C., in Athens.

1177. Bad seed; a play in two acts. The dramatization of William March's novel, The bad seed. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1955. 96 p.
55–7822 PS3505.A53157B36
William March is the pseudonym of William Edward March Campbell (1893–1954), an Alabama author of short stories and novels.

1178. SHERWOOD ANDERSON, 1876–1941

Short stories, novels, and autobiographical works, most successful when dealing with small-town life in Ohio, ca. 1880–1910, were used by the author to express his pessimism concerning the fate of simple people, adjusted to primitive conditions derived from the pioneer period in rural America, who are defeated or frustrated by forces at work in a society rapidly becoming industrialized. Anderson's work is characterized by frankness of expression in advance of his time, by a mystical faith in the life force in man, and by introspection almost psychoanalytical in quality.

1179. Winesburg, Ohio. New York, Huebsch, 1919. 303 p. 19–17477 PZ3.A55Win
Short stories.

1180. Poor white; a novel. New York, Huebsch, 1920. 371 p. 20–27471 PZ3.A55Po PS3501.N4P6

1181. The triumph of the egg; a book of impressions from American life in tales and poems. New York, Huebsch, 1921. 269 p. 21–21097 PZ3.A55Tr

1182. A story teller's story; the tale of an American writer's journey through his own imaginative world and through the world of facts, with many of his experiences and impressions among other writers—told in many notes—in four books—and an epilogue. New York, Huebsch, 1924. 442 p. 24–27699 PS3501.N4Z5

1183. Dark laughter. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1925. 319 p. 25–20829 PZ3.A55Da
The title refers to the vital laughter of the unrepressed Negroes in the background of this novel about sterility and frustration in the machine age. This story of the Midwest is written with a stream-of-consciousness technique.

1184. Tar, a Midwest childhood. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1926. 346 p. 26–22222 PS3501.N4Z52

1185. The portable Sherwood Anderson, edited, and with an introd., by Horace Gregory. New York, Viking Press, 1949. 631 p. (The Viking portable library) 49–856 PS3501.N4A6 1949
Includes among numerous selections Death in the Woods (1933), p. 532–548, considered by the editor of this collection the masterpiece among Anderson's short stories.

1186. Sherwood Anderson's memoirs. [New York] Harcourt, Brace, 1942. 507 p. 42–11377 PS3501.N4Z49

1187. Letters; selected and edited with an introd. and notes by Howard Mumford Jones, in association with Walter B. Rideout. Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 479 p. 52–12649 PS3501.N4Z54

1188. Howe, Irving. Sherwood Anderson. New York, Sloane, 1951. xiii, 271 p. (The American men of letters series) 51–9927 PS3501.N4Z65
"Bibliography": p. 257–260.

1189. Schevill, James Erwin. Sherwood Anderson, his life and work. [Denver] University of Denver Press, 1951, xvi, 360 p. illus. 51–10225 PS3501.N4Z8
Bibliography: p. 356–357.

1190. SHALOM ASCH, 1880–

Asch is a Polish-born commentator on Jewish life and problems. His cycle of novels on Biblical themes—The Nazarene (1939), The Apostle (1943), Mary (1949), and The Prophet (1955)—has enjoyed wide circulation in the United States, where the author, although long a naturalized citizen, continues to write in Yiddish and to have his books translated for the American audience. One of his recurring themes, illustrated by the titles below, is the adjustment of Jewish immigrants to the new environment encountered in the United States, usually in an urban setting such as New York City. The author has also dealt with problems of Jewish life abroad, as in Three Cities (1933), a trilogy dealing with Jews in Russia.

1191. The mother; authorized translations by Elsa Krauch. New York, Putnam, 1937. 295 p. 37–28739 PZ3.A798Mo6
An earlier version was published in 1930 in a translation by Nathan Ausübel.

1192. Three novels: Uncle Moses, Chaim Lederer's return, Judge not—; translation by Elsa Krauch. New York, Putnam, 1938. 176, 116, 127 p. 38–29527 PZ3.A798Thr
Written originally between 1916 and 1923.

1193. East River, a novel. Translation by A. H. Gross. New York, Putnam, 1946. 438 p. 46–7365 PZ3.A798Eas

1194. A passage in the night. New York, Putnam, 1953. 367 p. 53–8146 PZ3.A798Pas

1195. Lieberman, Herman. The Christianity of Sholem Asch, an appraisal from the Jewish viewpoint. [From the Yiddish, by Abraham Burstein] New York, Philosophical Library, 1953. 276 p. 53–11659 PJ5129.A8Z783

1196. MARY (HUNTER) AUSTIN, 1868–1934

A writer with a strong local interest in the Indian culture of the Southwest, particularly in California and New Mexico, Mrs. Austin left an autobiographical record of her varied literary career in Earth Horizon (1932). The American Rhythm (1923, enl. ed., 1930) expounds her idea that the American environment and way of life determine the verse forms suited to poems written in the United States. It includes also an anthology of her "re-expressions" of native Indian verse.

1197. The land of little rain. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1903. 280 p. 3–26358 F786.A93
Short stories.

1198. One-smoke stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1934. 294 p.
34–27071 PZ3.A9373On

1199. PHILIP BARRY, 1896–1949

While Barry's recognized genre was that of the social comedy, in which he had numerous successes on the stage, his plays also provide penetrating studies of marriage as an institution, the relation of parents to children, and other important aspects of American family life. Hotel Universe (1930), a symbolic play on the mystic power of goodness in a man considered by the world to be insane, is one of his most serious dramatic works.

1200. Holiday, a comedy in three acts. New York, S. French, 1929. 205 p.
29–7881 PS3503.A648H6 1929

1201. The animal kingdom, a comedy. New York, S. French, 1932. 198 p.
32–17483 PS3503.A648A8 1932

1202. The Philadelphia story; a comedy in three acts. New York, Coward-McCann, 1939. 206 p. 40–11146 PS3503.A648P5 1939a

1203. Second threshold; with revisions and a pref. by Robert E. Sherwood. New York, Harper, 1951. 132 p. 51–10938 PS3503.A648S4 1951
A play.

1204. SAMUEL NATHANIEL BEHRMAN, 1893–

Behrman began by writing "pure" comedy. Faced by the turmoil of the thirties, he began in his plays to explore the possibility of comedy in our time and produced comedies reflecting the more serious issues of the period. In recent years he has adapted a number of foreign plays, written reminiscences of his childhood in Worcester, Massachusetts, and he has also published a humorous, perceptive biography of an art dealer: Duveen (1952).

1205. Biography, a comedy. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1933. 241 p.
33–4065 PS3503.E37B5 1933

1206. Three plays: Serena Blandish, Meteor, The second man. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1934. 355 p. 34–6070 PS3503.E37T5 1934

1207. Rain from heaven, a play in three acts. New York, Random House, 1935. 250 p.
35–2998 PS3503.E37R3 1935

1208. End of summer. New York, Random House, 1936. 256 p.
36–7652 PS3503.E37E6 1936

1209. No time for comedy. New York, Random House, 1939. 216 p.
39–14726 PS3503.E37N6 1939

1210. The Talley method, a play in three acts. New York, Random House, 1941. 197 p.
41–8550 PS3503.E37T3 1941

1211. The pirate. New York, Random House, 1943. xii, 209 p. plate.
43–51114 PS3503.E37P5
A play.

1212. Jane. New York, Random House, 1952. 195 p. 52–8279 PS3503.E37J3

1213. The Worcester account. New York, Random House, 1954. 239 p.
53–5014 PS3503.E37Z53
Reminiscences.

1214. ROBERT CHARLES BENCHLEY, 1889–1945

A successful journalist and drama critic, Benchley achieved his greatest prominence as a comedian working through short films and radio appearances, as well as through his numerous humorous articles, which were originally written mainly for periodicals, and later collected in volumes such as Of All Things (1921), Love Conquers All (1922), Pluck and Luck (1925), The Early Worm (1927), The Treasurer's Report, and Other Aspects of Community Singing (1930), and From Bed to Worse; or, Comforting Thoughts about the Bison (1934). The titles themselves reflect the literate, verbal nonsense which was his specialty. His gentle satire (of which he himself was the main target) encompassed a broad range of topics, chiefly concerned with everyday affairs such as pigeon persecution, music interpretation, and the menace of buttered toast. Selections from earlier volumes appeared in Inside Benchley (1942), Benchley—Or Else! (1947), and The Benchley Roundup (1954). An additional element of humor was given the Benchley books by the many illustrations supplied by Gluyas Williams.

1215. 20,000 leagues under the sea; or, David Copperfield. New York, Holt, 1928. 233 p. illus. 28–31116 PS3503.E49T8 1928

1216. No poems; or, Around the world backwards and sideways. New York, Harper, 1932. 330 p. illus. 32–34924 PS3503.E49N6 1932

1217. My ten years in a quandary, and how they grew. New York, Harper, 1936. 361 p. illus. 36–9634 PS3503.E49M9 1936

1218. After 1903—what? New York, Harper, 1938. 271 p. illus. 38–2530 PS3503.E49A7 1938

1219. Benchley beside himself. New York, Harper, 1943. 304 p. illus. 43–8712 PS3503.E49B4

1220. Chips off the old Benchley. New York, Harper, 1949. 273 p. illus. 49–10872 PS3503.E49C5

1221. Benchley, Nathaniel. Robert Benchley, a biography. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1955. 258 p. illus. 55–10402 PS3503.E49Z6

1222. STEPHEN VINCENT BENÉT, 1898–1943

As a poet, novelist, and short story writer, Benét made use of themes drawn from American history and folklore. In his poetry he often adapted forms from folk ballads, a device he used also in the varying metrics of his Civil War epic, John Brown's Body (1928), which was awarded a Pulitzer prize and which has been called the most popular long poem of the century. His posthumous Western Star (1943), celebrating the English settlements at Jamestown and Plymouth, constitutes book one of an incomplete narrative poem about the western migration of peoples. As a short-story writer Benét is probably best known for The Devil and Daniel Webster (1937), which has practically become a part of New Hampshire folklore, and which was made into a successful movie and also used to produce a libretto for an opera by Douglas Moore (b. 1893). Benét's first two novels, The Beginning of Wisdom (1921) and Young People's Pride (1922), were stories of developing young authors, and they showed the influence of F. Scott Fitzgerald. The third novel of his youthful period was Jean Huguenot (1923), which dealt with the problem of a woman's values in life. Spanish Bayonet (1926), which is probably his best-known novel, is a story of the development of Florida, with the Revolutionary War period for temporal background. In America (1944) Benét produced a short, popular history of this country from its founding to Pearl Harbor. Also published posthumously was The Last Circle (1946), in which his wife, Rosemary Carr Benét (b. 1900), collected stories and poems not appearing in previous volumes and for the most part written in the last few years of the author's life.

1223. James Shore's daughter. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1934. 277 p. 34–15494 PZ3.B4292Jam

A novel in which the main attempt is to recreate the spirit of the times of the late 19th and the opening decades of the 20th centuries in America.

1224. Selected works. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1942. 2 v. 42–15523 PS3503.E5325A6 1942

The first volume is devoted to Benét's poetry. In addition to the epic poem John Brown's Body (1928), it includes material from the author's earlier volumes, Young Adventure (1918), Heavens and Earth (1920), Tiger Joy (1925), Ballads and Poems, 1915–1930 (1931), and Burning City (1936). The second volume is devoted to his prose; in addition to the complete novel, Spanish Bayonet (1926), it includes short stories under the three headings of "Stories of American History," "Tales of Our Time," and "Fantasies and Prophecies." Benét's earlier collections of short stories were Thirteen O'Clock (1937) and Tales Before Midnight (1939).

1225. JOHN PEALE BISHOP, 1892–1944

Bishop's poetry, criticism, general essays, reviews of poetry, and miscellaneous articles, published posthumously in collected editions, contribute to an understanding of forces that impinged upon American society between two world wars and that were reflected in the literature of the period. He wrote in a style formed by his taste for classic restraint, substantial values, decorum, and elegance. William Butler Yeats and T. S. Eliot were formative influences in the development of his poetical work. Bishop also produced some distinguished fiction: notably, Many Thousands Gone (New York, Scribner, 1931. 282 p.), a volume of short stories dealing with the South during the Civil War period, and Act of Darkness (New York, Scribner, 1935. 368 p.), a novel which reflects life in a West Virginia town early in the 20th century.

1226. Collected essays. Edited with an introd. by Edmund Wilson. New York, Scribner, 1948. 508 p. 48–8528 PS3503.I79A16 1948

This volume is divided into ten sections: "Essays," "Painters," "Moving Pictures," "Novelists of the Twenties," "Novelists of the South," "Poetry Reviews," "Miscellaneous Articles," "Aphorisms and Notes," "Portraits of Places," and "Stories." The last section does not constitute a collection of his short stories, for none of those in Many Thousands Gone (vide supra) are included.

1227. Collected poems. Edited with a pref. and a personal memoir by Allen Tate. New York, Scribner, 1948. 277 p.
48–4117 PS3503.I79A17 1948

This volume contains many poems previously unpublished or published only outside the earlier volumes of the author's poetry, as well as reprinting the contents of Green Fruit (1917), Now with His Love (1933), Minute Particulars (1935), and the new material in Selected Poems (1941).

1228. RICHARD PALMER BLACKMUR, 1904–

By his own experience as a poet Blackmur is exceptionally well-qualified to analyze, interpret, and criticize the language and accomplishments of poets such as Emily Dickinson, Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, Wallace Stevens, Marianne Moore, and E. E. Cummings. An insight into his critical methods and purposes may be gained from "A Critic's Job of Work," an essay found in The Double Agent and also in Language as Gesture.

1229. The double agent; essays in craft and elucidation. New York, Arrow Editions, 1935. 302 p. 35–31958 PS324.B6

1230. From Jordan's delight [poems] New York, Arrow Editions, 1937. 105 p.
37–4180 PS3503.L266F7 1937

1231. The expense of greatness. New York, Arrow Editions, 1940. 305 p.
40–34148 PR473.B56

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—The craft of Herman Melville: a putative statement.—A note of Yvor Winters.—The composition in nine poets: 1937.—Nine poets: 1939.—The letters of Marian Adams.—The expense of greatness: three emphases on Henry Adams.

1232. The second world [poems] Cummington, Mass., Cummington Press, 1942. 29 p.
42–17666 PS3505.L266S4

1233. Language as gesture; essays in poetry. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1952. 440 p.
52–6451 PN1055.B55

1234. The lion and the honeycomb; essays in solicitude and critique. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. 309 p. 55–5638 PS121.B59

1235. Anni mirabiles, 1921–1925: reason in the madness of letters; four lectures presented under the auspices of the Gertrude Clarke Whittall Poetry and Literature Fund. Washington, Reference Dept., Library of Congress, 1956. 55 p.
56–60048 PN771.B56

A discussion of European and American literature of the twenties.

1236. LOUISE BOGAN, 1897–

Throughout Louise Bogan's career critics have ascribed to her poetry excellence of form, traditional lyric quality, originality, and sustained power. Her scholarship in literary criticism, particularly with reference to poetry, is evidenced in frequent contributions to journals and in her Achievement in American Poetry, 1900–1950 (1951).

1237. Collected poems, 1923–1953. New York, Noonday Press, 1954. 126 p.
54–9946 PS3503.O195A17 1954

The material in this volume is mostly derived from the author's earlier books of poetry: Body of This Death (1923), Dark Summer (1929), The Sleeping Fury (1937), and Poems and New Poems (1941).

1238. Selected criticism: prose, poetry. New York, Noonday Press, 1955. 404 p.
55–8230 PN511.B54

A selection of critical articles and reviews (mostly of new poetry) which Louise Bogan prepared for various periodicals over a period of thirty years.

1239. JAMES BOYD, 1888–1944

James Boyd first gained prominence by novels with a Southern setting dealing with the Revolutionary and Civil Wars. These were followed by Long Hunt (1930), which dealt with the opening of the frontier from North Carolina to the Mississippi, and Bitter Creek (1939), which reflected life in the high plains country of the Rocky Mountains during the second half of the 19th century. Roll River (1935) was a story of four generations of a Pennsylvania family. A posthumous volume, Old Pines, and Other Stories (1952) was a selection of stories set in his home state of North Carolina.

1240. Drums. New York, Scribner, 1925. 490 p. 25–8792 PZ3.69375Dr

A Revolutionary War novel that has become a "high school classic."

1241. Marching on. New York, Scribner, 1927. 426 p. 27–11031 PS3503.O885M3 1927 PZ3.B69375Ma

This book, whose story centers about a Confederate soldier during the Civil War, presents characters who are descendants of those in Drums.

1242. KAY BOYLE, 1903–

Kay Boyle has passed much of her life as an expatriate, a fact which is reflected in her fiction dealing with one or two Americans in Europe, often in France. As a result her theme often becomes one of contrasting individuals or cultures. Occasionally she has drifted from portraying "normal" conflicts to portraying sexual perversions and writing moral "horror" stories, such as Gentlemen, I Address You Privately (1933) and Monday Night (1938). An experimentalist who has been praised for her style and for her evocation of places and things more than for her character presentation, her objectivity or noninvolvement in her stories lends an appearance of realism, despite linguistically mannered prose. Her work is usually more sustained in her short stories and novelettes than in her longer works, and many have regarded her as one of the best of modern short-story writers.

1243. Plagued by the nightingale. New York, Cape & Smith, 1931. 334 p. 31–6593 PZ3.B69796Pl

An American girl and her French husband face the problem of the need to have a child in order to obtain money from his relatives, and the conflicting desire to avoid passing on a hereditary ailment.

1244. Year before last. New York, H. Smith, 1932. 373 p. 32–17514 PZ3.B69796Ye

A young man on the Riviera struggles between love of a woman and love of a magazine (financed, conditionally, by his aunt).

1245. Death of a man. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1936. 321 p. 36–22179 PZ3.B69796De

A Nazi sympathizer, an American woman, and her English husband meet in the Austrian mountains. The book ends with Dollfuss' assassination.

1246. The crazy hunter; three short novels. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1940. 295 p. 40–6737 PZ3.B69796Cr

CONTENTS.—The crazy hunter.—The bridegroom's body.—Big Fiddle.

1247. Primer for combat. [New York] Simon & Schuster, 1942. 320 p. 42–36354 PZ3.B69796Pr

Centering about an American woman, her husband, and their three children, this diary-form novel reflects life in a German-controlled French village during the summer of 1940.

1248. Thirty stories. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1946. 362 p. 46–11845 PZ3.B69796Th

A selection from stories published in the preceding twenty years.

1249. His human majesty. New York, Whittlesey House, 1949. 295 p. 49–8270 PZ3.B69796Hi

A novel about ski troops training in the Colorado mountains in the winter of 1944. They are made up of emigrés representing all countries overrun by the Nazis.

1250. The smoking mountain; stories of post war Germany. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1951. 273 p. 51–10197 PZ3.B69796Sm

1251. The seagull on the step. New York, Knopf, 1955. 247 p. 55–5604 PZ3.B69796Se

A concern over Franco-American relations is revealed in this novel about an American girl who comes to understand a French village.

1252. PEARL (SYDENSTRICKER) BUCK, 1892–

As the daughter of American missionaries in China, Pearl Buck acquired the deep appreciation of the Chinese people which motivates her best-known works of fiction. Her portrayal of American missionaries in China and the blending of Chinese and Western humanism in her own philosophy of life are of particular significance to the student of American civilization. She has furthered her role of interpreter of the East to the West through her translations and nonfictional writings. In 1932 she was awarded a Pulitzer prize and in 1938 a Nobel prize. In 1958 Mrs. Buck revealed that she had published novels with an American setting under the pen name of "John Sedges."

1253. The good earth. New York, John Day, 1931. 375 p. 31–26625 PZ3.B8555Go

1254. Sons. New York, John Day, 1932. 467 p. 32–27061 PZ3.B8555So

1255. The mother. New York, John Day, 1934. 302 p. PZ3.B8555Mo
34–807 PS3503.P198M6

1256. A house divided. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1935. 353 p.
35–1591 PZ3.B8555Ho

1257. The exile. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1936. 315 p. 36–3511 BV3427.S852B8

1258. Fighting angel; portrait of a soul. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1936. 302 p.
37–27009 BV3427.S85B8 1936

Fighting Angel, the biography of the author's father, is a companion volume to The Exile, which is a biography of her mother. Together they form a work to be entitled The Spirit and the Flesh. Cf. 1st preliminary leaf.

1259. Dragon seed. New York, John Day, 1942. 378 p. 41–27318 PZ3.B8555Dr

1260. My several worlds, a personal record. New York, John Day, 1954. 407 p.
54–10460 PS3503.U198Z5

1261. JAMES BRANCH CABELL, 1897–

Cabell expressed his ironic-satirical comments on mankind in general and Virginians in particular in a highly mannered but distinguished prose. Books such as The Cream of the Jest (1917) and Something About Eve (1927) were among those that stood out in his disconnected series of novels which had his mythical, somewhat medieval kingdom of Poictesme for setting. His most famous book, Jurgen (1919), aroused considerable publicity and controversy upon being banned at the time of its publication. Cabell writes symbolically in a style and context that tends to restrict his audience to those with a taste for preciosity. Always concerned with the esthetics of literature, he has continued over the years to produce his own rather special type of book, and has over fifty volumes to his credit.

1262. Works. [Storisende ed.] New York, McBride, 1927–30. 18 v.
PS3505.A153A1 1927

CONTENTS.—1. Beyond life.—2. Figures of earth.—3. The silver stallion.—4. Domnei. The music from behind the moon.—5. Chivalry.—6. Jurgen.—7. The line of love.—8. The high place.—9. Gallantry.—10. Something about Eve.—11. The certain hour.—12. The cords of vanity.—13. From the hidden way. The jewel merchants.—14. The rivet in grandfather's neck.—15. The eagle's shadow.—16. The cream of the jest. The lineage of Lichfield.—17. Straws and prayer-books.—18. Townsend of Lichfield.

1263. Ladies and gentlemen: a parcel of reconsiderations. New York, McBride, 1934. 304 p.
34–34569 PS3505.A153L3 1934

Twenty letters addressed to famous personalities, real and fictitious, reassessing their reputations and characters.

1264. Smirt; an urbane nightmare. New York, McBride, 1934. xxi, 309 p. [The nightmare has triplets, v. 1] 34–6047 PZ3.C107Sm

1265. Smith; a sylvan interlude. New York, McBride, 1935. ix, 313 p. [The nightmare has triplets, v. 2] 35–22390 PZ3.C107Smi

1266. Smire; an acceptance in the third person. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1937. 311 p. [The nightmare has triplets, v. 3]
37–6125 PZ3.C107Sl

1267. Let me lie, being in the main an ethnological account of the remarkable Commonwealth of Virginia and the making of its history. New York, Farrar, Straus, 1947. 286 p.
47–30215 F227.C213

CONTENTS.—Quiet along the Potomac.—The first Virginian.—Myths of the Old Dominion.—Colonel Esmond of Virginia.—Concerns heirs and assigns.—Mr. Ritchie's Richmond.—Almost touching the Confederacy.—General Lee of Virginia.—Is of Southern ladies.—"Published in Richmond, Virginia."—Miss Glasgow of Virginia.—As to our life and letters.

1268. Quiet, please. Gainesville, University of Florida Press, 1952. 105 p.
52–7061 PS3505.A153Q5

Autobiographical notes and commentary.

1269. As I remember it; some epilogues in recollection. New York, McBride, 1955. 243 p.
55–11765 PS3505.A153Z52

1270. ERSKINE CALDWELL, 1903–

Caldwell's regional novels and short stories deal chiefly with Georgian poor whites. Although relieved by humor and concern, depravity and degeneracy are characteristic aspects of the people and situations with which his books are concerned. He has been variously regarded as an extreme realist and as an extreme romanticist of the horrible.

1271. Tobacco road. New York, Scribner, 1932. 241 p. 32–5023 PZ3.C12734To

Dramatized by Jack Kirkland in 1933, the play had a phenomenal continuous Broadway run of over 3,000 performances.

1272. God's little acre. New York, Viking Press, 1933. 303 p. 33–3291 PZ3.C12734Go

1273. Trouble in July. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1940. 241 p. 40–27204 PZ3.C12734Tr

1274. Tragic ground. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1944. 237 p. 45–1137 PZ3.C12734Tq

1275. Complete stories. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1953. 664 p. 53–10243 PZ3.C12734Cn

1276. WILLA SIBERT CATHER, 1873–1947

Willa Cather studied in her novels the struggle between the spirit and the world. Her strong point was probably the stylistic purity of her depiction of her native Nebraska and the Southwest. The sympathy she was able to feel for these regions dominates O Pioneers! (1913), The Song of the Lark (1915), My Ántonia (1918, rev. 1926), A Lost Lady (1923), and Death Comes for the Archbishop (1927). Her novels, to a large extent either directly or symbolically autobiographical, tend more to chronicle form than to plot structure.

1277. The novels and stories. Library ed. [Boston, Houghton Mifflin] 1937–41. 13 v. illus. A43–1040 DCU

Each volume has special t. p.

CONTENTS.—1. O Pioneers!—2. The song of the lark.—3. Alexander's bridge & April twilights.—4. My Ántonia.—5. One of ours.—6. Youth and the bright Medusa.—7. A lost lady.—8. The professor's house.—9. Death comes for the archbishop.—10. Shadows on the rock.—11. Lucy Gayheart & My mortal enemy.—12. Obscure destinies & Literary encounters.—13. Sapphira and the slave girl.

1278. On writing; critical studies on writing as an art, with a foreword by Stephen Tennant. New York, Knopf, 1949. 126 p. 49–10534 PS3505.A87048 1949

CONTENTS.—Four letters: On Death comes for the Archbishop. On Shadows on the rock. Escapism. On The professor's house.—The novel démeublé.—Four prefaces: The best stories of Sarah Orne Jewett. Gertrude Hall's The Wagnerian romances. Stephen Crane's Wounds in the rain and other impressions of war. Defoe's The fortunate mistress.—My first novels (there were two).—On the art of fiction.—Katherine Mansfield.—Light on adobe walls (an unpublished fragment).

1279. Bennett, Mildred R. The world of Willa Cather. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1951. xviii, 226 p. illus. 51–9633 PS3505.A87Z58

1280. Brown, Edward Killoran. Willa Cather, a critical biography [by] E. K. Brown; completed by Leon Edel. New York, Knopf, 1953. 351 p. 52–12204 PS3505.A87Z584

"Bibliographical note": p. [346]–351.

1281. Daiches, David. Willa Cather, a critical introduction. Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1951. 193 p. 51–9710 PS3505.A87Z62

1282. Lewis, Edith. Willa Cather living; a personal record. New York, Knopf, 1953. 197 p. 52–12190 PS3505.A87Z72

1283. Sergeant, Elizabeth Shepley. Willa Cather, a memoir. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1953. 288 p. illus. 52–13732 PS3505.A87Z83

1284. MARY ELLEN CHASE, 1887–

Mary Ellen Chase writes primarily of Maine coast characters and the sea in her novels and novelettes. She has also written a number of autobiographical works: A Goodly Heritage (1932) and A Goodly Fellowship (1939) reflect her Maine background and her life as an English teacher, chiefly at Smith College. The White Gate; Adventures in the Imagination of a Child (1954) portrays three years of her Maine childhood.

1285. Mary Peters. New York, Macmillan, 1934. 377 p. 34–27262 PZ3.C901Mar

The heroine passes her youth on her father's ship, but later returns to settle in the Maine coastal village of her ancestors.

1286. Silas Crockett. New York, Macmillan, 1935. 404 p. 35–25387 PZ3.C3901Si

A novel which depicts maritime life along the coast for one hundred years through the story of four generations of a New England family.

1287. Dawn in Lyonesse. New York, Macmillan, 1938. 115 p. 38–27053 PZ3.C3901Daw
The Tristan and Isolde story reworked in a modern tale of Cornwall.

1288. Windswept. New York, Macmillan, 1941. 440 p. 41–21397 PZ3.C3901Wi
Story of a Maine coastal family and their friends, from the 1880's to 1939.

1289. The plum tree. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 98 p. 49–11252 PZ3.C3901Pl
A novelette of a day in a home for aged women.

1290. ROBERT PETER TRISTRAM COFFIN, 1892–1955

Coffin is a Maine poet best known for his realistic, pastoral lyrics, verses which express a degree of sentimentality and a rural "wholesomeness" in a retrained, conventional manner; he was awarded the Pulitzer prize for poetry for Strange Holiness (1935). A prolific author, he has written in a number of forms besides poetry, though usually and best about his native Maine. He has written novels, such as Red Sky In the Morning (1935) and John Dawn (1936); biography, represented by Captain Abby and Captain John (1939), the story of two Maine sea captains; and history as in Kennebec, Cradle of Americans (1937), the first volume in the Rivers of America series (q. v.). The recurring theme of Maine life, manners, and history may be found in these and most of his other works, including books such as Yankee Coast (1947) and Maine Doings (1950). In these works he pictures a part of rural America, past and present, at times using characterizations that verge on folklore in their presentation of basic aspects of American character, personality, and dreams.

1291. Portrait of an American. New York, Macmillan, 1931. 182 p. illus.
31–31494 PS3505.O234P6 1931
Biography of the author's father.

1292. Lost paradise; a boyhood on a Maine coast farm. New York, Macmillan, 1934. 284 p.
34–35147 PS3505.O234Z5 1934
Autobiography.

1293. Thomas-Thomas-Ancil-Thomas. New York, Macmillan, 1941. 342 p.
41–6046 PZ3.C6541Th

A novel in poetic prose on the theme of the continuity of life from father to son through the generations; the contemporary heir is a Maine farmer.

1294. Book of uncles. New York, Macmillan, 1942. 151 p. 42–22252 PS3505.O234B6
Fifteen sketches, each about a different uncle.

1295. Collected poems. New and enl. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1948. 446 p.
48–2263 PS3505.O234A17 1948
Much of Coffin's poetry had previously appeared in such volumes as his Christchurch (1924), Dew and Bronze (1927), Golden Falcon (1929), The Yoke of Thunder (1932), Ballads of Square-Toed Americans (1933), Saltwater Farm (1937), Maine Ballads (1938), There Will Be Bread and Love (1942), Primer for America (1943), Poems for a Son with Wings (1945), and People Behave like Ballads (1946).

1296. Apples by ocean. [Poems] New York, Macmillan, 1950. 128 p.
50–10425 PS3505.O234A7

1297. Selected poems. New York, Macmillan, 1955. 112 p.
55–14775 PS3505.O234A6 1955

1298. JAMES GOULD COZZENS, 1903–

Cozzens is a realistic novelist who writes about a variety of topics. Employing a carefully practiced style within traditional limits, he presents objective, rounded pictures of individuals and situations.

1299. The last Adam. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1933. 301 p.
33–1357 PZ3.C83983Las
London edition (Longmans, Green & Co.) has title: A Cure of Flesh.
A smalltown doctor's story which presents life in a Connecticut community.

1300. Men and brethren. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1936. 282 p.
36–755 PZ3.C83983Me
A study of a clergyman in contemporary New York City.

1301. The just and the unjust. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1942. 434 p.
42–17992 PZ3.C83983Ju
Presents life in a small Connecticut village during a murder trial.

1302. Guard of honor. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1948. 631 p.
48–8544 PZ3.C83983Gu
Story of three days at an air training base in Florida in 1943; it reflects the problems of civilians adjusting to military life.

1303. HART CRANE, 1899–1932

Hart Crane experienced many literary influences, such as the Elizabethans, some late 19th-century French poets, and Dante; he also highly admired and drew inspiration from Whitman, but his work was closer in spirit and technique to Poe. Although Crane published only two books during his life, he is generally considered one of the foremost poets of his era. Through his belief in the "logic of metaphor," applying to it his emotional and intellectual force, and employing tonal adroitness, he created a poetry of eloquence and sonorous, compelling rhetoric. When on occasion his work fails to be the integrated entity he desired, it succeeds as fragments, verbally intense and sensitive. His most ambitious work was The Bridge, an attempt to create a meaningful, affirmative integration of modern American life.

1304. The collected poems; edited with an introd. by Waldo Frank. New York, Liveright, 1933. 179 p. front. (port.)
33–27111 PS3505.R272 1933
This collection includes the poems from White Buildings (1926) and The Bridge (1930). It also contains a section entitled Key West: An Island Sheaf, a group of publications which Crane had prepared for separate volume publication. In addition there is a group of "Uncollected Poems" and an essay on "Modern Poetry."

1305. Letters, 1916–1932; edited by Brom Weber. New York, Hermitage House, 1952. 426 p.
52–12760 PS3505.R272Z54

1306. Weber, Brom. Hart Crane, a biographical and critical study. New York, Bodley Press, 1948. 452 p. ports., facsims.
48–6081 PS3505.R272Z8
Includes an appendix of Hart Crane's uncollected poetry and prose and the worksheets of Atlantis.
"Selected bibliography": p. 441–443.

1307. COUNTEE CULLEN, 1903–1946

Cullen was a Negro poet who wrote conservative, formal lyrics. Although he expressed little of the racial consciousness or Negro rhythms found in the verse of men such as Langston Hughes and James Weldon Johnson, his greater verbal and metrical fluency gained him more popularity.

1308. On these I stand; an anthology of the best poems of Countee Cullen. Selected by himself and including six new poems never before published. New York, Harper, 1947. 197 p.
47–30109 PS3505.U287A6 1947

1309. EDWARD ESTLIN CUMMINGS, 1894–

Since his first book of poetry, Tulips and Chimneys, the poetry of E. E. Cummings has been romantic and typographically unusual. Although he occasionally employs other moods, his most characteristic poems are romantic lyrics with a surrealistic touch, marked by considerable verbal experimentation. Far less known for his prose, he has nevertheless produced several distinguished volumes in that medium.

1310. The enormous room. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1922. 271 p.
22–9403 D570.9.C82
An account of his imprisonment by mistake in a French military prison during the First World War.

1311. Eimi. New York, Covici, Friede, 1933. 432 p. 33–8819 PS3505.U334E5 1933a
The record of a trip through Soviet Russia, with an account of the author's protests against conditions there.

1312. I; six nonlectures. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 118 p. (The Charles Eliot Norton lectures, 1952–1953)
53–10472 PS3505.U334Z5
Contains a statement of his position as a writer; some autobiographical material is included.

1313. Poems, 1923–1954. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1954. 468 p.
54–9724 PS3505.U334 1954
CONTENTS.—Tulips and chimneys (1923).—& (1925).—XLI poems (1925).—Is 5 (1926).—W (1931).—No thanks (1935).—New poems [from Collected poems] (1938).—50 poems (1940).—1 x 1 (1944).—XAIPE (1950).

1314. HAROLD LENOIR DAVIS, 1896–

H. L. Davis is an Oregon author who regularly writes about his home area. Best known for his fiction, which includes Beulah Land (1949), a story of the frontier, and Winds of Morning (1952), a novel of the Columbia River Valley country that has been called an "intellectual western," Davis has also produced a volume of regional poetry, Proud Riders (1942).

1315. Honey in the horn. New York, Harper, 1935. 380 p. 35–16787 PZ3.D29355Ho

A novel about homesteading in Oregon early in the 20th century; the book was awarded a Pulitzer prize in 1936.

1316. Team bells woke me, and other stories. New York, Morrow, 1953. 300 p. 53–5338 PZ3.D29355Te

1317. CLARENCE DAY, 1874–1935

Day was a humorous essayist who was best known for his autobiographical works portraying family life, the most popular of which was Life with Father (1935), which in play form (by Howard Lindsay and Russel Crouse, 1940) was a great Broadway success. Some critics consider Day's somewhat cynical, satirical This Simian World (1920) his best work.

1318. The best of Clarence Day, including God and my father, Life with father, Life with mother, This simian world, and selections from Thoughts without words. New York, Knopf, 1948. 451 p. illus. 48–6580 PS3507.A585B4

1319. HILDA DOOLITTLE, 1886–

H. D., as she preferred to sign herself, was in a sense the main poet of the Imagist group, for she was the one who abided most consistently by its doctrines. Her work, which has often been called "classic," does not attempt either to interpret or to present the problems of modern life; rather, it is a frugal, evocative presentation of something seen in nature.

1320. Collected poems of H. D. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1925. 306 p. 25–9543 PS3501.L373A17 1925

This volume was reissued in 1940. Earlier books of poetry by Hilda Doolittle include Sea Garden (1916), Hymen (1921), and Heliodora, and Other Poems (1924).

1321. Red roses for bronze, by H. D. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1931. 147 p. 32–26042 PS3501.L373R4 1931

1322. The walls do not fall, by H. D. London, New York, Oxford University Press, 1944. 48 p. 44–7016 PS3501.L373W3

1323. Tribute to the angels, by H. D. London, New York, Oxford University Press, 1945. 42 p. 45–10399 PS3501.L373T7

1324. The flowering of the rod, by H. D. London, New York, Cumberlege, Oxford University Press, 1946. 50 p. 47–591 PS3501.L373F5

1325. JOHN RODERIGO DOS PASSOS, 1896–

John Dos Passos started as a leftist novelist. He is probably best known for his triology entitled U. S. A., originally published as 42nd Parallel (1930), 1919 (1932), and The Big Money (1936), a work of realistic fiction with many stylistic innovations; a heavy emphasis on fact and a detailing of the background give the work value as a commentary on a period in this country's history. As Dos Passos later turned from his leftist views, he turned increasingly to nonfiction: observational books of fiction, biographical works, etc. Part of his work now appears dated because of its journalistic nature; much survives, however, as fiction or reportage of more than momentary interest.

1326. Three soldiers. New York, G. H. Doran, 1921. 433 p. 21–26886 PZ3.D74Th

Depicts the effects of World War I on three "typical" American privates.

1327. Manhattan transfer. New York, Harper, 1925. 404 p. 25–23116 PZ3.D74Ma

The lives of more than a dozen individuals are presented in numerous fictional episodes meant to mirror the complex pattern of life in modern New York City.

1328. U. S. A. 1. The 42nd parallel. 2. Nineteen nineteen. 3. The big money. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1937. [1471] p. 38–27019 PZ3.D74Us

Various pagings.

1329. The ground we stand on; some examples from the history of a political creed. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1941. 420 p. 41–16286 E183.D7

The development of the American creed of liberty is traced through biographical studies of individuals who influenced the conception.

1330. State of the Nation. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1944. 333 p. plates. 44–6169 E169.D68

An account of a trip through the United States during the Second World War.

1331. Chosen country. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1951. 485 p. 51–7856 PZ3.D74Ch

1848–1930 in America reflected through numerous episodic sections, after the manner of the author's U. S. A.

1332. District of Columbia. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. 342, 248, 446 p.
52–7617 PZ3.D74Di

Also published as three separate volumes: Adventures of a Young Man; Number One; and The Grand Design.

Reflects American life in the twenties, thirties, and early forties.

1333. THEODORE DREISER, 1871–1945

Dreiser's works played a major role in the breakdown of the "genteel" tradition in American literature and in the development of fiction as a medium for serious treatment of social and economic abuses. His novels are, in general, deterministic, portraying as they do human beings acted upon by their biological drives and by external forces in society and their environment. However unworthy Dreiser's characters may be, he presents them with sympathy, pity, and without condemnation. Important sources for a study of Dreiser's increasing disillusionment and pessimism, induced by life in Chicago, New York, and Philadelphia, are found in his numerous autobiographical works.

1334. Sister Carrie. New York, Doubleday, Page, 1900. 557 p. 1–29034 PZ3.D814S

This edition was said to have been withheld from circulation because of the book's supposed "immorality." A new edition was given general release in 1912. The story, set mainly in Chicago and New York, is about a smalltown girl who rises from mistress to successful actress, while her erstwhile beloved sinks from successful businessman to beggardom and suicide.

1335. Jennie Gerhardt, a novel. New York, Harper, 1911. 432 p.
11–26603 PZ3.D814J

Set largely in Cleveland and New York, this is the story of a woman who gives up a man, whose mistress she has become, in order that he may inherit a legacy and assume a less controversial position in society.

1336. The financier. New York, Harper, 1912. 779 p. (A trilogy of desire, v. 1)
12–24487 PZ3.D814Fi

A character study of a rising big businessman in Philadelphia during the 1860's and early 1870's. A revised version appeared in 1927.

1337. The Titan. New York, John Lane, 1914. 551 p. (A trilogy of desire, v. 2)
14–9767 PZ3.D814T

The great capitalist of The Financier has established himself in Chicago and prospers even more. Commercial and public utilities financial deals are shown against a background of the period's social standards and cultural views.

In The Stoic (1947) the hero's further career was traced to London, where he undertook the building of that city's subway system.

1338. An American tragedy. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1925. 2 v.
26–141 PZ3.D814Am

Based on an actual New York State murder case, this book presents the author's naturalistic and essentially tragic view of life in America. Contrasting standards and manners of various social strata are portrayed.

1339. The "genius." New York, John Lane, 1915. 736 p.
15–20143 PZ3.D814G3 RBD

The story of a small-town Illinois artist's adjustment to society as his life develops in Chicago and New York and he finds his true vocation as a realistic painter.

1340. A Hoosier holiday. New York, John Lane, 1916. 513 p. illus. 16–23068 E169.D77 E168.D77

An automobile trip from New York City to Indiana.

1341. Free, and other stories. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1918. 369 p.
18–26757 PZ3.D814Fr

1342. Twelve men. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1919. 360 p.
19–6139 PS3507.R55T9 1919

Short stories.

1343. The bulwark. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1946. 337 p.
46–25076 PZ3.D814Bu

A book of religious probing, it presents the life of a Quaker in a Quaker community near Philadelphia.

1344. A book about myself. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1922. 502 p.
22–25344 PS3507.R55Z5 1922

Republished in 1931 in two volumes bearing the titles: Dawn and Newspaper Days.

1345. The best short stories of Theodore Dreiser, edited with an introd. by Howard Fast. Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1947. 349 p.
47–3829 PZ3.D814Be

1346. Dreiser, Helen (Patges) My life with Dreiser. Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1951. 328 p. illus. 51–10332 PS3507.R55Z58

1347. Elias, Robert H. Theodore Dreiser, apostle of nature. New York, Knopf, 1949. xii, 354, xxi p. illus. 49–7227 PS3507.R55Z63

1348. Kazin, Alfred, and Charles Shapiro, eds. The stature of Theodore Dreiser; a critical survey of the man and his work. With an introd. by Alfred Kazin. Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1955. 303 p. 55–8446 PS3507.R55Z64

1349. Matthiessen, Francis Otto. Theodore Dreiser. New York, Sloane, 1951. 267 p. (The American men of letters series)
51–1734 PS3507.R55Z7

1350. RICHARD EBERHART, 1904–

Although he apparently writes in large part by inspiration, Eberhart's poetry is known for its intellectual and philosophical aspects. His search is for the nature of man, and the position of man in time (and the meaning of time) and the universe.

1351. Selected poems. London, Chatto & Windus, 1951. 86 p.
51–3153 PS3509.B456A6 1951
Eberhart's earlier volumes of poetry are A Bravery of Earth (1930), Reading the Spirit (1936), Song and Idea (1940), Poems, New and Selected (1944), and Burr Oaks (1947).

1352. Undercliff: poems, 1946–1953. New York, Oxford University Press, 1953. 127 p.
53–13069 PS3509.B456U6

1353. WALTER DUMAUX EDMONDS, 1903–

Edmonds is a popular historical novelist who concerns himself mainly with the New York State area, his best-known works being set in the Mohawk Valley and along the Erie Canal.

1354. Rome haul. Boston, Little, Brown, 1929. 347 p. 29–5703 PZ3.E242Ro Portrays Erie Canal life in the 1850's.

1355. Drums along the Mohawk. Boston, Little, Brown, 1936. 592 p.
36–16924 PZ3.E242Dr

A story of the Revolutionary War and its influence on the farmers of the Mohawk Valley.

1356. Erie water. Boston, Little, Brown, 1933. 506 p. 33–3217 PZ3.E242Er
A story of the building of the Erie Canal and life along the route from 1817 to 1825.

1357. THOMAS STEARNS ELIOT, 1888–

T. S. Eliot, an American who became a British subject, wrote early poetry of frustration, disillusion, and despair expressive of the spiritual aridity and insecurity of a generation. His The Waste Land (1922) came to epitomize the feelings of the West's, and to some extent of the world's, cultured youth after the First World War. A subsequent turning to a highly religious poetry, as in Ash Wednesday (1930), reflected his acceptance of Anglican Catholic dogma and conservatism in political and social views. Hence his essays have come to show an authoritarian assessment of literature and society. In recent years he has concentrated on verse drama, continuing experiments in verse forms, and leaning towards social satire and comedy. All his work has evidenced an extensive assimilation of modern psychological theories. Eliot has been one of the most influential of modern poets, his poetry having transcended national and linguistic boundaries, and having provoked a formidable mass of critical and exegetical studies, not to mention innumerable imitations. His receipt in 1948 of the Nobel prize for literature is partial indication of the entrenchment of his work in modern literature.

1358. Selected essays. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 460 p.
50–10103 PN511.E443 1950

1359. Complete poems and plays. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1952. 392 p.
52–11345 PS3509.L43 1952
This volume contains the poetry published in earlier volumes, such as Prufrock (1917), Poems (1920), The Waste Land (1922), The Hollow Men (1925), and Ash Wednesday (1930), as well as the "Ariel Poems," the "Minor Poems," and other verse as originally brought together in the author's Collected Poems, 1909–1935 (1936). It also contains the subsequent poems from Four Quartets (1943), Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats (1939), and the plays Murder in the Cathedral (1935), The Family Reunion (1939), and The Cocktail Party (1950).

1360. The confidential clerk, a play. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1954. 159 p.
54–5253 PS3509.L43C69

1361. Drew, Elizabeth A. T. S. Eliot, the design of his poetry. New York, Scribner, 1949. 216 p. 49–1640 PS3509.L43Z67

1362. Gallup, Donald Clifford. T. S. Eliot; a bibliography, including contributions to periodicals and foreign translations. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1953. 177 p. 53–5644 Z8260.5.G16 1953

A revision and extension of the author's A Bibliographical Checklist of the Writings of T. S. Eliot, published in 1947.

1363. Gardner, Helen Louise. The art of T. S. Eliot. New York, Dutton, 1950. 185 p. 50–9034 PS3509.L43Z675 1950

1364. March, Richard, and M. J. Tambimuttu, eds. T. S. Eliot; a symposium from Conrad Aiken [and others] Compiled by Richard March and Tambimuttu. Chicago, Regnery, 1949. 259 p. illus. 49–48864 PS3509.L43Z73 1949

"A tribute to T. S. Eliot, on his sixtieth birthday, from his friends."

1365. Maxwell, Desmond Ernest Stewart. The poetry of T. S. Eliot. London, Routledge & Paul [1952] 223 p. 52–4500 PS3509.L43Z78 1952

1366. On the Four quartets of T. S. Eliot. Anon. With a foreword by Roy Campbell. London, Stuart, 1953. 64 p. 54–3457 PS3509.L43F668

1367. Rajan, Balachandra, ed. T. S. Eliot; a study of his writings by several hands. New York, Funk & Wagnalls, 1948. 153 p. 49–7235 PS3509.L43Z82 1948

CONTENTS.—The waste land: an analysis, by Cleanth Brooks.—Ash Wednesday, by E. E. Duncan Jones.—Four quartets: a commentary, by H. L. Gardner.—The unity of the quartets, by B. Rajan.—Eliot's philosophical themes, by Philip Wheelwright.—A question of speech, by Anne Ridler.—Eliot's critical method, by M. C. Bradbrook.—Notes on 'Gerontion,' by Wolf Mankowitz.—A check of T. S. Eliot's published writings (p. 139–153).

1368. Robbins, Rossell Hope. The T. S. Eliot myth. New York, Schuman, 1951. 226 p. 51–14190 PS3509.L43Z825

1369. Smidt, Kristian. Poetry and belief in the work of T. S. Eliot. Oslo, Dybwad, 1949. 228 p. (Skrifter utg. av det Norske videnskaps-akademi i Oslo. II. Hist.-filos. klasse, 1949, no. 1) 52–17717 PS3509.L43Z866

1370. Unger, Leonard, ed. T. S. Eliot: a selected critique. New York, Rinehart, 1948. xix, 478 p. 48–7063 PS3509.L43Z883

1371. Williamson, George. A reader's guide to T. S. Eliot; a poem-by-poem analysis. New York, Noonday Press, 1953. 248 p. 53–7584 PS3509.L43Z898

1372. JAMES THOMAS FARRELL, 1904–

James Farrell is best known for his novels, although he has also written short stories and nonfiction, the latter largely literary commentary. The locale for much of his fiction is that part of Chicago in which he grew up, a declining middle- and lower-class area whose inhabitants were for the most part Irish Catholics. Farrell, a liberal, wrote in the tradition of naturalistic realism, with as many sociological as philosophic or poetic overtones, so that his work is an indictment of a section of society and its frequently despiritualizing effects. The dual moral standards of this group result in the ruin of Studs Lonigan (the hero of the early trilogy which is usually considered Farrell's most forceful work), while Danny O'Neill (the hero of a second, contrasting series) survives and rises to a mature view of life. A somewhat comparable series tells the story of Bernard Clare (renamed Bernard Carr after the first volume); Clare (Carr) is presented as a Chicago-born writer whose career centers in New York, where much of his attention focuses on the problem of the leftist political position in the thirties.

1373. Studs Lonigan. New York, Vanguard Press, 1935. 201, 412, 465 p. 36–214 PZ3.F2465St PS3511.A738S7 1935

CONTENTS.—Young Lonigan.—The young manhood of Studs Lonigan.—Judgment day.

1374. A world I never made. New York, Vanguard Press, 1936. 508 p. 36–24944 PZ3.F2465Wo

The story of Danny O'Neill is continued in No Star Is Lost (1938. 38–17566 PZ3.F2465No); Father and Son (1940. 40–32291 PZ3.F2465Fat); My Days of Anger (1943. 43–16086 PZ3.F2465 My); and The Face of Time (1953. 53–10805 PZ3.F2465Fac).

1375. The league of frightened Philistines, and other papers. New York, Vanguard Press, 1945. xiv, 210 p.
45–35125 PS3511.A738A16 1945
"Selected from . . . [the author's] critical and non-fictional writing of the past fifteen years."—Preface.

1376. Bernard Clare. New York, Vanguard Press, 1946. 367 p. 46–3585 PZ3.F2465Be
Continued in: The Road Between (1949. 49–8444 PZ3.F2465Ro) and Yet Other Waters (1952. 52–11116 PZ3.F2465Yg).

1377. Literature and morality. [New York] Vanguard Press, 1947. xv, 304 p.
47–4577 PN49.F3

1378. Reflections at fifty, and other essays. New York, Vanguard Press, 1954. 223 p.
54–11517 PS3511.A738R4

1379. WILLIAM FAULKNER, 1897–

Faulkner, who was awarded the Nobel prize for literature in 1950, has been considered by some critics, in this country as well as abroad, to be the greatest of living novelists. Much of his writing has been experimental, utilizing techniques of stream-of-consciousness, interior monologues, and multiple personal narratives to portray events with psychological realism. Patterns of symbolic myth woven on the universal theme of human fate have been discovered by critics in many of his stories. The paradox of passion and compassion, violence and beatitude, pathos and comedy, realism and idealism, mammonism and mysticism are seldom separated very far in any of his work. Seeking moral purpose, he presents the past alive in the present—a historic deep South pervading a modern South. His stories usually take place in a fictional Mississippi county, a counterpart to his own home area, where morality and immorality take a large battlefield in a rural locale. While each volume is an individual unit, no character can take curtain bows with full assurance he will not be called upon to play a part in some subsequent drama. In this way Faulkner has presented a "human comedy" of a Southern community. Although he most characteristically presents a vision of life, rather than a concept of it, he allows philosophy to dominate in his latest novel A Fable, which was awarded the Pulitzer prize in 1955. Faulkner has also been one of the most influential of modern short-story writers, with volumes such as These 13 (1931) and Go Down, Moses (1942), which form an integral part of his work. He has also published some poetry: The Marble Faun (1924) and A Green Bough (1933). He has on occasion spelled his name as "Falkner."

1380. Soldiers' pay. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1926. 319 p. 26–6911 PZ3.F272So
Story of an American in the British air force during World War I who is seriously wounded and returns to his home in Georgia to die.

1381. Mosquitoes. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1927. 349 p. 27–10732 PZ3.F272Mo
A satire with a New Orleans locale.

1382. Sartoris. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1929. 380 p. 29–3496 PZ3.F272Sar
Faulkner's first novel, portraying life in the South, traces the degeneracy of a prominent family in the course of three generations, from the Civil War to World War I.

1383. The sound and the fury. New York, Cape & Smith, 1929. 401 p.
29–20977 PZ3.F272Sou
An experimental novel about a degenerate Southern family, written, for most of the book, from the narrative point of view of the family's idiot boy.

1384. As I lay dying. New York, Cape & Smith, 1930. 254 p. 30–27682 PZ3.F272As
A somewhat acridly humorous portrait of the irrational behavior of human beings as seen by various individual characters in the story.

1385. Sanctuary. New York, Cape & Smith, 1931. 380 p. 31–4182 PZ3.F272San
This, "the most horrific tale" of sex, cruelty, and violence which the author could imagine was successfully aimed at the popular market which his more serious works had failed to attain.

1386. Light in August. [New York] Smith & Haas, 1932. 480 p.
32–25588 PZ3.F272Li
The story of a pregnant girl's search for her lover.

1387. Pylon. New York, Smith & Haas, 1935. 315 p. 35–4415 PZ3.F272Py
A story of airplane racing contestants during a carnival in a Southern city, this book, reflecting Faulkner's dislike of cities, is outside the main current of his studies of a Southern community.

1388. Absalom, Absalom! New York, Random House, 1936. 384 p.
36–24678 PZ3.F272Ab3
A tour de force of technical dexterity which traces the story of a Southern planter's family in the 19th century, as it has become known to a young college student in the 20th century. The several threads of narrative, each limited to that version of events which filters through the mind and personality of the character who narrates it, evoke a sense of the relativity of human history and an awareness of the symbolic significance of human character and human motives in the past, as they are known in the present.

1389. The unvanquished. New York, Random House, 1938. 293 p.
38–7091 PS3511.A86U5 1938
Seven short stories forming a continuous novel which traces the life of the Sartoris family during the Civil War and the Reconstruction period.

1390. The wild palms. New York, Random House, 1939. 339 p.
39–1750 PZ3.F272Wi
Two interwoven novelettes which develop contrapuntal treatments of the theme of escape. One is the story of a New Orleans doctor who seeks with his beloved to escape from society but winds up in prison after the woman's death from an abortion. The other is the story (Old Man) of a convict who escapes from a chain gang during a flood on the Mississippi, and in the unavoidable performance of an act of heroism in saving the lives of a woman and her newborn baby becomes so trammeled in responsibility that he welcomes his return to prison.

1391. The hamlet. New York, Random House, 1940. 421 p.
40–7215 PS3511.A86H3 1940
A large family of lower-class whites batten upon a Southern community through cunning exploitation of Southern honor and integrity.

1392. Intruder in the dust. New York, Random House, 1948. 247 p.
48–8519 PZ3.F272In
Two boys, one Negro and one white, and an aristocratic old maid accumulate the evidence to prove the innocence and prevent the lynching of a Negro accused of murder.

1393. Knight's gambit. New York, Random House, 1949. 246 p.
49–11472 PZ3.F272Kn
Six stories centering about a county attorney.

1394. Collected stories. New York, Random House, 1950. 900 p.
50–9187 PZ3.F272Co

1395. Requiem for a nun. New York, Random House, 1951. 286 p.
51–12731 PS3511.A86R4 1951
The story of the "heroine" of Sanctuary eight years later.

1396. A fable. [New York] Random House, 1954. 437 p. 54–6651 PZ3.F272Fab
Set against the battlegrounds of Europe in World War I, this is the story of Christ in modern guise.

1397. Campbell, Harry M., and Ruel E. Foster. William Faulkner, a critical appraisal. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1951. 183 p.
51–12064 PS3511.A86Z75

1398. Coughlan, Robert. The private world of William Faulkner. New York, Harper, 1954. 151 p. illus. 54–8943 PS3511.A86Z76

1399. Hoffman, Frederick J., and Olga W. Vickery, eds. William Faulkner: two decades of criticism. [East Lansing] Michigan State College Press, 1951. vii, 280 p. 51–13066 PS3511.A86Z8

1400. Howe, Irving. William Faulkner, a critical study. New York, Random House, 1952. xiii, 203 p. 52–5147 PS3511.A86Z84

1401. Miner, Ward L. The world of William Faulkner. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1952. 170 p. 52–14931 PS3511.A86Z9

1402. O'Connor, William Van. The tangled fire of William Faulkner. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1954. 182 p.
54–5657 PS3511.A86Z93

1403. EDNA FERBER, 1887–

Edna Ferber has been successively a newspaper reporter, a writer of short stories, a novelist, and a playwright collaborating chiefly with George S. Kaufman. Her sympathies, reflected in her choice of themes, are as wide as the variations in the American scene she portrays. She has written now of the trials and triumphs of a middle-class businesswoman or a farm wife, now of pioneering in Oklahoma, or again of life on a floating 19th-century theater set up in a showboat on the Mississippi River. Humor, rapid-paced narrative, love of life, and devotion to the United States infuse her books with qualities that have given them an extensive popular appeal. Her autobiography, A Peculiar Treasure (1939), is a document of the American experiment that touches the life of the Nation at many points.

1404. So-Big. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1924. 360 p. 24–26188 PZ3.F380So
Story of a farm wife's work for her son. Awarded the Pulitzer prize in 1925.

1405. Show boat. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1926. 398 p.
26–15187 PZ3.F380Sh

1406. Cimarron. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1930. 388 p.
30–8609 PZ3.F380Ci
Depicts the 1889 land rush in Oklahoma and the later development of the area.

1407. Saratoga trunk. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1941. 352 p.
41–24504 PS3511.E46S3 1941
A Creole adventuress and a cowboy gambler at a 19th-century New York spa became involved in a struggle for control of a train trunk line.

1408. One basket; thirty-one short stories. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1947. 581 p.
47–30149 PZ3.F38On
A collection that throws light on the development of the author's style.

1409. THOMAS HORNSBY FERRIL, 1896–

Ferril, who lives in Denver, is a regional poet. However, in terms of his own region he is concerned with all time and all places. He watches mountains wearing away, cities coming and going, the passing of nations and the generations of man. In I Hate Thursday (1946), a collection of articles most of which were written for a weekly newspaper, the Rocky Mountain Herald, he comments, with a less regional emphasis than in his poetry, on a great variety of specific topics.

1410. New and selected poems. New York, Harper, 1952. 169 p.
52–8470 PS3511.E7245N4
Ferril's earlier volumes of poetry were High Passage (1926), Westering (1934), and Trial by Time (1944).

1411. DOROTHEA FRANCES (CANFIELD) FISHER, 1879–

Dorothy Canfield Fisher, whose New England regional novels and stories of American domestic life reveal the author's insight into the drama of lives that on the surface seem uneventful, published many of her early works under the name Dorothy Canfield. Her great love for France and French life is woven into her books as a theme second only to that of the devotion she feels for her permanent locale in rural Vermont. She writes in what has come to be called the conventional manner: that is, she designs a plot, develops her characters, tells a story, and tends to resolve conflicts idealistically.

1412. The bent twig. New York, Holt, 1915. 480 p. 15–26659 PZ3.F53B
The development and maturing of a Middle West university professor's daughter.

1413. Home fires in France. New York, Holt, 1918. 306 p. 18–26756 PZ3.F53Ho Short stories based on the author's experiences in France during World War I.

1414. The brimming cup. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1921. 409 p. 21–4168 PZ3.F53Br Problems of modern life studied in terms of Vermont characters.

1415. Rough-hewn. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1922. 504 p. 22–19057 PZ3.F53Ro
May be regarded as a "preface" to The Brimming Cup. It presents the childhood and youth of two of the main characters, taking them to the point where the earlier published book begins.

1416. The deepening stream. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1930. 393 p.
30–28175 PZ3.F33De
Childhood through early married life of a woman born in the Middle West and spending some time in France.

1417. Seasoned timber. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. 485 p. 39–27079 PZ3.F53Se
A Vermont study which centers about a poor, rural academy and a problem of democratic principles.

1418. Four-square. [Short stories] New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1949. 236 p.
49–11288 PZ3.F53Fo

1419. Vermont tradition; the biography of an outlook on life. Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 488 p. 53–10226 F49.F57
A "spiritual" history of the author's adopted State.

1420. VARDIS ALVERO FISHER, 1895–

Vardis Fisher is a prolific novelist whose early novels, in part autobiographical, realistically emphasize the hardships of life and the primitive conditions encountered on farms and in frontier locations in Idaho, Utah, and adjacent regions in the Far West. In various historical novels Mr. Fisher has developed additional themes drawn from the literature of westward migrations in America. Among these are the discovery and final decline of the fabulous Comstock Lode, at Virginia City, Nevada, and the tragic suffering of the Donner Party during their trek from Illinois to California in 1846–47. In 1952 The Island of the Innocent appeared, being the seventh novel in a twelve-volume series entitled The Testament of Man, designed to trace the history of mankind from prehistoric to modern times. This constitutes the author's most ambitious effort to portray man's struggle and attainments under different civilizations.

1421. Toilers of the hills. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1928. 361 p. 28–23667 PZ3.F539To
Deals with life on a dry farm in Idaho.

1422. Dark Bridwell. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1931. 376 p. 31–14419 PZ3.T539Dar
Elemental passions in the lives of a family on a remote mountain farm in Idaho comprise the materials of the plot which this novel develops.

1423. In tragic life. Caldwell, Idaho, Caxton Printers, 1932. 464 p.
32–35789 PZ3.F539In
Tetralogy concerned with the long search of the Western hero, Vridar Hunter, for the meaning of life. Succeeding volumes in their order of publication are: Passions Spin the Plot (1934); We Are Betrayed (1935); and No Villain Need Be (1936).

1424. Children of God. New York, Harper, 1939. 769 p. 39–27649 PZ3.F539Ch
A historical novel that treats as an American epic the beginnings of Mormonism, the persecution of the Mormons, and their long migration from the Middle West to Utah.

1425. FRANCIS SCOTT KEY FITZGERALD, 1896–1940

F. Scott Fitzgerald was one of the leading recorders of the "jazz-age" or "frivolous twenties." His most successful novel, The Great Gatsby, like most of his work, dealt with millionaires, parvenus, and the general stridency of the period, this time mainly with a Long Island, New York, setting. Fitzgerald's later career as a Hollywood writer is the basis for Budd Schulberg's novel, The Disenchanted (New York, Random House, 1950. 338 p.).

1426. This side of paradise. New York, Scribner, 1920. 305 p. 20–6430 PZ3.F5754Th

1427. The beautiful and damned. New York, Scribner, 1922. 449 p.
22–4437 PZ3.C5754Be

1428. The great Gatsby. New York, Scribner, 1925. 218 p. 25–10468 PZ3.F5754Gr

1429. The portable F. Scott Fitzgerald, selected by Dorothy Parker. Introd. by John O'Hara. New York, Viking Press, 1945. 835 p. (The Viking portable library) 45–8464 PZ3.F5754Po
CONTENTS.—Novels: The great Gatsby. Tender is the night.—Stories: Absolution. The baby party. The rich boy. May day. The cut-glass bowl. The offshore pirate. The freshest boy. Crazy Sunday. Babylon revisited.

1430. Kazin, Alfred, ed. F. Scott Fitzgerald: the man and his work. Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1951. 219 p. 51–10640 PS3511.I9Z67

1431. Mizener, Arthur. The far side of paradise; a biography of F. Scott Fitzgerald. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1951. xx, 362 p. ports.
51–9185 PS3511.I9Z7
"Fitzgerald's published work": p. 350–356.

1432. JOHN GOULD FLETCHER, 1886–1950

Living as an expatriated American in England, Fletcher early wrote poetry associated with the Imagist movement of 1907–17. In company with Amy Lowell he also experimented with the use of polyphonic prose. When he returned to live in his native State, Arkansas, he wrote of that region and on other themes native to the United States in a vein of mysticism colored by romance. His autobiography, Life Is My Song (1937), indicates his intimate association with the course of American poetry throughout a period of significant development.

1433. Selected poems. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1938. 237 p.
38–14768 PS3511.L457A6 1938
On the basis of this volume Fletcher was awarded the Pulitzer prize for poetry in 1939. The selections are from his earlier volumes: Irradiations, Sand and Spray (1915), Goblins and Pagodas (1916), The Tree of Life (1918), Breakers and Granite (1921), The Black Rock (1928), and XXIV Elegies (1935). Preludes and Symphonies (1922) was a reissue of Irradiations, Sand and Spray, and Goblins and Pagodas.

1434. South star. New York, Macmillan, 1941. 117 p. 41–6401 PS3511.L457S6 1941

Includes a long poem in four parts, "The Story of Arkansas," accompanied by lyrics on various Southern themes.

1435. The burning mountain [poems] New York, Dutton, 1946. 96 p.
46–4558 PS3511.L457B8

1436. Simon, Charlie May (Hogue) Johnswood. New York, Dutton, 1953. 249 p.
53–6090 PS3537.I64Z5
Mrs. Fletcher's reminiscences of the home in Arkansas and the life she shared with her husband.

1437. ESTHER FORBES, 1894?–

Esther Forbes is known for the accuracy of her evocative historical novels depicting New England. She conveys not only local color, but also character. She has also written some nonfiction, such as Paul Revere & the World He Lived In (1942), which was awarded a Pulitzer prize for history, and The Boston Book (1947), a book of photographs by Arthur Griffin for which she wrote the text.

1438. O genteel lady! Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1926. 296 p. 26–9023 PZ3.F7418O
The Massachusetts-bred heroine confronts the conventions and the intellectual life of the Victorian period.

1439. A mirror for witches in which is reflected the life, machinations, and death of famous Doll Bilby, who, with a more than feminine perversity, preferred a demon to a mortal lover. Here is also told how and why a righteous and most awful judgment befell her, destroying both corporeal body and immortal soul. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1928. 213 p. illus.
28–12074 PZ3.F7418Mi
The story of a witch in 17th-century Salem, Massachusetts.

1440. Miss Marvel. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1935. 304 p. 35–14885 PZ3.F418Mis
A New England mill manager's daughter achieves spinsterhood in the hope of romantic love.

1441. Paradise. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1937. 556 p. 37–27104 PZ3.F7418Par
A story of colonial pioneering in early 17th-century New England, through the beginning of King Phillip's War.

1442. The general's lady. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1938. 394 p.
38–27638 PZ3.F7418Ge
Love and life, with the last years of the American Revolution for setting.

1443. The running of the tide. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1948. 632 p.
48–4573 PZ3.F7418Ru
Life in later 18th- and early 19th-century Salem, then at its height as a shipping city.

1444. Rainbow on the road. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1954. 343 p.
53–9248 PZ3.F7418Rai
A picaresque novel about an itinerant portrait painter in New England in the 1830's.

1445. WALDO DAVID FRANK, 1889–

Waldo Frank is the author of numerous works, both fiction and nonfiction. His greatest reputation has been in Latin America, where, through his lectures and writings, he has helped gain an audience for other American authors. This interest has been a reciprocal affair, reflected in books such as his biography of Bolivar, Birth of a World (1951), and South American Journey (1943). He has also written on Spanish culture in Virgin Spain, rev. ed. (1942). In The Jew in Our Day (1944) he discussed some of the problems of his fellow Jews. He has also written books on more general aspects of American society and development, such as Our America (1919), The Re-discovery of America (1929), and In the American Jungle [1925–1936] (1937), a collection of essays on industrial America. His better-known novels, often dealing with life in America, tend to portray social groups or areas. They have been criticized for lack of "character" development, which is probably in part a result of his belief that the individual is a product of environment. In his early work Frank was a leftist, but he turned against the Communists in the thirties. There remains in his writings something of a mystical, prophetic quality which either permeates or dominates his realistic work.

1446. Rahab. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1922. 250 p. 22–4977 PZ3.F8498Ra
Set in New York, this is the story of a girl who, in purity of spirit, discovers God, while socially lapsing into prostitution.

1447. The death and birth of David Markand, an American story. New York, Scribner, 1934. 542 p. 34–33666 PZ3.F8498De
A New York businessman leaves home and family in search of life, and finds a new (radical) faith after four years of wandering about America.

1448. The bridegroom cometh. New York, Doubleday, Doran, 1939. 628 p.
39–13360 PZ3.F8498Br2

A novel that reflects American life between 1914 and 1924. The story is that of an inhibited girl, raised puritanically, who finds herself in social work and communism.

1449. Island in the Atlantic, a novel. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1946. 503 p.
46–6710 PZ3.F8498Is

A novel that reflects social changes in America, as three generations on Manhattan Island are traced from the Civil War to 1912.

1450. Not heaven; a novel in the form of prelude, variations, and theme. New York, Hermitage House, 1953. 287 p. 53–8718 PZ3.F8498No

This is an attempt to extend the limits of the novel; separate incidents are united by theme rather than traditional unities of time, place, or action. The theme might be said to be the situation of the modern human being.

1451. ROBERT FROST, 1874–

A pastoral poet, Frost has been called a modern Theocritus. His poems are descriptive of rural New England, mainly Vermont and New Hampshire, but they take incident and environment at a crucial, symbolic moment, which projects his idylls into the realm of the metaphysical lyric. His poetry has increasingly passed from an earlier relative emphasis on environment and setting to a more recent elaboration of philosophical speculation. His verse has been cast primarily in the form of lyrics or dramatic monologues, or dialogues—with all forms having a prominent dramatic element. This is even further reflected in his language, which is an adaptation of conversational style to poetic form. Although in the main stream of modern thought, Frost has held aloof from the urban currents and eddies of "modern" literary convention, and remains authentically representative of the indigenous culture which absorbs but does not succumb to the machine age.

1452. Complete poems of Robert Frost, 1949. New York, Holt, 1949. 642 p.
49–9497 PS3511.R94 1949

This is the most recent, generally available edition of Frost's collected writings, although there have been many editions of his collected and selected poetry. His earlier volumes include A Boy's Will (1913), North of Boston (1914), Mountain Interval (1916), New Hampshire (1923), West-Running Brook (1928), A Further Range (1936), A Witness Tree (1942), A Masque of Reason (1945), A Masque of Mercy (1947), and Steeple Bush (1947). Frost's many other volumes are mainly single poems published in individual booklets.

1453. ZONA GALE, 1874–1938

Zona Gale wrote mainly novels and short stories which, whatever the name used, had her home town, Portage, Wisconsin, for setting. Her early books were sentimental, regional works, such as the popular Friendship Village (1909); however, she soon turned from sentimental tales to realistic works, and then, increasingly, a strain of mysticism and a concern for social conditions infused her work.

1454. Birth. New York, Macmillan, 1918. 402 p.
18–20940 PZ3.G1319B

1455. Miss Lulu Bett. New York, Appleton, 1920. 264 p. 20–4218 PZ3.G1319Mi

1456. Faint perfume. New York, Appleton, 1923. 217 p. 23–6139 PZ3.G1319Fa

1457. Preface to life. New York, Appleton, 1926. 345 p. 26–18625 PZ3.G1319Pr

1458. Yellow gentians and blue. New York, Appleton, 1927. 188 p.
27–20431 PZ3.G1319Ye

1459. Papa La Fleur. New York, Appleton, 1933. 154 p. 33–5483 PZ3.G1319Pap

1460. ELLEN ANDERSON GHOLSON GLASGOW, 1874–1945

Ellen Glasgow was a Virginian who depicted her State in realistic novels that may to some extent be regarded as social histories. Her idealism, her belief in the triumph of morality over futility, always restrains and directs her literary craftsmanship. The worldly cause may at times be lost or obscure, but there is always a spiritual victory. She attempts to deal truthfully with a post-Civil War South, presenting settings and situations that are often grim, but relieved by her humor and affection. Although many of her numerous books have been acclaimed, Barren Ground (1925), Vein of Iron (1935), and The Romantic Comedians (1926) seem generally to be the most highly regarded.

1461. [Works] Virginia ed. New York, Scribner, 1938. 12 v. fronts.
38–24704 PS3513.L34 1938

CONTENTS.—1. Barren ground.—2. The miller of Old Church.—3. Vein of iron.—4. The sheltered life.—5. The romantic comedians.—6. They stooped to folly.—7. The battle ground.—8. The deliverance.—9. Virginia.—10. The voice of the people.—11. Romance of a plain man.—12. Life and Gabriella.

1462. In this our life. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1941. 467 p.
41–51629 PZ3.G464In

1463. The woman within. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1954. 307 p. illus.
54–11329 PS3513.L34Z5
Autobiography.
"The works of Ellen Glasgow": p. 302.

1464. CAROLINE GORDON, 1895–

Caroline Gordon, wife of Allen Tate, writes novels and short stories dealing with the South, especially the Kentucky-Tennessee region, and reflecting the philosophy of the agrarians.

1465. Penhally. New York, Scribner, 1931. 282 p. 31–25046 PZ3.C6525Pe
A story of a Kentucky family and their estate, Penhally, from 1826 into the 20th century.

1466. Aleck Maury, sportsman. New York, Scribner, 1934. 287 p.
34–37083 PZ3.G6525A1
A character novel that takes the form of an autobiography of a Virginia hunting and fishing enthusiast.

1467. The garden of Adonis. New York, Scribner, 1937. 299 p.
37–33903 PZ3.G6525Gar
Conflicts of various social groups are presented in this novel set against a background of present-day plantation life in the South.

1468. None shall look back. New York, Scribner, 1937. 378 p. 37–27189 PZ3.G6525No
Civil War story centering on the exploits of Confederate Major General Nathan Forrest and the part played in the war by a Kentucky-Tennessee border family.

1469. Green centuries. New York, Scribner, 1941. 469 p. 41–22068 PZ3.G6525Gr
A novel of the westward movement from Virginia into Kentucky in the years before the Revolution.

1470. The women on the porch. New York, Scribner, 1944. 316 p.
44–4503 PZ3.G6525Wo
A psychological novel in which a woman leaves her New York husband and returns to her family home in Tennessee, where most of the story takes place.

1471. The forest of the South. New York, Scribner, 1945. 245 p. 45–9169 PZ3.G6525Fo
Short stories.

1472. The strange children. New York, Scribner, 1951. 303 p. 51–12447 PZ3.G6525St
A novel about a group of restless, rootless intellectuals in Tennessee.

1473. PAUL ELIOT GREEN, 1894–

Paul Green is known primarily for his plays. He has been called a folk dramatist, and most of his work, including his novels and short stories, depicts life in the South, especially in North Carolina. In 1927 his In Abraham's Bosom was awarded the Pulitzer prize for drama.

1474. This body the earth. New York, Harper, 1935. 422 p. 35–19876 PZ3.G8248Th
A story which reflects the folkways and social conditions of the poor tenant-farmer class of North Carolina.

1475. Out of the South, the life of a people in dramatic form. New York, Harper, 1939. 577 p. 39–27317 PS3513.R452O8 1939
Contents.—The house of Connelly.—The no 'count boy.—Saturday night.—The field god.—Quare medicine.—The hot iron.—In Abraham's bosom.—Unto such glory.—Supper for the dead.—Potter's field.—The man who died at twelve o'clock.—White dresses.—Johnny Johnson.—Hymn to the rising sun.—The lost colony.

1476. Salvation on a string, and other tales of the South. New York, 1946. 278 p.
46–6956 PZ3.G8248Sal
Short stories about the people of a small North Carolina farm town.

1477. The common glory, a symphonic drama of American history, with music, commentary, English folksong and dance. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1948. 273 p.
48–11307 PS3513.R452C6
A spectacle drama about Virginia's contribution to the establishment of a democratic government in America; with Thomas Jefferson as the main character.

1478. Dog on the sun, a volume of stories. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1949. 178 p. 49-11774 PZ3.G8248Do PS3513.R452D6

1479. Adams, Agatha B. Paul Green of Chapel Hill; edited by Richard Walser. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Library, 1951. vii, 116 p. (The University of North Carolina. Library extension publication, v. 16, no. 2) 51-62187 PS3513.R452Z58

1480. SAMUEL BERNARD GREENBERG, 1893-1917

Samuel Greenberg was a Viennese Jewish immigrant who lived in poverty in New York. He left school at seventh grade to work. He early became ill with tuberculosis, and it was while in hospitals that he found time to do almost all of his writing. Untrained formally, and in isolation, he wrote a highly modernistic, mystic verse which has since come to be recognized as an extraordinary precursor of the modern school. Drawing much of his inspiration from Emerson and Thoreau, Greenberg himself was to have a profound influence on Hart Crane, who read his work in manuscript.

1481. Poems. A selection from the manuscripts, edited with an introd. by Harold Holden and Jack McManis; pref. by Allen Tate. New York, Holt, 1947. 117 p. 47-4715 PS3513.R4582P6
Includes autobiographical sketch.

1482. HORACE VICTOR GREGORY, 1898-

Horace Gregory writes urbane poetry in a dramatic tone. In addition to his poetry and some critical work, he is known for his translation of poems by Catullus (1931) and a History of American Poetry, 1900-1940 (1946), which he wrote with his wife, Marya Zaturenska (q. v.).

1483. Selected poems. New York, Viking Press, 1951. 143 p.
51-11788 PS3513.R558A6 1951
Earlier volumes of poetry by Gregory include Chelsea Rooming House (1930), No Retreat (1933), Chorus for Survival (1935), and Poems, 1930-1940 (1941).

1484. ZANE GREY, 1872-1939

Zane Grey was an Eastern dentist who became a highly successful author of westerns. However, critics considered his writing stilted, his characters wooden, his situations unrealistic, and his plots melodramatic. Despite this, he has probably been the prime factor in crystallizing the European, and to some extent even the American, "conception" of early Western life. After becoming rich on the income from his novels, Grey passed much of his time in outdoor activities, especially fishing. This resulted in a number of autobiographical books (discussed in the Sports and Recreation section of this bibliography), which were more favorably received by many critics, although less well received by the general public. His books are still popular in cheap editions.

1485. Riders of the purple sage. New York, Harper, 1912. 334 p.
12-1131 PZ3.G87Ri
This has probably been the most popular of the more than fifty novels by Zane Grey. Because his plots were almost all constructed on one basic formula, this book may be used to exemplify that aspect of his work which has had such a wide nonliterary influence.

1486. The Zane Grey omnibus, edited by Ruth G. Gentles. New York, Harper, 1943. xvii, 409 p. 43-4314 PZ3.G87Zan
CONTENTS.—Zane Grey: a biographical sketch.—Zane Grey: an interpretation.—"The ringer."—Wild Horse mesa, a novel.—Don, the story of a lion dog.—Tales of fishes.—Down an unknown jungle river.—Exercises.

1487. Karr, Jean. Zane Grey, man of the West. New York, Greenberg, 1949. 229 p.
49-11953 PS3513.R6545Z7 1949
"The books of Zane Grey": p. 215-229.

1488. ALFRED BERTRAM GUTHRIE, 1901-

Guthrie's novels of American migrations in the middle of the 19th century recreate for the reader the opening of the wilderness on the now vanished western frontier. He writes in a poetic prose of the pioneers' love of the new land and the open sky.

1489. The big sky [by] A. B. Guthrie, Jr. New York, Sloane, 1947. 386 p.
47-3316 PZ3.G95876Bi

1490. The way west. New York, Sloane, 1949. 340 p. 49-11198 PZ3.G95876Way

1491. MOSS HART, 1904-

Moss Hart, a New York dramatist, did much of his earlier work in collaboration with George S. Kaufman (q. v.), including such comedies as You Can't Take It With You (1937) and The Man Who Came To Dinner (1939). In addition to collaborating on such plays, he acted in the capacity of librettist for some musical comedies. Subsequently he has, in addition to adaptations, undertaken some more ambitious work in dramas which reflect on contemporary life, such as Winged Victory (1943), a World War II play about the air force.

1492. Light up the sky, a play. New York, Random House, 1949. 120 p.
49–8200 PS3515.A7943L5

1493. The climate of Eden, a play; based on Edgar Mittelholzer's novel, Shadows move among them. New York, Random House, 1953. 177 p.
53–5528 PS3515.A7943C6

1494. ERNEST HEMINGWAY, 1898–

Hemingway as a novelist and short-story writer evolved the journalistic style to its artistic ultimate; from this has developed one of the most prolific schools of modern fiction. A novelist of pain and suffering, whose characters lose much and gain little (though some would claim an occasional spiritual victory, it is usually won in a lost cause), he emphasizes conversational realism and objective presentation, but frequently achieves the effect of symbolic fable. His stories are usually of Americans, but seldom of America, since they often have a foreign setting. He was awarded the Nobel prize for literature in 1954.

1495. The sun also rises. New York, Scribner, 1926. 259 p. 26–19106 PZ3.H3736Su
Members of the British and American element in European society wander about the continent (largely France and Spain) indulging in drinking, loving, and general aimless merriment—all realistically indicative of the ineffectuality of their lives.

1496. A farewell to arms. New York, Scribner, 1929. 355 p. 29–20658 PZ3.H3736Fa
A story of an American in the Italian ambulance service and his love affair with an English nurse in Italy during World War I.

1497. For whom the bell tolls. New York, Scribner, 1940. 471 p.
40–27732 PZ3.H3736Fo PS3515.E37F6 1940
A novel about an American in the Loyalist army during the Spanish Civil War.

1498. The short stories: the first forty-nine stories and the play The fifth column. New York, Modern Library, 1942. 597 p. (The Modern Library of the world's best books)
42–36273 PS3515.E37A15 1942

1499. Across the river and into the trees. New York, Scribner, 1950. 308 p.
50–9370 PZ3.H3736Ac
A novel about an American Army officer's return visit to Italy, after having been there during World Wars I and II.

1500. The old man and the sea. New York, Scribner, 1952. 140 p.
52–11935 PZ3.H3736Ol
A philosophic and symbolic novelette with the moral that man is not meant for defeat (though he may be destroyed), this is the story of an old man from a Cuban fishing village and his protracted struggle with a giant fish.

1501. Atkins, John A. The art of Ernest Hemingway; his work and personality. London, Nevill, 1952. 245 p. 53–26230 PS3515.E37Z57

1502. Baker, Carlos H. Hemingway; the writer as artist. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1952. xix, 322 p.
52–8759 PS3515.E37Z58
Bibliographical footnotes. "A working check-list of Hemingway's prose, poetry, and journalism": p. [299]–310.

1503. Fenton, Charles A. The apprenticeship of Ernest Hemingway: the early years. New York, Farrar, Straus & Young, 1954. xi, 302 p.
54–7968 PS3515.E37Z59

1504. McCaffery, John K. M., ed. Ernest Hemingway, the man and his work. Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1950. 351 p.
50–10036 PS3515.E37Z7

1505. Young, Philip. Ernest Hemingway. New York, Rinehart, 1952. 244 p. (Rinehart critical studies) 52–5603 PS3515.E37Z96

1506. JOSEPH HERGESHEIMER, 1880–1954

Hergesheimer's earlier, more widely acclaimed work was mainly in the form of novels with realistic historical backgrounds. Based on much research, these depicted aspects of the American past, analyzed character, and presented the "atmosphere" of his settings. Into such evocations of places in the past he projected his imaginative stories.

1507. The three black Pennys. New York, Knopf, 1917. 408 p. 17–25287 PZ3.H422Th
Against a background of the Pennsylvania iron fields, this novel depicts the rise and decline of a family through the story of three alternate generations, starting from the late colonial period.

1508. Java Head. New York, Knopf, 1919. 255 p. 19–579 PZ3.H422Ja
The story of a New England merchant vessel captain who married a Chinese wife and brought her home to Salem, Massachusetts, when that port was experiencing its most flourishing period.

1509. Linda Condon. New York, Knopf, 1919. 304 p. 19–27595 PZ3.H422Li
A character study of a woman who in social terms is emotionally unresponsive. She lives for beauty, in the form of personal adornment, until she perceives a beauty that transcends mortality in the work of a sculptor who has been inspired by her.

1510. Quiet cities. New York, Knopf, 1928. 354 p. 28–13911 PZ3.H422Qu
Nine short stories depicting different American cities at various points in the past, from colonial times to the pre-Civil War period.

1511. The limestone tree. New York, Knopf, 1931. 386 p. 31–2676 PZ3.H422Le
A novel with 18th- and 19th-century Kentucky for background.

1512. DU BOSE HEYWARD, 1885–1940

Heyward first gained attention as a poet, notably with Carolina Chansons (1922), which he wrote with Hervey Allen (q. v.). However, his most prominent book was Porgy, a novel depicting Negroes in Charleston, S. C., a work which was the source of George Gershwin's opera Porgy and Bess. Another novel on the Southern Negro was Mamba's Daughters (1929).

1513. Porgy. New York, Doran, 1925. 196 p. 25–17940 PZ3.H1586Po

1514. Durham, Frank. Du Bose Heyward, the man who wrote Porgy. Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1954. 252 p. illus. 54–10111 PS3515.E98Z6
"An informal version of a dissertation . . . for the Ph. D. degree at Columbia University."

1515. ROBERT SILLIMAN HILLYER, 1895–

Robert Hillyer writes polished, conventional poetry in the 19th-century tradition, but with a modern temper. In his lyrics his themes tend to be general and unlocalized; he has also written poems for specific occasions, such as the Phi Beta Kappa poems, two of which are included in A Letter to Robert Frost and Others (1937), and another, "In Time of Mistrust," is included in Pattern of a Day (1940). Hillyer has also published two novels: Riverhead (1932) and My Heart for Hostage (1942).

1516. Poems for music, 1917–1947. New York, Knopf, 1947. 83 p. 47–5283 PS3515.I69P6
The author's selection of his seventy best lyrics. An earlier selection of the author's poetry is his Collected Verse (1933), which brings together material from Sonnets and Other Lyrics (1917), The Five Books of Youth (1920), The Hills Give Promise (1922), The Halt in the Garden (1925), The Seventh Hill (1928) and The Gates of the Compass (1930). Hillyer was awarded a Pulitzer prize for poetry for this earlier collection.

1517. The suburb by the sea, new poems. New York, Knopf, 1952. 71 p. 52–5738 PS3515.I69S9

1518. SIDNEY COE HOWARD, 1891–1939

Sidney Howard was a dramatist whose plays bear, or were borne by, a "message," so that much of his work has been dated by the passing of time and the specific cause which motivates them, although a few survive as examples of the "newer" realism. He was awarded the Pulitzer prize for drama for They Knew What They Wanted, a marital comedy set in California.

1519. The silver cord; a comedy in three acts. New York, Scribner, 1927. 204 p. (The Theatre guild library) 27–5629 PS3515.O847S5 1927
A drama of a widowed mother's pathological love for her two sons.

1520. Yellow jack, a history by Sidney Howard, in collaboration with Paul De Kruif. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1934. 152 p. plates. 34–18182 PS3515.O847Y4 1934
"Based on the dramatic 'Walter Reed' chapter of Paul de Kruif's 'Microbe hunters' . . . this play deals with man's struggle against and final victory over the dread yellow fever."—Publisher's announcement.

1521. LANGSTON HUGHES, 1902–

Hughes is a Negro writer who first gained attention for his verse in such books as The Weary Blues (1926) and Fine Clothing to the Jew (1927); these were in part derived in form and mood from Negro blues and jazz. More recently his prose has received greater attention, in part because of its presentation of Harlem Negroes. A leftist and somewhat anti-white in the thirties, he has in recent years written with less bias and a sense of humor.

1522. The big sea, an autobiography. New York, Knopf, 1940. 335 p.
40–30931 PS3515.U274Z5 1940

1523. Simple speaks his mind. [New York] Simon & Schuster, 1950. 231 p.
50–7299 PS3515.U274S53
Short stories centering about Simple, a Negro who expresses opinions on a variety of subjects.

1524. Laughing to keep from crying. New York, Holt, 1952. 206 p.
52–7952 PZ3.H87313Lau
Twenty-four short stories about Negroes.

1525. Simple takes a wife. [New York] Simon & Schuster, 1953. 240 p.
53–1553 PS3515.U274S57
Further humorous short stories centering about Simple; occasionally there are still bitter undertones.

1526. ZORA NEALE HURSTON, 1903–

Zora Neale Hurston is a Negro who usually writes of Negro people in Florida. She has been commended for her recording of the folklore and dialect of the area.

1527. Jonah's gourd vine. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1934. 316 p. 34–7611 PZ3.H9457Jo

1528. Their eyes were watching God; a novel. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1937. 286 p.
37–18658 PZ3.H9457Th

1529. Seraph on the Suwanee, a novel. New York, Scribner, 1948. 311 p.
48–8745 PZ3.H9457Se

1530. FEDERICO SCHARMEL IRIS, 1889–

Scharmel Iris was born in Italy; as a youth he came to America and settled in Chicago, where he began to write poetry in English. His short, taut lyrics are little known, despite the fact that they have been brilliantly praised by a number of prominent authors, including William Butler Yeats, who wrote: "Of poets writing today there is no greater!" Iris' first volume, Lyrics of a Lad, appeared in 1914; there followed a period of disappearing manuscripts, so that it was not until 1953 that a second volume appeared, reprinting some of the work in the earlier book. Much of his work has been published in periodicals under various pseudonyms.

1531. Bread out of stone. [Poems] Chicago, Regnery, 1953. 62 p.
53–8795 PS3517.R5B7

1532. ROBINSON JEFFERS, 1887–

Isolated in his "inevitable place" on the spectacular California coast near Carmel, Jeffers has looked at America and the world, where he has seen evil, decadence, and tragedy as inevitable accompaniments of human, particularly of family, relations. So extreme is his vision of sin that it attains some of the characteristics of romanticism, although of an inverted kind. His long narrative poems deal with murder, incest, and horrors equal to them; his short poems also express what he calls a philosophic mood of "Inhumanness." These startling, if unconvincing, revelations of total depravity are set forth powerfully in poems marked by technical proficiency and imaginative use of themes drawn in part from classical and Biblical sources, and from the folklore of California. In recent years Jeffers has increasingly devoted his talents to making free adaptations of classical Greek tragedy. His most recent work of this kind is The Cretan Woman, first performed in 1954.

1533. The women at Point Sur. New York, Boni & Liveright [c1927] 175 p.
44–35263 PS3519.E27W6 1927a

1534. Selected poetry. New York, Random House, 1938. 622 p.
38–28958 PS3519.E27A6 1938
Presents some new poems and about one half of the poet's previously published work; includes selections from Tamar and Other Poems (1924), Roan Stallion (1925), Cawdor (1928), Dear Judas (1929), Thurso's Landing (1932), Give Your Heart to the Hawks (1933), Solstice (1935), and Such Counsels You Gave to Me (1937).

1535. Medea, freely adapted from the Medea of Euripides by Robinson Jeffers. New York, Random House, 1946. 107 p.
46–25159 PA3975.M4J4

1536. Hungerfield, and other poems. New York, Random House, 1954. 115 p.
53–9714 PS3519.E27H9
Includes The Cretan Woman.

1537. JAMES WELDON JOHNSON, 1871–1938

Johnson was a Negro author of diversified interests who was probably best known for some of his poetry. His versified Negro sermons are imaginative interpretations, in the idiom of primitive religion, of the character and quality of his race. Although he strove for objectivity on the matter, race consciousness is a strong element in his work.

1538. God's trombones; seven Negro sermons in verse. New York, Viking Press, 1927. 56 p.
27–12269 PS3519.O2625G6 1927

1539. Along this way; the autobiography of James Weldon Johnson. New York, Viking Press, 1933. 418 p. 33–29189 E185.97.J69

1540. Saint Peter relates an incident, selected poems. New York, Viking Press, 1935. 105 p. 35–22368 PS3519.O2625A6 1935

1541. MACKINLAY KANTOR, 1904–

Kantor is a Midwestern author whose many works cover a wide range. In The Voice of Bugle Ann (1935) and its sequel The Daughter of Bugle Ann (1952) he presented two widely read foxhound stories which represent the rural-life animal-story genre in popular American fiction. Typical of the patriotic and sentimental strains in much of his work is God and My Country (1954), a novelette in praise of the Boy Scouts. Author's Choice (1944) is a selection of forty of his short stories. While he has written in such forms as adventure and mystery stories, and poetry, much of his more serious work has gone into historical fiction dealing with the Civil War.

1542. Long remember. New York, Coward-McCann, 1934. 411 p.
34–27082 PZ3.K142Lo
A novel dealing with the Battle of Gettysburg.

1543. But look, the morn. New York, Coward-McCann, 1947. 308 p.
47–30121 PS3521.A47Z5
The story of the author's childhood in a small Iowa town.

1544. Andersonville. Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1955. 767 p. 55–8257 PZ3.K142An
A novel, presenting by implication the entire Civil War, but dealing specifically with a notorious prisoner-of-war camp in Georgia.

1545. GEORGE SIMON KAUFMAN, 1889–

George S. Kaufman is a New Yorker who has been a journalist and director as well as a playwright. He has worked on many popular, humorous plays. For most of these he acted as a collaborator, commonly with authors such as Moss Hart, Marc Connelly, Edna Ferber, Morris Ryskind, and Ring Lardner. His work, much of which takes the form of satire on aspects of American life, is noted for its "wise-crack" element.

1546. Merton of the movies, in four acts, a dramatization of Harry Leon Wilson's story of the same name, by George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly. New York, French, 1925. 112 p. illus. (French's standard library edition)
25–9428 PS3521.A727M4 1925

1547. Stage door, a play in three acts, by Edna Ferber and George S. Kaufman. New York, Dramatists Play Service, 1938. 165 p. illus.
38–25234 PS3511.E46S8 1938

1548. Six plays by Kaufman and Hart, with an introd. by Brooks Atkinson. New York, Modern Library [°1942] xxxii, 586 p. (The Modern Library of the world's best books)
44–8784 PS3521.A727S5 1942a
CONTENTS.—Men at work, by Moss Hart.—Forked lightning, by G. S. Kaufman.—Once in a lifetime.—Merrily we roll along.—You can't take it with you.—The American way.—The man who came to dinner.—George Washington slept here.

1549. The late George Apley, a play by John P. Marquand and George S. Kaufman, based on Mr. Marquand's novel. [New York] Dramatists Play Service, 1946. 72 p.
46–20312 PS3525.A6695L3 1946

1550. The solid gold Cadillac; a comedy, by Howard Teichmann and George S. Kaufman. New York, Random House, 1954. 151 p. illus. 54–8795 PS3539.E24S6

1551. OLIVER LA FARGE, 1901–

La Farge is an anthropologist, ethnologist, and archaeologist whose writings deal in large part with American Indians; his main interest is in the Navajos. His first novel, Laughing Boy, was awarded the Pulitzer prize for fiction and remains, in the opinion of many, his most successful work. He dealt with the Navajos again in The Enemy Gods (1937), a thesis novel which depicts the Indian's inability to adapt to the white man's way of life. Less directly concerned with Indians were books such as the autobiography Raw Material (1945), and Eagle In the Egg (1949), the official history of the Air Transport Command.

1552. Laughing Boy. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1929. 302 p. 29–23247 PZ3.L129Lau

1553. All the young men; stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1935. 272 p.
35–13561 PZ3.L129Al

CONTENTS.—Hard winter.—All the young men.—Haunted ground.—A family matter.—North is black.—Higher education.—The goddess was mortal.—Dangerous man.—Love charm.—Women at Yellow wells.—Camping on my trail.—No more Bohemia.

1554. RING WILMER LARDNER, 1885–1933

In a slangy, conversational style Ring Lardner wrote mordant, humorous stories, most popularly and prominently about baseball figures. His own most acclaimed collections were How To Write Short Stories (1924) and The Love Nest, and Other Stories (1926).

1555. The portable Ring Lardner. Edited, and with an introd. by Gilbert Seldes. New York, Viking Press, 1946. 756 p. (The Viking portable library) 46–7398 PS3523.A7A6 1946

1556. WILLIAM ELLERY CHANNING LEONARD, 1876–1944

Leonard, for many years a professor in the English Department at the University of Wisconsin, wrote imaginatively on psychological aspects of his personal experience; his scholarly work was done largely in the field of translations of epical works in different languages. The personal works range through the autobiographical poetry of Two Lives (1923) and his psychoanalytic autobiography to his posthumously published volume of sonnets, A Man Against Time, an Heroic Dream (1945). His intense poetic feeling, expressed in academic and traditional form, is thought by some critics to have found more enduring expression in his metrical translations of Beowulf, Gilgamesh, the De Rerum Natura of Lucretius, and the fragments of Empedocles. He also made a notable contribution to regional drama with Red Bird (1923), a play based on a story of Wisconsin pioneer days.

1557. The locomotive-god. New York, Century, 1927. 434 p. 27–20232 PS3523.E62Z5

The author's autobiography in which, by psychoanalysis, he traces the origin of certain mental maladies.

1558. A son of earth, collected poems. New York, Viking Press, 1928. x, 235 p.
28–23943 PS3523.E62S5 1928

1559. SINCLAIR LEWIS, 1885–1951

Lewis rose to prominence through his romantically realistic novels of middle class life in the Midwest. Most of his work is satiric; his characters are usually types (businessman, preacher, social worker, etc.) rather than individuals; and his novels verge on being (and sometimes openly are) social tracts. As the first American to be awarded the Nobel prize for literature (1930), his reputation and influence have been extensive. The novels with which he first gained fame are usually considered his best.

1560. Main Street, the story of Carol Kennicott. New York, Harcourt, Brace & Howe, 1920. 451 p. 20–18934 PZ3.L5884Ma

The story of a well-educated but limited young woman who tries to introduce culture and taste into a small, unimaginative, Minnesota town.

1561. Babbitt. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1922. 401 p. 22–14419 PZ3.L5884Ba

Babbitt is the stereotyped businessman hero in this satirical novel of a Midwestern urban society with generally restricted views and values.

1562. Arrowsmith. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1925. 448 p. 25–6078 PZ3.L5884Ar

The story of a doctor's career, this novel was awarded a Pulitzer prize for literature in 1926, but Lewis declined it.

1563. Elmer Gantry. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1927. 432 p. 27–4761 PZ3.L5884E1

A novel satirizing religious hypocrisy.

1564. Dodsworth, a novel. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1929. 337 p.
29–26270 PZ3.L5884Do

The story of an American businessman from a Midwestern city who, after retirement, travels to Europe in search of culture. Dodsworth is Babbitt's alterego.

1565. Ann Vickers. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1933. 562 p.
33–27006 PZ3.L5884An PS3523.E94A67

A study of a woman social worker and the question of a woman's place in American society.

1566. It can't happen here; a novel. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1935. 458 p.
35–19689 PZ3.L5884It

An imaginary story of the establishment of a dictatorial, fascistic government in America.

1567. Gideon Planish, a novel. New York, Random House, 1943. 438 p.
43–51122 PZ3.L5884Gi

A satire exposing the racket of organized philanthropy.

1568. Cass Timberlane, a novel of husbands and wives. New York, Random House, 1945. 390 p. 45–4918 PZ3.L5884Cas

A novel about a respected, middle-aged judge in a Minnesota town who takes a young, second wife; the book presents many standard American sentimental and cynical observations on marriage.

1569. Kingsblood royal. New York, Random House, 1947. 348 p.
47–2064 PZ3.L5884Ki

A social document novel on the Negro problem.

1570. From Main Street to Stockholm; letters of Sinclair Lewis, 1919–1930. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1952. 307 p.
52–6449 PS3523.E94Z53

1571. LUDWIG LEWISOHN, 1882–

Lewisohn is probably best known for his novels, which are largely propagandistic works giving his views on recurrent subjects such as sex, marriage, divorce, and the positions of Jews in society. Rivaling the best of these in popularity, and by some the most esteemed of his productions, have been his autobiographical works. He has also gained prominence through other forms, such as his book on the American spirit revealed in literature, Expression in America (1932; a postscript was added to the 1939 edition, which bore the later title: The Story of American Literature); his dramatic articles from The Nation, reprinted in The Drama and the Stage (1922); his lay philosophical work, such as The Permanent Horizon; A New Search for Old Truths (1934); and, among his nonfiction books dealing specifically with Jews, The American Jew, Character and Destiny (1950). It has been claimed that Lewisohn's work is usually too largely polemical or pamphleteering to be literature; but most critics have admired his lucid, expressive style, his penetration; his realistic post-Freudian presentations, and the spirit with which he works in behalf of his beliefs, have also won praise.

1572. Up stream; an American chronicle. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1922. 248 p.
22–5315 PS3523.E96Z5 1922

Autobiography.
Continued in Mid-Channel.

1573. The case of Mr. Crump. Paris, E. W. Titus, 1926. 435 p. NN

Story of a young musician from South Carolina who goes to New York, where he is seduced by an older woman. The bulk of the book is a bitter exposé of 12 years of miserable marriage, acridly presenting one of the most unpleasant women in world literature.

The book was for some time banned from the mails.

A paperback edition appeared in 1947 under the title The Tyranny of Sex.

1574. The island within. New York, Harper, 1928. 350 p. 28–6770 PZ3.L591Is

The story of a Jewish Polish family that immigrates to America, but maintains its essential Jewishness.

1575. Mid-channel; an American chronicle. New York, Harper, 1929. 310 p.
29–9655 PS3523.E96Z55

Autobiography: a continuation of the author's Up Stream.

1576. Stephen Escott. New York, Harper, 1930. 315 p. 30–7110 PZ3.L591St

A sociological novel discussing the problem of sex and marriage.

1577. The golden vase. New York, Harper, 1931. 141 p. 31–28151 PZ3.L591Go

A philosophical novelette on the theme of love renounced because of age and lack of courage.

1578. Renegade. New York, Dial Press, 1942. 333 p. 42–6285 PZ3.L591Re

A historical novel set in France at the time of Louis XIV, this is the story of a wealthy Jew who leaves his religion for love, but after a period of adversity discovers how deep is his religious connection.

1579. Anniversary. [New York] Farrar, Straus, 1948, ℗1946. 304 p. 48–5114 PZ3.L591An

A stream-of-consciousness novel set in a small New England city, and with sex, love, marriage, divorce, and middle-class morality for themes.

1580. NICHOLAS VACHEL LINDSAY, 1879–1931

Vachel Lindsay, a regional poet intimately associated with the Middle West, was one of the "new" poets who came into prominence during the First World War. His chief claims to being an innovator lie in the derivation of his verse forms from ballads and folk songs, and in his use of American themes, frequently unconventional, originating in his own experiences of camp meetings and revivals, in his friendship with hobos and laborers, and from tales of folk heroes, real and imaginary. He conceived of poetry as an oral art, comparable to a "higher vaudeville" in which the arts of music and poetry were to be blended in a result that was to be chanted rather than read. Devotion to his own idealized and romanticized dream of democracy in America was a dominant influence in his work.

1581. Collected poems. Rev. and illustrated ed. New York, Macmillan, 1925. 464 p. 25–10046 PS3523.I58A17 1925

Lindsay's early poetry was first printed in pamphlets meant to be traded for food and shelter during his wanderings about the country; perhaps the most famous of these early works is Rhymes to Be Traded for Bread (1912?). As he emerged from his formative period, he produced a series of books on which his fame mainly rests: General William Booth Enters into Heaven, and Other Poems (1913), The Congo, and Other Poems (1914), and The Chinese Nightingale, and Other Poems (1917). Thereafter Lindsay continued to be prolific, but the quality of his work declined. The later volumes include The Daniel Jazz, and Other Poems (1920), Going-to-the-Sun (1923), Going-to-the-Stars (1926), The Candle in the Cabin (1926), and Every Soul Is a Circus (1929). A volume of Selected Poems was published in 1931.

1582. Harris, Mark. City of discontent; an interpretative biography of Vachel Lindsay, being also the story of Springfield, Illinois, USA, and of the love of the poet for that city, that State and that Nation. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1952. 403 p. 52–5806 PS3523.I58Z6

1583. AMY LOWELL, 1874–1925

Amy Lowell was a New Englander of great strength and will who resolved to be a poet. With her second book, Sword Blades and Poppy Seed, she started the experimentation which in large measure was to make her name. Using a technique of free verse in "polyphonic prose," she practiced her theory of imagism,—meanwhile largely taking over the Imagist movement and shaping it to her own ends. Mainly a poet of the visual, she at times projected moods and emotional overtones into her imagery, thus reflecting her personality. In her later work the influence of Chinese poetry, particularly its imagery, reinforced the already established emphasis on the visual in her work. Vitality and experimentation applied to the Imagist theory were the factors by which this determined woman achieved for herself a position as a poet. These qualities were well represented in Men, Women, and Ghosts, which some have considered her best book, in Legends, and in What's O'Clock, a posthumous volume which was awarded the Pulitzer prize.

1584. Complete poetical works. With an introd. by Louis Untermeyer. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1955. xxix, 607 p. 55–6949 PS3523.O88 1955

In addition to some "new" poems, this volume contains the work previously published in A Dome of Many-Coloured Glass (1912), Sword Blades and Poppy Seed (1914), Men, Women, and Ghosts (1916), Can Grande's Castle (1918), Pictures of the Floating World (1919), Legends (1921), Fir-Flower Tablets (1922), A Critical Fable (1922), What's O'Clock (1925), East Wind (1926), and Ballads for Sale (1927).

1585. ARCHIBALD MacLEISH, 1892–

Although influenced by many poets, MacLeish has evolved his own individual poetic style and statement. His great skill in handling poetic forms has been employed in a large body of work. Increasingly over the years he had tended to conceive of the poet as social force, a role in which he has expounded views on national and international questions of much moment, using prose as well as poetry as a medium for this purpose, e. g., in his selected addresses, A Time to Act (1943). At his best in the short lyric, MacLeish nevertheless achieved a tour de force, which some have regarded as his masterpiece, in Conquistador (1932), a story of the conquest of Mexico, written in terza rima. He has also gone far in developing some outstanding radio scripts in dramatic-narrative verse.

1586. Collected poems, 1917–1952. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. 407 p. 52–6083 PS3525.A27A17 1952

In addition to a group of new poems, this volume contains material from earlier books and booklets such as The Happy Marriage (1924), The Pot of Earth (1925), Streets in the Moon (1926), The Hamlet of A. MacLeish (1928), Einstein (1929), New Found Land (1930), Conquistador, Frescoes for Mr. Rockefeller's City (1933), Poems, 1924–1933 (1933), Public Speech (1936), America Was Promises (1939), and Actfive, and Other Poems (1948).

1587. This music crept by me upon the waters. [A play] Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 38 p. (The Poets' theatre series, 1)
54–5428 PS3525.A27T47

1588. Songs for Eve. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1954. 58 p. 54–9118 PS3525.A27S72

1589. JOHN PHILLIPS MARQUAND, 1893–

John P. Marquand writes popularly successful novels which usually depict society in New England, frequently in Massachusetts. Often his characters are from the upper classes and are trying to live in accord with values which are no longer valid or are at least debatable. A strain of humor, frequently satire, runs through a large part of his work.

1590. The late George Apley; a novel in the form of a memoir. Boston, Little, Brown, 1937. 354 p. 37–646 PZ3.M34466Lat2

1591. Wickford Point. Boston, Little, Brown, 1939. 458 p. 39–27145 PZ3.M34466Wi

1592. H. M. Pulham, Esquire. Boston, Little, Brown, 1941. 431 p.
41–51574 PZ3.M34466H2
A serial version of this story appeared in McCall's under the title of "Gone Tomorrow."

1593. So little time. Boston, Little, Brown, 1943. 594 p. 43–12144 PZ3.M34466

1594. Repent in haste. Boston, Little, Brown, 1945. 152 p. 45–9462 PZ3.M34466Re

1595. Melville Goodwin, USA. Boston, Little, Brown, 1951. 596 p.
51–12737 PZ3.M34466Me

1596. Point of no return. Boston, Little, Brown, 1949. 559 p. 49–7556 PZ3.M34466Po

1597. Sincerely, Willis Wayde. Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. 511 p.
55–5534 PZ3.M34466Si

1598. Hamburger, Philip P. J. P. Marquand, Esquire, a portrait in the form of a novel. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. 114 p.
52–9587 PS3525.A6695Z7
A biographical study written in a style imitating Marquand's novels.

1599. EDGAR LEE MASTERS, 1868–1950

Masters' one great popular success was the Spoon River Anthology, a collection of free verse poems inspired by the Greek Anthology and meant to represent truthful epitaphs spoken in death by residents of the Spoon River cemetery. In this way a small Midwestern community is "brought to life." Most of Masters' other work was imitation of better known 19th-century poets. Across Spoon River (1936) is his autobiography.

1600. Spoon River anthology. New York, Macmillan, 1915. 248 p.
15–8027 PS3525.A83S5 1915

1601. Selected poems. New York, Macmillan, 1925. 411 p.
25–18498 PS3525.A83A6 1925
This volume contains selections from Spoon River Anthology (1915), Songs and Satires (1916), The Great Valley (1917), Toward the Gulf (1918), Starved Rock (1919), Domesday Book (1920), The Open Sea (1921), and The New Spoon River (1924). Because the selection was made to represent all his work, less than a tenth of his major volume has been included.

1602. HENRY LOUIS MENCKEN, 1880–1956

In his period of greatest activity and fame H. L. Mencken was primarily a journalist with a flair for attacking "established nonsense" (some liked to call him an iconoclast); his views found expression through periodicals such as The Smart Set, The American Mercury, and the Baltimore Sun. Since most of his work dealt with matters of current interest, it now seems in large part to be dated. His studies of the American language and the autobiographical "Days," which reflected life in Baltimore, are of more significance to the student of American civilization.

1603. The American language; an inquiry into the development of English in the United States. [4th ed., corr., enl., and rewritten] New York, Knopf, 1936. 769 p.
36–27236 PE2808.M4 1936
Includes bibliographies.
Supplements I and II appeared in 1945 and 1948.

1604. The days of H. L. Mencken: Happy days, Newspaper days, Heathen days. New York, Knopf, 1947. [958] p.
47–11231 PS3525.E43D34
Each part has special t. p. and is paged separately.

1605. A Mencken chrestomathy, edited and annotated by the author. New York, Knopf, 1949. 627 p. 49–3894 PS3525.E34A6 1949

1606. Kemler, Edgar. The irreverent Mr. Mencken. Boston, Little, Brown, 1950. x, 317 p. illus. 50–7313 PS3525.E43Z59 1950
Bibliographical references included in "Notes" (p. [295]–303). "Chronology of . . . [H. L. Mencken's] books": p. [304]–306.

1607. Manchester, William R. Disturber of the peace; the life of H. L. Mencken. New York, Harper, 1951. xiv, 336 p. ports.
51–9028 PS3525.E43Z67
"Bibliographical note": p. 317–322.

1608. EDNA ST. VINCENT MILLAY, 1892–1950

Miss Millay was a very popular poet who was most renowned for her highly romantic lyrics, especially some of her sonnets expressing passionate love of life and beauty. Although her main achievement was in shorter works, her one-act play Aria da Capo (1921) successfully satirized war and warmakers. This play was included with Two Slatterns and a King (1921) and The Lamp and the Bell (1921) in the volume Three Plays (1926). Perhaps her best-known play is The King's Henchman (1927), which with slight modifications was used as the libretto for an opera by Deems Taylor (b. 1885). In the thirties Miss Millay cultivated, without great poetic success, the "social consciousness" required by the period; this culminated in The Murder of Lidice (1942), a narrative poem about one of the atrocities of the early years of World War II. Her posthumous Letters (1952) reflect aspects of her life and personality not always clear in her poetry itself.

1609. Collected poems. New York, Harper, 1956. 738 p. 56–8756 PS3525.I495A17 1956
Other volumes of poetry by Millay include Renascence (1917), A Few Figs from Thistles (1921), Second April (1921), The Buck in the Snow (1928), Fatal Interview (1931), Wine from These Grapes (1934), Conversation at Midnight (1937), Huntsman, What Quarry? (1939), and Make Bright the Arrows (1940). Mine the Harvest (1954) was a posthumous collection of her poems which had not previously appeared in volume form. Collected Sonnets (1941) and Collected Lyrics (1943) present most of her poetry arranged by type; this same division is to some extent retained in the Collected Poems.

1610. Sheean, Vincent. The indigo bunting; a memoir of Edna St. Vincent Millay. New York, Harper, 1951. 131 p.
51–13495 PS3525.I495Z8

1611. HENRY MILLER, 1891–

Miller has striven to express imaginatively in his fiction and books of travel his concepts of reality. He has on occasion treated the theme of the American expatriate in Europe between 1928 and 1939. The frankness with which details of physical experience are presented in some of his novels aroused official disapproval in America and made it impossible to publish in this country books such as his Tropic of Cancer (1935), which is an autobiographical story of an American expatriate in Paris, and Black Spring (1936), which pictures bums, café habitués, etc., in Paris. The esthetic merits and/or social justification or desirability of Miller's works, which are largely autobiographical and inclined to be radical, have brought forth sharply conflicting views from the critics, some of whom consider him a major author to be praised for his extraordinary vigor and realism, while others deliver an equally strong denunciation.

1612. Tropic of Capricorn. Paris, Obelisk Press [1939] 367 p.
39–13888 PS3525.I5454T8 1939 RBD
A vivid, if revolting, account of the life of an absolute dissident who despises, or pretends to despise, megalopolitan humanity as represented by life in New York City during the first quarter of the 20th century, but who relishes every detail of his personal existence, particularly the physiological ones.

1613. The air-conditioned nightmare. New York, New Directions, 1945–47. 2 v.
45–11390 E169.M6
Based on his travels about the United States, this book reflects the author's critical reaction to, and emotional rejection of the country. His antipathy is intense, and he finds himself most comfortable with people in Indian reservations or the distinctively foreign (especially if poorer) sections of the cities. The second volume bore the title Remember to Remember.

1614. MARY BRITTON MILLER ("ISABEL BOLTON"), 1883–

Mary Miller's career as an author started with poetry, but she first gained general acclaim with the publication in 1943 of her first novel, In the Days of Youth, a story set in New England in the late 19th century. In the forties she began to write under the pseudonym "Isabel Bolton." The short novels with New York City settings which she published under this name have been highly regarded for their style and a lyric quality in precise phrasing and in situation.

1615. Do I wake or sleep, by Isabel Bolton [pseud.] New York, Scribner, 1946. 202 p. 47–1265 PZ3.M61573Do

1616. The Christmas tree, by Isabel Bolton [pseud.] New York, Scribner, 1949. 212 p. 49–7858 PZ3.M61573Ch

1617. Many mansions [by] Isabel Bolton [pseud.] New York, Scribner, 1952. 215 p. 52–12830 PZ3.M61573Man

1618. MARGARET MITCHELL, 1900–1949

Margaret Mitchell's one book was a historical novel of Georgia during the Civil War and the Reconstruction. In publication terms it is said to have been the most successful publication of the century, having sold unprecedented numbers of copies on an international scale; it is still selling well. It was also the source of a highly popular motion picture.

1619. Gone with the wind. New York, Macmillan, 1936. 1037 p. 36–27334 PZ3.M69484Go

1620. MARIANNE MOORE, 1887–

Marianne Moore's poetry, based on mathematical syllabic patterns, is precise in word usage, at times exotic in either its subject matter or its attitudes, and often of abstract philosophical background. She is an objectivist who devotes much attention to fauna such as the jerboa. She believes poems should be ". . . imaginary gardens with real toads in them."

1621. Collected poems. New York, Macmillan, 1951. 180 p. 51–14374 PS3525.O5616A6 1951a

This collection includes poems from the author's earlier volumes Selected Poems (1935), What Are Years (1941), and Nevertheless (1944), as well as a group of poems which had not previously been brought together in book form.

1622. Predilections. New York, Viking Press, 1955. 171 p. 55–7376 PS3525.O5616P7

A volume of literary criticism made up of articles, essays, and reviews.

1623. MERRILL MOORE, 1903–

It has been estimated that Dr. Moore has already written some 100,000 sonnets. While he writes in a nominally traditional form, he is modernistic in his free treatment of it, and often also in his subject matter. Many of his sonnets are autobiographical, often reflecting his Southern background or his experiences as a psychiatrist.

1624. M; one thousand autobiographical sonnets. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1938. 1000 p. 39–537 PS3525.O563M2 1938

1625. Clinical sonnets. New York, Twayne, 1949. 72 p. [The Twayne library of modern poetry, 6] 49–50118 PS3525.O563C6

1626. Illegitimate sonnets. New York, Twayne, 1950. 125 p. 51–225 PS3525.O563I4

1627. More clinical sonnets. New York, Twayne, 1953. 72 p. 53–1172 PS3525.O563M6

1628. Wells, Henry W. Poet and psychiatrist: Merrill Moore, M. D.; a critical portrait with an appraisal of two hundred of his poems. New York, Twayne, 1955. 325 p. 55–3466 PS3525.O563Z94

1629. OGDEN NASH, 1902–

Nash, who is noted for the tortured rhymes and irregular rhythms of his light verse, in which he expresses gently ironic commentaries on life, is commonly considered America's best modern humorous poet.

1630. I'm a stranger here myself. Boston, Little, Brown, 1938. 283 p. 38–27468 PS3527.A637I5 1938

1631. Good intentions. Boston, Little, Brown, 1942. 180 p. 42–25547 PS3527.A637G6

1632. Many long years ago. Boston, Little, Brown, 1945. xvii, 333 p. 45–8449 PS3527.A637M3

1633. Versus. Boston, Little, Brown, 1949. 169 p. 49–7579 PS3527.A637V4

1634. The private dining room, and other new verses. Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 169 p. 52–12647 PS3527.A637P73

1635. ROBERT GRUNTAL NATHAN, 1894–

Robert Nathan's first critical acclaim came for his book Autumn (1921), a Vermont pastoral characteristic of most of his work. His books are usually very short imaginative novelettes of fantasy written in a style that has often been called poetic and delicate, and which are pervaded by a tenderness that eliminates almost any astringent effects from the irony and satire of his humor. His books range from The Puppet Master (1923), wherein dolls converse, through Journey of Tapiola (1938), the adventures of a terrier in New York, to Road of Ages (1935), the story of a caravan of Jews wending their way to a new home, and But Gently Day (1943), a tale of a young airman, killed in the war, who in the moment before dying joins his ancestors of the Civil War period and has a love affair with his grandmother. Children, animals, toys, and dreams recur in Nathan's stories, but he considers them to be as real as famine, floods, share-croppers, production lines, and slums, and so defends himself from charges of irreality and irrelevance. Nathan has also written several volumes of formal, conservative verse; The Green Leaf (1950) was a volume of collected poems.

1636. One more spring. New York, Knopf, 1933. 212 p. 33–3086 PZ3.N195On

A novelette in which some characters take refuge, during a depression winter, in a shed in New York's Central Park.

1637. The Barly fields, a collection of five novels. New York, Knopf, 1938. xiv, 523 p. 38–27469 PZ3.N195Bar

CONTENTS.—The fidler in Barly.—The woodcutter's house.—The bishop's wife.—The orchid.—There is another heaven.

1638. Winter in April. New York, Knopf, 1938. 228 p. 38–27028 PZ3.N195Wi

A novel, without much of the usual fantasy, in which youth and age fall in love.

1639. Portrait of Jennie. New York, Knopf, 1940. 212 p. 40–27011 PZ3.N195Po

A fantasy in time which seems to imply a mystical belief in the immortality of the soul.

1640. Journal for Josephine. New York, Knopf, 1943. 142 p. 43–2244 PS3527.A74J6

A picture of Cape Cod during the summer of 1942; to some extent it may be generalized to a picture of the home front during World War II.

1641. The married look. New York, Knopf, 1950. 195 p. 50–13123 PZ3.N195Mar Another romantic fantasy in time.

1642. The innocent Eve. New York, Knopf, 1951. 184 p. 51–10299 PZ3.N195In

Lucifer visits New York with his secretary.

1643. Sir Henry. New York, Knopf, 1955, ℗1954. 187 p. 54–12039 PZ7.N195Si

A satirical fantasy.

1644. JOHN GNEISENAU NEIHARDT, 1881–

Neihardt's major undertaking was a series of epics depicting the trans-Missouri country in the 19th century, particularly the 1880's. In iambic pentameter rhymed couplets he wrote of the pioneers and the Indians. His prose, dealing with much the same theme and setting, is linguistically less artificial.

1645. A cycle of the West: The song of three friends [1919], The song of Hugh Glass [1915], The song of Jed Smith [1941], The song of the Indian Wars [1925], The song of the Messiah [1935]. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 254, 113, 179, 110 p. 49–8578 PS3527.E35C8

1646. When the tree flowered; an authentic tale of the old Sioux world. New York, Macmillan, 1951. 248 p. 51–6974 PZ3.N316Wh

1647. EUGENE GLADSTONE O'NEILL, 1888–1953

Eugene O'Neill emerged, through the experimentalist little theater movement in general and the Provincetown Playhouse in particular, as America's first major dramatist; in doing this he set aside a dramatic tradition of theater as craft alone, and established one of theater as art. O'Neill's plays are a search for the nature of tragedy in modern times. Life must be meaningfully expressed in a relationship between the individual (frequently seen through Freudian theories) and forces, internal or external, which are beyond his control, rather than one between man and God. This concept may be clearly seen in Mourning Becomes Electra, a Trilogy, wherein the ancient Greek tragedy, or tragedies, of Agamemnon, Orestes, Electra, et al., is transformed and transferred to New England of the period following the Civil War. Also regularly recurrent is the character's struggle to find his place in the world and with regard to himself: either finding it, as in Lazarus Laughed; or losing himself successfully in a world of fantasy, as in the philosophical The Iceman Cometh; or losing himself unsuccessfully in despair, as in The Hairy Ape. While normally a romantic realist, seeking a rational ideal, he turned occasionally to a more visionary type of drama, which reached its peak in the affirmative vision of Lazarus Laughed, which some consider his greatest play. Others prefer the psychological-sociological probing in plays such as the mammoth Strange Interlude. A few prefer his early, less ambitious sea plays, e. g., The Moon of the Caribbees, and Six Other Plays of the Sea. Meanwhile the lyrical, nostalgic comedy Ah, Wilderness! remains one of his most popular full-length works, particularly with small theater groups. In 1936 O'Neill was awarded the Nobel prize for literature.

1648. Plays. New York, Random House, 1951. 3 v. (The Random House lifetime library)
51–9684 PS3529.N5 1951

CONTENTS.—1. Strange interlude (1928). Desire under the elms (1925). Lazarus laughed (1927). The fountain (1926). The moon of the Caribbees (1919). Bound east for Cardiff (1916). The long voyage home (1919). In the zone (1919). Ile (1919). Where the cross is made (1919). The rope (1919). The dreamy kid (1922). Before breakfast (1916).—2. Mourning becomes Electra (1931). Ah, wilderness! (1933). All God's chillun got wings (1924). Marco millions (1927). Welded (1924). Diff'rent (1921). The first man (1922). Gold (1920).—3. "Anna Christie" (1922). Beyond the horizon (1920). The Emperor Jones (1921). The hairy ape (1922). The great god Brown (1922). The straw (1921). Dynamo (1929). Days without end (1934). The iceman cometh (1946).

1649. A moon for the misbegotten. New York, Random House, 1952. 177 p.
52–6668 PS3529.N5M68 1952

1650. Engel, Edwin A. The haunted heroes of Eugene O'Neill. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 310 p.
53–5068 PS3529.N5Z63

1651. DOROTHY (ROTHSCHILD) PARKER, 1893–

Dorothy Parker is a New York wit who gained fame for her light (and often barbed) verse and her satirical short stories. Her collected poems appeared in Not So Deep as a Well (1936), and her collected stories in Here Lies (1939). She has also written for stage and film.

1652. Dorothy Parker, with an introd. by W. Somerset Maugham. New York, Viking Press, 1944. 544 p. (The Viking portable library)
44–4169 PS3531.A5855A6 1944

A collection of poems and stories.

1653. JULIA MOOD PETERKIN, 1880–

Julia Peterkin described in her fiction the life of isolated plantation Negroes in South Carolina. Her local color stories were characterized not only by an evocation of the setting, but also by an attempt to reproduce the dialect. The novels have been considered among the best about Negroes. In Roll, Jordan, Roll (1933) she undertook a nonfictional presentation of the Negroes in her tales; the book was extensively illustrated with photographs by Doris Ulmann.

1654. Black April. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1927. 315 p. 27–5080 PZ3.P436Bl

1655. Scarlet sister Mary. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1928. 345 p.
28–24477 PZ3.P436Sc

Awarded the Pulitzer prize for literature in 1929.

1656. ERNEST POOLE, 1880–1950.

Ernest Poole was a novelist concerned with social problems. He commonly wrote with the point of view of a socialist of the early part of the century. His first novel, The Voice of the Street (1906), which depicts poverty in New York's East Side, in a way set the pace for his works, which often deal with American problems, frequently with a New York particularization. However, there are exceptions, such as With Western Eyes (1926), in which a Russian scientist views America; The Nancy Flyer, a Stagecoach Epic (1949), a reconstruction of stagecoach history in Poole's adopted state of New Hampshire; and Blind: A Story Of These Times (1920), which in part portrays tenement life in New York, but also deals with Europe and the Russian Revolution. The Bridge, an autobiography, was published in 1940.

1657. The harbor. New York, Macmillan, 1915. 387 p. 15–2844 PZ3.P785H

Usually considered Poole's best book, this has been called the outstanding American proletarian novel.

1658. His family. New York, Macmillan, 1917. 320 p. 17–13623 PZ3.P785Hi

A New York family as typifying changes in modern life; the book was awarded a Pulitzer prize in 1918.

1659. KATHERINE ANNE PORTER, 1894–

Katherine Anne Porter, who writes short stories on a wide range of topics, has been generally acclaimed for her perfection on a small scale, the precision of her English, her restraint, and the poetic element in her style. Born and reared in Texas and Louisiana, her experience has also included several years in Mexico and Europe; from each of these areas she has drawn settings for her stories. Although her work is small in bulk, and in some respects in scope, almost all of it has been highly praised. Outside the short-story form her work includes the writing of Mae Franking's anonymously published My Chinese Marriage (1921), which Miss Porter disclaims on the grounds that she was merely setting down another person's story, and The Days Before (1952), a collection of essays and articles, most of which were written to meet specific editorial demand at various times throughout her career.

1660. Flowering Judas. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1930. 145 p.
30–25819 PS3531.O752F55 1930
PZ3.P8315Fl

CONTENTS. — Maria Concepción. — Magic. — Rope.—He.—The jilting of Granny Weatherall.—Flowering Judas. Theft, That Tree, The cracked looking-glass, and Hacienda were added in the 1935 edition.

1661. Pale horse, pale rider; three short novels. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. 264 p.
39–27273 PZ3.P8315Pal
PS3531.O752Pe

CONTENTS.—Old morality.—Noon wine.—Pale horse, pale rider.

1662. The leaning tower, and other stories. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1944. 246 p.
44–7946 PZ3.P8315Le

1663. Schwartz, Edward. Katherine Anne Porter; a critical bibliography. New York, New York Public Library, 1953. 42 p.
53–2504 Z87057.S35

Reprinted from the Bulletin of the New York Public Library of May 1953.

1664. EZRA LOOMIS POUND, 1885–

In his early literary essays, poetry, and translations, as well as personally, Pound exerted a considerable effect on American literature, influencing and "discovering" poets such as Hart Crane, William Carlos Williams, Robert Frost, T. S. Eliot, Archibald MacLeish, Carl Sandburg, Amy Lowell, and others. The supreme greatness or hopelessly obfuscated cacophony of his later work is still being debated: partly in nonliterary terms, for Pound rests in political disrepute, largely based on the economic and political views which led him to side with Mussolini during World War II. Always concerned with literary theory and technique (when not obsessed by economic matters), even his Letters, 1907–1941 (1950) as edited by D. D. Paige are presentations of literary views, rather than reflections of a personal life. Pound's translations and adaptations of poems from Chinese and Provençal, among others, have not only done much to make such literature known to Americans, but the creativeness applied to some of them has given the work the seminal effect of forceful original poetry. Considered by some an outstanding achievement in modern verse drama is his translation of Sophocles' Women of Trachis, which appeared in 1954 in the winter issue of The Hudson Review.

1665. The cantos. [New York] New Directions, 1948. 149, 56, 46, 167, 118 p.
48–4633 PS3531.O82C28

CONTENTS.—A draft of XXX cantos.—Eleven new cantos, XXXI–XLI.—The fifth decade of cantos.—Cantos LII–LXXI.—The Pisan cantos.

1666. Personae; the collected poems. [New York] New Directions [1950? ᶜ 1926] 273 p.
50–13308 PS3531.O82P4 1950

Personae was first used by Pound as a title for a 1909 volume of poetry; the title was used again for a collection of poetry published in 1926. This collection also included material from Exultations (1909), Ripostes (1912), Lustra (1916), Hugh Selwyn Mauberley (1920), and Homage to Sextus Propertius, which was first published independently in 1934, although it dates from 1917. The present edition of the Personae is meant to include all Pound's poems other than the Cantos. Pound's other independent volumes of poetry have included Canzoni (1911), Cathay (1915), Quia Pauper Amavi (1919), Umbra (1920), Poems, 1918–21 (1921), Indiscretions (1923), and Alfred Venison's Poems (1935).

1667. The translations of Ezra Pound. [New York] New Directions [1953?] 408 p.
53–11965 PN6020.P6

1668. Literary essays. Edited with an introd. by T. S. Eliot. [Norfolk, Conn.] New Directions, 1954. xv, 464 p. 54–7905 PN511.P625

1669. Edwards, John H. A preliminary checklist of the writings of Ezra Pound, especially his contributions to periodicals. New Haven, Kirgo-Books, 1953. viii, 73 p. 52–12855 Z8709.3.E3

1670. Espey, John J. Ezra Pound's Mauberley; a study in composition. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1955. 139 p. 54–6474 PS3531.O82H842 1955

1671. Kenner, Hugh. The poetry of Ezra Pound. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1951. 342 p. 51–12356 PS3531.O82Z7

1672. Leary, Lewis G., ed. Motive and method in The cantos of Ezra Pound. New York, Columbia University Press, 1954. viii, 135 p. (English Institute. Essays, 1953) 54–11609 PE1010.E5 1953

1673. Russell, Peter, ed. An examination of Ezra Pound; a collection of essays. [Norfolk, Conn.] New Directions, 1950. 268 p. 50–10415 PS3531.O82Z8 1950a
London ed. (P. Nevill) has title: Ezra Pound.

1674. Watts, Harold H. Ezra Pound and The cantos. Chicago, Regnery, 1952. 132 p. 53–1720 PS3531.O82C29 1952a

1675. JOHN CROWE RANSOM, 1888–

Ransom's poetry is distinguished by verbal elegance and precision, and permeated by gentle, intellectual irony. His first book, Poems About God (1919), bore the promise that has been fulfilled in the small quantity of verse he has since published. Not only an accomplished poet, Ransom is also prominent as a literary critic and as editor of the literary quarterly. The Kenyon Review (v. 1+ winter 1939+ Gambier, Ohio, Kenyon College).

1676. Chills and fever, poems. New York, Knopf, 1924. 95 p. 24–21606 PS3535.A635C5 1924

1677. Two gentlemen in bonds. New York, Knopf, 1927. 87 p. 27–2199 PS3535.A635T8 1927
Verse.

1678. The world's body. New York, Scribner, 1938. 350 p. 38–27471 PN1136.R3
CONTENTS.—A poem nearly anonymous.—Forms and citizens.—Poets without laurels.—The poet as woman.—Poetry: a note in ontology.—A psychologist looks at poetry.—A cathedralist looks at murder.—The cathartic principle.—The mimetic principle.—Sentimental exercise.—The tense of poetry.—Contemporaneous not contemporary.—Shakespeare at sonnets.—Art and Mr. Santayana.—Criticism, inc.

1679. Poems and essays. New York, Vintage Books, 1955. 185 p. (A Vintage book, K–24) 55–3813 PS3535.A635A6 1955
The poems in this volume are, with two additions, the same as those which appeared in Ransom's Selected Poems (1945). The essays are from periodicals, and had not previously had publication in volume form.

1680. MARJORIE (KINNAN) RAWLINGS, 1896–1954

Mrs. Rawlings' books have dealt with the isolated and somewhat primitive hammock district of Florida, with the exception of The Sojourner (1952), which was set in New York State. Best known for her novels, she has also published a volume of short stories and an autobiographical book describing her Florida neighbors as much as her own life. Her work, which has much local color detail and description, is realistic in manner, at times inclined to be sentimental, and with a frank love of the country and its people. An impression of their dialect is conveyed more in wording than spelling.

1681. South moon under. New York, Scribner, 1933. 334 p. 33–5485 PZ3.R1969So
A novel depicting the life of a hunter in the Florida backwoods.

1682. Golden apples. New York, Scribner, 1935. 352 p. 35–18688 PZ3.R1969Go
A story, with some culture conflict, of farming in the Florida back country.

1683. The yearling. New York, Scribner, 1938. 428 p. 38–27280 PZ3.R1969Ye
The author was awarded a Pulitzer prize for this novel about an adolescent in the Florida back country and his love for a pet fawn.

1684. When the whippoorwill— New York, Scribner, 1940. 275 p. 40–27409 PZ3.R1969Wh
CONTENTS.—A crop of beans.—Benny and the bird dogs.—Jacob's ladder.—The pardon.—Varmints.—The enemy.—Gal young 'un.—Alligators.—A plumb clare conscience.—A mother in Mannville.—Cocks must crow.

1685. Cross Creek. New York, Scribner, 1942. 368 p. 42–36118 PS3535.A845C7
Autobiographical work descriptive of the author's home area in Florida.

1686. EUGENE MANLOVE RHODES, 1869–1934

A cowboy and a writer in New Mexico, Rhodes wrote regional novels and short stories which are considered among the most literary of westerns. He truthfully depicted the background and social attitudes (which he shared) of the cowboy society of the late 19th century on the cattle ranges. One of his most esteemed novels, Pasó por Aqui (1927) was widely distributed as the movie Four Faces West. May Davison Rhodes, his wife, shortly after his death wrote a biography of him: The Hired Man on Horseback (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1938. 263 p.).

1687. Best novels and stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1949. xxii, 551 p. 49–11703 PZ3.R3443Bd Novels and novelettes included: Pasó por aqui.—Good men and true.—Bransford of Rainbow Range.—The trusty knaves.—The desire of the moth.—Hit the line hard.

1688. ELMER L. RICE, 1892–

Elmer Rice, born Elmer Reizenstein, is a New York dramatist who first attracted attention with realistic plays which commonly carried some leftist moral. A withdrawal from his leftist position was effected in his later work. Probably his most famous play is Street Scene, which reflects life in a New York slum tenement block. He tried to give the same treatment to New York as a whole in his novel, Imperial City (1937). His earlier novel, A Voyage to Purilia (1930) was a satire on the movie industry; his later novel, The Show Must Go On (1949) was a more serious study of theater life.

1689. Seven plays. New York, Viking Press, 1950. x, 524 p. 50–10796 PS3535.I224S45
Contents.—On trial (1914).—The adding machine (1923).—Street scene (1929).—Counsellor-at-law (1931).—Judgment day (1934).—Two on an island (1940).—Dream girl (1946).

1690. The winner, a play in four scenes. New York, Dramatists Play Service, 1954. 127 p. 54–11654 PS3535.I224W5

1691. CONRAD MICHAEL RICHTER, 1890–

Conrad Richter writes historical novels and short stories which give his impressions of life in America. His setting is often the American Southwest, to which he himself moved, or the region about Ohio and Pennsylvania, where he was born. His lucid style, depiction of local color, and recording of historical details are characteristics of his work. He has also written nonfiction, such as The Mountain on the Desert (1955), which expresses his philosophic and mystic view of life.

1692. Early Americana and other stories. New York, Knopf, 1936. 322 p. 36–21011 PZ3.R417Ear
Contents.—Early Americana.—Smoke over the prairie.—New home.—Long drouth.—Frontier woman.—As it was in the beginning.—Buckskin vacation.—The square piano.—Early marriage.

1693. The sea of grass. New York, Knopf, 1937. 149 p. 37–27107 PZ3.R417Se2
A refined heroine leaves her husband and children and their large cattle ranch to return to the city; after 20 years she returns and is accepted back by her husband.

1694. The trees. New York, Knopf, 1940. 302 p. 40–27179 PZ3.R417Tr
The first volume of a trilogy, this is the story of a Pennsylvania pioneer family's immigration to Ohio near the end of the 18th century. It was followed in 1946 by The Fields (PZ3.R417Fi 46–2155), which is the story of the next generation opening up the frontier community. In 1950 appeared The Town (PZ3.R417To 50–6331), in which the family moves from a cabin to a mansion, and the community becomes a town, while the frontier has moved further West.

1695. The free man. New York, Knopf, 1943. 147 p. 43–11545 PZ3.R417Fr
The story of a German who arrives in America as an indentured servant; fights in the Revolutionary War against the British; and lives with the Pennsylvania Dutch as a free man.

1696. The light in the forest. New York, Knopf, 1953. 179 p. 52–12207 PZ3.R417Li
A story of the conflict of white and Indian views of life. It centers about the rescue of a boy after 11 years with the Delaware Indians who had captured him, of the boy's attempt to rejoin the Indians, and the results.

1697. ELIZABETH MADOX ROBERTS, 1886–1941

Elizabeth Madox Roberts wrote novels and short stories of life in rural Kentucky at various social levels and at different periods, among which the 20th century predominates. Artistry of style and lyricism are characteristics of her best work. In the field of poetry the author wrote first for children and later for adults, introducing certain aspects of the folk song into this portion of her work. Her last volume of poems was Song in the Meadow (1940). In almost all of her writing she made some use of the English spoken in the Kentucky hills. The dialect added freshness and vitality to her work, except when the form was extreme or when its presence constituted an impediment for readers unfamiliar with the speech of the locality.

1698. The time of man. New York, Viking Press, 1926. 382 p. 26–15401 PZ3.R54145Ti

The author's first novel and the one most frequently read and reprinted. It is a story of poor whites in rural Kentucky.

1699. My heart and my flesh . . . a novel. New York, Viking Press, 1927. 300 p.
27–22999 PZ3.R54145My

Against a Kentucky setting this book unfolds a psychological story of a young woman, of aristocratic family, who survives near-insanity and protracted illness to find happiness.

1700. Jingling in the wind. New York, Viking Press, 1928. 256 p.
28–22353 PZ3.R54145Ji

A humorous fantasy about a rural rainmaker and his trip to the metropolis to attend a convention of rainmakers.

1701. The great meadow. New York, Viking Press, 1930. 338 p.
30–7676 PZ3.R54145Gr

A story of pioneer life in Kentucky and conflict with the Indians.

1702. A buried treasure. New York, Viking Press, 1931. 296 p.
31–28312 PZ3.R5414Bur

A humorous narrative about a farmer and his wife who discover a buried treasure, and the celebration party they hold.

1703. The haunted mirror. New York, Viking Press, 1932. 288 p.
32–32267 PZ3.R54145Hau

A volume of short stories.

1704. He sent forth a raven. New York, Viking Press, 1935. 255 p.
35–27098 PZ3.R54145He

A poetic and somewhat mystic story about a farmer who, after his wife's death, vowed not to set foot on earth again, and then spent the rest of his life directing the farm work from his porch.

1705. Black is my truelove's hair. New York, Viking Press, 1938. 281 p.
38–27966 PZ3.R54145Bl

A lyrical novel of a Kentucky village girl who eventually finds true love; the story is written in a simple prose reflecting the native speech of the region.

1706. Not by strange gods; stories. New York, Viking Press, 1941. 244 p.
41–5114 PZ3.R54145No

CONTENTS.—The haunted palace.—I love my bonny bride.—Swing low, sweet chariot.—Holy morning.—The betrothed.—Love by the highway.

1707. KENNETH LEWIS ROBERTS, 1885–

Kenneth Roberts is a historical novelist who usually sets his stories in early America (from the pre-Revolutionary period through the War of 1812). Maine, the state in which he lives, or characters from Maine, are often prominent in his books.

1708. Arundel, being the recollections of Steven Nason of Arundel, in the province of Maine, attached to the secret expedition led by Colonel Benedict Arnold against Quebec and later a captain in the Continental Army serving at Valcour Island, Bemis Heights, and Yorktown. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1930. 618 p.
30–3872 PZ3.R54263Ar

Sequels: Rabble in Arms and Captain Caution.

1709. Rabble in arms; a chronicle of Arundel and the Burgoyne invasion. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1933. 870 p.
33–33263 PZ3.R54263Rab

Sequel: Captain Caution (1934).
Preceded by: Arundel.

1710. Northwest passage. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1937. 2 v.
37–27401 PS3535.O176N6 1937

The first part recounts the campaigns of Robert Rogers and Rogers' Rangers against the Indians; the second part is largely the story of Rogers' search for a northwest passage.

1711. Oliver Wiswell. New York, Doubleday, Doran, 1940. 2 v.
40–36023 PS3535.O176O5 1940
A novel of the American Revolution as seen by a colonial loyalist.

1712. Boon Island. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1956, ©1955. 275 p.
56–5443 PZ3.R54263Bo
The story of a shipwreck, which occurred in the winter of 1710 on a rocky island off the New Hampshire coast, and of the endurance of the survivors who underwent extreme hardships.

1713. EDWIN ARLINGTON ROBINSON, 1869–1935

Robinson's poetry is basically a searching for ultimate moral values. This quest is often presented through dramatic sketches of individuals, many of whom are associated with Tilbury, the fictitious name he assigned to Gardiner, Maine, the town in which he was reared. Although his content was novel, he employed conservative verse forms. He started writing near the beginning—and was himself part—of the revolt against the effete sunsets-and-nightingales poetry that quantitatively dominated late 19th-century poetic production. At his best in his dramatic sketches and lyrics, Robinson also wrote a number of long narrative poems which attracted considerable attention when they were first published. Initially he struggled in isolation for recognition, so that he became a somewhat embittered author; but his subsequently acknowledged position as an important poet and his transitional modernity have led various schools to claim him as a member, or at least as a precursor. The struggle for achievement, recognition, and even survival is reflected more directly in his letters than in his poetry.

1714. Collected poems. New York, Macmillan, 1937. xii, 1498 p.
37–27280 PS3535.O25A17 1937
"Complete edition with additional poems. Published April 1937."
CONTENTS.—The man against the sky (1916).—The children of the night (1890–1897).—Captain Craig, etc. (1902).—Merlin (1917).—The town down the river (1910).—Lancelot (1920).—The three taverns (1920).—Avon's harvest, etc. (1921)—Tristram (1927).—Roman Bartholow (1923).—Dionysus in doubt (1925).—The man who died twice (1924).—Cavender's house (1929).—The glory of the nightingales (1930).—Matthias at the door (1931).—Nicodemus (1932).—Talifer (1933).—Amaranth (1934).—King Jasper (1935).

1715. Selected letters. New York, Macmillan, 1940. x, 191 p. 40–27180 PS3535.O25Z53

1716. Untriangulated stars; letters of Edwin Arlington Robinson to Harry de Forest Smith, 1890–1905. Edited by Denham Sutcliffe. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1947. xxvii, 348 p. 47–11410 PS3535.O25Z54

1717. Barnard, Ellsworth. Edwin Arlington Robinson, a critical study. New York, Macmillan, 1952. xii, 318 p.
52–7104 PS3535.O25Z555

1718. Fussell, Edwin S. Edwin Arlington Robinson; the literary background of a traditional poet. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1954. 211 p. 54–8017 PS3535.O25Z66

1719. Neff, Emery E. Edwin Arlington Robinson. [New York] Sloane, 1948. xviii, 286 p. (The American men of letters series)
48–8640 PS3535.O25Z74

1720. OLE EDVART RØLVAAG, 1876–1931

Rølvaag came to America from Norway in 1896. He attended St. Olaf College in Minnesota, where from 1907 to 1931 he was professor of Norwegian; in that language all his books were originally written. The first novel of the trilogy which was his major work is usually regarded as his best; in it he realistically depicts the life of Norwegian emigrants in South Dakota when it was part of the Northwestern frontier. The two subsequent novels follow the family history after the initial pioneer period had passed.

1721. Giants in the earth; a saga of the prairie. New York, Harper, 1927. 465 p.
27–12513 PZ3.R6275Gi
Translated by the author from I De Dage, published by Aschehoug, 1924–25.

1722. Peder Victorious, a novel. Translated from the Norwegian, English text by Nora O. Solum . . . and the author. New York, Harper, 1929. 350 p. 29–1081 PZ3.R6285Pe Translation of Peder Seier.

1723. Their fathers' God, a novel. Translated from the Norwegian by Trygve M. Ager. New York, Harper, 1931. 338 p.
31–29967 PZ3.R6275Th
Translation of Den Signede Dag.

1724. ARCHIBALD HAMILTON RUTLEDGE, 1883–

Archibald Rutledge comes from a low country area, formerly a rice plantation, in South Carolina; this he usually uses as a setting for his writings. Some of his best work is that of a nature-lover and hunter describing his hunting experiences and the woods and swamplands, with much attention given to the animals inhabiting them; such books include Children of Swamp and Wood (1927), An American Hunter (1937), and Hunter's Choice (1946). Further aspects of life on his plantation are treated in the short stories of Old Plantation Days (1921) and the somewhat sentimental Peace in the Heart (1930). In addition to the short stories and the nature and hunting sketches, Rutledge has also written much conservative poetry, a recent volume of selections being Brimming Tide and Other Poems (1954).

1725. Wild life of the South. New York, Stokes, 1935. 253 p. illus.
35–17191 QH81.R9783

1726. Home by the river. Indianapolis, New York, Bobbs-Merrill, 1941. 167 p. plates, ports. 41–4127 F279.H25R8
A book of Rutledge's experiences and observations at, as well as some historical background of, the family plantation at Hampton, S. C.

1727. CARL SANDBURG, 1878–

Sandburg first gained prominence as a realistic poet of America in general and of Chicago and the Midwest in particular. He has adapted Whitman's form and idiom with much success to evoke urban industrial America, the small town, and rural America. Although a 1950 volume of his collected poetry was awarded a Pulitzer prize for poetry, his free verse has tended in recent years to be overshadowed by his prose: his biographical work on Lincoln, his autobiography, and the long historical novel, Remembrance Rock.

1728. Abraham Lincoln, the prairie years. With 105 illus. from photographs, and many cartoons, sketches, maps, and letters. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1926. 2 v. 26–38885–E457.3.S22

1729. Abraham Lincoln, the war years. With 414 half-tones of photographs and 249 cuts of cartoons, letters, documents. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. 4 v. 39–27998 E457.4.S36

1730. Remembrance Rock. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1948. 1067 p.
48–8509 PZ3.S213Re
A patriotic novel attempting to convey the "American Dream." The book attempts this through picturing the people and times at three critical stages: the Puritan period, the time of the Revolutionary War, and the pre-Civil War and Civil War period.

1731. Complete poems. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 676 p.
50–11502 PS3537.A618 1950
Among earlier volumes of Sandburg's poetry are In Reckless Ecstasy (1904), Chicago Poems (1916), Cornhuskers (1918), Smoke and Steel (1920), Slabs of the Sunburnt West (1922), Good Morning, America (1928), and The People, Yes (1936).

1732. Always the young strangers. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1952. 527 l.
53–9843 PS3537.A618Z5 1952
Autobiographical.

1733. GEORGE SANTAYANA, 1863–1952

Santayana was born in Spain of a Spanish father and a New England mother; he came to America as a child, but after some forty years returned to Europe, where he passed the rest of his life. He has been praised for his poetry, despite its limited bulk; his one novel achieved considerable renown; and he wrote an outstanding autobiography. However, it is as a philosopher of literary merit that he is best known, and his philosophical works are treated under the Philosophy section of this bibliography. In all his work Santayana has been a stylist of conservative tendencies and with a consciousness of word connotations.

1734. Poems. New York, Scribner, 1923. 140 p.
23–5779 PS2770.A4 1923

1735. The genteel tradition at bay. New York, Scribner, 1931. 74 p. 31–26894 B821.S17
Three essays on the old and the new humanism.

1736. The last Puritan; a memoir in the form of a novel. London, Constable, 1935. 721 p.
35–31979 PZ3.S2284Las
A study of the New England character, bleakly bowed beneath the weight of moral duty.

1737. Persons and places. New York, Scribner, 1944–53. 3 v. 43–51363 B945.S24A3
Autobiography.
CONTENTS.—[v. 1] The background of my life.—v. 2. The middle span.—v. 3. My host the world.

1738. Dialogues in limbo, with 3 new dialogues. New York , Scribner, 1948. 248 p.
48–10294 B945.S23D5 1948
First issued in 1925.

1739. Dominations and powers; reflections on liberty, society, and government. New York, Scribner, 1951. 481 p. 51–10642 JC251.S33

1740. The poet's testament: poems and two plays. New York, Scribner, 1953. 216 p.
53–11773 PS2772.P6
The two plays are The Marriage of Venus and Philosophers at Court.

1741. Letters. Edited, with an introd. and commentary, by Daniel Cory. New York, Scribner, 1955. xxxi, 451 p.
55–9677 B945.S24A4

1742. Duron, Jacques. La pensée de George Santayana; Santayana en Amérique. Paris, Nizet [1950] viii, 556 p. 51–22923 B945.S24D8

1743. EVELYN SCOTT, 1893–

Evelyn Scott is a novelist who has been concerned with establishing basic motivations and attitudes behind human actions. Her exposure of hypocrisies and shams, expressed with seriousness of purpose and resultant common lack of humor, have resulted in subjects and views to which conservatives have objected. Her usually long, fictional accounts of life in America are written in a realistic, neo-naturalistic style and with a wealth of accurately observed detail expressive of her impressionistic rather than interpretational approach. Some of her books are episodic in character, rather than adhering to rigid plot structure. This may be seen in works such as Breathe Upon These Slain (1934), a novel which recreates the lives of former inhabitants of a rented English farmhouse, evolving the story from the evidence of what they have left behind. At the same time she shared with Waldo Frank a milder (i. e., less communistic) liberalism and a tendency to see characters as part of a group or setting, rather than as individuals; early influenced by the writings of Karl Marx, in the thirties she turned from what she considered a perversion of his principles, and started to evolve her own course of liberalism. In addition to her fiction, she has written some poetry and two volumes of autobiography: Escapade (1923) and Background In Tennessee (1937), which is as much a study of her background as of any part of her life.

1744. The narrow house. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1921. 221 p.
21–5273 PZ3.S245Na
A novel of drab lives pressed together in a narrow house.

1745. The wave. New York, Cape & Smith, 1929. 624 p. 29–14106 PZ3.S4245Wav
A loosely structured novel of narratives of the Civil War.

1746. A calendar of sin, American melodramas. New York, Cape & Smith, 1931. 2 v.
31–28134 PZ3.S4245Cal
A novel evolving from the stories of five generations of a family.

1747. Eva Gay, a romantic novel. New York, Smith & Haas, 1933. 799 p.
33–27102 PZ3.S4245Ev
A story with the world for stage; on the plot level it is concerned with a woman and her two loves.

1748. The shadow of the hawk. New York, Scribner, 1941. 494 p. 41–7659 PZ3.S4245Sh
The story of a boy who grows up with the knowledge that his father, convicted of murder, was innocent.

1749. ROBERT EMMET SHERWOOD, 1896–1955

Robert Sherwood distinguished himself in several fields, but is probably best known for his dramatic work. His early plays, such as The Road to Rome (1927) and Reunion in Vienna (1932), tended to be comedies displaying Shavian influence. With The Petrified Forest he began to show a more personal style in serious drama. After this his work was predominantly serious. Related to his work in drama is his writing for films. Sherwood was also the author of Roosevelt and Hopkins, an Intimate History (1948, rev. 1950), for which he was awarded the Pulitzer prize for biography. He also three times received the Pulitzer award for drama.

1750. The petrified forest. New York, Scribner, 1935. 176 p.
35–5154 PS3537.H825P4 1935

1751. Idiot's delight. [A play] New York, Scribner, 1936. 190 p.
36–8866 PS3537.H825I4 1936

1752. Abe Lincoln in Illinois, a play in twelve scenes. New York, Scribner, 1939. 250 p.
39–27098 PS3537.H825A63 1939

1753. There shall be no night. New York, Scribner, 1940. 178 p.
40–27741 PS3537.H825T45 1940a

1754. UPTON BEALL SINCLAIR, 1878–

Upton Sinclair is an extremely prolific author with a gift for presenting action in a journalistic manner. His usually realistic work has been largely propagandistic and, in his early years, almost entirely "proletarian" in emphasis. The Jungle, his first successful publication, was an exposé of conditions in the meat industry in Chicago; it was influential in starting a crusade for pure food in the Theodore Roosevelt era, and has been called the most powerful novel of the muckraking movement. Later he turned to writing pamphlets, from The Profits of Religion (1918) through Mammonart (1925) and Money Writes (1927); in this series he produced one of the most thorough, if unbalanced, Marxian interpretations of American culture. After a few years he again turned from proletarian novels in order to write in aid of his campaign for the governorship of California, to which he was nearly elected in 1934. In 1940 he started publication of a series of novels centering about Lanny Budd, a hero whose mobility enabled the author to comment about numerous contemporary affairs. The series depicts the situation, national and international, from the beginning of World War I through the period following World War II. In 1943 the third volume, Dragon's Teeth, was awarded a Pulitzer prize. The series was announced as complete with the publication in 1949 of volume ten; however, it was resumed in 1953. Although Sinclair has also produced a few dramatic works, it is his novels which are well known. It has been claimed that in some foreign countries he is the most widely read of American authors and that he has been translated more often into more foreign languages than any other modern author. In 1925 he was officially declared a Soviet classic, an act which evidenced his great popularity in Russia.

1755. The jungle. New York, Doubleday, Page, 1906. 413 p. 6–6264 PZ3.S616J

1756. Oil! A novel. New York, Boni, 1927. 527 p. 27–7669 PZ3.S616Oi
A story derived from scandals during President Harding's administration, especially the Teapot Dome scandal.

1757. American outpost; a book of reminiscences. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1932. 280 p.
32–26373 PS3537.I85Z5 1932

1758. Lanny Budd series. New York, Viking Press, 1940–53. 11 v.
CONTENTS.—v. 1. World's end (PZ3.S616Wo 40–7472).—v. 2. Between two worlds (PZ3.S616Be 41–4373).—v. 3. Dragon's teeth (PZ3.S616Dr 42–106).—v. 4. Wide is the gate (PZ3.S616Wi 43–162).—v. 5. Presidential agent (PZ3.S616Pl 44–4916).—v. 6. Dragon harvest (PZ3.S616Dp 45–35107).—v. 7. A world to win (PZ3.S616Wn 46–3965).—v. 8. Presidential mission (PZ3.S616Po 47–30286).—v. 9. One clear call (PZ3.S616Om 48–8056).—v. 10. O shepherd, speak! (PZ3.S616O 49–9981).—v. 11. The return of Lanny Budd (PZ3.S616Re 53–5202).

1759. LILLIAN EUGENIA SMITH, 1897–

Born and reared in the South and coeditor from 1936 to 1945 of South Today, Miss Smith's novel, Strange Fruit, was the expression of a Southerner's soul searching on account of evils resulting from racial discrimination in her native section. The purpose of the novel to expose the ultimate of these evils necessitates tragedy and violence in the action of the book; but these are expressed with literary artistry as well as power. The author's position with regard to a love affair between members of different races, and her fidelity to language natural to uneducated characters but not in ordinary use, made the book a controversial one. Partly for that reason it reached a large audience. It has also been translated into French, Italian, Spanish, and other languages.

1760. Strange fruit, a novel. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1944. 371 p.
44–40028 PZ3.S6536St

1761. The journey. Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1954. 256 p. 53–6643 PZ3.S6536Jo
Spiritual autobiography of the author's journey thus far through life.

1762. WILBUR DANIEL STEELE, 1886–

Although he has written several novels, Steele is best known for his short stories; these are frequently set in places such as New England, South Carolina, and Arizona. Ingenuity of plot presentation and sustained action have led some reviewers to regard him as the best of conventional short-story writers. He has also done some dramatic work, such as Terrible Woman, and Other One Act Plays (1925); these were written for the Provincetown Players. In some cases he has collaborated with other authors in the writing of plays.

1763. That girl from Memphis. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1945. 470 p.
45–5456 PZ3.S8149Th

A novel of the early West, in which a young man falls in love with a prostitute.

1764. The best stories of Wilbur Daniel Steele. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1946. 469 p.
46–5578 PZ3.S8149Be

1765. Full cargo; more stories. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 369 p.
51–14516 PZ3.S8149 Fu

1766. GERTRUDE STEIN, 1874–1946

Gertrude Stein lived most of her life in France, where she created her experimental writings on essentially American subjects, based on her memories of her native land or on encounters with Americans abroad. Much of her work was constructed on a principle of verbal repetition with slight modification, so as to arrive at and establish with precision some nuance of meaning. Thus in her attempts for clarity she evolved in her prose not only a tendency to occasionally complex syntax, but also to a frequent heavy abstraction, characterized in part by an emphasis on verbs and a deemphasis on nouns (a procedure reversed in much of her poetry),—with the result that most readers find her more experimental books "difficult." Nevertheless, her works have been highly admired by a few and influential on a number of prominent writers, such as Hemingway, Sherwood Anderson, and Louis Bromfield. Her reputation for difficulty has to some extent kept from her a wide audience such as might seem consonant with her wide influence; consequently a number of authors, who have derived stylistic elements from her works, have themselves been far more popular. In her more conservative books the speech rhythms on which she based the bulk of her work become obvious, and a few might be viewed as largely lucid conversational reportage—a factor which draws her considerably closer to some of the authors who have found her writings seminal.

1767. Three lives; stories of the good Anna, Melanctha, and the gentle Lena. New York, Grafton Press, 1909. 279 p.
9–20912 PS3537.T323T5 1909

1768. The making of Americans, being a history of a family's progress, written . . . 1906–1908. [Paris, Contact Editions] 1925. 925 p.
44–10190 PS3537.T323M3 1925

1769. Wars I have seen. New York, Random House, 1945. 259 p.
45–2075 PS3537.T323W3

1770. Brewsie and Willie. New York, Random House, 1946. 114 p.
46–5457 PS3537.T323B7

A conversational-styled book reflecting the personal problems of American soldiers in France during World War II.

1771. Selected writings. Edited, with an introd. and notes, by Carl Van Vechten. New York, Random House, 1946. 622 p.
46–11965 PS3537.T323A6 1946

In addition to selections from the books listed above, this volume contains material from Geography and Plays (1922), and some miscellaneous pieces, as well as the complete texts of Tender Buttons (1914), Miss Stein's autobiographical The Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas (1933), and Four Saints in Three Acts (1934), which was used by Virgil Thomson as the libretto for his opera of the same name. Miss Stein's fiction is represented by short stories, rather than by selections from her novels Lucy Church Amiably (1930) and Ida (1941).

1772. The Yale edition of the unpublished writings of Gertrude Stein. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1951. 51–6628 PS3537.T323A6

1773. Rogers, William Garland. When this you see remember me; Gertrude Stein in person. New York, Rinehart, 1948. 247 p.
48–7376 PS3537.T323Z8

1774. Sutherland, Donald. Gertrude Stein, a biography of her work. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1951. 218 p.
51–12323 PS3537.T323Z83

1775. JOHN STEINBECK, 1902–

Steinbeck is a realistic and naturalistic novelist from California who commonly uses his home area as a setting for his fiction. His sympathy is with the inarticulate masses who are unable to speak for themselves. He pictures with understanding the lowest classes, the brute, the animalistic, the moronic, and the less intelligent social outcasts. Grapes of Wrath, a social document of the problems and life of the migratory farmers of the Southwest during the dustbowl period of the depression years, has probably been his most influential and widely read novel of social criticism.

1776. The long valley. New York, Viking Press, 1938. 303 p. 38–27754 PZ3.S8195Lo2
Short stories.

1777. The grapes of wrath. New York, Viking Press, 1940. 619 p.
40–6133 PZ3.S8195Gr11
"First published in April 1939 . . . eleventh printing February 1940."

1778. The wayward bus. New York, Viking Press, 1947. 312 p.
47–30085 PZ3.S8195Way PS3537.T3234W3

1779. East of Eden. New York, Viking Press, 1952. 602 p. 52–4118 PZ3.S8195Eas

1780. Short novels: Tortilla Flat [1935]; The red pony [1937]; Of mice and men [1937]; The moon is down [1942]; Cannery Row [1945]; The pearl [1947]. With an introd. by Joseph Henry Jackson. New York, Viking Press, 1953. xiii, 407 p. 53–9196 PZ3.S8195Sh PS3537.T3234A6 1953

1781. Sweet Thursday. New York, Viking Press, 1954. 273 p. 54–7983 PZ3.S8195Sw

1782. WALLACE STEVENS, 1879–1955

The name of Stevens has been ranked with that of T. S. Eliot as first in impressiveness among poets belonging to the modern movement of poetry in English. However, he worked in relative solitude and constituted his own school for studying the mind and its perceptions. His first published book, Harmonium (1923), appeared when he was 44 years of age and at once revealed the eloquence and elegance for which this Connecticut poet was to become known. On the other hand a heavy richness, which might be called "gaudiness," also characterized the part of his work that has verbal and metrical flamboyance. Using a style and selecting subjects frequently exotic, his universal theme is the role of the human imagination. The philosophical bent informing his technical virtuosity resulted in an impressive body of constantly maturing poetry.

1783. The necessary angel; essays on reality and the imagination. New York, Knopf, 1951. 176 p. 51–12072 PN1055.S68
A collection of essays, lectures, etc., which expresses the author's theory of poetry.

1784. Collected poems. New York, Knopf, 1954. 534 p. 54–11750 PS3537.T4753 1954
This collection, which was awarded a Pulitzer prize, includes the poems of earlier volumes such as Harmonium (1923), Ideas of Order (1935), The Man with the Blue Guitar (1937), Parts of a World (1942), Transport to Summer (1947), and The Auroras of Autumn (1950).

1785. O'Connor, William Van. The shaping spirit, a study of Wallace Stevens. Chicago, Regnery, 1950. ix, 146 p.
50–7455 PS3537.T4753Z7

1786. JAMES HOWELL STREET, 1903–1954

James Street's career included professional specialization as a Baptist clergyman, a journalist, a novelist, and a writer of short stories. Born in Mississippi, he imparted to the majority of his books a strong regional interest in the South, although the time and place represented may vary from 18th-century wars with the Indians on the frontier of the Old Southwest to essentially contemporary conditions on a cotton farm in Mississippi. However, he was at home also in the Middle West, the locale of his sequel novels about a clergyman's life in a small town. His sympathetic and perceptive short stories about children and adolescents, their animals, games, and adventures appeared in The Saturday Evening Post and other popular periodicals before a representative collection appeared in 1945. Whether in stirring historical romances or in novels written about the lives and in the colloquial speech of plain people, Mr. Street expressed his consciousness of the epic story of America's development, and his faith in its future.

1787. Oh, promised land. New York, Dial Press, 1940. 816 p. 40–27414 PZ3.S91557Oh 1788. In my father's house. New York, Dial Press, 1941. 348 p.

41–5679 PZ3.S91557In

1789. The gauntlet. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1945. 311 p.
45–9403 PZ3.S91557Gau
Sequel: High Calling (1951).

1790. Short stories. New York, Dial Press, 1945. 314 p. 45–5601 PZ3.S91557Sh
CONTENTS.—The golden key.—In full glory reflected.—The old Gordon place.—Weep no more, my lady.—Please come home, my lady.—Buck and fo' bits.—The crusaders.—Pud'n and Tayme.—They know how.—The road to Gettysburg.—All out with Sherman.—Set the wild echoes flying.—The biscuit eater.—The house.

1791. James Street's South. Edited by James Street, Jr. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1955. 282 p. 55–7652 F210.S76
"Essays on the South and its cities."

1792. THOMAS SIGISMUND STRIBLING, 1881–

T. S. Stribling's better-known novels usually reflect the Tennessee and Alabama districts with which he was familiar. Although not distinguished by stylistic merits, his works display a gift for narrative and a recording of colloquial conversation. This aptitude was probably developed in the popular and pulp fiction which he wrote in his early years. While the characteristic embedding of realistic details in his presentation of Southern life appeared in early work such as Birthright (1922), his narrative abilities came to the fore with such novels as Fombombo (1923) and Red Sand (1924), which depict American "businessmen" in Venezuela, and derive from Stribling's stay in that country. These elements were brought together in his later work, for which he returned to the rural South as a setting. In 1933 he was awarded a Pulitzer prize for the second volume of a trilogy which has been considered by some to be his main work. Another transition was made with The Sound Wagon (1935), in which his satirical tendencies became dominant. With These Bars of Flesh (1938), he continued in this vein, satirizing contemporary politics and education; the setting in this work was "Megapolis" in the North.

1793. The forge. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1931. 525 p.
31–6082 PZ3.S9166For
Volume one of a trilogy.

1794. The store. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1932. 571 p.
32–26671 PZ3.S9166Sr2
Volume two of the same trilogy.

1795. Unfinished cathedral. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1934. 383 p.
34–27137 PZ3.S9166Un
Volume three of the trilogy.

1796. RUTH SUCKOW, 1892–

Ruth Suckow's first novel, Country People (1924), dealt with three generations of a German-American family from the time of their arrival in Iowa in the middle of the 19th century. Since then she has quite consistently used Iowa as the locale for her fiction. Probably best known for her novels, she has also been praised for her short stories, of which a number of collections have been published, such as Children and Older People (1931). In both forms her merit has consisted of a "homey" but psychologically and physically accurate depiction of common people in everyday circumstances. It has been commented that this results in her work being basically character sketches rather than stories.

1797. Iowa interiors. New York, Knopf, 1926. 283 p. 26–27442 PZ3.S942Io
CONTENTS.—A start in life.—A home-coming.—The daughter.—The top of the ladder.—Mame.—Uprooted.—Renters.—Retired.—A pilgrim and a stranger.—A rural community.—Just him and her.—The resurrection.—Wanderers.—An investment for the future.—Four generations.—Golden wedding.

1798. The Bonney family. New York, Knopf, 1928. 296 p. 28–3333 PZ3.S942Bo

1799. The folks. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1934. 727 p. 34–32214 PZ3.S942Fo

1800. New Hope. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1942. 342 p. 42–3175 PZ3.S942Ne

1801. Some others and myself; seven stories and a memoir. New York, Rinehart, 1952. 281 p.
51–14899 PZ3.S942So

1802. NEWTON BOOTH TARKINGTON, 1869–1946.

Booth Tarkington was a highly prolific Midwestern novelist who achieved prominence in two fields of fiction. He is probably best known for his humorous stories of childhood and adolescence, such as Penrod and Sam (1916). He also wrote a number of serious novels, usually studies of Middle Western life; these include The Gentleman from Indiana (1899), The Conquest of Canaan (1905), and The Heritage of Hatcher Ide (1941). He was twice awarded a Pulitzer prize: for The Magnificent Ambersons (1918), the first volume of a trilogy, and in 1922 for Alice Adams, which has often been adjudged his best book. He attained a mastery of novel technique and an easy style, through which he expressed his often humorous and at times sentimental, "realist-romantic" tales. While he maintained a wide popular following, many of his works have been criticized for lack of psychological penetration and perception of sociological situations. Much of his work, particularly that of the first quarter of the century, remains generally popular.

677676 O–63–11

1803. Penrod. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1914. 345 p. 14–5820 PZ3.T175Pe

1804. Seventeen; a tale of youth and summer time and the Baxter family, especially William. New York, Harper, 1916. 328 p.
16–6604 PZ3.T175Se

1805. Alice Adams. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1921. 434 p.
21–26561 PZ3.T175Al

1806. Growth. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1927. 887 p.
27–27696 PZ3.T175Gr
CONTENTS.—The magnificent Ambersons.—The turmoil.—National avenue.

1807. Russo, Dorothy Ritter, and Thelma L. Sullivan. A bibliography of Booth Tarkington, 1869–1946. Indianapolis, Indiana Historical Society, 1949. xix, 303 p. illus.
49–50289 Z8858.9.R8

1808. Woodress, James L. Booth Tarkington, gentleman from Indiana. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1955. 350 p. 55–6307 PS2973.W6

1809. ALLEN TATE, 1899–

Tate was an early and leading member of the Nashville, Tennessee, group of authors known as Fugitives, because of their periodical The Fugitive (1922–25); this group developed, with changes in membership, into the Agrarians and the general movement known as Regionalism, which remained basically a Southern movement opposing the industrialization of the South. The Fugitives also included Robert Penn Warren, John Crowe Ransom, and Merrill Moore (qq. v.); the Agrarian-Regionalists added such names as Cleanth Brooks and John Gould Fletcher (qq. v.), with such authors as William Faulkner, Eudora Welty, and the more northerly Ruth Suckow (qq. v.) loosely associated with the Regionalist movement. The Regionalists voiced themselves through such prominent periodicals as the Southern Review (1935–42), The Kenyon Review (1939+), and The Sewanee Review (1892+), of which Tate assumed the editorship from 1944 to 1946. However, Tate's work, and that of many fellow Regionalists, is beyond narrow Regionalism. Tate is known for his intellectuality, concern with form, and restraint of emotion, both as a critic and as a poet. He has also written biographies of Stonewall Jackson (1928) and Jefferson Davis (1929).

1810. On the limits of poetry, selected essays: 1928–1948. New York, Swallow Press, 1948. 379 p. 48–8822 PN1031.T3
Selected from the author's previously published works: Reactionary Essays on Poetry and Ideas (1936), Reason in Madness (1941), and The Hovering Fly (1949).

1811. Poems, 1922–1947. New York, Scribner, 1948. 208 p. 48–5674 PS3539.A74P58
Earlier books of poetry by Allen Tate include Mr. Pope, and Other Poems (1928), Ode to the Confederate Dead . . . (1930), Poems, 1928–1931 (1932), Selected Poems (1937), and The Winter Sea (1945).

1812. Arnold, Willard B. The social ideas of Allen Tate. Boston, Bruce Humphries, 1955. 64 p. 54–9591 PS3539.A74Z6

1813. SARA TEASDALE, 1884–1933

Sara Teasdale's better poems, mainly lyrics of love and muted emotions, are handled with delicate control, and infused with quiet sincerity and simplicity. In subject and style her work is reminiscent of the later 19th century, although a few elements reveal the influence of the free verse and Imagist movements.

1814. The collected poems. New York, Macmillan, 1937. 311 p.
37–28625 PS3539.E15 1937
CONTENTS.—Sonnets to Duse and other poems (1907).—Helen of Troy and other poems (1911).—Rivers to the sea (1915).—Love songs (1917).—Flame and shadow (1920).—Dark of the moon (1926).—Stars to-night (1930).—Strange victory (1933).

1815. JAMES GROVER THURBER, 1894–

James Thurber is a humorist in love with life and fantasy. His whimsical realism sometimes conceals a mordant satire, but his tone is usually gentle, for he finds more folly than depravity in the world. The illustrations he produces for his own work complement his prose, and are thought by some to be masterpieces of line drawing. Though a realistic appearance usually dominates, his work is occasionally somewhat eerie, and nightmares run loose in midday streets or Victorian drawing-rooms.

1816. Is sex necessary? or, Why you feel the way you do, by James Thurber and E. B. White. New York, Harper, 1929. 197 p.
29–27938 PN6161.T56

1817. Cream of Thurber, skimmed from the following writings and drawings of James Thurber: My life and hard times, The owl in the attic, The middle-aged man on the flying trapeze, Let your mind alone! London, Hamilton [1939] 250 p. illus. 40–6648 PS3539.H94A6 1939

1818. The Thurber carnival. New York, Harper, 1945. 369 p. illus.
45–1366 PS3539.H94T5

1819. The Thurber album; a new collection of pieces about people. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1952. 346 p. illus.
52–10216 PS3539.H94T46

1820. Thurber country; a new collection of pieces about males and females, mainly of our own species. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1953. 276 p. illus. 53–9700 PS3539.H94T53

1821. FREDERIC RIDGELY TORRENCE, 1875–1950

Ridgely Torrence produced a restrained, conservative type of poetry. Although the volume of his work is very slim, he wrote what has been called flawless verse. His lyricism reached maturity in Hesperides (1925). He also experimented with Negro drama, preparing the way for others. As a poetry editor of The New Republic during the twenties, he gave encouragement to a number of younger poets.

1822. Poems. New ed., with new poems. New York, Macmillan, 1952. 127 p.
52–3721 PS3539.O63P6 1952

1823. MARK ALBERT VAN DOREN, 1894–

Poet, editor, critic, lecturer, and professor of English at Columbia University, Van Doren for a number of years has been instrumental in the development of literary interest and taste in the United States. He is an exceedingly prolific poet, whose work expresses, sometimes symbolically, his sensitive response to life in America and to nature seen and enjoyed in rural areas. In 1940 his Collected Poems, 1922–1938 (1939) won the Pulitzer prize. He has written prose that is also poetical, as in a novel, Windless Cabins (1940), and much distinctive criticism.

1824. Jonathan Gentry. New York, Boni, 1931. 205 p. illus.
31–7761 PS3543.A557J6 1931

An epic poem of America, in three parts: "Ohio River (1800)"; "Civil War"; and "Foreclosure."

1825. The Mayfield deer. New York, Holt, 1941. 271 p. illus.
41–12993 PS3543.A557M3 1941

Narrative poem based on an incident re-recorded in an Illinois county history, but told also as an episode of the Wisconsin frontier.

1826. Mortal summer. Iowa City, Prairie Press, 1953. 63 p. 54–18137 PS3543.A557M6

Poem.

1827. Selected poems. New York, Holt, 1954. ix, 238 p. 54–9660 PS3543.A557A17 1954

This selection includes poems from the author's Spring Thunder, and Other Poems (1924), 7 P. M., and Other Poems (1926), Now the Sky, and Other Poems (1928), A Winter Diary, and Other Poems (1935), The Last Look, and Other Poems (1937), Collected Poems (1939), The Seven Sleepers, and Other Poems (1944), New Poems (1948), and Spring Birth, and Other Poems (1953). It does not include the long works: Jonathan Gentry, The Mayfield Deer, and Mortal Summer, which are entered above.

1828. CARL VAN VECHTEN, 1880–

Van Vechten has been noted as an interpreter of jazz society life in New York City during the 1920's. His first prominence came as a music critic, from which he branched off to essays in other fields. Essays from his early volumes were selected for Red: Papers on Musical Subjects (1925) and Excavations: A Book of Advocacies (1926). The "earlier" Tiger in the House (1920) was a book on cats in history, folklore, and the arts. With Peter Whiffle (1922) Van Vechten turned to fiction, the form in which he became most famous; this was a humorous, "sparkling," "civilized" book about Bohemian life in New York before World War I. His last novel, Parties (1930) brought the record of frivolous life in New York City up to the depression. In 1932 he published a series of autobiographical essays in Sacred and Profane Memories. As the mode of life with which he is associated became a thing of the past, Van Vechten ceased to write extended works. Since then he has appeared primarily as an editor or as the author of introductions; much of his time has been devoted to photography.

1829. The blind bow-boy. New York, Knopf, 1923. 261 p. 23–11805 PZ3.V368Bl

A novel about fashionable life in New York in the 1920's.

1830. The tattooed countess; a romantic novel with a happy ending. New York, Knopf, 1924. 286 p. 24–21077 PZ3.V368Ta

A commentary on the culture of a small Iowa town, to which the heroine returns on a visit to her sister. The time is the late 19th century.

1831. Firecrackers; a realistic novel. New York, Knopf, 1925. 246 p. 25–16657 PZ3.V368Fi

A story of New York in the mid 1920's.

1832. Nigger heaven. New York, Knopf, 1926. 286 p. 26–15403 PZ3.V368Ni

A novel depicting Negro life and customs in Harlem.

1833. Spider boy; a scenario for a moving picture. New York, Knopf, 1928. 297 p. 28–19963 PZ3.V368Sp

A humorous novel on Hollywood.

1834. Jonas, Klaus W. Carl Van Vechten, a bibliography. New York, Knopf, 1955. xii, 82 p. 55–7911 Z8926.J6

1835. Lueders, Edward G. Carl Van Vechten and the twenties. [Albuquerque] University of New Mexico Press, 1955. 150 p. 55–5451 PS3543.A653Z8

1836. HOWELL HUBERT VINES, 1899–

The local-color novels of Howell Vines reflect the Warrior rivers country of northern Alabama. Although they do not have a strong plot line, and are not outstanding as works of characterization (with the region itself contending for the position of main character), they do have a position among works of regional literature. The author's style shows a sensitivity to the English spoken in the area, though more in its cadences and vocabulary than in the use of phonetic spellings of pronunciational variations, and his total effect is nearer to the experience of those who know the South at first hand than that of better-known writers.

1837. A river goes with heaven. Boston, Little, Brown, 1930. 290 p. 30–29555 PZ3.V749Ri

1838. This green thicket world. Boston, Little, Brown, 1934. 375 p. 34–9619 PZ3.V749Th

1839. GLENWAY WESCOTT, 1901–

With the publication of his first novel, The Apple of the Eye (1924), Wescott began to use regional themes drawn from aspects of life observed in his native state, Wisconsin. These include: the influence on a boy's developing instincts of life in a rural district of the state; a young man's nostalgic rediscovery of his ancestors, all the way back to pioneer days, from stories suggested by pictures in an old family album; and short stories descriptive of landscapes and localities, with overtones of social criticism. Before writing his later books the author was almost continually abroad for 9 years, on the Riveria and in Paris. From these expatriate years came influences that doubtless contributed to the writing of his short novel, The Pilgrim Hawk (1940), which introduces international elements, and to that of his war novel, Apartment in Athens (1945), concerned with the effects of the German occupation of Greece during World War II on a native family.

1840. The grandmothers; a family portrait. New York, Harper, 1927. 338 p. 27–26866 PZ3.W512Gr

The story of a pioneer family in the Middle West.

1841. Good-bye Wisconsin. New York, Harper, 1938. 362 p. 28–21484 PZ3.W512Go

Short stories.

1842. NATHANAEL WEST, 1902–1940

West wrote bitter satiric-comedy novels in a somewhat surrealistic manner. His stories range from that of a man who is editor of a New York newspaper advice-to-the-lovelorn column to a report on Hollywood as he saw it while he was a film writer there.

1843. Miss Lonelyhearts. New York, Liveright, 1933. 213 p. 33–14139 PZ3.W51952Mi

1844. The day of the locust. New York, Random House, 1939. 238 p. 39–12578 PZ3.W51952Day

1845. EDITH NEWBOLD (JONES) WHARTON, 1862–1937

Edith Wharton in her novels chronicled New York's decaying aristocracy of the late 19th century. Her writings involve a degree of satire and irony directed at the faults of this small group, of which she herself was a part. A careful craftsman who had little direct influence on serious literature, she probably contributed much to raising the standards of popular fiction. Artistically she survives as a careful author of manners and as a regionalist. She depicted one segment of society without implying or perceiving aspects of the nature and direction of American society as a whole. One of her more deliberate attempts to depict the group she knew so well was her series entitled Old New York, which appeared in 1924 in four volumes which may be read as separate works; the individual titles under which they appeared were False Dawn (The 'Forties), The Old Maid (The 'Fifties), The Spark (The 'Sixties), and New Year's Day (The 'Seventies). In a few instances Edith Wharton departed from portraying New York society by employing a New England or Middle West background, or by handling the theme of Americans in Europe.

1846. The valley of decision. New York, Scribner, 1902. 2 v. 2–6076 PZ3.W555V

1847. The house of mirth. London, New York, Macmillan, 1905. 516 p.
44–44937 PZ3.W555Ho2

1848. Ethan Frome. New York, Scribner, 1911. 195 p. 11–25015 PZ3.W555Et

1849. The reef. New York, Appleton, 1912. 366 p. 12–25996 PZ3.W555Re

1850. The custom of the country. New York, Scribner, 1913. 594 p.
13–22207 PZ3.W555Cu
PS3545.H16C8

1851. Xingu, and other stories. New York, Scribner, 1916. 436 p. 16–21972 PZ3.W555X
CONTENTS.—Xingu.—C o m i n g home.—Autre temps . . .—Kerfol.—The long run.—The triumph of night.—The choice.—Bunner sisters.

1852. The age of innocence. New York, Appleton, 1920. 364 p. 20–18615 PZ3.W555Ag 1853. The mother's recompense. New York, Appleton, 1925. 341 p.

25–8793 PZ3.W555Mo

1854. Hudson River bracketed. New York, Appleton, 1929. 559 p.
29–24077 PZ3.W555Hu
Sequel: The Gods Arrive (New York, Appleton, 1932. 431 p.).

1855. An Edith Wharton treasury; edited and with an introd. by Arthur Hobson Quinn. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1950. xxxi, 581 p.
50–2775 PZ3.W555Ed
CONTENTS.—The age of innocence.—The old maid.—After Holbein.—A bottle of Perrier.—The lady's maid's bell.—Roman fever.—The other two.—Madame De Treymes.—The moving finger.—Xingu.—Autre temps.—Bunner sisters.

1856. Nevius, Blake. Edith Wharton, a study of her fiction. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1953. xi, 271 p.
53–10439 PS3545.H16Z75
"The writings of Edith Wharton": p. 260–263. Bibliography: p. 264–265.

1857. JOHN HALL WHEELOCK, 1886–

Wheelock is a poet who began with rather exuberant poems, but before long turned to philosophic lyrics of moderated tone. Writing always in a traditional manner (in large part derived from Henley, Whitman, and the Romantics), his early verse at times reflected, as a background to his themes, life in New York; his later verse has usually been generalized insofar as any "setting" is concerned, but deals with love, loneliness, longing, and an awareness that "That too has passed away."

1858. Poems old and new. New York, Scribner, 1956. 203 p.
56–9881 PS3545.H33A6 1956
Wheelock's earlier volumes of poetry include The Human Fantasy (1911), The Beloved Adventure (1912), Love and Liberation (1913), Dust and Light (1919), The Black Panther (1922), The Bright Doom (1927), and Poems, 1911–1936 (1936).

1859. ELWYN BROOKS WHITE, 1899–

Long associated editorially with The New Yorker, E. B. White writes familiar essays with touches of sophisticated humor which have been called the best now being written in English. Commonly commenting on and reflecting life in urban (and suburban) America, usually in articles first written for The New Yorker, he also has a taste for rural life, as evinced in the essays he wrote for Harper's during the years in which he lived on a Maine farm. The serious undercurrent in his work has come to the fore in productions such as The Wild Flag (1946), which argued the cause for federal world government, and the booklet essay, Here Is New York (1949), which some have adjudged the best such literary description of the city that has been written. In addition to his prose, he has written light verse, as in The Lady Is Cold (1929) and The Fox of Peapack, and Other Poems (1938).

1860. Everyday is Saturday. New York, Harper, 1934. 242 p.
34-33063 PS3545.H5187E8 1934
"The paragraphs that make this book appeared first in the New Yorker."

1861. Quo vadimus? or, The case for the bicycle. New York, Harper, 1939. 219 p.
39-4681 PS3545.H5187Q6 1939

1862. One man's meat. New York, Harper, 1942. 346 p. 42-16753 PS3545.H5187O5
All but three of the essays are from the monthly department "One man's meat" in Harper's Magazine.

1863. The second tree from the corner. New York, Harper, 1954. 253 p.
53-11864 PS3545.H5187S4
Prose and poetry.

1864. THORNTON NIVEN WILDER, 1897-

As an author Thornton Wilder cannot readily be regarded as being in the main currents of modern fiction. He tends to write in a concise, expressive, and almost classical manner. In this he reveals his scholarly background, as also at times in his subject matter. Thus, The Woman of Andros (1930) is a novel based on Terence's Andria. Wilder started as a novelist with The Cabala (1926); however, in 1928 appeared his third book, a collection of short plays entitled The Angel that Troubled the Waters, and Other Plays, and since then he has gained considerable stature as a dramatist. In both fields his work has been experimental and lyrical; these aspects, combined with his frequent subtlety, his sparseness of detail, and a humor tending to gentle satire or irony, have at times perhaps obscured the omnipresent philosophical attitude: the concern with the nature of man and the problems of idealism, which are illumined by the mystical impulse which impregnates his writing.

1865. Our town, a play in three acts. New York, McCann, 1938. 128 p.
38-27331 PS3545.I345O9 1938a
This play, which was awarded a Pulitzer prize for drama, is meant to depict life in the early 20th century in a New Hampshire town, intended to typify American communities of the period.

1866. Heaven's my destination. New York, Longmans, Green, 1934. 244 p.
35-4227 PZ3.W6468He
An overtly realistic novel about a salesman who has undergone a religious conversion; though with tragic implications, the book is a comedy in which some Midwestern and Southern beliefs are examined.

1867. The bridge of San Luis Rey. New York, Boni, 1927. 235 p.
27-23452 PS3545.I345B7 1927
This novel, which received a Pulitzer prize, is about a group of people who were killed as the result of the collapse of a bridge in Peru. The stories are presented as derived from a book written by a Franciscan who had set out to establish that the deaths were the result of divine providence.

1868. The skin of our teeth, play in three acts. New York, Harper, 1942. 142 p.
42-36421 PS3545.I345S5
This unconventional comedy, which was awarded a Pulitzer prize for drama, attempts to present the history of civilized man through the story of a family living in Excelsior, New Jersey.

1869. The ides of March. New York, Harper, 1948. 246 p. 48-647 PZ3.W6468Id
An epistolary novel, or "fantasia," centering about the life of Julius Caesar.

1870. OSCAR WILLIAMS, 1900-

Williams had an early start as a poet, but soon turned to the lucrative world of advertising. Then, after a fairly long period, he returned to poetry, and soon established a reputation as a poet of the city, expressed in an obviously "modern" verse that is heavily studded with figures of speech. An even greater reputation was established by Williams as anthologist of poetry. His anthologies, which have been widely praised for their receptivity to new and little-known poets, include A Little Treasury of Modern Poetry, English and American (1946; rev. ed., 1950), A Little Treasury of Great Poetry, English and American (1947), A Little Treasury of American Poetry (1948), and The New Pocket Anthology of American Verse (1955).

1871. Selected poems. New York, Scribner, 1947. 143 p. 47-30760 PS3545.I5337A6 1947
Earlier volumes of poetry by Williams are The Golden Darkness (1921), Adam & Eve & the City (1936), The Man Coming Toward You (1940), and That's All That Matters (1945).

1872. WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS, 1883-

Williams was early a member of, but soon broke with, the Imagist school; however, he has always been a visual poet concerned with form and sound patterns as organic reinforcement of what he has to say. His poems reveal a humanitarian poet of social mores, ethics, and environment, who strives to establish a unique personal form and idiom. The cadences of speech pervade both his poetry and his prose. In both prose and poetry Williams is concerned with the question of what is "American," especially the localistic aspects as seen in terms of his home area in New Jersey. This may be seen in the short stories of volumes such as The Knife of the Times, and Other Stories (1932) and Life Along the Passaic River (1938). A Voyage to Pagany (1928) is a novel about a smalltown doctor who goes to Europe with some ambition to write.

1873. In the American grain. New York, Boni, 1925. 235 p. 25–23403 E169.1.W52

CONTENTS.—Red Eric.—The discovery of the Indies; Christopher Columbus.—The destruction of Tenochtitlan; Cortez and Montezuma.—The fountain of eternal youth; Juan Ponce de Leon.—De Soto and the New world.—Sir Walter Raleigh.—Voyage of the "Mayflower."—The founding of Quebec; Samuel de Champlain.—The Maypole at Merrymount; Thomas Morton.—Cotton Mather's Wonders of the invisible world: 1. Enchantments encountered. 2. The trial of Bridget Bishop at Salem, The trial of Susanna Martin. 3. Curiosities.—Père Sebastian Rasles.—The discovery of Kentucky; Daniel Boone.—George Washington.—Poor Richard; Benjamin Franklin.—Battle between the Bon Homme Richard and the Serapis; John Paul Jones.—Jacataqua.—The virtue of history; Aaron Burr.—Advent of the slaves.—Edgar Allan Poe.—Abraham Lincoln.

1874. White mule. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1937. 293 p.
37–11249 PZ3.W67667Wh PS3545.I544W5

This novel was designed as the first part of a trilogy reflecting American manners; however, all three volumes can stand as individual works. The subsequent volumes were entitled In the Money and The Build-Up (vide infra).

1875. In the money. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1940. 382 p.
40–35170 PZ3.W67667In

The second volume of a trilogy which began with White Mule (q. v.).

1876. Paterson. New York, New Directions, 1946–51. 4 v. 46–5910 PS3545.I544P3

A fifth and concluding volume of this verse work was scheduled for publication in 1958.

1877. A dream of love; a play in three acts and eight scenes. [New York, New Directions] 1948. 107 p. (Direction, 6)
48–8451 AP2.D583, no. 6

1878. Collected later poems. [New York, New Directions] 1950. 240 p.
50–11028 PS3545.I544A17 1950

This is a collection of the poems Williams wrote during the 1940's, with the exception of the long poem on the author's New Jersey home town, Paterson (vide supra). Individual volumes of poetry which appeared in the period covered include The Broken Span (1941), The Wedge (1944), The Clouds, Aigeltinger, Russia, &c. (1948), and The Pink Church (1949). During this period there also appeared in the New classics series of New Directions a volume of the Selected Poems (1949) of Williams.

1879. Make light of it; collected stories. New York, Random House, 1950. 342 p.
50–10847 PZ3.W67667Mak PS3545.I544A6 1950

1880. Autobiography. New York, Random House, 1951. 402 p.
51–12522 PS3545.I544Z5

1881. Collected earlier poems. [New York, New Directions] 1951. 482 p.
51–8849 PS3545.I544A17 1951

Earlier volumes of poetry by Williams include Poems (1909), The Tempers (1913), A Book of Poems, Al Que Quierel (1917), Kora in Hell (1920), Sour Grapes (1921), Spring and All (1923), and An Early Martyr, and Other Poems (1935). An inclusive collection covering most of this period is The Complete Collected Poems . . . 1906–1938 (1938).

1882. The build-up, a novel. New York, Random House, 1952. 335 p.
52–5166 PZ3.W67667Bu

The final volume of a trilogy which began with White Mule and In the Money (qq. v.).

1883. The desert music, and other poems. New York, Random House, 1954. 90 p.
54–5667 PS3545.I544D4

1884. Selected essays. New York, Random House, 1954. 342 p.
54–7815 PS3545.I544A16 1954

1885. Journey to love. New York, Random House, 1955. 87 p.
Poems. 55–8173 PS3545.I544J6

1886. Koch, Vivienne. William Carlos Williams. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1950. x, 278 p. (The Makers of modern literature)
50–697 PS3545.I544Z6
Bibliography: p. 267–273.

1887. THOMAS WOLFE, 1900–1938

Thomas Wolfe, the son of a stonecutter and his wife who kept a boarding-house, was born in Asheville, North Carolina, a hill city in a state proud of its mountains and the people who live among them. Educated at the University of North Carolina and at Harvard, he became a teacher in New York. Later, he was able to extend his experience by travel and observation of European civilization at first hand. The impact of these changing environments, and the combination of rags and riches about him before and during the great depression that began in 1929, influenced the development of ideas he poured forth in a spate, through the medium of his four massive novels. Sometimes mystically rhapsodic, at other times as naturalistic as those of Theodore Dreiser, these books are intensely autobiographical, as well as full of details of his family's experiences. Using an adaptation of the stream-of-consciousness technique, probably derived from his study of James Joyce, they reveal the author's unsuccessful search for permanent solutions for intellectual, philosophical, social, and economic problems observed in a world in flux. Because of their form as well as their meaning these novels are examples of a new direction still to be observed in American fiction.

1888. Look homeward, angel, a story of the buried life. New York, Scribner, 1929. 626 p.
29–22336 PZ3.W8314Lo
A biographical novel of Wolfe's youth, it traces the hero's youth through his attendance at the State University.

1889. Of time and the river; a legend of man's hunger in his youth. New York, Scribner, 1935. 912 p. 35–27095 PZ3.W8314Of
A sequel to Look Homeward, Angel, this volume traces the hero's career through graduate work in playwriting at Harvard, teaching in New York City, and a European tour.

1890. The web and the rock. New York, Harper, 1939. 695 p. 39–27574 PZ3.W8314We2
In some ways a sequel to Of Time and the River; however, the hero's name has been changed, and there is a recapitulation of his youth. The story then continues with his writing novels in New York, and having a love affair with a rich stage-designer. The book concludes with a trip to Germany.

1891. You can't go home again. New York, Harper, 1940. 743 p.
40–27633 PZ3.W8314Yo
A sequel to The Web and the Rock. The hero discovers that the home town he knew is lost in the past, and that the Germany he loved has been destroyed by Naziism. Much of the book reflects the pre-depression optimism and financial speculation in the twenties.

1892. The hills beyond. New York, Harper, 1941. 386 p. 41–21548 PZ3.W8314Hi
Contents.—The lost boy.—No cure for it.—Gentlemen of the press.—A kinsman of his blood.—Chickamauga.—The return of the prodigal.—On leprechauns.—Portrait of a literary critic.—The lion at morning.—God's lonely man.—The hills beyond.—A note on Thomas Wolfe, by E. C. Aswell.

1893. Thomas Wolfe's letters to his mother, Julia Elizabeth Wolfe. Edited with an introd. by John Skally Terry. New York, Scribner, 1943. xxxv, 368 p. 43–6520 PS3545.O337Z55

1894. Letters. Collected and edited, with an introd. and explanatory text, by Elizabeth Nowell. New York, Scribner, 1956. xviii, 797 p.
56–9880 PS3545.O337Z54

1895. Adams, Agatha B. Thomas Wolfe, Carolina student; a brief biography. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Library, 1950. 91 p. (The University of North Carolina. Library extension publication, v. 15, no. 2)
50–63183 PS3545.O337Z6

1896. Johnson, Pamela H. Hungry Gulliver; an English critical appraisal of Thomas Wolfe. New York, Scribner, 1948. 170 p.
48–5174 PS3545.O337Z75 1948
London edition published under title: Thomas Wolfe.

1897. Muller, Herbert J. Thomas Wolfe. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions Books, 1947. 196 p. (The Makers of modern literature)
47–11790 PS3545.O337Z8

1898. Pollock, Thomas C., and Oscar Cargill, eds. Thomas Wolfe at Washington Square. New York, New York University Press, 1954. xiii, 163 p. illus. 54–5275 PS3545.O337Z83
Contents.—Thomas Wolfe at Washington Square, by O. Cargill.—Memorabilia. His students remember: Drunk with words, by A. G. Doyle. Overloaded black briefcase, by B. W. Kofsky. Thomas Wolfe, a reminiscence, by J. Mandel. His colleagues remember: and gladly teche . . . by R. Dow. Tom Wolfe: penance no more, by H. T. Volkening. My experiences with Thomas Wolfe, by V. Fisher. Replacing Tom Wolfe, by R. Krauss.—Bibliography (p. 153–163).

1899. Rubin, Louis D. Thomas Wolfe; the weather of his youth. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1955. 183 p. illus.
55–7364 PS3545.O337Z85

1900. Walser, Richard G., ed. The enigma of Thomas Wolfe; biographical and critical selections. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. xi, 313 p. 52–13698 PS3545.O337Z9

1901. Watkins, Floyd C. Thomas Wolfe's characters, portraits from life. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1957. 194 p.
57–7335 PS3545.O337Z94

1902. ELINOR (HOYT) WYLIE, 1887–1928

Although she wrote several novels, Elinor Wylie is better known for her poetry, which has been praised for clarity, brilliancy, delicateness, brittleness, and a mastery of technique. Influenced by Donne and the metaphysicals, she was not of them. Her verse is limited in range, but displays great artistic integrity.

1903. Collected poems. [Edited by William Rose Benét] New York, Knopf, 1932. 311 p.
32–26577 PS3545.Y45 1932

"The contents of this book embody the contents of Elinor Wylie's four books of poems, Nets to Catch the Wind (1921), Black Armour (1923), Trivial Breath (1928), and Angels and Earthly Creatures (1929), in the exact sequence and order in which they were originally published. Added to these is a section of poems hitherto uncollected in book form, some of which have been previously published in periodicals."—Foreword.

1904. Collected prose. New York, Knopf, 1933. 879 p. 33–27444 PS3545.Y45A16 1933

CONTENTS.—Jennifer Lorn, with a preface by C. Van Vechten.—The Venetian glass nephew, with a preface by C. Van Doren.—The orphan angel, with a preface by S. V. Benét.—Mr. Hodge and Mr. Hazard, with a preface by Isabel Paterson.—Fugitive prose, with a preface by W. R. Benét.

1905. MARYA ZATURENSKA, 1902–

Although Marya Zaturenska was born in Russia, whence she came to America as a child, she has written distinguished poetry in English, and has found for herself a place in modern American poetry. Her subtle, lyrical verse won for her a Pulitzer prize for poetry, for her volume Cold Morning Sky. In addition to poetry she has, with her husband Horace Gregory (q. v.), produced a history of modern American poetry; by herself she has written a biography of Christina Rossetti (1949), whom she in some ways resembles.

1906. Selected poems. [New York] Grove Press, 1954. 130 p.
54–8111 PS3549.A77A6 1954

In addition to new poems, this volume contains selections from the earlier books Threshold and Hearth (1934), Cold Morning Sky (1937), The Listening Landscape (1941), and The Golden Mirror (1944).

F. The Second World War and the Atomic Age (1940–1955)

It should be candidly admitted that this final section of "Literature" was split off from the preceding one largely as a matter of convenience. Hence, the logic of listing a dozen or more writers in this, rather than in the preceding, section is tenuous at best and cannot be completely sustained by argument. The more important writers belong to both periods and have contributed to most of the trends observable in both. That a new period is in the making, however, seems clear.

The years 1940–1955 were among the most momentous in recorded history. In them the atomic bomb was brought into production and used as a means for winning the most destructive war the world has seen. Within the decade after the first bomb was dropped in 1945 tensions accompanying the progress of the atomic age spread over countries and continents until the whole world was, and is, affected. During these years American authors and their readers began living in a new international age. This era of international preoccupations was brought into being, not by a common language of scholarship and a common form of religion, as in the Middle Ages, but by an uneasy peace and a shared uncertainty concerning the future of human beings in a world brought together, for good or ill, by scientific discoveries which have annihilated distances that formerly contributed to a sense of safety within national boundaries.

The final effects of these forces with which modern man is at grips are hidden in the future. So far as their impact on American literature is concerned only a much longer historical perspective than that now available can contribute to a reliable verdict. It is, however, already a matter of literary history that William Faulkner, Eugene O'Neill, T. S. Eliot, and other contemporary writers whose works have been described in the preceding section have contributed to a second American renaissance, occurring roughly between 1920 and 1940. They have established their reputations, their places at the bar of contemporary criticism, and given to the "one world" of the atomic age an expression of American culture at its present state of maturity. For the purposes of this final section devoted to literature, attention is therefore focused on younger authors writing at mid-century, from whose work must be derived such evidence as exists of the new literary directions currently being taken.

One obvious point of departure for assessing trends in current literature is provided by writers' use of war as a theme. It will be remembered that the First World War was reflected in literature produced by a "lost generation" of disillusioned authors. Their pessimism after the failure of America's crusade to "make the world safe for democracy" contributed to the philosophy of deterministic naturalism that pervaded much of their writing. The writers who participated in or observed the Second World War never hoped that their struggle would end war or bring peace all over the earth. They had fewer illusions to lose than had their seniors; hence, the trend of their writing about the last war is away from the deterministic "closed system" variety of naturalism and toward an "open ended" relativistic naturalism, with symbolic overtones, but occasionally owing much to the reportorial style developed by numerous correspondents whose work, it has been said, made this the most fully reported war in history.

Another characteristic of contemporary creative writing, including poetry, is its frequent use of language formerly considered, in general, too crude or unpleasant to be used in "polite society" and hence seldom or never embodied in literary expression. This uncommon "language of common men" is sometimes employed with such fidelity as to shock the segment of the reading public that has been educated in classic American literature characterized by decorous, even elegant, language, as so much of the best 19th-century writing was. Some critics feel that this shock treatment, used deliberately, not only achieves realism for characters to whom the language used would be natural, but also awakens complacent readers to awareness of conditions about which they may prefer to remain ignorant. It is doubtless true, also, that contemporary writing reflects one of the recurring changes in taste and manners that literature has mirrored down the ages.

Not merely the language used but also the subjects popularly treated by contemporary writers have undergone further change. Uncovering hidden abnormalities and compulsions in the lives of deviate individuals, or even in lives that on the surface appear commonplace, if not normal, has also had a part in this further break with the genteel tradition after its disruption by Theodore Dreiser and others in preceding periods. Not all the novels, short stories, and plays that feature this interest are grim. Irony, humor, fantasy, symbolism, Gothic horror, and the use of native American themes drawn from the historical past all lend variety and interest to much of this type of work. Even the bitterness, satire, and cynicism with which the darker aspects of contemporary life are frequently portrayed by young writers are, according to some critics, an indirect revelation of the moral indignation of the authors against private and public indifference to such conditions, as well as society's backwardness in coping with them. These authors are not reformers on a national scale, however, as were many earlier American writers who concerned themselves with large social and economic problems in the United States. It appears that literary artists today think of the spiritual and social problems of man in the contemporary world primarily in clinical and secondarily in sociological or anthropological frames of reference, rather than in the religious, political, socio-economic frames of the past.

Literary criticism continues to flourish. It has been justly said that the creative-writer-critic and particularly the poet-critic constitute one of the most striking phenomena present in American literature today. It is also interesting to note that at a time when the United States is called the strongest defender of Western civilization such a volume of critical exposition is available for the understanding of America's own civilization, so far as it is reflected in literature. Long before literary historians could possibly complete their work of review and synthesis current studies by highly competent critics have been carried to interested national and international audiences by means of journals of literary opinion published both by university and commercial presses. Whether or not contemporary writing and the criticism of that writing reveal the American mind and spirit "in the round," the revelation that has been made is known far beyond the bounds of the United States. Writers, therefore, assume an increasing responsibility as representatives of their country in the world.

With respect to developments in American poetry, the critics emphasize: a departure from the use of experimental forms developed by the poets' forerunners; a return to lyricism; and a trend toward neo-classicism. Some commentators have undertaken to defend poets from charges of wilful complexity and obscurity leveled against them, sometimes by their peers. The champions of the "difficult" poets point out that the times reflected in poetry also are complex, hence not susceptible to treatment in simple, obvious terms; and that, moreover, good poetry has never been easy poetry. The reader's intelligence has its own part to play in reaching the poet's true meaning.

Finally, two striking and related aspects of literature during this fifteen-year fragment of a period are its extent and its accessibility. Men of letters, who constituted such a small fraction of American professional society in the early years of the country's history, now play a role enhanced in importance by their growing numbers and by their productivity. New avenues also tend to open out more widely to accommodate the distribution of their work. One of these is provided by the great increase in numbers of students receiving education at the college level. While stringent critics of education have been heard to deny that college education implies more than a minimum literacy for the student, the fact remains that the general effects of a national literary tradition are much more widespread than ever before. Even without formal higher education the citizen of today is constantly besieged by claims on his attention of ideas gleaned from his radio, his television, the motion picture theater he attends, and the reprints of books purchased cheaply at his local drugstore. The heterogeneous audience created by this interplay of education, entertainment, and information is not universally discriminating; consequently much of the writing designed to attract it is commercially inspired to win popular approval and to increase profits. However, one of the hopeful signs of the literary times is the dissemination of serious literary work by modern mass media of communication. At home and abroad the opportunities—and responsibilities—of American writers are greater than in any earlier period.

1907. JAMES AGEE, 1909–1955

Agee's serious and fastidious writing is marked by moral indignation at the faults of contemporary society and by his power to express his judgments with poetic intensity, in a highly individualistic vocabulary. His prose works include Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (1941), a documentary text to photographs by Walker Evans, a book which is a biting arraignment of the system of farm tenantry in Alabama cotton production; and The Morning Watch (1951), a long short story of a twelve-year-old boy's inner conflicts and adjustments.

1908. Permit me voyage [poems] With a foreward by Archibald MacLeish. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1934. 59 p. (The Yale series of younger poets, edited by S. V. Benét)
34–38156 PS3501.G35P4 1934

1909. LOUIS AUCHINCLOSS, 1917–

Auchincloss is a novelist of manners dealing with well-to-do elements of New York City society, somewhat in the tradition of Edith Wharton and Henry James (qq. v.). His first book, The Indifferent Children (1947) was published under the pseudonym of Andrew Lee.

1910. The injustice collectors. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1950. 248 p.
50–14014 PZ3.A898Ip

Short stories.

1911. Sybil. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952 [i. e. 1951] 284 p. 51–8774 PZ3.A898Sy

1912. A law for the lion. [Cambridge, Mass.] Houghton Mifflin, 1953. 279 p.
53–5728 PZ3.A898Law

1913. The romantic egoists. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1954. 210 p.
54–5984 PZ3.A898Ro

Short stories.

1914. JAMES BALDWIN, 1924–

Baldwin in his first novel tells the story of a young Harlem Negro's spiritual problems and orthodox "salvation." The flashback technique is used to present the family background and to give the work wider scope for its oblique comment on morality and mores.

1915. Go tell it on the mountain. New York, Knopf, 1953. 303 p.
52–12199 PZ4.B18Go

1916. SHIRLEY FRANCES BARKER, 1911–

Shirley Barker first appeared before the public as a poetess. Her The Dark Hills Under (1933) was published in The Yale series of younger poets. This volume presaged her interest in New England in general and her native New Hampshire in particular. To this setting she has regularly returned, most notably as a historical novelist dealing with the colonial period. However, in Fire and the Hammer (1953) she deals with Pennsylvania and New Jersey at the time of the Revolutionary War.

1917. Peace, my daughters. New York, Crown, 1949. 248 p. 49–1164 PZ3.B2457Pe
A novel about the Salem witchcraft trials.

1918. Rivers parting. New York, Crown, 1950. 311 p. 50–14406 PZ3.B2457Ri
A novel set in 17th century England and New Hampshire.

1919. A land and a people; a book of poems. New York, Crown, 1952. 78p.
52–5683 PS3503.A5684L3

1920. Tomorrow the new moon. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1955. 354 p.
55–6820 PZ3.B2457To
A novel reflecting life in New England during the period of Cotton Mather.

1921. SAUL BELLOW, 1915–

With his third novel, The Adventures of Augie March, Bellow received wide, though not unanimous literary acclaim. A picaresque styled narrative about a Chicago Jew, it is a somewhat humorous, but not highly introspective fictional statement of the view that life is worth living.

1922. The adventures of Augie March. New York, Viking Press, 1953. 536 p.
53–7953 PZ3.B41937Ad

1923. JOHN BERRYMAN, 1914–

Berryman practices a highly crafted verse somewhat in the tradition of Wallace Stevens. His quiet, philosophic poems have been appearing in leading literary periodicals since the early thirties. Prominent mainly as an example of the modern trend in poetry, Berryman has also written an important study of Stephen Crane, and has done much critical work.

1924. The dispossessed. [Poems] New York, Sloane, 1948. 103 p.
48–6929 PS3503.E744D5

1925. ELIZABETH BISHOP, 1911–

Elizabeth Bishop's New England birth and rearing set against her visits to Key West have in part resulted in a poetry fusing a northern conservatism and a tropical luxuriance. Her work has been commended for metrical skill, ironic humor, incisive imagery, and keen powers of observation. Like most modern American poets, her work tends to appear first in periodicals. The first volume of this not very prolific poetess was North & South (1946).

1926. Poems: North & south. A cold spring. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1955. 95 p.
55–7003 PS3503.I785P6

1927. PAUL FREDERIC BOWLES, 1910–

Bowles has been regarded by some critics as one of the most forceful of the younger writers of fiction. His work is usually a picture of the modern sterility of spirit followed by a disintegration of personality; the stories are commonly evolved in terms of the civilized in contact with the primitive, frequently with an African setting. Thus Bowles projects and personifies some of the more strident overtones of modern life; this results in what might be called horror stories, but the horror is derived more from the psychological implications than from the gruesome physical facts. These qualities have placed him to the fore among authors of the modern Gothic tale. It could be said that Bowles presents a pessimistic waste land in prose fiction. He has also acquired a considerable reputation as a composer.

1928. The sheltering sky. [New York] New Directions, 1949. 318 p.
49–11888 PZ3.B682Sh

1929. The delicate prey, and other stories. [New York] Random House, 1950. 307 p.
50–10899 PZ3.B6826De
CONTENTS.—At Paso Rojo.—Pastor Dowe at Tacaté.—Call at Corazon.—Under the sky.—Señor Ong and Señor Ha.—The circular valley.—The echo.—The scorpion.—The fourth day out from Santa Cruz.—Pages from Cold Point.—You are not I.—How many midnights?—A thousand days to Mokhtar.—Tea on the mountain.—By the water.—The delicate prey.—A distance episode.

1930. Let it come down. New York, Random House, 1952. 311 p.
52–5141 PZ3.B6826Le

1931. The spider's house. New York, Random House, 1955. 406 p.
55–8169 PZ3.B6826Sp

1932. RAY BRADBURY, 1920–

Bradbury, one of the more popular science-fiction authors, represents a rapidly growing field of American writing. Although the field has usually been dismissed as pulp fiction, the quality of Bradbury's work has attracted the attention of many literary critics. His tales, often touched with humor, are usually works of fantasy or horror. Although commonly set in the future, they often indirectly comment on present-day society; so much so that his novel, Fahrenheit 451 (1953), becomes in part a social tract in its portrayal of a regimented society in which books are banned.

1933. Dark carnival. Sauk City, Wis., Arkham House, 1947. 313 p.
47–24598 PZ3.B72453Dar
Short stories.

1934. The Martian chronicles. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1950. 222 p.
50–7660 PZ3.B72453Mar

1935. The illustrated man. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 251 p.
51–1140 PZ3.B72453Il
Short stories.

1936. The golden apples of the sun. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1953. 250 p. illus.
52–13569 PZ3.B72453Go
Short stories.

1937. GWENDOLYN BROOKS, 1917–

Gwendolyn Brooks is a Negro author who was born in Kansas and later moved to Chicago, which is reflected in much of her writing. Her first volume of poetry, A Street in Bronzeville (1945), was generally well received as expressing Negro urban life; in 1950 for her second book she was awarded a Pulitzer prize for poetry.

1938. Annie Allen. New York, Harper, 1949. 60 p.
49–10072 PS3503.R7244A7

1939. Maud Martha. New York, Harper, 1953. 180 p.
53–7726 PZ4.B872Mau
A novelette, with a Chicago setting, about a young Negro woman and her love.

1940. JOHN HORNE BURNS, 1916–

The first book by Burns was a war novel, The Gallery, which depicted the great sympathy, and with what some have thought sentimentality, the Italians during the American occupation. His second book, Lucifer With a Book, was an attack on aspects of the private school system in America. A Cry of Children is the story of an unsatisfactory love affair which crosses social lines, but includes vignettes of the modern American city and presents on several levels the conflicts of a changing morality. Burns' books are written in a realistic, "non-literary" manner, and they have been said to evidence an "inverted puritanism."

1941. The gallery. New York, Harper, 1947. 342 p.
47–4090 PZ3.B93702Gal

1942. Lucifer with a book, a novel. New York, Harper, 1949. 340 p.
49–8269 PZ3.B93702Lu

1943. A cry of children. New York, Harper, 1952. 276 p.
52–9547 PZ3.B93702Cr

1944. TRUMAN CAPOTE, 1924–

Mr. Capote's style has been characterized as rich, eloquent, and simple, with a remarkable suggestive power. Others say that he is precocious and exotic, or even decadent. Some say his stories with Southern settings have a folktale quality which bespeaks the humor and tenderness with which he approaches his characters and presents life as essentially sad, but redeemed by humor and tenderness. Others find his subject matter reprehensible. He is sympathetic toward and understanding of children and deviate individuals.

1945. Other voices, other rooms. New York, Random House, 1948. 231 p.
48–5135 PZ3.C1724Ot
A novel in which a lonely youth confronts abnormality and eccentricity in a relatively isolated and rundown Louisiana mansion.

1946. A tree of night, and other stories. New York, Random House, 1949. 209 p.
49–7722 PZ3.C1724Tr
Modern Gothic stories with psychological or supernatural settings wherein abnormal individuals abound.

1947. The grass harp. [New York] Random House, 1951. 181 p.
51–13101 PZ3.C1724Gr
A symbolistic book of fantasy and the grotesque, in which the unimaginative life of conformity is attacked. Three leading characters take up residence in a tree to provide the central episode about which the story revolves. The work also appeared as a stage play.

1948. JOHN CIARDI, 1916–

Ciardi is a poet who has often used World War II as theme, or as a source of imagery for his nonwar poems. Besides the war, his themes are commonly America, love, and death. He has written both descriptive and symbolic poetry, usually with a highly concrete form of presentation. In addition to writing poetry, he has produced an anthology of the work of young American poets: Mid-Century American Poets (1950).

1949. Homeward to America. New York, Holt, 1940. 62 p. 40–3997 PS3505.I27H6 1940

1950. Other skies. [Poems] Boston, Little, Brown, 1947. 83 p.
47–31468 PS3505.I27O8

1951. Live another day; poems. New York, Twayne, 1949. 88 p.
49–10624 PS3505.I27L5

1952. From time to time. [Poems] New York, Twayne, 1951. 84 p. (The Twayne library of modern poetry) 51–8821 PS3505.I27F7

1953. As if; poems new and selected. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1955. 143 p. 55–9956 PS3505.I27A75

1954. WALTER VAN TILBURG CLARK, 1909–

Clark is a novelist who depicts the West and, more particularly, Nevada. His first book revolved about an erroneous lynching; his second portrayed a Reno youth who wished to be a composer; and his third was the story of a hunt for a mountain lion. His works demonstrate a psychological awareness and a tendency to infuse symbolic overtones into his realistic presentations.

1955. The Ox-Bow incident. New York, Random House, 1940. 309 p.
40–33213 PZ3.C5483Ox

1956. The city of trembling leaves. New York, Random House, 1945. 690 p.
45–35081 PZ3.C5483Ci

1957. The track of the cat, a novel. New York, Random House, 1949. 404 p.
49–9031 PZ3.C5483Tr

1958. The watchful gods, and other stories. New York, Random House, 1950. 306 p.
50–9687 PS3505.L376W3

CONTENTS.—Hook.—The wind and the snow of winter.—The rapids.—The anonymous.—The buck in the hills.—Why don't you look where you're going?—The Indian well.—The fish who could close his eyes.—The portable phonograph.—The watchful gods.

1959. AUGUST WILLIAM DERLETH, 1909–

August Derleth is a prolific author of books on Wisconsin. His most prominent works, his historical novels, are sometimes criticized for their slow pacing. Selected Poems (1944) contained a representative group of his largely regional poems. Wisconsin Earth, A Sac Prairie Sampler (1948) republished in one volume Shadow of Night, Place of Hawks, and Village Year: A Sac Prairie Journal. In addition he has written a number of mystery stories and edited anthologies in that field. He has also edited a number of science-fiction anthologies, such as Strange Ports of Call (1948), Beachheads in Space (1952), Time to Come (1954), and Portals of Tomorrow (1954).

1960. Wind over Wisconsin. New York, Scribner, 1938. 391 p.
38–27410 PZ3.D445Wi

This second volume of the Sac Prairie Saga takes place in the 1830's, the last years of the Indian wars.

1961. Restless is the river. New York, Scribner, 1939. 514 p. 39–27856 PZ3.D445Re

Pioneer life from 1839 to 1850 in the Sac Prairie country.

1962. Bright journey. New York, Scribner, 1940. 424 p. 40–33102 PZ3.D445Br

Frontier Wisconsin from 1812 to 1840 is reflected in this novel about fur trade in the Northwest Territory.

1963. Country growth. New York, Scribner, 1940. 322 p. 40–11748 PZ3.D4447Co

Short stories.

1964. Evening in spring. Sauk City, Wis., Stanton & Lee, 1945. 308 p.
46–781 PZ3.D445Ev2

A novel of adolescence in a Wisconsin village.

1965. Village daybook: a Sac Prairie journal. Chicago, Pellegrini & Cudahy, 1947. 306 p. illus. 47–3074 PS3507.E69V4

1966. RALPH ELLISON, 1914–

The first novel of this Negro novelist traces the life of a Negro from his adolescence in the South to maturity in New York. The prose is at times surrealistic.

1967. Invisible man. New York, Random House, 1952. 439 p. 52–5159 PZ4.E47In

1968. PAUL HAMILTON ENGLE, 1908–

Paul Engle is an Iowa poet and teacher who has incorporated much of his knowledge of the land and his love of America in his verses. These in their usual affirmativeness have been accredited to the Whitman tradition, although echoes of MacLeish and other modern authors may be heard in Engle's writings. Also, his poetic craftsmanship has in recent years become both more formal and more accomplished. His first book of poems was Worn Earth (1932), which was included in The Yale series of younger poets. This was followed by American Song (1934) and Break the Heart's Anger (1936), which contain poems reflecting his life abroad as a Rhodes scholar, and also his increasing awareness of the social issues and attitudes of the period. Corn (1939) is something of a transition book, for it reflects his return to America and his taking as theme the Iowan farmer and the dominating virtues of America. His work since then has reflected his position as an Iowan, a professor, a father, and a native citizen of America. His position as a scholar is indicated by Reading Modern Poetry (1955), an anthology with commentary which he produced with Warren Carrier.

1969. Always the land. New York, Random House, 1941. 326 p. 41–3535 PZ3.E576Al

A poetic novel of Iowan farm life.

1970. West of midnight. New York, Random House, 1941. 96 p. 42–269 PS3509.N44W4 1941

Poems.

1971. The word of love. [Poems] New York, Random House, 1951. 39 p. 51–10256 PS3509.N44W55

1972. American child; sonnets for my daughters, with thirty-six new poems. New York, Dial Press, 1956. 102 p. 56–9509 PS3509.N44A68 1956

The first part of this was first collected in book form under the title American Child, a Sonnet Sequence (1945).

1973. HOWARD MELVIN FAST, 1914–

Mr. Fast is a leftist novelist of much technical skill. Most of his work is in the form of the historical novel. In the main, these read extremely well. However, he slants his material obviously to influence readers rather than to render a comprehensive, objective view of his subject. Fast's most recent book, Silas Timberman (1954), the story of a quiet, conservative professor who ends up in jail because of his opposition to views of educationalists and members of Congress, who regard him as a Communist, is obvious propaganda.

1974. Conceived in liberty; a novel of Valley Forge. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1939. 389 p. 39–27589 PZ3.F265Co

A novel based on the experiences of the American Army during the winter months at Valley Forge during the American Revolutionary War.

1975. The last frontier. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1941. 307 p. 41–13229 PZ3.F265Las

A story of Cheyenne Indians leaving an Oklahoma reservation in 1878 in a last striving for dignified survival.

1976. The unvanquished. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1942. 316 p. 42–16612 PZ3.F265Un

A novel based on the life of George Washington during the Revolution.

1977. Citizen Tom Paine. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1943. 341 p. 43–51139 PZ3.F265Ci

A fictionalized account of Tom Paine's life in both Europe and America, with some emphasis on the Revolutionary period.

1978. The American, a Middle Western legend. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1946. 337 p. 46–25220 PZ3.F265Am

A novel based on the life of John Peter Altgeld, a liberal Illinois politician and Governor of that State in the late 19th century.

1979. My glorious brothers. Boston, Little, Brown, 1948. 280 p. 48–8762 PZ3.F265My
The story of the freeing of Israel from Syrian-Greek rulers 100 years before Christ.

1980. The passion of Sacco and Vanzetti, a New England legend. New York, Blue Heron Press, 1953. 254 p. 53–3420 PZ3.F265Pas
A view of the events behind the execution of Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti in 1927.

1981. JEAN GARRIGUE, 1912–

Jean Garrigue is a subjective poetess of minor scope who presents her emotions in a word-conscious verse that is reminiscent of Wallace Stevens.

1982. The ego and the centaur. [Poems. New York, New Directions] 1947. 126 p. 47–30700 PS3513.A7217E4

1983. The monument rose, poems. New York, Noonday Press, 1953. 58 p. 53–10701 PS3513.A7217M6

1984. WILLIAM GOYEN, 1915–

Goyen is a young Texas author who writes a highly "literary," poetic prose which he has so far used more for a lyric evocation of a time and place than as a means of telling a story.

1985. The house of breath. New York, Random House, 1950. 181 p. 50–9448 PZ3.G7484Ho
An emotional mood picture of Charity, Texas, apparently based largely on childhood recollections.

1986. Ghost and flesh; stories and tales. New York, Random House, 1952. 183 p. 52–5143 PZ3.G7484Gh

1987. In a farther country; a romance. New York, Random House, 1955. 182 p. 55–8143 PZ3.G7484In
A surrealistic novel about a Texas girl inhabiting a New York City "castle in Spain," where she is queen.

1988. LILLIAN FLORENCE HELLMAN, 1905–

Lillian Hellman, possibly the most successful of modern American women dramatists, writes plays with a "message"—often related to current events.

1989. Four plays: The children's hour; Days to come; The little foxes; Watch on the Rhine. New York, Random House, 1942. 330 p. 42–7559 PS3515.E343F6

1990. Another part of the forest, a play in three acts. New York, Viking Press, 1947. 134 p. 47–30238 PS3515.E343A8

1991. The autumn garden; a play in three acts. Boston, Little, Brown, 1951. 139 p. 51–10951 PS3515.E343A85

1992. JOHN RICHARD HERSEY, 1914–

John Hersey is known mainly for his reportorial work on World War II. His first book, Men on Bataan (1942), told the story of General MacArthur and the fall of the Philippines. In 1946 an entire issue of The New Yorker was devoted to Hiroshima, Hersey's account of the effects of the atomic bomb on that city; it was issued the same year as a book. His second novel, The Wall (1950), told of the Polish Jews under the Nazi occupation. His most recent novel, The Marmot Drive (1953), is a symbolic story which ostensibly reports a small New England town's attempts to overcome an invasion of woodchucks. Except for the last novel, he has regularly presented his material in a simple, realistic manner, as a reporter.

1993. Into the valley; a skirmish of the marines. New York, Knopf, 1943. 138 p. illus. 43–1318 D767.98.H4

1994. A bell for Adano. New York, Knopf, 1944. 269 p. 44–164 PZ3.H4385Be
A novel about the American occupation of a Sicilian village during World War II.

1995. WILLIAM MOTTER INGE, 1913–

William Inge, who was born in Kansas, is representative of some of the newer dramatists. His work, which is in the realist tradition, has met with considerable popular and critical acclaim both on the stage and in film.

1996. Come back, little Sheba. New York, Random House, 1950. 119 p. 50–8371 PS3517.N265C6 1950
An alcoholic, middle-aged chiropractor and his wife experience an unromantic family life.

1997. Picnic, a summer romance in three acts. New York, Random House, 1953. 168 p. (A Random House play) 53–8342 PS3517.N265P5

Set in a small Kansas town, this is a play about the effect of a good-looking vagrant on the women of the community.

1998. Bus stop. New York, Random House, 1955. 154 p. (A Random House play)
55–9043 PS3517.N265B8
A group of characters are brought together in a roadside restaurant when the bus is snowbound.

1999. RANDALL JARRELL, 1914–

Jarrell has developed a reputation as an occasionally coruscating critic of profound insight, as well as a sympathetic poet of musical and technical virtuosity. Many of his poems have been products of the war; these have appeared in volumes such as Little Friend, Little Friend (1945), Losses (1948), and The Seven-League Crutches (1951).

2000. Poetry and the age. New York, Knopf, 1953. 271 p. 52–12173 PN1271.J3

2001. Pictures from an institution, a comedy. New York, Knopf, 1954. 277 p.
54–5973 PZ4.J37Pi
A satirical novel about life at a small college.

2002. Selected poems. New York, Knopf, 1955. 205 p. 55–5613 PS3519.A86A6 1955

2003. JAMES JONES, 1921–

Jones' first novel was a realistic story of Army life in Hawaii, starting a few months before the Pearl Harbor attack and concluding shortly after it. A highly popular book, it was the source of an equally popular screen adaptation.

2004. From here to eternity. New York, Scribner, 1951. 861 p. 51–9228 PZ4.J77Fr

2005. ROSS FRANKLIN LOCKRIDGE, 1914–1948

Lockridge wrote only one book, a somewhat prolix novel which dealt with the day of July 4, 1892, in a small Indiana town, but which used the flashback technique to cover half a century of American life. The book rapidly became a best-seller and was widely acclaimed by critics, although a few clergymen objected to some passages. The author committed suicide about three months after publication of his book.

2006. Raintree County . . . which had no boundaries in time and space, where lurked musical and strange names and mythical and lost peoples, and which was itself only a name musical and strange. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1948. 1066 p. maps. 48–245 PZ3.L81146Rai

2007. ROBERT LOWELL, 1917–

Robert Lowell has been one of the most widely acclaimed of the younger poets. He has considerable linguistic and technical skill at his command as he sets out to explain the moral polarity of the world. His poetry, which often uses New England as a setting, is subtle, sincere, intense, and at times involved; it is also representative of the return to "classical" forms, or formalism, though with a very modern astringency. In 1947 he was awarded a Pulitzer prize for Lord Weary's Castle.

2008. Land of unlikeness; introd. by Allen Tate. Cummington [Mass.] Cummington Press, 1944. [43] p. 45–237 PS3523.O89L3

2009. Lord Weary's castle. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1946. 69 p.
46–7958 PS3523.O89L6

2010. The mills of the Kavanaughs. [Poems] New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1951. 55 p.
51–10214 PS3523.O89M5

2011. ROBERT JAMES COLLAS LOWRY, 1919–

Robert Lowry is the author of realistic novels and short stories, most of which derive in subject matter from World War II. These antimilitaristic and sometimes bitter works have been deplored by some for their "manner" and lack of restraint; the author has also been accused of sentimentality. However, his careful writing and the impression of truthfulness in his writings have won him many adherents. His most recent novel, The Violent Wedding (1953), is about a love affair between a white girl and a Negro prizefighter.

2012. Casualty. [New York] New Directions, 1946. 153 p. 46–7271 PZ3.L9564Cas

2013. Find me in fire. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 280 p.
48–7932 PZ3.L9564Fi

2014. The big cage. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1949. 342 p. 49–11454 PZ3.L9564Bi

2015. The wolf that fed us. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1949. 220 p.
49–7962 PZ3.L9564Wo

CONTENTS.—The toy balloon.—The church.—Layover in El Paso.—The war poet.—The wolf that fed us.—Visitors to the castle.—The terror in the streets.—The gold button.

2016. Happy New Year, kamerades! 11 stories. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1954. 256 p.
54–6783 PZ3.L9564Hap

2017. MARY THERESE McCARTHY, 1912–

Mary McCarthy started her literary career as a book reviewer and as a columnist dealing with New York stage productions; this latter aspect of her work may be seen in the essays selected for Sights and Spectacles, 1937–1956 (1956), which, partly because of the freedom allowed her by The Partisan Review, for which she wrote, is far from a full picture of the stage productions of the period. In recent years she has become famous as a novelist of biting satires. Her technique, however, is more one of close dissection of a neurotic character viewed narrowly than it is a caricaturing on a broad scale. Her characters are usually drawn from the literary and academic world in which she moves.

2018. The company she keeps. [New York] Simon & Schuster, 1942. 304 p.
42–13269 PZ3.M1272Co

A portrait of a neurotic, pseudo-intellectual, liberal girl as a product of the thirties.

2019. The oasis. New York, Random House, 1949. 181 p. 49–10152 PZ3.M1272Oas

The story of a group of intellectuals who attempt to establish a Utopia on a New England mountain.

2020. Cast a cold eye. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 212 p.
50–9761 PZ3.M1272Cas

A group of short stories distinguished by the author's famous stylistic abilities.

2021. The groves of Academe. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1952. 302 p.
52–7255 PZ3.M1272Gr

A novel, with a small Pennsylvania college setting, against which a neurotic-intellectual professor of literature is closely pictured with all his unpleasantnesses.

2022. A charmed life. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. 313 p.
55–10153 PZ3.M1272Ch

A novel picturing life in a colony set up to encourage the creativity of writers and artists.

2023. CARSON (SMITH) McCULLERS, 1917–

Carson McCullers is a Southern novelist who usually writes subtle and original works set in her home area. She commonly presents understanding, sympathetic accounts of her characters' inner compulsions; this aspect is heightened by her emphasis on the factors of personality motivation and the differences in even the "well-adjusted" characters. She is a realist and tends to be symbolistic, with results that have been called metaphysical. Her Reflections in a Golden Eye (1941) is a bizarre but brilliant story of a group of abnormal individuals whose fates intertwine at a prewar Southern Army post. The Member of the Wedding (1946) is an evocative novel which depicts the yearning of a young girl to escape her environment; it appeared also in both stage and screen adaptations.

2024. The ballad of the sad café; the novels and stories of Carson McCullers. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1951. 791 p.
51–10969 PZ3.M13884Bal

CONTENTS.—The ballad of the sad café.—Wunderkind.—The jockey.—Madame Zilensky and the King of Finland.—The sojourner.—A domestic dilemma.—A tree, a rock, a cloud.—The heart is a lonely hunter.—Reflections in a golden eye.—The member of the wedding.

2025. NORMAN MAILER, 1923–

Mailer's first novel was a best seller that dealt with the war in the Pacific; it was noted for its realism and its accurate recording of the speech of the soldiers, as well as for passages of poetic intensity. His second book, a thesis novel which dealt with political ideologies and was set in postwar New York, and also his third, which portrays the denizens of the motion picture and entertainment world in California, were not so highly regarded by many reviewers.

2026. The naked and the dead. New York, Rinehart, 1948. 721 p.
48–6633 PZ3.M2815Nak

2027. Barbary shore. New York, Rinehart, 1951. 312 p. 51–10764 PZ3.M2815Bar

2028. The deer park. New York, Putnam, 1955. 375 p. 55–10093 PZ3.M2815De

2029. WILLIAM KEEPERS MAXWELL, 1908–

William Maxwell was born in Illinois, and his life there is a source for much of the background in his writings. He was for a time an editor of The New Yorker.

2030. Bright center of heaven. New York, Harper, 1934. 315 p.
34–28619 PZ3.M4518Br
Events of a day on a Wisconsin farm.

2031. They came like swallows. New York, Harper, 1937. 267 p.
37–6382 PZ3.M4518Th
A story of commonplace events in the lives of members of an American family in 1918.

2032. The folded leaf. New York, Harper, 1945. 310 p. 45–3288 PZ3.M4518Fo
A story of the friendship of two boys, one an introvert and the other an extrovert.

2033. Time will darken it. New York, Harper, 1948. 302 p. 48–8331 PZ3.M4518Ti Set in a small Illinois town in 1912, this story mirrors life in America at that period.

2034. THOMAS MERTON, 1915–

Thomas Merton is a Catholic convert who became a Trappist monk. This story he tells in his popular autobiographical book, The Seven Storey Mountain. He initially received most attention as a Catholic poet writing in a surrealistic style. Of late he has been writing religious prose; meditations, biographical works, etc.

2035. A man in the divided sea. [Norfolk, Conn., New Directions] 1946. 155 p.
46–7485 PS3525.E7174M3
A collection of poems including those which appeared in Thirty Poems (1944).

2036. The seven storey mountain. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1948. 429 p.
48–8645 BX4705.M542A3
Autobiography.

2037. Figures for an apocalypse. [Poems] Norfolk, Conn., New Directions [1948] ©1947. 111 p. 48–2906 PS3525.E7174F5

2038. Seeds of contemplation. [Norfolk, Conn.] New Directions, 1949. 201 p.
49–1562 BX2350.M54
A mystic work of meditation on the spiritual life.

2039. The tears of the blind lions. [Poems. New York] New Directions, 1949. 32 p.
49–49074 PS3525.E7174T4

2040. The waters of Siloe. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1949. 377 p. illus.
49–10495 BX4102.M4
This volume is something of a philosophy of monasticism and a history of the Cistercians, with an emphasis on Cistercian activities in the United States.

2041. The sign of Jonas. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1953. 362 p.
52–9857 BX4705.M542A32
"A collection of personal notes and meditations set down during about five years . . . in the monastery of Gethsemani."

2042. No man is an island. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. 264 p.
55–7420 BX2350.M535
This volume of reflections on the inner life serves as a sequel to Seeds of Contemplation (q. v.).

2043. ARTHUR MILLER, 1915–

With his third book, the play All My Sons, Miller rose to prominence as an author, and started the work that was to establish him as one of the leading dramatists of his generation. His style is one of flat realism, so that it is from what he says and the way he organizes his material, rather than from any purely literary expression, that he achieves his effect.

2044. Situation normal. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1944. 179 p.
44–47726 U766.M48
An account, in the form of notes to a film producer, of civilians training to be soldiers as the author had observed them during a special tour.

2045. Focus. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1945. 217 p. 45–9586 PZ3.M61224Fo
A novel on the theme of anti-Semitism.

2046. All my sons, a play in three acts. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1947. 83 p.
47–30156 PS3525.I5156A7
A tragedy dealing with the social effects of an industrial war crime.

2047. Death of a salesman; certain private conversations in two acts and a requiem. New York, Viking Press, 1949. 139 p.
49–8817 PS3525.I5156D4
A tragedy reflecting the life of a salesman, and presenting the problem of values in modern society. This book was awarded a Pulitzer prize for drama, and it was the first play to be distributed by the Book-of-the-Month Club.

2048. The crucible, a play in four acts. New York, Viking Press, 1953. 145 p.
53-6724 PS3525.I5156C7 1953
A play dealing with the Salem witchcraft trials.

2049. A view from the bridge; two one-act plays. New York, Viking Press, 1955. 160 p.
55-10474 PS3525.I5156V5
A View from the Bridge is the story of two Italians who illegally entered the United States, and who are seeking jobs as longshoremen. The second play, A Memory of Two Mondays, presents a view of life in a New York warehouse as reflecting the outside world.

2050. BUCKLIN MOON, 1911–

Moon is a Southern Negro author who in his works has attempted to present his view of race prejudice and relationships between whites and Negroes, especially as they exist in the South.

2051. Without magnolias. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1949. 274 p.
49-8390 PZ3.M77717Wi
A tract novel depicting a Negro community in Florida.

2052. WRIGHT MORRIS, 1910–

Morris' novels, which often use a Midwest setting, are written in the plain prose characteristic of much modern fiction. A professional photographer, Morris reflects an aptitude for recording visual details of commonplace things and acts as indirect indexes of character and personal relationships. This is further emphasized in some of his work by the joint use of photographs and text, as in The Home Place (1948), the story of a New York family on a visit to a Nebraska farm, which he continued, without pictures, in The World in the Attic (1949). His first book, My Uncle Dudley (1942), captured much of this photographic sense in a picaresque novel about the trip of some "bums" from Los Angeles to Chicago, basically humorous but with serious overtones. In The Man Who Was There (1945), a novel about the effects on others of a man missing in war action, Morris started to explore the geography of personality, the mystery of private human feelings, the interinfluence of characters, and the sorrow of individual loneliness and non-communication which have become dominant ingredients in his latest books. Throughout his work there is an attempt to find out and understand what an "American" is.

2053. Man and boy. New York, Knopf, 1951. 212 p. 51-2263 PZ3.M8346Mam
A satire on a selfish mother about to christen a boat in honor of her hero-son who was killed at Guadalcanal.

2054. The works of love. New York, Knopf, 1952, ©1951. 269 p.
51-11978 PZ3.M8346Wn
A study of the personality of a Midwesterner from his isolated boyhood in a rural community, through his successful career in the poultry business, to his isolated old age in Chicago, where he suddenly dies while employed as a store Santa Claus.

2055. The deep sleep. New York, Scribner, 1953. 312 p. 53-11783 PZ3.M8346De
A novel told through the minds of five people brought together in a Philadelphia suburb by the death of a judge who had deeply influenced each of them.

2056. The huge season. New York, Viking Press, 1954. 306 p. 54-10858 PZ3.M8346Hu

The main character visualizes the present-day (1952) situation in terms of the influences on him and his friends during their youth in the Jazz Age.

2057. EDWARD NEWHOUSE, 1911–

Newhouse, because of the frequent appearance of his short stories in that periodical, is sometimes known as a New Yorker author. His work deals mainly with the New York scene, including the suburbs; however, most of the stories in The Iron Chain (1946) are concerned with World War II.

2058. Many are called; forty-two short stories. New York, Sloane, 1951. 384 p.
51-12159 PZ3.N458Man

2059. The temptation of Roger Heriott. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1954. 241 p.
54-10198 PZ3.N458Te
A novel about the demands of integrity in a moderately well-to-do suburbanite who works in New York for a private foundation that awards fellowships to young musicians.

2060. JOHN FREDERICK NIMS, 1913–

Nims writes a polished poetry which usually employs urban themes, often those of the small city. While his work thus reflects aspects of modern American life, it also reflects his own life as a scholar.

2061. The iron pastoral. New York, Sloane, 1947. 86 p. 47–4500 PS3527.I863I7
Poems.

2062. A fountain in Kentucky, and other poems. New York, Sloane, 1950. 72 p.
50–6019 PS3527.I863F6 1950

2063. CLIFFORD ODETS, 1906–

Odets rose to prominence as a playwright concerned with conveying a meaningful view of life, especially the life of urban middle-class society. Raised in New York in a middle-class family, he portrays this background in many of his plays. Realism and forceful dialogue have been characteristic of much of his work. An experimentalist in subject matter and attitude, he rapidly became one of the leaders of the "new" drama of the thirties.

2064. Six plays. With a pref. by the author. New York, Modern Library, 1939. 433 p. (The Modern Library of the word's best books)
39–27816 PS3529.D46S5 1939
CONTENTS.—Waiting for Lefty.—Awake and sing!—Till the day I die.—Paradise lost.—Golden boy.—Rocket to the moon.

2065. Night music; a comedy in twelve scenes. New York, Random House, 1940. 237 p.
40–7217 PS3529.D46N5 1940

2066. Clash by night. New York, Random House, 1942. 242 p.
42–7560 PS3529.D46C5

2067. The big knife. New York, Random House, 1949. 147 p.
49–5900 PS3529.D46B5 1949

2068 The country girl, a play in three acts. New York, Viking Press, 1951. 124 p.
51–1860 PS3529.D46C6

2069. JOHN HENRY O'HARA, 1905–

John O'Hara, whose first novel is still considered by some to be his best work, writes often of common (in the pejorative sense) people. He is realistic in style and, to many, shockingly frank. His settings vary widely, though Hollywood, New York, and rural Pennsylvania do recur; a large percentage of his characters are modern urbanites.

2070. Appointment in Samarra, a novel. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1934. 301 p.
34–25527 PZ3.O3677Ap
Three days of sex, alcohol, and gangsters in a Pennsylvania town in 1930 climax in the hero's suicide.

2071. The doctor's son and other stories. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1935. 294 p.
35–3041 PZ3.O3677Do

2072. Files on parade. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. 277 p.
39–23749 PZ3.O3677Fi
Short stories.

2073. Pipe night. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1945. 205 p.
45–3002 PZ3.O3677Pi
Short stories.

2074. Here's O'Hara; three novels and twenty short stories. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1946. 440 p. 46–4951 PZ3.O3677He
The novels are Butterfield 8 (1935), which is based on a New York murder case, and which involves mainly the fringe elements of nightclub life; Hope of Heaven (1938), which presents the unhappy love affair of a Hollywood scenario writer and a bookstore clerk; and Pal Joey (1940), which takes the form of letters of a nightclub entertainer.

2075. Hellbox. New York, Random House, 1947. 210 p. 47–30414 PZ3.O3677Hc
Short stories.

2076. A rage to live. New York, Random House, 1949. 590 p. 49–10363 PZ3.O3677Rag
A somewhat panoramic novel of social and sexual life in a Pennsylvania community, starting a few years before World War I.

2077. The Farmers Hotel, a novel. New York, Random House, 1951. 153 p.
51–14121 PZ3.O3677Far
The story of people snowbound in a Pennsylvania hotel.

2078. Ten North Frederick. New York, Random House, 1955. 408 p.
55–8167 PZ3.O3677Te
A novel of manners set in O'Hara's home area in Pennsylvania.

2079. KENNETH PATCHEN, 1911–

Patchen's poetry is often sentimental in content, but normally modernistic in form. His themes have been: protest against social and economic injustices and follies, love of humanity and the universe, hatred of mankind and the world, sex, and religion. His poetry has been extremely uneven, and the range of its critical laudation and denunciation has been equally great. He has also written several volumes of prose, which were largely surrealistic and with many of the qualities and much of the subject matter of his poetry. His most recent venture, Glory Never Guesses (1955), is a limited edition, silk-screen process volume worked originally by hand, in an attempt to produce a book as an integral work of art, somewhat in the tradition of some of Blake's work.

2080. First will & testament. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1939. 181 p.
40–1114 PS3531.A764F5 1939
Poems.

2081. The journal of Albion Moonlight. [Mount Vernon, N. Y., Walpole Printing Office] 1941. 313 p. 41–19128 PS3531.A764J6 1941
A novel in surrealistic and often poetic prose; the work, written in the form of a journal, relies strongly on symbolism to convey its author's commentaries about life, society, and the individual.

2082. The memoirs of a shy pornographer. [New York, New Directions] 1945. 242 p.
45–8438 PZ3.P2714Me
An experimental, satirical novel about a naive young man whose novel becomes a pornographic best-seller as a result of the publisher's large-scale substitution of asterisks for otherwise innocuous words.

2083. The selected poems. [Norfolk, Conn.] New Directions, 1946. 86 p. (The New classics series) A48–7811 PS3531.A764A6 1946

2084. Sleepers awake. [New York, Padell] 1946. 389 p. 46–21856 PS3531.A764S5
A surrealistic novel attacking many of the follies of contemporary man; man's inhumanity to man is the basic theme for excoriation. The book incorporates an unusual amount of typographical experimentation.

2085. See you in the morning. New York, Padell, 1948, ©1947. 256 p.
48–17796 PZ3.P2714Se
In a sense Patchen's first novel, this is a short, conventional, poetic story about a young couple who accept life and love in the face of imminent death.

2086. Red wine & yellow hair. [Poems] New York, New Directions, 1949. 64 p.
49–7607 PS3531.A764R4

2087. FREDERIC PROKOSCH, 1908–

Prokosch has spent much of his life abroad, a fact which is revealed in his poetry and novels. His settings and most of his characters are usually foreign, although some, if not all, of the central characters tend to be American. He is a careful, lyric writer who presents, often in a poetic prose of philosophic detachment, meditative reveries on the problems of the modern world. However, in A Tale for Midnight (1955) he goes back several centuries for the story of the Cenci. Prokosch has also translated poetry from several languages.

2088. The Asiatics. New York, Harper, 1935. 423 p. 35–19872 PZ3.P9424As
Travels of an American through Asia.

2089. The seven who fled. New York, Harper, 1937. 479 p. 37–18251 PZ3.P9424Se
Seven Russian exiles have terrifying experiences wandering through Central Asia.

2090. Night of the poor. New York, Harper, 1939. 359 p. 39–24223 PZ3.P9424Ni
A novel that reflects aspects of America, especially the poor whites of the South, as seen by a boy hitchhiking from Wisconsin to Texas.

2091. The skies of Europe. New York, Harper, 1941. 500 p. 41–14057 PZ3.P9424Sk
A novel about Europe in the two years prior to World War II, as seen through the eyes of an American reporter who travels about the continent.

2092. The conspirators. New York, Harper, 1943. 338 p. 43–1142 PZ3.P9424Co
Refugees and espionage agents against a Lisbon setting during World War II.

2093. Age of thunder. New York, Harper, 1945. 311 p. 45–2642 PZ3.P9424Ag
A philosophically inclined narrative of a search along the French-Swiss border for traitors.

2094. The idols of the cave. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1946. 373 p.
46–7545 PZ3.P9424Id
A novel that presents, in an almost disinterested manner, unusual, sideline characters in New York during the war.

2095. Chosen poems. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1947. 81 p.
47–2987 PS3531.R78C45 1947

2096. Storm and echo. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 274 p.
48–8302 PZ3.P9424St PS3531.R78S7

A novel which presents the fearfulness and impenetrability of man's inner life as discovered by a journey into the African jungle.

2097. Nine days to Mukalla. New York, Viking Press, 1953. 249 p.
52–14033 PZ3.P9424Nk

A group of westerners, including some Americans, experience a plane crash on an isolated Arabic island in the Indian Ocean, and thereafter undergo unpleasant and exhausting adventures in their attempt to return to civilization.

2098. KENNETH REXROTH, 1905–

Rexroth is a California poet who has by some critics been adjudged best in his nature and descriptive poetry, but who himself seems to place greater value on the philosophic parts of his work. His direct philosophic impulse led him to abandon the syntactical experimentation found in his early poems, In What Hour (1940), for a neoclassic syllabic verse form which would allow him more readily to communicate his message. The earlier experimentalism reappeared in another volume, The Art of Worldly Wisdom (1953), a collection of early work which had not previously been published in book form. While in many aspects his work is derived from modern French, American, and English poetry, Rexroth's work also shows classical influences, both East and West. Detectable in his lyrics, they become decisive in the lyric plays published in Beyond the Mountains.

2099. The phoenix and the tortoise. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1944. 100 p.
44–9924 PS3535.E923P5

Poems.

2100. The signature of all things; poems, songs, elegies, translations, and epigrams. New York, New Directions, 1950. 89 p.
50–5683 PS3535.E923S5

2101. Beyond the mountains. [Plays. New York, New Directions] 1951. 190 p. (Direction, 20) 51–9631 PS3535.E923B4

CONTENTS.—Phaedra.—Iphigenia.—Hermaios.—Berenike.

2102. The dragon and the unicorn. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1952. 171 p.
52–14902 PS3535.E923D7

"Large parts of . . . [this poem] were previously published . . . in the New Directions annuals for 1950 and 1951."

2103. THEODORE ROETHKE, 1908–

Roethke is a poet of quiet tone and a modest though well-controlled range. A large percentage of his themes stems from his childhood experiences in a greenhouse. He is one of the younger poets to have achieved recognition. In 1954 he received the Pulitzer prize for The Waking, a selection which adequately represents his production to date.

2104. The waking; poems, 1933–1953. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1953. 120 p.
53–9125 PS3535.O39W3

2105. MURIEL RUKEYSER, 1913–

Born and bred in New York City, Rukeyser became an urban poet in the neo-metaphysical mould. Her leftist tendencies have repeatedly led in her work to a probing of social problems and injustices. Miss Rukeyser has occasionally ventured into other fields of writing, as in The Life of Poetry (1949), a study of the role of poetry in life, and in Willard Gibbs (1942), a scientist discussed at length under no. 4751.

2106. Selected poems. [New York, New Directions] 1951. 111 p. (The New classics series) 51–12264 PS3535.U4A6 1951

Earlier volumes of poetry by Rukeyser include Theory of Flight (1935), U. S. 1 (1938), A Turning Wind (1939), Wake Island (1942), The Beast in View (1944), The Green Wave (1948), and Elegies (1949).

2107. JEROME DAVID SALINGER, 1919–

Salinger rose to prominence in 1951 with a novel about a neurotic adolescent who is expelled from preparatory school and wanders about New York for a few days before going home. The story is told in the form of an interior monologue written in nonliterary conversational prose.

2108. The catcher in the rye. Boston, Little, Brown, 1951. 277 p.
51–4713 PZ4.S165Cat

2109. Nine stories. Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 302 p. 52–12626 PZ4.S165Ni

2110. WILLIAM SAROYAN, 1908–

Saroyan is a highly prolific Armenian-American Californian who usually writes in somewhat amorphous form about California, although occasionally dealing with New York or some other place. His work is often highly imaginative reporting of the world as he sees it. Personality, fantasy, and humor inform his world of sweetness and light wherein wander all (and almost only) the beautiful people. However, a few of his later books have accepted the possibility of unpleasantness in life. Saroyan's first book was The Daring Young Man on the Flying Trapeze, and Other Stories (1934), which almost immediately established his popularity. While his numerous short stories and sketches continue to maintain for him a reputation as a short-story writer, he has also received considerable attention as a dramatist. My Heart's in the Highlands (1939) is usually considered his best play, but it was The Time of Your Life (1939), which was awarded the 1940 Pulitzer prize for drama, which the author refused. He has also written a number of novels and autobiographical works. The latter is in some respects a formal distinction, for it has been claimed that he writes some fictional autobiography, and that the rest of his work is highly autobiographical fiction.

2111. My name is Aram. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1940. 220 p.
40–34075 PZ3.S246My

2112. Three plays: My heart's in the Highlands, The time of your life, Love's old sweet song. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1940. 121, 200, 146 p.
40–30799 PS3537.A826T47 1940

2113. Three plays by William Saroyan: The beautiful people, Sweeney in the trees, and Across the board on Tomorrow Morning. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1941. 275 p.
41–22847 PS3537.A826T43 1941

2114. Razzle dazzle. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1942. 505 p.
42–12443 PS3537.A826R35
"Frontispiece" (added t. p. on two leaves, illustrated in color): Razzle-dazzle; or, The human ballet, opera and circus; or, There's something I got to tell you: being many kinds of short plays as well as the story of the writing of them.

2115. The human comedy. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1943. 291 p.
43–51036 PZ3.S246Hu

2116. The Saroyan special, selected short stories. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1948. 368 p.
48–9565 PZ3.S246Sar

2117. Don't go away mad, and two other plays: Sam Ego's house [and] A decent birth, a happy funeral. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1949. 238 p.
49–11921 PS3537.A826D6

2118. The Assyrian, and other stories. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 276 p.
50–5197 PZ3.S246As

2119. The twin adventures: The adventures of William Saroyan, a diary. The adventures of Wesley Jackson, a novel. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 225, 285 p. 50–6550 PZ3.S246Tw
"An hour-to-hour chronicle of a writer at work on the writing of a novel, and the novel itself."
The novel was published separately in 1946.

2120. Tracy's tiger. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 143 p. 51–13965 PZ3.S246Tp

2121. The bicycle rider in Beverly Hills. New York, Scribner, 1952. 178 p.
52–12748 PS3537.A826Z52
Autobiographical.

2122. The laughing matter, a novel. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1953. 254 p.
52–13557 PZ3.S246Lau

2123. MAY SARTON, 1912–

May Sarton was born in Belgium, but came to America within a few years, after her family fled the country because of the German invasion. In her early years she had expected to make the theater her career; one of the products of this interest is the play, The Underground River (1947). She soon turned, however, from the theater to a career as a poet and novelist. As a poet she established a considerable reputation as a formal lyricist through works published in periodicals and in her small early collections, Encounter in April (1937) and Inner Landscape (1939). Her novels have reflected her European background and interests, for they have usually had European characters and settings. Thus works such as The Single Hound (1938), The Bridge of Years (1946), and Shadow of a Man (1950) have served to present Americans with pictures of life in Europe.

2124. The lion and the rose, poems. New York, Rinehart, 1948. 104 p.
48–5806 PS3537.A832L5

2125. A shower of summer days. New York, Rinehart, 1952. 244 p.
52–9599 PZ3.S249Shc
A novel in which an American girl matures in the course of a summer visit to the estate of relatives in Ireland.

2126. The land of silence, and other poems. New York, Rinehart, 1953. 99 p.
53–7721 PS3537.A832L3

2127. Faithful are the wounds. New York, Rinehart, 1955. 281 p. 55–5304 PZ3.S249Fai
This is May Sarton's first novel with an American setting. Its story is that of a Harvard professor who commits suicide. It has been claimed that the story is based on the life and death of F. O. Matthiessen (q. v.).

2128. MARK SCHORER, 1908–

Mark Schorer has written a number of realistic novels and short stories which have been praised for their psychological insight as well as for their style and structure. In 1946 he published William Blake; the Politics of Vision, which is more an attempt to explain the poet's system of thought than it is a critical or historical work.

2129. A house too old, a novel. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1935. 305 p.
35–15150 PZ3.S375Ho
A novel about settlers in a Wisconsin town, with the story of the growth of the community over the subsequent century.

2130. The hermit place, a novel. New York, Random House, 1941. 313 p.
41–7658 PZ3.S375He
A psychological novel about two sisters who were in love with a man who died a year before the time of the story.

2131. The state of mind, thirty-two stories. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. 346 p.
47–2350 PZ3.S375St

2132. The wars of love, a novel. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1954. 174 p.
53–7878 PZ3.S375War
A story of some children together at an upstate New York resort, and how that summer works out when they come together as adults in New York City.

2133. DELMORE SCHWARTZ, 1913–

Delmore Schwartz is a New York poet whose work commonly reflects his native city and is usually philosophical in tenor. He has also published some short stories and dramatic work, as well as a number of distinguished critical reviews. His critical work has appeared in periodicals such as Partisan Review, of which he was editor, from 1943 to 1946, and subsequently associate editor.

2134. In dreams begin responsibilities. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1938. 171 p.
39–8052 PS3537.C79I5 1938
CONTENTS.—"In dreams begin responsibilities," a story.—Coriolanus and his mother: the dream of one performance, a narrative poem.—Poems of experiment and imitation.—Dr. Bergen's belief, a play in prose and verse.

2135. Shenandoah. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1941. 28 p. (The Poet of the month [8])
41–28270 PS3537.C79S5 1941
Poetic drama.

2136. Genesis . . . [New York, New Directions] 1943+
43–8710 PS3537.C79G4
A story, in prose and poetry, of the making of an American.

2137. The world is a wedding. [Short stories. Norfolk, Conn.] New Directions, 1948 196 p.
48–7957 PZ3.S405Wo
CONTENTS.—The world is a wedding.—New Year's Eve.—A bitter farce.—America!—The statues.—The child is the meaning of this life.—In dreams begin responsibilities.

2138. Vaudeville for a princess, and other poems. [New York] New Directions, 1950. 106 p.
50–9969 PS3537.C79V3

2139. KARL JAY SHAPIRO, 1913–

Although Karl Shapiro was a soldier when his first volumes appeared during the Second World War, he has developed into more than a war poet. His poetry usually deals with the implications of the poet's position, or evolves out of his immediate environment. His relatively formal verse thus reflects his life in America and in the Pacific. He edited Poetry: A Magazine of Verse from 1950 to 1955.

2140. Person, place and thing. [New York] Reynal & Hitchcock, 1942. 88 p.
42–51003 PS3537.H27P4

2141. V-letter, and other poems. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1944. 63 p.
44–6977 PS3537.H27V18

2142. Essay on rime. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1945. 72 p. 45–9654 PS3537.H27E8
Verse.

2143. Trial of a poet, and other poems. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1947. 81 p.
47–11585 PS3537.H27T7

2144. Poems, 1940–1953. New York, Random House, 1953. 161 p.
53–6928 PS3537.H27A17 1953
A short selection from the author's earlier volumes, with a few new poems added.

2145. IRWIN SHAW, 1913–

Shaw, who has written for films and radio, first attracted general public attention as a dramatist; among his plays are Bury the Dead (1936) and Sons and Soldiers (1944). Shortly after being acclaimed as a dramatist, he emerged as a prominent short-story writer. Here, as in all his writings, a clarity of expression and a driving moral purpose were evident. Writing usually of Americans in general, and often of New Yorkers in particular, Shaw has almost always directly or indirectly presented some social issue.

2146. The young lions. New York, Random House, 1948. 689 p.
48–8508 PZ3.S5357Yo
Starting in a Bavarian forest in 1938, this novel traces the story of three men and their part in World War II through 1945.

2147. Mixed company; collected short stories. [New York, Random House] 1950. 480 p.
50–10065 PZ3.S5357Mi

2148. The troubled air. New York, Random House, 1951. 418 p.
51–11045 PZ3.S5357Tr
The story of an attempt to clear some people in the radio industry after they are subjected to unsubstantiated charges of communism. This is a political novel dealing with the problem of communism in America in the late forties; the emphasis is on the then prevalent attitude. Since it is a book with a message, few have reacted to it on any purely esthetic level, with the result that it has received mixed reviews.

2149. HARRY ALLEN SMITH, 1907–

In loosely autobiographical narratives and novels H. Allen Smith offers his humorous commentary on American life and customs. Coming from the Midwest to New York City, Smith began his writing career as a journalist; much of his early work reflects interview assignments with unusual people. In time he settled in Mt. Kisco, a New York suburb which he uses as a point of departure for a number of his writings.

2150. 3 Smiths in the wind: Low man on a totem pole. Life in a putty knife factory. Lost in the horse latitudes. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1946. 205, 218, 223 p. 46–7219 PN4874.S56A35

2151. Lo, the former Egyptian! Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1947. 212 p.
47–11538 PN6161.S6574
Autobiographical reminiscences pertaining to his youth in that part of Illinois known as Egypt.

2152. Larks in the popcorn. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 256 p.
48–9385 PN6161.S65734
An account of life in the New York suburbs.

2153. We went thataway. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1949. 256 p.
49–11513 PZ3.S64803We
An account of a trip through the West to report to Mt. Kisco on the "western menace."

2154. Mister Zip. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1952. 252 p. 52–5112 PZ3.S64803Mk
A satire, in novel form, on Hollywood westerns.

2155. The world, the flesh, and H. Allen Smith. Garden City, N. Y., Hanover House, 1954. 301 p. 54–8923 PN4874.S56A38
Selections made largely from Smith's London Journal (1952) and Low Man on a Totem Pole (1941).

2156. JEAN STAFFORD, 1915–

Jean Stafford is a New England novelist who has been much praised for her stylistic virtuosity as well as for psychological penetration. Her ambitious stories are more than well-written plots, for they attempt to comment on life and life values and on the position of good and evil in the world. Much of her work derives in mood and setting from her native New England.

2157. Boston adventure. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1944. 496 p.
44–40176 PZ3.S7783Bo

2158. The mountain lion. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1947. 231 p.
47–1963 PZ3.S7783Mo

2159. The Catherine wheel, a novel. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1952. 281 p.
52–6161 PZ3.S7783Cat

2160. Children are bored on Sunday. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1953. 252 p.
52–13766 PZ3.S7783Ch
Short stories.

2161. WALLACE EARLE STEGNER, 1909–

Wallace Stegner regularly uses a setting in the Northwest and northern Midwest. In addition to his fiction, which began with short stories and his novelette Remembering Laughter (1937) about life on an Iowa farm, Stegner has written Mormon Country (1942), which is a history of the Mormons and, to a large extent, of Utah; One Nation (1945; with the editors of Look), a report on foreign population elements in the United States; and Beyond the Hundredth Meridian: John Wesley Powell and the Second Opening of the West (1954), a distinguished biographical-historical study.

2162. The Big Rock Candy mountain. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1943. 515 p.
43–51281 PZ3.S818Bi
Life of a wandering family in the far West, Alaska, and Canada.

2163. Second growth. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. 240 p. 47–4398 PZ3.S818Se
A story with a small New Hampshire town setting, reflecting the conflict of views between the regular inhabitants and the summer residents, who were largely educators.

2164. The preacher and the slave. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1950. 403 p.
50–8708 PZ3.S818Pr
A biographical novel about the last decade of the life of Joseph Hillstrom (1882–1914), a leader of the I. W. W.

2165. The women on the wall. [Short stories] Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1950. 277 p.
49–50344 PZ3.S818Wo

2166. JESSE STUART, 1907–

Stuart first achieved recognition with his poems in Man With a Bull-Tongue Plow (1934), which depicted life in his native Kentucky hills. This folk-tale, local-color aspect dominates his rustic, regional works, which are written in a language reflecting the local dialect. His direct relationship to this area is unsophisticatedly present in his autobiographical works: Beyond Dark Hills (1938) and The Thread That Runs So True (1949), the latter covering his life through the time he left teaching to become a farmer so that he could afford to get married. It is not his nature to labor his work artistically, with the result that his plots are at times unconvincing, passing only as excuses for regionalistic prose emphasizing setting and character. While Stuart has been criticized for his excessive "cult of the primitive" and limited range, many enjoy his direct, down-to-earth stories.

2167. Head o' W-Hollow. New York, Dutton, 1936. 342 p. 36–8773 PZ3.S9306He
Short stories.

2168. Men of the mountains. New York, Dutton, 1941. 349 p. 41–4022 PZ3.S9306Men
Short stories.

2169. Taps for Private Tussie. New York, Books, Inc., Distributed by E. P. Dutton, 1943. 303 p. illus. 43–17838 PZ3.S9306Tap2

2170. Tales from the Plum Grove hills. New York, Dutton, 1946. 256 p.
46–7101 PZ3.S9306Tal

2171. Clearing in the sky, & other stories. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1950. 262 p.
50–10491 PZ3.S9306Cl

2172. Kentucky is my land. [Poems] New York, Dutton, 1952. 95 p.
52–11461 PS3537.T92516K4

2173. The good spirit of Laurel Ridge. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1953. 263 p.
53–10630 PZ3.S9306Go

2174. WILLIAM STYRON, 1925–

Styron is a young author who has assimilated the influences of stream-of-consciousness novelists such as Faulkner and Joyce. His first novel dealt with the degeneracy of a Southern family.

2175. Lie down in darkness, a novel. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1951. 400 p.
51–12286 PZ4.S938Li

2176. PETER HILLSMAN TAYLOR, 1917–

Taylor is a Tennessee-born author whose stories reflect life in the upper South. He has been praised for his prose style, in which he quietly and simply presents complex psychological situations and character relationships and evokes the Southern setting. The continuing influence of the past in the present is a recurring factor in his work.

2177. A long Fourth, and other stories. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1948. 166 p.
48–1781 PZ3.T21767Lo

2178. A woman of means. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 160 p.
50–7597 PZ3.T21767Wo

2179. The widows of Thornton. [Short stories] New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1954. 310 p.
53–7839 PZ3.T21767Wi

2180. GORE VIDAL, 1925–

Vidal is a skilled story-teller who in recent books has shown a tendency toward satire and irony. In one book, The City and the Pillar, he became almost a social tractarian, writing in a somewhat journalistic style on the problem of homosexuality.

2181. Williwaw. New York, Dutton, 1946. 222 p.
46–4254 PZ3.V6668Wi

An "obscure corner of the war" novel which shows the experiences of three days on a freighter in the Aleutian waters while a williwaw is in progress.

2182. In a yellow wood. New York, Dutton, 1947. 216 p. 47–1967 PZ3.V6668In

A young veteran in a brokerage office roams through routine urban life confronted with the problem of possible alternative ways of life, but decides against a change.

2183. The city and the pillar. New York, Dutton, 1948. 314 p. 47–12503 PZ3.V6668Ci

2184. The season of comfort. New York, Dutton, 1949. 253 p. 49–7028 PZ3.V6668Se

A young artist reaches spiritual and social maturity against a (Washington and national) background of a political family in the period between two world wars; the theme of the domineering mother is prominent.

2185. Dark green, bright red. New York, Dutton, 1950. 307 p. 50–9879 PZ3.V6668Dar

A story of a Central American revolution, with an American for leading character.

2186. A search for the King, a 12th-century legend. New York, Dutton, 1950. 255 p.
49–50412 PZ3.V67Se

Based on the story of Blondel de Nesle's search for Richard Coeur de Lion.

2187. The judgment of Paris. New York, Dutton, 1952. 375 p.
52–5296 PZ3.V6668Ju

A young American goes to Europe to find himself, and finds self-discovery in love for his solution. The characters belong mainly to the international set or, at least, the international wanderers.

2188. Messiah. New York, Dutton, 1954. 254 p.
54–5053 PZ3.V6668Me

Somewhat in the tendency of science fiction, this is a story of the establishment, through modern advertising techniques and media, of a new messiah.

2189. PETER ROBERT EDWIN VIERECK, 1916–

Peter Viereck is a satiric lyric poet who strives, in poetry that tends to be formal, for clarity and a conformity with what he considers the basic ethical implications of our civilization. He has also written several historico-philosophical works, such as Conservatism Revisited: The Revolt Against Revolt, 1815–1949 (1949) and Shame and Glory of the Intellectuals (1953), which more directly express the views and values with which he concerns himself.

2190. Terror and decorum; poems, 1940–1948. New York, Scribner, 1948. 110 p.
48–8754 PS3543.I325T4

2191. Strike through the mask! New lyrical poems. New York, Scribner, 1950. 70 p.
50–6348 PS3543.I325S8

"The essay in the appendix, 'The poet in the machine age,' appeared in the Journal of the history of ideas, N. Y., 1949."

2192. The first morning, new poems. New York, Scribner, 1952. 120 p.
52–12815 PS3543.I325F5

2193. ROBERT PENN WARREN, 1905–

Warren is distinguished both as a poet and as a novelist, with an increasing mastery of form and technique. His early poetry was marked by its intellectualism and the influence of the metaphysical poets; his later work shows an assimilation of influences and a tendency to greater simplicity, along with the use of narrative and regional themes. While his work is not regional in the narrow sense of the word, he does use Southern material, with an emphasis on his native State, Kentucky.

2194. Night rider. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1939. 460 p. 39–5848 PZ3.W2549Ni
A novel of the tobacco war between growers and manufacturers in Kentucky in the early 1900's.

2195. At heaven's gate. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1943. 391 p.
43–13163 PZ3.W2549At
A modern "horror" novel in which sympathy aroused by a Southern girl's suicide saves her unscrupulous financier father.

2196. Selected poems, 1923–1943. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1944. 102 p.
44–3743 PS3545.A748S4

2197. All the king's men. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1946. 464 p.
46–6144 PZ3.W2549Al
Reflecting to some extent the career of Huey Long in Louisiana, this is a story of a Southern demagogue who attains political control of his State.

2198. The circus in the attic, and other stories. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1947. 276 p.
48–5123 PZ3.W2549Ci

2199. World enough and time, a romantic novel. New York, Random House, 1950. 512 p.
50–7242 PZ3.W2549Wo
PS3545.A748W6 1950
Presenting a reconstruction of a 19th-century Kentucky murder case, the book mirrors the place and period of the story, as well as presenting some aspects of the author's search for the meaning of life and an assessment of man's values.

2200. Brother to dragons, a tale in verse and voices. [New York] Random House, 1953. 230 p.
53–5009 PS3545.A748B7
The story of an 1811 Kentucky frontier murder of a slave by the two sons of a sister of Thomas Jefferson.

2201. Band of angels. New York, Random House, 1955. 375 p.
55–5814 PZ3.W2549Ban
A somewhat melodramatic novel of the Civil War era, slavery, and miscegenation.

2202. EUDORA WELTY, 1909–

Eudora Welty has been acclaimed as one of the best modern American short-story writers, with frequent mention made of her sensitivity, subtlety, and technical skill. She is a Southern writer who depicts much the same locale as does Faulkner. Her range of tone is considerable: nostalgic, fanciful, grotesque, humorous, etc. However, each book tends to be dominated by one tone. Her style and descriptions are the important elements, for she offers relatively little plot.

2203. A curtain of green. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1941. 285 p.
41–52028 PZ3.W4696Cu

2204. The robber bridgegroom. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1942. 185 p.
42–23596 PZ3.W4696Ro

2205. The wide net, and other stories. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1943. 214 p.
44–1666 PZ3.W4696Wi

2206. Delta wedding, a novel. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1946. 247 p.
46–3217 PZ3.W4696De

2207. The golden apples. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1949. 244 p.
49–10054 PZ3.W4696Go

2208. The Ponder heart. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1954. 156 p. illus.
54–5248 PZ3.W4696Po
A novelette.

2209. The bride of the Innisfallen, and other stories. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. 207 p.
55–5248 PZ3.W4696Br

2210. JESSAMYN WEST

Jessamyn West is a novelist and short-story writer whose work ranges from realistic pictures of Indiana farm life through stories in the modern Gothic manner. She received notice also for her opera libretto A Mirror for the Sky (1948), which presents the life of John Audubon (q. v.).

2211. The friendly persuasion. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1945. 214 p.
45–35221 PZ3.W51903Fr
Sketches of the life of Quakers in Indiana during the second half of the 19th century.

2212. The witch diggers. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1951. 441 p.
51–9108 PZ3.W51903Wi
A symbolic and somewhat Gothic novel depicting life on a poor farm in Southern Indiana in 1899.

2213. Cress Delahanty. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1953. 311 p.
53–5654 PZ3.W51903Cr
An adult's somewhat humorous view of the life of an adolescent girl on a California ranch.

2214. Love, death, and the ladies' drill team. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. 248 p.
55–10809 PZ3.W51903Lo
Short stories.

2215. RICHARD PURDY WILBUR, 1921–

Richard Wilbur's poetry is a leading example of the modern neo-classic formal verse that has become prominent in the work of the younger poets. Lyrical and precise in observation, with life imaginatively perceived, some of his work is humorous, but normally far from the category of "light verse."

2216. The beautiful changes, and other poems. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1947. 55 p.
47–11597 PS3545.I32165B4

2217. Ceremony, and other poems. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 55 p.
50–10749 PS3545.I32165C4

2218. TENNESSEE WILLIAMS, 1914–

The plays of Tennessee Williams (whose original name was Thomas Lanier Williams) frequently draw on the Mississippi Delta region for setting and characters. With sympathy and understanding he presents, in a poetic and sometimes symbolistic style, characters so weighed down by the past that their incorrect adaptation to current life leads them to frustration and breakup.

2219. The glass menagerie. New York, Random House, 1945. 124 p.
45–7913 PS3545.I5365G5
This work, which was successful as a play and in its motion-picture adaptation, is the story of the remnants of a Southern family with pretensions to gentility; the plot centers about the crippled daughter who lives in her dream world with a symbolic collection of fragile glass pieces, which stands in contrast with the family's St. Louis slum apartment.

2220. 27 wagons full of cotton, and other one-act plays. Norfolk, Conn., New Directions, 1946. 207 p. 46–2373 PS3545.I5365T9
The motion picture Baby Doll (1956) is based on a film script which Williams produced by reworking the story of the title play in this collection. A small part of the film's plot was also drawn from the one-act play, The Long Stay Cut Short (1946). The two source plays are included in the version of the screen play published by New Directions.

2221. A streetcar named Desire. New York, New Directions, 1947. 171 p.
48–5556 PS3545.I5365S8
This play, which was awarded a Pulitzer prize for drama, and which was widely acclaimed both as a play and then as a movie, presents against a New Orleans background the story of a neurotic, sexually frustrated woman, a descendant of a once prominent family, who is in conflict with the "vulgar" society of the slums, and unable to resolve for herself the problems of modern life.

2222. One arm, and other stories. [New York] New Directions, 1948. 210 p.
49–1337 PS3545.I5365O5
CONTENTS.—One arm.—The malediction.—The poet.—Chronicle of a demise.—Desire and the black masseur.—Portrait of a girl in glass.—The important thing.—The angel in the alcove.—The field of blue children.—The night of the iguana.—The yellow bird.

2223. Summer and smoke. New York, New Directions, 1948. 130 p.
48–11697 PS3545.I5365S85
Set in a small Mississippi town, this play presents the story of a young woman who is unable to resolve satisfactorily the problems of her emotional life.

2224. The Roman spring of Mrs. Stone. [New York] New Directions, 1950. 148 p.
50–9067 PZ3.W67655Ro
This tautly wrought novelette is the story of a widowed actress who has retired to Rome, where she is confronted with the problem of trying to achieve a satisfactory love life.

2225. The rose tattoo. New York [New Directions] 1951. 144 p.
51–11004 PS3545.I5365R6 1951
This play, which also had a successful screen adaptation, is unusual among Williams' usually sombre works in that with a touch of humor it relates the story of a widow finding love in a Gulf-coast community.

2226. Camino Real. [Norfolk, Conn.] New Directions, 1953. 161 p.
53-12831 PS3545.I5365C3
This text is a version, revised for publication, of a symbolistic and surrealistic play which in its technique was a new departure for Williams.

2227. Hard candy, a book of stories. [New York] New Directions, 1954. 220 p.
54-4797 PZ3.W67655Har

2228. Cat on a hot tin roof. [Play. New York] New Directions, 1955. 197 p.
55-3093 PS3545.I5365C37
This play, which received a Pulitzer prize for drama, is set on a Mississippi Delta plantation; its story is in large part that of a wife trying to reestablish sexual relations with her husband, who is suspected of being a homosexual.

2229. HERMAN WOUK, 1915–

The setting of Wouk's writings has been New York City, in which he was raised, and the Navy, in which he served during World War II. His first book, Aurora Dawn (1947), is a satirical novel about the New York business world. His next work, The City Boy (1948), was a best-selling novel about an urban childhood. After that he turned briefly to drama with The Traitor (1949), a play about an American Communist. His work since then has grown in complexity and bulk, so that it appears at infrequent intervals. Through all his writings he has remained in the realist tradition, presenting life as it may be seen. With the best-selling status and impressiveness of his recent work, and the reissuance of his earlier novels, some now regard him as one of the more promising of the younger novelists.

2230. The Caine mutiny, a novel of World War II. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 494 p. 51-9977 PZ3.W923Cai
A novel about a Navy mutiny during World War II. It is a fictional incident in a historical setting, and it reflects Navy life of the period. The work was used as the source for a successful stage play and for a much praised movie.

2231. Marjorie Morningstar. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1955. 565 p.
55-6485 PZ3.W923Mar
A novel reflecting life in a Jewish family in New York City.

2232. RICHARD NATHANIEL WRIGHT, 1908–

Richard Wright has been considered America's foremost Negro novelist, although his most recent novel, The Outsider, was generally reviewed unfavorably. He was raised among lower-class Southern Negroes and later moved to Chicago; it is this background that is reflected in his stories, especially in the autobiographical Black Boy (1945). Although his work inclines to the melodramatic, it is stylistically in the tradition of realism. In the thirties Wright became interested in communism and some of his work exhibits an awareness of leftist doctrines and attitudes.

2233. Native son. New York, Harper, 1940. 359 p. 40-4862 PZ3.W9352Nat
A somewhat melodramatic tale of the life and criminal acts of a Negro youth in the Chicago slums.

2234. Uncle Tom's children, five long stories. New York, Harper, [1940] xxx, 384 p.
40-29877 PZ3.W9352Un2
First published 1938 without the autobiographical introduction and without the fifth story.
CONTENTS.—The ethics of living Jim Crow; an autobiographical sketch.—1. Big boy leaves home.—2. Down by the riverside.—3. Long black son.—4. Fire and cloud.—5. Bright and morning star.

2235. The outsider. New York, Harper, 1953. 405 p. 53-5383 PZ3.W9352Ou
A melodramatic thesis novel with first a Chicago and then a New York setting. The story is that of a Negro whose mentality leads him to ruin through problems of alcohol, women, money, and communism. The book is meant to be a commentary on the emotional strains of life in our times.

II

Language

A. Dictionaries 2236–2241
B. Grammars and General Studies 2242–2252
C. Dialects, Regionalisms, and Foreign Languages in America 2253–2271
D. Miscellaneous 2272–2275

IT HAS frequently been said that there is no American language, but that each individual speaks his own language. To some extent this is true of any language, but that is more a problem for semantics (discussed under Philosophy, q. v.) than it is for linguistics. For there is obviously a basic language and a central core of usage. It is this central core of usage in the United States that is our main concern here, with some attention paid to aspects that are peripheral to it.

At the same time there is no intention at this point to enter into the question of a separate American language. It is simply noted that American English diverges from British English at a number of points, and to these differences attention is directed. As a result of this approach, some major works such as Otto Jespersen's A Modern English Grammar on Historical Principles; Completed . . . by Niels Haislund (Copenhagen, Munksgaard, 1949. 7 v.) have been omitted; for while they are highly useful for determining the language's historical background, they are mainly oriented towards British English. We have, however, considered for inclusion general works which were oriented towards American English, or which specifically studied the divergences that have developed between the two forms of the language.

Since dialects have played a role in the development of the language, and since they are a part of the general language picture in this country, a few books on dialect have been selected for their comprehensive coverage, or because they deal with major dialect groups. No attempt was made to cover all dialects and their variations; the compromise being the usual one of presenting representative titles.

The same is largely true for the few books on foreign languages in America, which were selected to represent some of the historically more important language groups of the many that have played so large a part in the life and in the developing English of an amalgamating people.

Since a certain amount of slang enters the more formal language with the passage of time, and since so much American literature has used slang in dialogue passages, a few guides to slang terms have been included.

New information on the changing language, as well as much on aspects of its past development, may be obtained from periodicals such as Language, the Linguistic Society of America's journal, and in American Speech; a Quarterly of Linguistic Usage.

A. Dictionaries

2236. Craigie, Sir William A., and James H. Hulbert, eds. A dictionary of American English on historical principles, compiled at the University of Chicago. Chicago, University of Chicago Press [1938–44] 4 v. 39–8203 PE2835.C72

Paged continuously; bibliography: p. 2529–2552.

This book attempts to present words that are either clearly or seemingly of American origin, as well as those more used in or associated with America. The terminal date for admission was 1900, although some illustrations have been chosen from later writing; also, slang words were included only if of early origin or of special prominence. With these limitations, the dictionary is not one for the language written or spoken in America, but rather one for those elements which have originated or developed in America, adding to or modifying the English-language stock. A broader, though less detailed, coverage of the language may be found in works such as Webster's New International Dictionary of the English Language, 2d ed., unabridged (Springfield, Mass., Merriam, 1945. cxii, 3210 p.), which has developed out of the original efforts of Noah Webster, whose biography is included in the Education section of this bibliography. Another long-established American dictionary which covers the language on a very broad basis is Funk & Wagnalls New "Standard" Dictionary of the English Language . . . (New York, Funk & Wagnalls, 1952. lxx, 2815 p.).

2237. Horwill, Herbert W. A dictionary of modern American usage. 2d ed. Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1944. xxxi, 360 p.
A46-686 PE2835.H6 1946

First published in 1935, this work presents in a dictionary arrangement a discussion of American word usage as it differs from traditional British usage. The work does not cover slang, and it is not designed to serve as a complete dictionary of "Americanisms."

2238. Kenyon, John Samuel, and Thomas Albert Knott, eds. A pronouncing dictionary of American English. Springfield, Mass., Merriam, 1953. 484 p. 53-1416 PE1137.K37

A record of the colloquial speech forms of educated Americans throughout the country; there is no attempt to provide for dialectal variations. The work covers the words in common usage in America, with special attention given to proper names. The work differs from, and so supplements, other dictionaries such as Webster's New International Dictionary, 2d ed., in that the latter records the pronunciation of formal platform speech. The Kenyon and Knott book contains no definitions. Dr. Knott was general editor of the New International Dictionary, and Dr. Kenyon served as consulting editor in pronunciation.

2239. Mathews, Mitford M., ed. A dictionary of Americanisms on historical principles. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1951. 2 v. (xvi, 1946 p.) 51-1957 PE2835.D5

Bibliography: p. 1913-1946.

This work is devoted exclusively to words which either originated in America or took on a new meaning here. In this respect it is more limited than Craigie's Dictionary of American English, above. However, within its limitations it is more complete, partly in inclusiveness, but mainly because it is more up-to-date. A discussion of the history and relative merits of leading types of dictionaries of the language may be found in James Root Hulbert's Dictionaries, British and American (London, A. Deutsch, 1955. 107 p.).

2240. Thornton, Richard H. An American glossary, being an attempt to illustrate certain Americanisms upon historical principles. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1912. 2 v.
30-25356 PE2835.T6 1912a

——— ——— Volume III, edited by Louise Hanley. Madison, Wis., American Dialect Society, 1939. xiv, 452 p. (In Dialect notes . . . New Haven, Conn., 1931-39. v. 6, pt. 3-18)
30-25356 PE2801.D5, v. 6

"A biographical sketch of Richard Hopwood Thornton, LL. D., by the Reverend E. H. Clark": p. v-viii.

The first two volumes of the glossary constitute an historically important contribution to the subject, although they have in large part been superseded by Craigie's and Mathews' volumes cited above. However, the third volume, which was published in parts in the periodical Dialect Notes, has not been superseded, and it remains one of the most important reference works on the vocabulary of American dialects.

2241. Wentworth, Harold. American dialect dictionary. New York, Crowell, 1944. 747 p.
44-6209 PE2835.W4

This is a dictionary which presents American local and regional terms, and those which verge on being colloquial. It supplies examples of early usage.

677676 O-63-13

B. Grammars and General Studies

2242. Curme, George O. Parts of speech and accidence. Boston, Heath, 1935. 370 p. (A Grammar of the English language . . . v. 2)
35–17513 PE1105.G7, v. 2

2243. Curme, George O. Syntax. Boston, Heath, 1931. 616 p. (A Grammar of the English language . . . v. 3) 31–19900 PE1105.G7, v. 3

The two volumes of A Grammar of the English Language which have so far appeared approach the problem as that of one language; however, wherever necessary the differences between American and British English are discussed in detail. The first volume, History of the English Language, Sounds and Spellings, Word-Formation, by Hans Kurath, has not yet appeared, although it is still listed in the publisher's 1956 catalog.

2244. Fries, Charles C. American English grammar; the grammatical structure of present-day American English with especial reference to social differences or class dialects. The report of an investigation financed by the National Council of Teachers of English and supported by the Modern Language Association and the Linguistic Society of America. New York, Appleton-Century, 1940. 313 p. (National Council of Teachers of English. English monographs, no. 10) 41–347 PE2811.F7

A report on the grammar of "standard" American English. The author recognizes that there may be a number of acceptable forms, rather than one "correct" form. Most of the distinctions made in the book are between "standard" and "vulgar" American English, with an attempt to record their frequency, extent, and divergencies.

2245. Galinsky, Hans. Die Sprache des Amerikaners; eine Einführung in die Hauptunterschiede zwischen amerikanischem und britischem Englisch der Gegenwart. Heidelberg, F. H. Kerle, 1951–52. 2 v. 52–37439 PE2813.G3

A detailed study and analysis of the American language as contrasted with British English. The emphasis is on the present-day situation, and not on the historical development, nor is it on dialectical variations. The first volume is divided into two sections on "Das Klangbild" and "Die Schreibung"; the second volume covers "Wortschatz und Wortbildung" and "Syntax und Flexion." Both volumes contain an extensive selective bibliography.

2246. Krapp, George P. The English language in America. New York, Century, for the Modern Language Association of America, 1925. 2 v. 25–19533 PE2808.K7

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 273–284.

Krapp (1872–1934) was a professor of English at Columbia University, and a leading student of the language of America. The first volume of his major work in this field has seven essays on "The Mother Tongue," "Vocabulary," "Proper Names," "Literary Dialects," "Style," "American Spelling," and "American Dictionaries." The second volume is devoted to pronunciation. Another work by him on the latter aspect is The Pronunciation of Standard English in America (New York, Oxford University Press, American Branch, 1919. 235 p.).

2247. Mathews, Mitford M., ed. The beginnings of American English; essays and comments. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1931. 181 p. 31–28142 PE2805.M3

A useful collection of material made up mainly of quotations from 18th- and early 19th-century writers on the English language in America. A word index is supplied.

2248. Mencken, Henry L. The American language; an inquiry into the development of English in the United States. 4th ed., cor., enl., and rewritten. New York, Knopf, 1936. 769 p. 36–27236 PE2808.M4 1936

"Proper names in America": p. 474–554.

——— ——— Supplement I–II . . . New York, Knopf, 1945–48. 2 v. PE2808.M4 1936 Suppl.

Includes bibliographies.

Mencken, who is included in the Literature section (q. v.), was a journalist rather than a linguist; nevertheless, he compiled one of the outstanding works on the history and nature of the American language. In addition to the Americana of "good" American English and place-names, he studied extensively American slang and dialects. The work does not attempt to rival the dictionaries in the field (compiled well after the first edition of his work in 1919), but is largely in the form of discursive text and essays. However, an extensive index in the main volume and its supplements does enable it to serve also as a lexicon of much linguistic esoterica. The supplements are aligned chapter by chapter with the main work.

2249. Myers, Louis M. Guide to American English. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1955. 433 p. 55-8367 PE1111.M954

A grammar aimed at students, this work presents American English without emphasizing British differences or using traditional approaches and terminology which the author regards as obsolete. The interest is in written English, rather than in the spoken language. Parts of the book have been drawn from the author's earlier American English; a Twentieth-Century Guide (New York, Prentice-Hall, 1952. 237 p.).

2250. Pyles, Thomas. Words and ways of American English. New York, Random House, 1952. 310 p. 52-5156 PE2808.P9

"The present book . . . is an attempt to provide for the lay reader a brief yet adequate treatment of the English language as it has been and is spoken and written by Americans."—Preface.

A general introductory book to the topic is Richard D. Mallery's Our American Language (Garden City, N. Y., Halcyon House, 1947. 276 p.).

2251. Robertson, Stuart. The development of modern English. 2d ed., rev. by Frederic G. Cassidy. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1954. 469 p. 53-13011 PE1075.R57 1954

A study of the history and nature of English, with the emphasis placed on picturing modern American English in its context within the English language as an entity. Individual chapters are followed by references for further reading. The original version of the work first appeared in 1934.

2252. Schele de Vere, Maximilian. Americanisms; the English of the New World. New York, Scribner, 1872. 685 p. 10-26369 PE2835.S4

A work which in individual chapters studies special sources of Americanisms. There are chapters on the American Indian, immigrants, the West, politics, etc. The work is not meant to be exhaustive, but rather to track down the unusual Americanisms that at the period were to be found in good American English.

C. Dialects, Regionalisms, and Foreign Languages in America

2253. Adams, Ramon F. Western words; a dictionary of the range, cow camp and trail. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1944. 182 p. 44-40294 PE3727.C6A4

The concern in this dictionary is with the terminology of the range country of the West, not with pronunciation or local dialect variations. Bruce Grant's The Cowboy Encyclopedia (Chicago, Rand McNally, 1951. 160 p.) has a smaller, if occasionally different, selection of words; but it also provides fairly extensive sketch illustrations.

2254. American Dialect Society. Publication. v. 1+ 1944+ Gainesville, Fla.

The Publications were preceded by a similar series, Dialect notes, published by the Society from 1890 to 1939. Issues of the present series now appear twice a year; some representative titles from this series follow:

2255. Nixon, Phyllis J. A glossary of Virginia words. The secretary's report. 1946. 46 p. (no. 5) 46-8431 PE3101.V8N5

2256. Woodard, Clement M. A word-list from Virginia and North Carolina. 1946. 46 p. (no. 6) 47-23449 PE3101.V8W6

"Words from A glossary of Virginia words [by Phyllis J. Nixon] current in Maine, by B. J. Whiting": p. 44-46.

2257. Figh, Margaret Gillis. A word-list from "Bill Arp" [pseud.] and "Rufus Sanders" [pseud.] Comments on word-lists in PADS, by James Nathan Tidwell. A word-list from southern Kentucky, by A. P. Dalton. The secretary's report. 1950. 27 p. (no. 13) 51-8421 PE2926.F5

2258. Bradley, Francis W. A word-list from South Carolina. Expressions from rural Florida, by Lucille Ayers and others. Minorcan dialect words in St. Augustine, Florida, by Lillian Friedman. 1950. 81 p. (no. 14) 51-8422 PE2927.S6B7

2259. Maurer, David W. The argot of the racetrack. 1951. 70 p. (no. 16) 52-8820 SF333.M34

2260. Reed, David W. Eastern dialect words in California. Supplementary list of South Carolina words and phrases, by F. W. Bradley. The secretary's report. 1954. 49 p. (no. 21) 54-3363 PE3101.C3R4

2261. Ives, Sumner. The phonology of the Uncle Remus stories. 1954. 59 p. (no. 22)
55–99 PS1818.I85

2262. Maurer, David W. Whiz mob; a correlation of the technical argot of pickpockets, with their behavior pattern. 1955. 199 p. (no. 24)
56–1443 PE3726.M3

2263. Atwood, E. Bagby. A survey of verb forms in the eastern United States. [Ann Arbor] University of Michigan Press, 1953. viii, 53 p. 31 maps. (Studies in American English, 2)
53–7458 PE1273.A89

A study, with map illustrations, of the distribution along the Atlantic seaboard of American regional variants in verbal inflections and verb vocabulary. A leading result is the demonstration that the "vulgate" is not one, but many, and largely regional.

2264. Bentley, Harold W. A dictionary of Spanish terms in English, with special reference to the American Southwest. New York, Columbia University Press, 1932. 243 p. (Columbia University studies in English and comparative literature)
33–2210 PE1582.S7B4 1932a

A study of the influence of Spanish on English, especially in the American Southwest, where the two languages early came into contact. More than half the book is devoted to a dictionary presentation of Spanish terms and phrases used in English; there is also an appendix of American proper names which have their source in Spanish.

2265. Broussard, James F. Louisiana Creole dialect. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1942. 134 p.
43–52792 PM7854.L6B7

CONTENTS. — Preface.—Phonetics.—Grammar.—Idioms.—Folklore: Proverbs and dit-ons. Medical prescriptions. Superstitions. Poetry. Tales.—La Fontaine's fables in translation.—Glossary.—Bibliography (p. 130–134).

A presentation of the dialect of French which started with the Negro slaves of white French owners. While fairly widely used in Louisiana, this is neither the Acadian French dialect found among many French groups in the state, nor is it the more urban French found among the descendants of the aristocracy. Both of these are much closer to the language as spoken in France.

2266. Buffington, Albert F., and Preston A. Barba. A Pennsylvania German grammar. Allentown, Pa., Schlechter, 1954. 167 p.
54–24782 PF5934.B8

Pennsylvania German (also known as Pennsylvania Dutch) is a dialect of German that is represented by several hundred thousand native speakers, most of whom live in Pennsylvania, although a scattering of others may be located in New Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, North Carolina, and elsewhere. A fairly complete early phonetic dictionary of the dialect's distinctive words may be found in A. R. Horne's Pennsylvania German Manual, 3d ed. (Allentown, Pa., T. K. Horne, 1905. 146 p.). Edwin R. Danner's Pennsylvania Dutch Dictionary (York, Pa., Dispatch Pub. Co., 1951. 178 p.) approaches the language through English. This dialect has accumulated a sizable literature. It is discussed in Earl F. Robacker's Pennsylvania German Literature: Changing Trends from 1683 to 1942 (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1943. 217 p.), which includes an extensive bibliography on p. 189–202.

2267. Haugen, Einar. The Norwegian language in America; a study in bilingual behavior. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1953. 2 v. (xiv, 695 p.) maps, diagrs., tables. (Publications of the American Institute, University of Oslo in coöperation with the Department of American Civilization, Graduate School of Arts and Sciences, University of Pennsylvania)
53–11316 PD2615.H3

CONTENTS.—v. 1. The bilingual community.—v. 2. The American dialects of Norwegian.

The Norwegian immigrants settled predominantly in Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Wisconsin, Montana, Iowa, Idaho, Illinois, Washington, and Oregon. The first volume of this work studies the historical and sociological aspects behind the linguistic problems of the Norwegian-American communities. The second volume studies the more purely linguistic problems, such as the inter-influence of Norwegian and English.

2268. Kurath, Hans, ed. Linguistic atlas of New England, by Hans Kurath, director and editor [with the collaboration of] Miles L. Hanley, associate director; Bernard Bloch, assistant editor, Guy S. Lowman, Jr., principal field investigator, Marcus L. Hansen, historian . . . sponsored by the American Council of Learned Societies and assisted by universities and colleges in New England. Providence, R. I., Brown University, 1939–43. 3 v. in 6. double maps. and handbook: xii, 240 p. maps. (Linguistic atlas of the United States and Canada)
39–32451 PE2845.L5K8

The Handbook has also special t. p.: Handbook of the linguistic geography of New England, by Hans Kurath, with the collaboration of Marcus L. Hansen, Julia Bloch [and] Bernard Bloch.

"Bibliography of linguistic geography": Handbook, p. 54–61; "Bibliography of New England history": Handbook, p. 105–121.

The six very large volumes of the main part of this work present a linguistic analysis of the New England area mainly through the medium of folded maps marked to indicate the different areas of usage of a given form. The smaller handbook, which appeared in a larger edition, to some extent summarizes the material and presents an analysis of the historical background. The set was designed as the first part of a linguistic atlas of the United States and Canada, but no subsequent parts have yet appeared.

2269. Kurath, Hans. A word geography of the Eastern United States. [Ann Arbor] University of Michigan Press, 1949. x, 88 p. 163 (i. e. 164) maps. (Studies in American English, 1)
49–50233 PE2970.E2K87

Based on material collected for a linguistic atlas for the Eastern States, begun in 1931 under the auspices of the American Council of Learned Societies.

Considers the dissemination of localized words, and provides historical interpretation for such distribution, as well as for the development and subdivision of speech areas. The text is followed by diagrammatic maps illustrating the distribution of the words discussed and outlining the speech areas.

2270. Randolph, Vance, and George P. Wilson. Down in the holler; a gallery of Ozark folk speech. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1953. 320 p. 53–5480 PE2970.O9R3

Bibliography: p. 303–314.

A study, based largely on many years of personal observation, of the Ozark dialect. In addition to a dictionary approach to unusual words and word usage, there are chapters on other matters, such as general pronunciation, old English words which have survived in the dialect, folk sayings, figures of speech, etc.

2271. Turner, Lorenzo Dow. Africanisms in the Gullah dialect. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1949. 317 p.
49–10175 PM7875.G8T8

Bibliography: p. 293–299.

A study of the Gullah dialect (which is spoken by Negroes of the South Carolina and Georgia coastal area) with emphasis on the African influence.

D. Miscellaneous

2272. Berrey, Lester V., and Melvin Van den Bark. The American thesaurus of slang; a complete reference book of colloquial speech. 2d ed. New York, Crowell, 1953. xxxv, 1272 p.
52–10837 PE3729.A5B4 1953

The bulk of this work is arranged by subject, with a complete index provided at the end. A shorter work is Joseph A. Weingarten's An American Dictionary of Slang and Colloquial Speech (New York, 1954. 390 p.), which arranges the words themselves alphabetically; the attempt was to include all general American slang and colloquialisms, and to indicate the earliest known usage for any given meaning. A much larger work also on historical principles is Eric Partridge's A Dictionary of Slang and Unconventional English (New York, Macmillan, 1951. 1230 p.); however, the emphasis in this work is upon Britishisms.

2273. Kenyon, John S. American pronunciation. 10th ed. Ann Arbor, Mich., Wahr Pub. Co., 1950. 265 p. 51–5688 PE1135.K4 1950

This book is designed primarily as an advanced textbook of the pronunciation of American English.

2274. Partridge, Eric. A dictionary of the underworld, British & American, being the vocabularies of crooks, criminals, racketeers, beggars and tramps, convicts, the commercial underworld, the drug traffic, the white slave traffic, spivs. New York, Macmillan, 1950. 804 p.
50–8598 PE3726.P3

Since this is a dictionary compiled on historical principles, and supplied with numerous examples and indications of period and milieu, there has been little attempt to be up to date. However, as the author points out, the conservatism of underworld slang leaves much of it still current. A less scholarly and non-historical work that may be used for supplementary purposes is the Dictionary of American Underworld Lingo (New York, Twayne Publishers, 1950. 327 p.), edited by Hyman E. Goldin, Frank O'Leary, and Morris Lipsius; this work was compiled in prisons by prisoners and reflects the current situation, but without indication of either the origin or the evolution of the terms. A similar work by an amateur linguist is Criminal Slang; the Vernacular of the Underworld Lingo (Boston, Christopher Pub. House, 1949. 292 p.), by Vincent J. Monteleone, who compiled it through his experiences as a law enforcement officer.

2275. Pike, Kenneth L. The intonation of American English. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1945. 200 p. (University of Michigan publications. Linguistics. v. 1)

A45-4529 P25.M47, v. 1

Bibliography: p. 191–200.

"This present study is . . . a statement of the structure of the English intonation system as such, in relation to the structural systems of stress, pause and rhythm . . ."—Preface.

III

Literary History and Criticism

A. Anthologies and Series 2276–2370
B. History and Criticism 2371–2550
C. Periodicals 2551–2577

THIS section seeks to provide material for an approach to, and a clarification of, many views of American literature: as a general field, and as a field for more specialized study in terms of genre, period, area, sociological implications, historical background, etc. It also provides for the study of criticism as a field in itself, and it opens up some paths of literature not explored within the Literature section (such as the detective story), and it presents, through prominent placing in critical works and in series, authors not included elsewhere. Thus this section not only seeks to serve for the analysis and clarification of literary materials presented elsewhere, but to lead to materials not otherwise presented.

An alphabetic arrangement has been adopted in each subsection in preference to a subject arrangement for several reasons. One is that the subject matter of many of the works listed is so various as to justify inclusion of each particular work under any one of several topics. Another is that a number of the literary critics and historians are of interest in their own right, so that it was deemed unadvisable to scatter their works on a subject basis. Not only would the placing of a book in one of several possible subject subdivisions be disputable, but on any level the titles so assembled would be incomplete, for much of the material on the same subject is elsewhere in the bibliography: e. g., all works of literary history and criticism, by writers having author entries under Literature, have been discussed along with the other works by those authors. This means that much important historical and critical work (by Blackmur, Eliot, Poe, Pound, Tate, etc.) is not to be found here, but under Literature. Also, much material on drama is to be found under Entertainment. Accordingly, the index must be rather extensively used to locate all relevant items.

Because of the large mass of material suitable for consideration for inclusion in this section, many works have had to be excluded by arbitrary limitations. Except in the case of works in a series, which as a whole might be regarded as general studies or anthologies, no work has been included here which deals with a single author. Highly specialized studies along other lines have also been excluded. For the rest, works were excluded if they were seriously out of date or if they too closely overlapped the material of other volumes; a few exceptions were made for works important in the history of criticism or as examples of literature in their own right. Most cases of special pleading, such as Calverton's Marxist approach to literature, have also been eliminated. Much of the excluded material may readily be identified through the bibliography volume of the Spiller, Thorp, Johnson, and Canby Literary History of the United States, which is listed below.

This listing of anthologies and series has been highly selective, except for the rather liberal representation given to textbook anthologies designed for use on the college level. If justification is sought for this exception, it may be found in the fact that these general anthologies of American literature present on the whole a uniformly high quality of editorial apparatus together with selections carefully chosen for the purpose at hand. It may be noted further that they present all too frequently the most available text, in part or in whole, of works listed individually in the literature section. An obvious additional factor is that they are excellent introductions to a large field. The main limitations imposed on selection of such anthologies is that no out-of-print works, however excellent, have been included.

Since the entire field of literary history and criticism, along with literature itself, is constantly and rapidly expanding, and since so much in both categories is often long available only in periodicals, there has been included a group of periodicals which are important for their role in the propagation of serious literature, literary history, and criticism.

A. Anthologies and Series

2276. American literature: a period anthology. Oscar-Cargill, general editor. [Rev. ed.] New York, Macmillan, 1949. 4 v.
49–48760 PS504.A62

CONTENTS.—[v. 1.] The roots of national culture, American literature to 1830, edited by Robert E. Spiller and Harold W. Blodgett (49–9906).—[v. 2] The romantic triumph; American literature from 1830 to 1860, edited by Tremaine McDowell (49–11990).—[v. 3] The rise of realism; American literature from 1860 to 1900, edited by Louis Wann (49–4119).— [v. 4] Contemporary trends; American literature since 1900, edited by John H. Nelson and Oscar Cargill (49–11262).

Edited by scholars in American literature, these generous selections illuminate the life and thought of the country as expressed in its literature. Critical comments concerning authors and bibliographical notes also are supplied.

2277. American men of letters. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1881–1909. 22 v.

This series, issued under the general editorship of Charles Dudley Warner (q. v.), comprises biographical and critical studies of a selected group of American writers, written by leading critics. Authors represented in this series who are discussed at length elsewhere in this bibliography are Bryant, Whittier, Holmes, J. R. Lowell, Aldrich, Longfellow, Emerson, Cooper, Franklin, Lanier, Prescott, Whitman, Thoreau, N. Webster, N. P. Willis, Simms, Irving, and Poe (qq. v.). Other books in the series are:

2278. Cary, Edward. George William Curtis. 1894. 343 p. 1–205 PS1493.C3

Curtis (1824–1892) was in his own day one of the most influential and esteemed of American authors. As a young man he spent some time at Brook Farm, and was closely associated with members of the Concord group. He first attained public notice with several Near East travel books. These were followed by Lotus Eating; a Summer Book (New York, Harper, 1852. 206 p.), a collection of articles on various resorts, mostly American. Then came his famous fictional works: Potiphar Papers (New York, Putnam, 1853. 251 p.) and Prue and I (New York, Dix, Edwards, 1856. 214 p.); these are largely periodical essays with a vague story thread. Trumps (New York, Harper, 1861. 502 p.) is a novel of Washington politics and New York social life. With these the first main phase of his literary career came to an end. In 1854 he began to write the essays for the Easy Chair editor's section of Harper's Magazine; these increasingly occupied his time until his death in 1892. In his editorial work he became more concerned with political and social affairs, and his editorial essays give a valuable picture of American life at that period; a large selection of them was published in From the Easy Chair (New York, Harper, 1892–94. 3 v.). A recent study of Curtis is Gordon Milne's George William Curtis & the Genteel Tradition (Bloomington, Indiana University Press, 1956. 204 p.).

2279. Frothingham, Octavius Brooks. George Ripley. 1882. 321 p. 7–8 PS2713.F6

Ripley (1802–1880), a practicing Unitarian minister from 1826 to 1841, was a prominent religious writer and editor of periodicals and a number of influential foreign books, in which capacities he had an important influence on the Transcendentalist movement, of which he was a leader. He helped found The Dial (q. v.) and to organize Brook Farm (q. v.). His biographer, Frothingham (1822–1895), was also a Unitarian minister and a Transcendentalist. Among his other books are Theodore Parker (Boston, Osgood, 1874. 588 p.), a leading abolitionist, Unitarian clergyman, and Transcendentalist; a history of Transcendentalism in New England (q. v.); a life of the philanthropist, statesman, abolitionist, reformer, Gerrit Smith (New York, Putnam, 1878. 381 p.); a Memoir of William Henry Channing (New York, Houghton Mifflin, 1886. 491 p.), a Unitarian clergyman, Transcendentalist, and editor, and the nephew of W. E. Channing (q. v.); and the autobiographical Recollections and Impressions, 1822–1890 (New York, Putnam, 1891. 305 p.).

2280. Higginson, Thomas Wentworth. Margaret Fuller Ossoli. 1884. 323 p.
4–17996 PS2506.H5

Margaret Fuller was a leader in the Transcendentalist movement; the literature section of this bibliography contains a discussion of her work. Higginson, her biographer, was one of the most esteemed men of letters of his day. Autobiographical works such as Old Cambridge (New York, Macmillan, 1899. 203 p.) and Part of a Man's Life (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1905. 311 p.) constitute a valuable source for studying prominent contemporaries, especially those of the literary world and the Transcendentalist movement. Valuable both as literature and as a historical record is Army Life in a Black Regiment (Boston, Fields, Osgood, 1870. 296 p.), which recounts his experiences during the Civil War as the leader of the first Negro unit in the Army. Higginson also wrote biographies of Longfellow and Whittier, and a series of biographical sketches in Contemporaries (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1899. 379 p.), which discusses people such as Emerson, A. B. Alcott, T. Parker, Whittier, Whitman, Lanier, L. M. Child, John Holmes, Thaddeus W. Harris, W. L. Garrison, Wendell Phillips, C. Sumner, and U. S. Grant.

2281. Sedgwick, Henry Dwight. Francis Parkman. 1904. 345 p. 4–13318 E175.5P24

Parkman (1823–1893) is one of America's leading 19th-century historians who also attained a position in literature; his works are discussed in the General History section of this bibliography. A recent volume of selections for the general reader is The Parkman Reader (Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. 533 p.). His biographer, Sedgwick (b. 1861), distinguished himself in this literary form, but mostly on non-American subjects such as in his Dante (1918), Marcus Aurelius (1921), Ignatius Loyola (1923), Henry of Navarre (1930), Marie Recamier (1940), Horace (1947), and others; his autobiography, Memoirs of an Epicurean, appeared in 1942.

2282. Smyth, Albert H. Bayard Taylor. 1896. 320 p. 4–17191 PS2993.S5 1896

Taylor (1825–1878) was one of the foremost authors in his generation. He achieved a large part of his initial fame through his travel books, of which the most famous is probably Eldorado (q. v.). Most of his travel writings were about foreign lands (Asia, Africa, and Europe). Almost all his work was exotic, and at the same time endowed with the "polish" that was so essential an ingredient for the successful, refined literary production of the period. This was also true of his poetry, which advanced his purely literary reputation, although he is now usually classed as merely a good minor poet with the ambiguously kind title of "laureate of the gilded age." His posthumous Poetical Works (Boston, Houghton, Osgood, 1880. 341 p.) remained in print well into the 20th century. He was also a minor dramatist of some contemporary note; his Dramatic Works (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1880. 345 p.) includes "The Prophet," "The Masque of the Gods," and "Prince Deukalion." Taylor also wrote a number of fictional works. His first novel was Hannah Thurston: A Story of American Life (New York, Putnam, 1863. 464 p.), which utilized a conventional love story plot as a framework for picturing American life and opinions in upstate New York. John Godfrey's Fortunes (New York, Putnam, 1864. 511 p.) pictured literary activities in New York. Both The Story of Kennett (New York, Putnam; Hurd and Houghton, 1866. 418 p.) and Joseph and His Friend (New York, Putnam, 1870. 361 p.) portrayed rural life in Pennsylvania. However, it was at the end of his life that Taylor undertook the work that brought him a degree of lasting fame; this was his translation of Goethe's Faust (Boston, Fields, Osgood, 1870–71. 2 v.), which has since gone through innumerable editions, and is still in print in several standard collections. Apart from this, his interest and importance nowadays are largely historical.

2283. The American men of letters series. New York, Sloane, 1948+

Second series issued under this title; in general designed to carry on in the contemporary period biographical and critical studies of authors not covered by Houghton Mifflin's earlier series (v. supra) of the same name. Since all the authors so far included in this new series are presented in the Literature section of the bibliography, reference to the most recent volumes is made there under the names of the individual authors treated. Earlier volumes include:

2284. Arvin, Newton. Herman Melville. 1950. 316 p. 50–7584 PS2386.A7 1950

2285. Berryman, John. Stephen Crane. 1950. 347 p. 50–10964 PS1499.C85Z56

2286. Grossman, James. James Fenimore Cooper. 1949. 286 p.
49–50106 PS1431.G77 1949

2287. Krutch, Joseph Wood. Henry David Thoreau. 1948. 298 p. 48–8483 PS3053.K7

2288. Miller, Perry. Jonathan Edwards. 1949. 348 p. 49–50164 BX7260.E3M5 1949

2289. Neff, Emery Edward. Edwin Arlington Robinson. 1948. 286 p.
48–8640 PS3535.O25Z74

2290. American writers series. New York, American Book Co., 1934+

The American writers series provides in each volume a representative selection from the writings of some author or group; in addition there is regularly an extensive and scholarly introduction, a chronological table, and an annotated bibliography. The series, most of whose parts have been kept in print, has appeared under the general editorship of Harry H. Clark. Authors represented in the series include Emerson, Hawthorne, Irving, Longfellow, Thoreau, Whitman, Bryant, Jonathan Edwards, Mark Twain, Poe, Cooper, Franklin, Melville, Holmes, Parkman, Harte, Henry James, Paine, J. R. Lowell, and Howells (qq. v.). Many of the volumes in this series have been cited elsewhere in this bibliography under the individual authors. Other volumes are:

2291. Alexander Hamilton and Thomas Jefferson; representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes by Frederick G. Prescott. 1934. lxxxi, 422 p. 34–21830 E302.H257

Both Hamilton and Jefferson were prominent leaders in the early years of the Republic, and they both possessed a writing ability and cogency of thought which place their documents among the more important literary works of the period. Both these men are treated extensively under the General History section of this bibliography; Jefferson is also included in the section on the literature of the Revolutionary and Federal periods. This selection from the writings of the two men assumes that the reader has ready access to one of the many editions of The Federalist (q. v.).

2292. Southern poets; representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes by Edd Winfield Parks. 1936. cxlviii, 419 p.
36–7131 PS551.P27

A companion volume to the Southern Prose Writers below, this work has a wider range in that it also includes work readily available elsewhere. The object of the work is "to present the best poems by Southerners . . . regardless of subject."

2293. John Lothrop Motley; representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes by Chester Penn Higby and B. T. Schantz. 1939. clxi, 482 p.
40–1040 PS2435.A4H5 1939

Motley (1814–1877) is one of those historians whose work has achieved a position in belles-lettres. His three major works are The Rise of the Dutch Republic (1856); History of the United Netherlands, from the Death of William the Silent, to the Twelve Years' Truce, 1609 (1860–67); and The Life and Death of John Barneveld (1874). He also wrote two novels: the autobiographical Morton's Hope; or, The Memoirs of a Provincial (1839), and Merry-Mount: A Romance of the Massachusetts Colony (1849).

2294. William Hickling Prescott; representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes by William Charvat and Michael Kraus. 1943. cxlii, 466 p. 43–1590 PS2656.A4 1943

Prescott (1796–1859) is another of America's "literary" historians. His masterpiece is History of the Conquest of Mexico (1843). That and the History of the Conquest of Peru (1847) are his most frequently reprinted works. His other main histories are History of Ferdinand and Isabella (1838) and History of the Reign of Philip the Second (1855–58), of which the latter work was left incomplete at the time of his death. A 22-volume edition of his works (including the standard biography by Ticknor) was published in Philadelphia by Lippincott in 1904. In addition to his historical work, Prescott also had a considerable interest in literature, as may be seen in his Biographical and Critical Miscellanies (1845) which, except for the opening biographical study of Charles Brockton Brown (q. v.), was a collection of articles which first appeared in the North American Review. Some of these articles, as well as others which Prescott published only in periodicals, are included in the present selection, giving the volume the added merit of showing him as a literary critic as well as a historian. It is true that Prescott's subject matter is largely foreign, but, as stated on p. cxxviii of the introduction to this work, ". . . a true evaluation of American culture of the past must embrace writers like Prescott who, in getting out of their age, carried American ideals and traditions with them. His work adds to the mounting evidence that the main line of American thought has been anything but narrowly nationalistic . . ."

2295. Minor Knickerbockers; representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes, by Kendall B. Taft. 1947. cxlviii, 410 p.
47–2234 PS549.N5T2

"Selected bibliography": p. cxi–cxlviii.

"Knickerbockers" is a term loosely applied to a group of early 19th-century New York City writers. The name came from Washington Irving's Diedrich Knickerbocker's History of New York (q. v.), and Irving himself is usually regarded as the leader of this cosmopolitan group. The Knickerbockers gained temporary dominance of the nation's literature, and in doing so became increasingly nationalistic. Authors represented in the present selection include James Kirke Paulding, Samuel Woodworth, Fitz-Greene Halleck, John Howard Payne, Joseph Rodman Drake, Robert Charles Sands, William Leggett, George Pope Morris, William Cox, Nathaniel Willis, Charles Fenno Hoffman, Theodore Sedgwick Fay, Lewis Gaylord Clark, Park Benjamin, and Cornelius Matthews; a number of these are discussed elsewhere in the bibliography, especially in the Literature section for this period.

2296. Southern prose writers; representative selections, with introd., bibliography, and notes by Gregory Paine. 1947. cxiv, 392 p.
47-679 PS551.P23

"The purpose . . . has been to make available to students of American literature southern literary materials not readily available in convenient form elsewhere and to present these materials in units sufficiently large to be genuinely representative of the authors chosen."—Preface. The authors included are: William Byrd, Jefferson, W. Wirt, John Taylor, Calhoun, H. S. Legaré, J. P. Kennedy, J. G. Baldwin, Longstreet, Crockett, Simms, J. E. Cooke, G. W. Cable, G. E. King, M. N. Murfree, J. C. Harris, S. Bonner, Lanier, T. N. Page, W. H. Page, J. L. Allen, W. S. Porter, and Woodrow Wilson. Most of these authors are represented more fully elsewhere in this bibliography.

2297. America's lost plays. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1940–42. 20 v.
PS623.A1A6

A series presenting generally forgotten and unavailable plays which were once popular, and which remain an integral part of the historical picture of the development of the American drama. Almost all of them date from the 19th century. A few of the authors represented have been included in the Literature section of the bibliography.

2298. Vol. 1. Forbidden fruit & other plays, by Dion Boucicault. 1940. viii, 313 p.
40-31677 PR4161.B2A13

CONTENTS.—Forbidden fruit.—Louis XI.—Dot.—Flying scud.—Mercy Dodd.—Robert Emmet.

2299. Vol. 2. False shame and Thirty years, two plays by William Dunlap. 1940. xiv, 106 p.
40-31678 PS1560.F2 1940

Translation and adaptation of Falsche Scham by August von Kotzebue and Trente ans, ou La vie d'un joueur, by Victor Ducange and Prosper Goubaux.

2300. Vol. 3. Glaucus, & other plays, by George Henry Boker. xiv, 228 p. 1940.
40-32028 PS1105.G6

CONTENTS.—The world a mask.—The bankrupt.—Glaucus.

2301. Vol. 4. Davy Crockett, & other plays, by Leonard Grover, Frank Murdock [!] Lester Wallack, G. H. Jessop, J. J. McCloskey. 1940. xxv, 231 p. 40-35497 PS625.G6

CONTENTS.—Rosedale; or, The rifle ball, by Lester Wallack.—Across the continent; or, Scenes from New York life and the Pacific railroad, by J. J. McCloskey.—Davy Crockett; or, Be sure you're right, then go ahead, by Frank Murdock [!]—Sam'l of Posen; or, The commercial drummer, by G. H. Jessop.—Our boarding house, by Leonard Grover.

2302. Vol. 5. Trial without jury, & other plays, by John Howard Payne. 1940. xvii, 264 p.
40-32715 PS2530.A5H5

CONTENTS.—Trial without jury; or, The magpie and the maid.—Mount Savage.—The boarding schools; or, Life among the little folks.—The two sons-in-law.—Mazeppa; or, The wild horse of Tartary.—The Spanish husband; or, First and last love.

2303. Vol. 6. The last duel in Spain, & other plays by John Howard Payne. 1940. 265 p.
40-35574 PS2530.A5H46

CONTENTS.—The last duel in Spain.—Woman's revenge.—The Italian bride.—Romulus, the shepherd king.—The black man; or, The spleen.

2304. Vol. 7. The early plays of James A. Herne, with act IV of Griffith Davenport. 1940. x, 160 p. 41-3201 PS1919.H75A13

CONTENTS.—Introduction.—Within an inch of his life.—"The minute men" of 1774–1775.—Drifting apart.—The Reverend Griffith Davenport.—Bibliography (p. [161]).

2305. Vol. 8. The great diamond robbery, & other recent melodramas, by Edward M. Alfriend & A. C. Wheeler, Clarence Bennett [and others] . . . 1940. xv, 255 p. 41-3202 PS625.L4

CONTENTS.—A royal slave, by Clarence Bennett.—The great diamond robbery, by Edward M. Alfriend and A. C. Wheeler.—From rags to riches, by Charles A. Taylor.—No mother to guide her, by Lillian Mortimer.—Billy the kid, by Walter Woods.

2306. Vol. 9. Five plays by Charles H. Hoyt. 1941. xv, 240 p.
41-3203 PS2039.H47A12

CONTENTS.—A bunch of keys.—A midnight bell.—A trip to Chinatown.—A temperance town.—A milk white flag.

2307. Vol. 10. The banker's daughter, & other plays, by Bronson Howard. 1941. xiv, 306 p. 41-6275 PS2014.H12B3 1941

CONTENTS.—Bronson Crocker Howard.—Survey of Howard's plays.—Hurricanes.—Old love letters.—The banker's daughter.—Baron Rudolph.—Knave and queen.—One of our girls.—Bibliography (p. 299-306).

2308. Vol. 11. An arrant knave, & other plays, by Steele MacKaye. 1941. xvii, 234 p. 41-10637 PS2359.M42A8 1941

CONTENTS.—Rose Michel.—Won at last.—In spite of all.—An arrant knave.

2309. Vol. 12. The cowled lover, & other plays, by Robert Montgomery Bird. 1941. x, 221 p. 41-10638 PS1099.B5C6 1941

CONTENTS.—The cowled lover.—Caridorf; or, The avenger.—News of the night; or A trip to Niagara.—'Twas all for the best; or, 'Tis all a notion.

2310. Vol. 13. The sentinels, & other plays, by Richard Penn Smith. 1941. x, 171 p. 41-10639 PS2869.S7S4 1941

CONTENTS.—Checklist of the plays of Richard Penn Smith (p. [ix]-x).—The sentinels; or, The two sergeants.—The bombardment of Algiers.—William Penn.—Shakespeare in love.—A wife at a venture.—The last man; or, the cock of the village.

2311. Vol. 14. Metamora, & other plays, by John Augustus Stone [and others] 1941. vi, 399 p. 41-18466 PS632.P3

CONTENTS.—Metamora; or, The last of the Wampanoags, by J. A. Stone.—Tancred, king of Sicily; or, The archives of Palermo, by J. A. Stone.—The spy, a tale of the neutral ground, by C. B. Clinch.—The battle of Stillwater; or, The maniac, by H. J. Conway (?)—The usurper; or, Americans in Tripoli, by J. S. Jones.—The crock of gold; or, The toiler's trials, by S. S. Steele.—Job and his children, by J. M. Field.—Signor Marc, by J. H. Wilkins.—The duke's motto; or, I am here! By John Brougham.

2312. Vol. 15. Four plays by Royall Tyler. 1941. viii, 120 p. 41-28105 PS855.T7A13

CONTENTS.—The island of Barrataria.—The origin of the feast of Purim; or, The destinies of Haman & Mordecai.—Joseph and his brethren.—The judgment of Solomon.

2313. Vol. 16. Monte Cristo, by Charles Fechter, as played by James O'Neill, & other plays by Julia Ward Howe, George C. Hazelton, Langdon Mitchell [and] William C. De Mille. 1941. 360 p. 41-24720 PS625.R8

CONTENTS.—Monte Cristo, by Charles Fechter.—Hippolytus, by J. W. Howe—Mistress Nell, by G. C. Hazelton.—Becky Sharp, by Langdon Mitchell.—The Warrens of Virginia, by W. C. De Mille.

2314. Vol. 17. The plays of Henry C. De Mille, written in collaboration with David Belasco. 1941+ xxv, 342 p. 41-24493 PS1534.D2A12

CONTENTS.—Introductory essay.—A complete list of the plays by H. C. De Mille (1 p. following p. xxv).—The main line, by H. C. De Mille and Charles Barnard.—The wife, by David Belasco and H. C. De Mille.—Lord Chumley, by H. C. De Mille and David Belasco.—The charity ball, by David Belasco and H. C. De Mille.—Men and women, by H. C. De Mille and David Belasco.

2315. Vol. 18. The heart of Maryland, & other plays, by David Belasco. 1941. xii, 319 p. 41-28106 PS1085.B23H4 1941

CONTENTS.—La Belle Russe.—The stranglers of Paris.—The girl I left behind me, by David Belasco and Franklin Fyles.—The heart of Maryland.—Naughty Anthony.

2316. Vol. 19. The white slave, & other plays, by Bartley Campbell. 1941. lxxxi, 248 p. 42-4434 PS1252.C25A19 1941

CONTENTS.— Biographical sketch.— Alphabetical list of the plays of Bartley Campbell (p. [xv]-lxxxi).—The Virginian.—My partner.—The galley slave.—Fairfax.—The white slave.

2317. Vol. 20. Man and wife, & other plays, by Augustin Daly. 1942. xxi, 407 p. 42-15353 PS1499.D85M35 1942

CONTENTS.—List of Daly's plays (p. [xi]-xxi).—Man and wife.—Divorce.—The big bonanza.—Pique.—Needles and pins.

2318. Anthology of best original short-shorts. 1953+ Ocean City, N. J., Oberfirst Publications, 1954+ annual. Oberfirst's short-short fiction library) 54-33676 PZ1.A63

Editor: 1954+ R. Oberfirst.

The "short-short" is a refinement of the short story, and portrays a single action in one to five pages. Usually it poses a surprise or twist ending, in the tradition of O. Henry (q. v.). The 1953 volume above is not the first collection by Oberfirst, but it is apparently the first of a series, of which three have so far appeared.

2319. Badger, Kingsbury M. American literature for colleges. Harrisburg, Pa., Stackpole Co. [1952–54] 2 v. 52–2996 PS507.B32

A college textbook anthology of American literature which is meant to trace the development of the American heritage. The result is a chronological development in terms of subject matter (pre-colonials, colonials, early nationalists, etc.), but not of material presented. In each section, the selections include not only work by people taking part in the period, movement, and activities discussed, but also subsequent people who wrote about it. The result also includes a far different representation of authors than is usual: the Amerindians receive considerable attention, and so do non-English colonists; also, many nonfiction authors infrequently regarded as part of "Literature" have been included, and, as an aspect of this, the usual authors included in literary anthologies have tended to have more than a usual proportion of space given over to their non-fictional writings. The second volume carries the work through the late 19th century and "Romanticism, Realism, and the Frontier."

2320. Beatty, Richmond Croom, Floyd C. Watkins, and Thomas Daniel Young, eds. The literature of the South. Randall Stewart, general editor. Chicago, Scott, Foresman, 1952. 1106 p. 52–2548 PS261.B43

An anthology reflecting the Southern experience in its many aspects through its more literary writers. The contemporary flourishing of belles-lettres in the South is reflected in some 40 percent of the book being devoted to the 20th century.

2321. Benét, William Rose, and Norman Holmes Pearson, eds. The Oxford anthology of American literature. New York, Oxford University Press, 1938. xxx, 1705 p. 38–34361 PS507.O9

Unlike most anthologies of American literature, this work is not aimed primarily at the textbook market; also, it approaches the selecting problem as a purely literary one. While the editors claim no attempt to be all-inclusive, some 150 writers are represented by selections. Because of the emphasis on literary merit, major writers regularly receive far more space than do minor authors. The relative importance of modern literature is recognized by devoting about half the volume to this period. Commentary is not provided with the selections, but biographical sketches of the authors are found on p. 1577–1683, with short author bibliographies. A "background" bibliography is presented on p. 1685–1688.

2322. The Best American short stories . . . and the Yearbook of the American short story . . . 1915+ Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1916+ 16–11387 PZ1.B446235

Title varies: 1915–41, The Best Short Stories. 1942+ The Best American Short Stories.

Editor: 1915–41, E. J. O'Brien.—1942+ Martha Foley.

Imprint varies: 1915–25, Boston, Small, Maynard & Company.—1926–32, New York, Dodd, Mead and Company.—1933+ Boston, Houghton Mifflin Company.

An annual survey of and selection from the short stories published in America during the preceding year. The present editor, Martha Foley, has also produced a number of more selective anthologies, including The Best of the Best American Short Stories, 1915–1950 (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. 369 p.) and, with Abraham Rothberg, U. S. Stories; Regional Stories from the Forty-Eight States (New York, Hendricks House-Farrar Straus, 1949. xix, 683 p.).

2323. Blair, Walter, Theodore Hornberger, and Randall Stewart, eds. The literature of the United States, an anthology and a history. Rev. ed. Chicago, Scott, Foresman, 1953. 2 v. 53–2382 PS507.B527

Although the emphasis is on the more important authors, this anthology presents a fair range of selections from lesser authors. Arranged along historical lines, the literary selections also reflect the development of ideas. Each section has an extensive introduction on the period, and individual authors and selections are commented upon. As with most such college texts, guides to further reading are supplied.

2324. Bradley, E. Sculley, and others, eds. The American tradition in literature. Edited by Sculley Bradley, Richmond Croom Beatty [and] E. Hudson Long. New York, Norton, 1956. 2 v. 56–1312 PS507.B74

A college textbook anthology which has an emphasis on major writers, whom it attempts to present in their full variety and stature. The final criterion for all selections has been literary, but the critical apparatus has been designed to relate them to America's history and intellectual development.

2325. Burrell, John Angus, and Bennett A. Cerf, eds. An anthology of famous American stories. Edited by Angus Burrell and Bennett Cerf. New York, Modern Library, 1953. 1340 p. (The Modern Library of the world's best books. [A Modern Library giant, G77])

53–9916 PZ1.B94An

A chronologically arranged collection of 73 short stories which the editors consider outstanding. This book is a revision of a work originally published in 1936 under the title The Bedside Book of Famous American Stories. As in the original work, the primary intent is still to provide stories for pleasurable reading, and only secondarily to provide a survey, so that nothing is included purely for historical purposes.

2326. Cady, Edwin Harrison, Frederick J. Hoffman, and Roy Harvey Pearce, eds. The growth of American literature; a critical and historical survey. New York, American Book Co., 1956. 2 v. (American literature series)
56–1720 PS507.C19

A college textbook for the study of American literature as it reflects the country's cultural development. Major writers are given a liberal representation among approximately one hundred authors presented. Introductions, chronologies, and highly selective bibliographies are supplied to guide the student.

2327. Cerf, Bennett A., and Van H. Cartmell, eds. Sixteen famous American plays. New York, Garden City Pub. Co., 1941. 1049 p.
41–51686 PS634.C42

CONTENTS.—They knew what they wanted, by Sidney Howard.—The front page, by Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur.—The green pastures, by Marc Connelly.—Biography, by S. N. Behrman.—Ah, wilderness! by Eugene O'Neill.—The petrified forest, by Robert Sherwood.—Waiting for Lefty, by Clifford Odets.—Dead end, by Sidney Kingsley.—Boy meets girl, by Bella and Samuel Spewack.—The women, by Claire Boothe.—"Having wonderful time," by Arthur Kober.—Our town, by Thornton Wilder.—The little foxes, by Lillian Hellman.—The man who came to dinner, by Moss Hart and George S. Kaufman.—The time of your life, by William Saroyan.—Life with father, by Howard Lindsay and Russel Crouse.

This work, which has also been published by Random House in a Modern Library reprint, offers a selection of plays produced between 1924 and 1939. Because of its terminal date, the work might be supplemented by Jack Gaver's Critics' Choice . . . (no. 2336), which covers the 1935–55 period.

2328. Cooke, George Willis, ed. The poets of Transcendentalism, an anthology. With introductory essay and biographical notes. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1903. xvi, 341 p.
3–6145 PS607.C7

An anthology of poetry influenced by the Transcendental movement in New England. Since the aim is "to give specimens of the poetical output of that movement," much of the book is devoted to work by minor and usually neglected poets.

2329. Davis, Joe Lee, John T. Frederick, and Frank Luther Mott, eds. American literature, an anthology and critical survey. New York, Scribner, 1948–49. 2 v.
48–9141 PS507.D3

A college textbook anthology that aims to provide a comprehensive collection of basic writings; essays on the periods and on the major authors are included, while the lesser authors are covered by headnotes. The work has been arranged chronologically, with the intention of presenting the American experience. The same work has been reissued under the title A Treasury of American Literature (Chicago, Spencer Press, 1955 [i. e., 1956]).

2330. Ellis, Harold Milton, and others, eds.. . . A college book of American literature. Edited by Milton Ellis, Louise Pound [and] George Weida Spohn. New York, American Book Co., 1939–40. 2 v. (American literature series; H. H. Clark, general editor)
39–22474 PS507.E65

"General bibliography": v. 1, p. 1003–1012; v. 2, p. 1077–1082.

A voluminous anthology, arranged chronologically. While most attention is given to major authors, many lesser ones are included, with nearly two hundred represented. The editorial intention is to present the significant statements of each period's spokesmen; the quantitative emphasis is on post-colonial writings. There are biographical sketches and bibliographies for each author. With the additional editorial assistance of Frederick J. Hoffman, there has appeared a one-volume abridged version of the work, intended for one-semester courses: A College Book of American Literature; Briefer Course, 2d ed. (New York, American Book Co., 1954. 1107 p.).

2331. Foerster, Norman, ed. American poetry and prose. 3d ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. 1610 p.
47–4469 PS507.F6 1947

"Under the general editorship of Robert Morss Lovett."

"American civilization: a reading list": p. 1595–1604.

A college textbook anthology of American writing from 1612 to the present. The emphasis is on major writers, with some minor authors represented. The purpose of the work is to register the progress of the United States in literature, and to present the growth of literature as a principal feature of American civilization. Brief biographical, bibliographical, and critical comments accompany the selections. For shorter courses William Charvat has prepared an abridged version (Boston, Houghton, Mifflin, 1952. 924 p.) of this work.

2332. Gassner, John, ed. 'Twenty-five best plays of the modern American theatre. Early series. New York, Crown, 1949. xxviii, 756 p. 49-9571 PS634.G32

CONTENTS.—"The hairy ape," by Eugene O'Neill.—Desire under the elms, by Eugene O'Neill.—What price glory? By Laurence Stallings and Maxwell Anderson.—They knew what they wanted, by Sidney Howard.—Beggar on horseback, by George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly.—Craig's wife, by George Kelly.—Broadway, by Philip Dunning and George Abbott.—Paris bound, by Philip Barry.—The road to Rome, by Robert E. Sherwood.—The second man, by S. N. Behrman.—Saturday's children, by Maxwell Anderson.—Porgy, by Dorothy and Du Bose Heyward.—The front page, by Ben Hecht and Charles MacArthur.—Machinal, by Sophie Treadwell.—Gods of the lightning, by Maxwell Anderson and Harold Hickerson.—Street scene, by Elmer Rice.—Strictly dishonorable, by Preston Sturges.—Berkeley Square, by J. L. Balderston.—The clod, by Lewis Beach.—Trifles, by Susan Glaspell.—Ile, by Eugene O'Neill.—Aria da capo, by Edna St. Vincent Millay.—Poor Aubrey, by George Kelly.—White dresses, by Paul Green.—Minnie Field, by E. P. Conkle.—Supplementary list of plays (p. 754-755).—Bibliography (p. 756).

A ". . . record of the period between 1919 and 1929, when our theatre arrived at maturity, and of the stirrings in the direction of modernity a few years earlier, as expressed by the Little Theatre movement . . ." This work is a "belated effort" to cover the integral first period for the series that follows. Gassner has done much writing and anthologizing in the field of the drama, both foreign and domestic. His The Theatre in Our Times; a Survey of the Men, Materials, and Movements in the Modern Theatre (New York, Crown Publishers, 1954. 609 p.) discusses world drama, but from the vantage point of the New York theatergoer, so that the work may be used as a commentary on modern drama in America. With Dudley Nichols he edited Twenty Best Film Plays (New York, Crown, 1943. xl, 1112 p.).

2333. Gassner, John, ed. Twenty best plays of the modern American theatre. New York, Crown, 1939. xxii, 874 p. 39-32159 PS634.G3

CONTENTS.—Winterset, by Maxwell Anderson.—High Tor, by Maxwell Anderson.—Idiot's delight, by Robert E. Sherwood.—Johnny Johnson, by Paul Green.—Green pastures, by Marc Connelly.—You can't take it with you, by George S. Kaufman and Moss Hart.—End of summer, by S. N. Behrman.—The animal kingdom, by Philip Barry.—Boy meets girl, by Bella and Samuel Spewack.—The women, by Clare Boothe.—Yes, my darling daughter, by Mark Reed.—Three men on a horse, by George Abbott and John Cecil Holm.—The children's hour, by Lillian Hellman.—Tobacco road, by Jack Kirkland and Erskine Caldwell.—Of mice and men, by John Steinbeck.—Dead end, by Sidney Kingsley.—Bury the dead, by Irwin Shaw.—The fall of the city, by Archibald MacLeish.—Golden boy, by Clifford Odets.—Stage door, by Edna Ferber and George S. Kaufman.—Plays by authors represented (p. 869-871).—Plays by other authors, 1930-1940 (p. 871-872).—Bibliography (p. 873-874).

This is the first of an indefinite series of collections of modern American plays; volumes are issued to represent newly elapsed periods. Each volume, in addition to the texts of leading plays, contains a concise introduction on the theater situation during the years covered.

2334. Gassner, John, ed. Best plays of the modern American theatre, second series. New York, Crown, 1947. xxx, 776 p. 47-30270 PS634.G28

CONTENTS.—The glass menagerie, by Tennessee Williams.—The time of your life, by William Saroyan.—I remember mama, by John Van Druten.—Life with father, by Howard Lindsay and Russel Crouse.—Born yesterday, by Garson Kanin.—The voice of the turtle, by John Van Druten.—The male animal, by James Thurber and Elliott Nugent.—The man who came to dinner, by George S. Kaufman and Moss Hart.—Dream girl, by Elmer Rice.—The Philadelphia story, by Philip Barry.—Arsenic and old lace, by Joseph Kesselring.—The hasty heart, by John Patrick.—Home of the brave, by Arthur Laurents.—Tomorrow the world, by James Gow and Arnaud d'Usseau.—Watch on the Rhine, by Lillian Hellman.—The patriots, by Sidney Kingsley.—Abe Lincoln in Illinois, by Robert E. Sherwood.—Bibliography (p. 775-776).

2335. Gassner, John, ed. Best American plays; third series, 1945-1951. New York, Crown, 1952. xxviii, 707 p. 52-5690 PS634.G277

CONTENTS.—Introduction: The mid-century theatre, a reprise with variations, by John Gassner.—Death of a salesman, by Arthur Miller.—A streetcar named desire, by Tennessee Williams.—The iceman cometh, by Eugene O'Neill.—The member of the wedding, by Carson McCullers.—The autumn garden, by Lillian Hellman.—Come back, little Sheba, by William Inge.—All my sons, by Arthur Miller.—Detective story, by Sidney Kingsley.—Billy Budd, by Louis O. Coxe and Robert Chapman.—Medea, by Robinson Jeffers.—Mister Roberts, by Thomas Heffen and Joshua Logan.—State of the Union, by Howard Lindsay and Russel Crouse.—Darkness at noon, by Sidney Kingsley.—Anne of the thousand days, by Maxwell Anderson.—Bell, book, and candle, by John Van Druten.—The moon is blue, by F. Hugh Herbert.—Summer and smoke, by Tennessee Williams.—Supplementary list of American nonmusical plays (p. 703–705).—American musical plays of the period (p. 705).—Bibliography (p. 706–707).

2336. Gaver, Jack, ed. Critics' choice; New York Drama Critics' Circle prize plays, 1935–55. New York, Hawthorn Books, 1955. 661 p. 55–10113 PS634.G35

A collection of the plays which since the 1935–36 season have received the New York Drama Critics' Circle awards for best play of the season. With Cerf and Cartmell's Sixteen Famous American Plays (q. v.) this work anthologizes the modern theater movement in America. The award plays are: Maxwell Anderson's "Winterset" and "High Tor"; John Steinbeck's "Of Mice and Men"; William Saroyan's "The Time of Your Life"; Lillian Hellman's "Watch on the Rhine"; Sidney Kingsley's "The Patriots" and "Darkness at Noon"; Tennessee Williams' "The Glass Menagerie," "A Streetcar Named Desire," and "Cat on a Hot Tin Roof"; Arthur Miller's "All My Sons" and "Death of a Salesman"; Carson McCullers' "The Member of the Wedding"; John Van Druten's "I Am a Camera"; William Inge's "Picnic"; and John Patrick's "The Teahouse of the August Moon."

2337. Halline, Allan Gates, ed. American plays, selected and edited, with critical introductions and bibliographies. New York, American Book Co., 1935. 787 p. (American literature series; H. H. Clark, general editor) 35–5220 PS623.H3

"Bibliographies": p. 751–776.

CONTENTS.—The contrast, by Royall Tyler.—André, by William Dunlap.—The bucktails; or, Americans in England, by James Kirke Paulding.—Superstition, by James Nelson Barker.—The gladiator, by Robert Montgomery Bird.—Bianca Visconti, by Nathaniel Parker Willis.—Fashion, by Anna Cora Mowatt.—Francesca da Rimini, by George Henry Boker.—Horizon, by Augustin Daly.—The Danites in the Sierras, by Joaquin Miller.—The Henrietta, by Bronson Howard.—The New York idea, by Langdon Mitchell.—Madame Sand, by Philip Moeller.—You and I, by Philip Barry.—Icebound, by Owen Davis.—The great god Brown, by Eugene O'Neill.—The field god, by Paul Green.

This book aims to present a picture of the chronological development of the American drama. Each play is introduced by a discussion of the play itself and its philosophical and literary relationships, as well as the dramatist's other work. A longer work with the same purpose, but with the emphasis on the pre-modern period, is Arthur H. Quinn's Representative American Plays, from 1767 to the Present Day, 7th ed., rev. and enl. (New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1953. 1248 p.), which includes the following: Thomas Godfrey's "The Prince of Parthia" (1767); Royall Tyler's "The Contrast" (1787); William Dunlap's "André" (1798); James Nelson Barker's "Superstition" (1824); John Howard Payne and Washington Irving's "Charles the Second" (1824); George Washington Parke Custis' "Pocahontas, or The Settlers of Virginia" (1830); Robert Montgomery Bird's "The Broker of Bogota" (1834); Nathaniel Parker Willis' "Tortesa the Usurer" (1839); Anna Cora Mowatt Ritchie's "Fashion" (1845); George Henry Boker's "Francesca da Rimini" (1855); Dion Boucicault's "The Octoroon, or Life in Louisiana" (1859); Joseph Jefferson's "Rip Van Winkle" (1865); Steele MacKaye's "Hazel Kirke" (1880); Bronson Howard's "Shenandoah" (1889); James A. Herne's "Margaret Fleming" (1890); William Gillette's "Secret Service" (1896); David Belasco and John Luther Long's "Madame Butterfly" (1900); Clyde Fitch's "The Girl With the Green Eyes" (1902); Langdon Mitchell's "The New York Idea" (1906); Augustus Thomas' "The Witching Hour" (1907); William Vaughn Moody's "The Faith Healer" (1909); Percy MacKaye's "The Scarecrow" (1910); Edward Sheldon's "The Boss" (1911); Rachel Crothers' "He and She" (1911); Eugene O'Neill's "Beyond the Horizon" (1920); Lula Vollmer's "Sun-Up" (1923); Sidney Howard's "The Silver Cord" (1926); Philip Barry's "Paris Bound" (1927); Maxwell Anderson's "Winterset" (1935); William Wister Haines' "Command Decision" (1947); and Richard Rodgers, Oscar Hammerstein II, and Joshua Logan's "South Pacific" (1949).

2338. Hart, James D., and Clarence Gohdes, eds. America's literature. New York, Dryden Press, 1955. 958 p. 55–14399 PS507.H24

An anthology designed for a first-year college course in American literature. Some 250 selections from the writings of 46 authors have been included. Long introductions relating literature to general culture have been provided for the four major editorial sections of the volume; also, each author has his own introduction.

2339. Howard, Leon, Louis B. Wright, and Carl Bode, eds. American heritage; an anthology and interpretive survey of our literature. Boston, Heath, 1955, 2 v. 54–9510 PS507.H6

A college textbook which seeks to present the "American heritage of ideas, emotions, and points of view which are revealed in literature and which reveal the nature of America today." There are brief introductions to the nearly 200 authors from whose writings selections have been made.

2340. Hubbell, Jay B., ed. American life in literature. Rev. ed. New York, Harper, 1949. 2 v. 49–2372 PS507.H8 1949

Bibliography: v. 1, p. 955–967; repeated in v. 2, p. 931–943.

A college textbook anthology in which the emphasis is on American literature as an expression of American life and thought. Major writers are well represented, and selections included from a fairly large number of lesser figures; a total of about 140 authors being represented. In addition, about two dozen British writers are included for passages reflecting their view of America. Extensive historical interchapters and individual author biographies, with special detail for major authors, are designed to relate the work to American history and life in more than its literary aspects. An abridged edition prepared for a one-semester course appeared in one volume under the same title; the most recent revision was in 1951.

2341. Jones, Howard Mumford, Ernest E. Leisy, and Richard M. Ludwig, eds. Major American writers. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1952. 1930 p. 52–406 PS507.J6 1952

An anthology textbook designed for college introductory courses in American literature. Major authors of the 18th and 19th centuries are presented, along with representative authors of the 17th and 20th centuries. Scholarly apparatus has been provided for the selections, but there are no period or movement survey essays. On the theory that too much is covered in most such anthologies and the courses for which they are designed, the editors have limited their selections, and only 42 authors are represented.

2342. Kreymborg, Alfred, ed. An anthology of American poetry; lyric America, 1630–1941. New York, Tudor Pub. Co., 1941. xl, 675 p. 41–10130 PS586.K7 1941

Originally published under title: Lyric America, an Anthology of American Poetry (1630–1930).

The main interest in this work is its representation of nearly three hundred major and minor poets. The anthology was designed as a companion volume, which could be used independently, for the author's historical-critical work: Our Singing Strength, an Outline of American Poetry (1620–1930) (New York, Coward-McCann, 1929. 643 p.). Kreymborg (b. 1883) is a playwright, novelist, and anthologist; but his favorite medium is poetry, of which he has been a prolific writer. His publications since Selected Poems, 1912–1944 (New York, Dutton, 1945. 319 p.) include Man and Shadow, an Allegory (New York, Dutton, 1946. 256 p.), a long poem on modern man as seen through his representatives on a visit to Central Park in New York City, and No More War, and Other Poems (New York, Bookman Associates, 1950. 127 p.). Throughout his career Kreymborg has been active in the cause of advancing "modern" American poetry, serving the cause both as editor and as anthologist.

2343. McDowell, Tremaine, ed. America in literature. New York, Crofts, 1944. 540 p. 44–5256 PS509.U5M2

A college textbook anthology, "collected both for individual readers and for students of composition, of American literature, and of our national life," this volume is not a survey of the development of American literature, but rather of the regions of America and the ideas which have influenced American life, as they have been presented by writers of varying literary stature. It is particularly adaptable for use as background reading for general courses in American civilization.

2344. Matthiessen, Francis O., ed. The Oxford book of American verse. New York, Oxford University Press, 1950. lvi, 1132 p. 50–9826 PS583.O82

Bibliography: p. 1107–1115.

A purely literary anthology on historical principles, this work emphasizes the work of the more important poets. Nothing is included for purely historical reasons; also, many of the quite minor poets are not represented, as they are in many anthologies (e. g., cf. Kreymborg supra). Other readily available anthologies of American poetry include A Comprehensive Anthology of American Poetry (New York, Modern Library, 1944. 490 p.), edited by Conrad Aiken (q. v.), and The New Pocket Anthology of American Verse (Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1955. 670 p.), edited by Oscar Williams (q. v.). The latter work is arranged alphabetically and places an unusually heavy emphasis on modern poetry, so that it might almost be regarded as a 20th-century poetry anthology. Williams has done a number of other popular poetry anthologies, such as A Little Treasury of American Poetry (New York, Scribner, 1948. xxxvi, 876 p.).

2345. Miller, Perry, and Thomas H. Johnson, eds. The Puritans. New York, American Book Co., 1938. 846 p. (American literature series; H. H. Clark, general editor) 38–34986 PS530.M5

Bibliographies: p. 785–834.

An extensive anthology of colonial Puritan writings; the lengthy general introduction includes sections on "The Puritan Way of Life" and "The Puritans as Literary Artists." A recent but shorter anthology of the period which Miller has edited is The American Puritans, Their Prose and Poetry, which appeared in an Anchor books paperback edition in 1956. Another good and current paperback anthology in this field is Colonial American Writing (New York, Rinehart, 1950. 581 p.), edited by Roy H. Pearce. An older work in the field is Colonial Prose and Poetry (New York, Crowell, 1901), edited by William P. Trent and Benjamin W. Wells, and published in three very small, compact volumes. Another book of interest here is America Begins (New York, Pantheon, 1950. 438 p.), edited by Richard M. Dorson, who presents selections from 17th century writings depicting the Atlantic coastal communities.

2346. Miller, Perry, ed. The Transcendentalists, an anthology. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1950. xvii, 521 p.

50–7360 B905.M5

Bibliography: p. [503]–510.

"This book exists primarily on the level of what the Transcendentalists called the understanding . . . It aims to make available articles and books that by now can be found only in a few special libraries. I have endeavored to arrange the selections so that they tell the story of themselves . . . this volume . . . [omits Emerson and Thoreau, since their works] are readily accessible, at least in anthologies. . . . Considering both the spatial limits and modern impatience, I have assumed the right to throw out irrelevancies and arid passages. I have tried to preserve only the hard core and the basic themes. . . . in order that this anthology might represent the group as they actually figured in history, I have limited the selection to what appeared at the time as public record . . ."—Introduction.

2347. Moses, Montrose J., ed. Representative plays by American dramatists; edited, with an introd. to each play, by Montrose J. Moses. New York, Dutton, 1918–[25] 3 v. illus.

18–5466 PS623.M7

Bibliographies: v. 1, p. [11]–18; v. 2, p. 3–8; v. 3, p. [4]–14.

CONTENTS.—I. 1765–1819. The Prince of Parthia, by Thomas Godfrey, Jr. 1765.—Ponteach; or, The savages of America, by Robert Rogers. 1766.—The group; a farce, by Mrs. Mercy Warren. 1775.—The Battle of Bunkers-Hill, by Hugh Henry Brackenridge. 1776.—The fall of British tyranny; or, American liberty, by John Leacock. 1776.—The politician out-witted, by Samuel Low. 1789.—The contrast, by Royall Tyler. 1790.—André, by William Dunlap. 1798.—The Indian princess; or, La belle sauvage, by James Nelson Barker. 1808.—She would be a soldier; or, The Plains of Chippewa, by Mordecai Manuel Noah. 1819.—II. 1815–1858. Fashionable follies, by Joseph Hutton. 1815.—Brutus; or, The fall of Tarquin, by John Howard Payne. 1818.—Sertorius; or, The Roman patriot, by David Paul Brown. 1830.—Tortesa, the usurer, by Nathaniel Parker Willis. 1839.—The people's lawyer, by Joseph Stevens Jones. 1839.—Jack Cade, by Robert T. Conrad. 1841.—Fashion, by Mrs. Anna Cora Mowatt. 1850.—Uncle Tom's cabin, dramatized by George L. Aiken. 1852.—Self, by Mrs. Sidney F. Bateman, 1856.—Horseshoe Robinson, by Clifton W. Tayleure. 1858.—III. 1856–1911. Rip Van Winkle: a legend of the Catskills; a comparative arrangement with the Kerr version, by Charles Burke. 1850.—Francesca da Rimini, by George Henry Boker. 1855.—Love in '76; an incident of the revolution, by Oliver Bell Bunce. 1857.—Paul Kauvar; or, Anarchy, by Steele Mackaye. 1887.—Shenandoah, by Bronson Howard. 1888.—In Mizzoura, by Augustus Thomas. 1893.—The moth and the flame, by Clyde Fitch. 1898.—The New York idea, by Langdon Mitchell. 1906.—The easiest way, by Eugene Walter. 1909.—The return of Peter Grimm, by David Belasco. 1911.

2348. Moses, Montrose J., ed. Representative American dramas, national and local; edited, with introductions, by Montrose J. Moses, rev. and brought up to date by Joseph Wood Krutch. Student's ed. Boston, Little, Brown, 1941. xvi, 1041 p.

41–26062 PS634.M6 1941

CONTENTS.—1894. A Texas steer, by Charles H. Hoyte.—1905. The girl of the golden West, by David Belasco.—1907. The witching hour, by Augustus Thomas.—1910. The city, by Clyde Fitch.—1910. The scarecrow, by Percy MacKaye.—1910. The piper, by Josephine Preston Peabody.—1911. Mrs. Bumpstead-Leigh, by Harry James Smith.—1914. It pays to advertise, by Roi Cooper Megrue and Walter Hackett.—1919. The famous Mrs. Fair, by James Forbes.—1920. The Emperor Jones, by Eugene O'Neill.—1921. Nice people, by Rachel Crothers.—1921. The detour, by Owen Davis.—1921. Dulcy, by George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly.—1923. The adding machine, by Elmer L. Rice.—1925. The show-off, by George Kelly.—1925. Lucky Sam McCarver, by Sidney Howard.—1927. The second man, by S. N. Behrman.—1928. Holiday, by Philip Barry.—1930. The green pastures, by Marc Connelly.—1935. Awake and sing, by Clifford Odets.—1936. The petrified forest, by Robert Emmet Sherwood.—1937. The masque of kings, by Maxwell Anderson.—Bibliographies, General references (p. 1013–1014).

2349. Pochmann, Henry A., and Gay Wilson Allen, eds. Masters of American literature. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 2 v. 49–6433 PS507.P6

A college textbook anthology which aims at presenting major authors and their outstanding works, as an introduction to American literature. The work accordingly presents copious selections from about 30 authors. Introductory essays, bibliographies, and footnotes are included to assist the student.

2350. Poets of today. New York, Scribner, 1954+ 54–10439 PS614.P64

CONTENTS.—[1] Poems and translations, by Harry Duncan. Samurai and serpent poems, by Murray Noss. Another animal, poems by May Swenson.—2. The hatch, poems, by Norma Farber. The irony of joy, poems by Robert Pack. Good news of death and other poems by Louis Simpson.—3. The floating world and other poems, by Lee Anderson. My father's business and other poems, by Spenser Brown. The green town: poems, by John Langland.

A series which, for purposes of publishing economies, incorporates in each volume the poems for a first volume by each of several young poets. The series is edited by John Hall Wheelock, who has written discriminating introductory essays for the volumes.

2351. Prize stories. The O. Henry awards. 1919+ Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday. 21–9372 PZ1.O11

Title varies: 1919–46, O. Henry Memorial Award Prize Stories.

Stories for 1919–27 were "chosen by the Society of Arts and Sciences."

Editors: 1919–32, B. C. Williams.—1933–40, Harry Hansen.—1941– Herschel Brickell (with Muriel Fuller, 19 –46).

An annual selection of leading American short stories of the preceding year. The 1956 volume was the 36th in the series. The series was interrupted in 1952 and 1953 as a result of the editor's death. Although this series and The Best American Short Stories . . . annuals (q. v.) both attempt to pick the best short stories published in American periodicals, there is little duplication in the stories included. Also, this series tends toward shorter volumes, partly because it does not offer an annual survey and bibliography of short stories. Both collections, however, maintain high standards of merit.

2352. Richardson, Lyon, N., George H. Orians, and Herbert R. Brown, eds. The heritage of American literature. Boston, Ginn, 1951. 2 v. 51–3922 PS507.R5

A college textbook which emphasizes major authors but gives some attention to minor figures; about one hundred and forty authors are represented. Sections, authors, and selections receive introductions designed to prepare students for classroom lectures; each author has a relatively extensive bibliography supplied.

2353. Short, Raymond W., and Wilbur S. Scott, eds. The main lines of American literature. New York, Holt, 1954. 648 p. 54–6620 PS507.S49

This college textbook anthology provides section and author introductions with some bibliographical information. The selections are designed to supplement full volume assignments of nine major authors who are not represented in this work. Available reprints of works by these omitted authors are listed in a pamphlet available to teachers from the publisher; the pamphlet also includes course syllabi.

2354. Tate, Allen, and John Peale Bishop, eds. American harvest; twenty years of creative writing in the United States. Garden City, N. Y., Garden City Pub. Co., 1943. 544 p. 45–2164 PS536.T3 1943

An anthology of literary works (mainly short stories and poems) produced in the United States during the twenties and thirties.

2355. Thorp, Willard, Merle Curti, and Carlos Baker, eds. American issues. Rev. and enl. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1954–55 [v. 1, 1955] 2 v. 55–5334 PS507.T53

CONTENTS.—v. 1. The social record.—v. 2. The literary record.

A college textbook anthology (in reality two anthologies), this is obviously more than a literary guide. The second volume, meant to be purely literary in the material presented, includes work from about seventy-five authors. The work of major authors is emphasized, while that of minor authors is included for representation of a type of writing. The first volume, on the other hand, is designed to present the records of the issues at work in American society during its history; nearly 200 authors (many of whom are included in volume two for other work) have selections presented in a manner designed to augment the purely belletristic approach to American literature. The usual scholarly apparatus is provided.

2356. Twentieth-century literature in America. Chicago, Regnery, 1951–52. 6 v.

2357. Bogan, Louise. Achievement in American poetry, 1900–1950. 1951. 157 p.
51–8384 PS221.B56

2358. Brodbeck, May, James Gray, and Walter Metzger. American non-fiction, 1900–1950. 1952. 198 p. 52–12468 PS379.B7

2359. Downer, Alan S. Fifty years of American drama, 1900–1950. 1951. 158 p.
51–13185 PS351.D6

2360. Hoffman, Frederick John. The modern novel in America, 1900–1950. 1951. 216 p.
51–13723 PS379.H6

2361. O'Connor, William Van. An age of criticism: 1900–1950. 1952. 182 p.
52–12476 PN99.U52O3

2362. West, Ray Benedict. The short story in America, 1900–1950. 1952. 147 p.
52–3551 PS374.S5M4

2363. Untermeyer, Louis, ed. Modern American poetry. Mid-century [i. e. 7th] ed. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. xxii, 709 p.
50–5229 PS611.U6 1950

A distinguished anthology of modern American poetry; the first edition appeared in 1919. Since then poets have been dropped and new ones added with each succeeding edition. The work attempts to represent the leading modern poets through a moderately large selection of their work; each poet's work is introduced by a concise half-page to eight pages of biographical information and critical discussion. Whitman and Dickinson (qq. v.) are included as precursors, and the cited 1950 edition includes recent work such as the poetry of Randall Jarrell, Peter Viereck, and Robert Lowell (qq. v.). The work has frequently been published with Untermeyer's comparable anthology of modern British poetry. The 1955 edition, Modern American & Modern British Poetry (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. 697 p.), which was edited with the assistance of Karl Shapiro and Richard Wilbur (qq. v.), is a much shorter work, and stripped of the biographical and critical introductions; however, it is still a good, if more restricted, work, and of value for its representation of very recent poets. With the many editions of this work, and with many other anthologies, such as An Anthology of the New England Poets from Colonial Times to the Present Day (New York, Random House, 1948. xx, 636 p.), Untermeyer (b. 1885) has come to be one of the best-known of American anthologists. His Early American Poets (New York, Library Publishers, 1952. 334 p.) covers American poetry to the point where his Modern American Poetry begins, but lacks similar individual introductions. Untermeyer also has a literary reputation in other fields, most notably in poetry. His Selected Poems and Parodies was published in 1935.

2364. Uppsala. Universitet. Amerikanska Seminariet. Essays and studies on American language and literature. Upsala, Lundequistska Bokhandeln; Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1945+

"The present series of Essays and Studies will be devoted to American philology in the wider sense. Occasionally, other subjects connected with American Humanities will be included. The series is intended to treat specialized as well as more comprehensive problems."—Publisher's statement on cover of number five.

Most of the volumes in the series to date have been published in both Sweden and the United States. In addition to the titles cited in full below, other works which have appeared in the series, or are said to be in preparation, include: R. C. Barton's The Change in Race Consciousness in American Negro Literature after 1930; F. Böök's Romantic Elements in Henry Thoreau; E. Ekwall's American and British Pronunciation; H. Elovson's The U. S. A. As a Symbol of Liberty in Swedish Literature in the Middle of the 19th Century; R. Engländer's Edward McDowell and Scandinavian Musical Tradition; G. Fridén's James Fenimore Cooper and Ossian; N. M. Holmer's The Character of the Iroquoian Languages and Indian Place Names in North America; S. Liljeblad's The Northern Shoshoni Indians; S. B. Liljegren's The Quality and Function of Anti-Intellectualism in American Romanticism and The Subject-Matter of American Literary Realism; and K. E. Lindblad's Noah Webster's Pronunciation and Modern New England Speech, a Comparison.

2365. Åhnebrink, Lars. The beginnings of naturalism in American fiction; a study of the works of Hamlin Garland, Stephen Crane, and Frank Norris, with special reference to some European influences, 1891–1903. 1950. 505 p. ([no.] 9)
50–8924 PS371.A2

Includes bibliographies.

2366. Ekström, Kjell. George Washington Cable, a study of his early life and work. 1950. 197 p. ([no.] 10) 51–6309 US1246.E4
Bibliography: p. [185]–193.

2367. Liljegren, Sten B. The revolt against romanticism in American literature as evidenced in the works of S. L. Clemens. 1945. 60 p. ([no.] 1) 47–24197 PS1342.R6L5
Bibliographical references included in "Notes" (p. 53–60).

2368. Lundblad, Jane. Nathaniel Hawthorne and European literary tradition. 1947. 196 p. ([no.] 6) 48–3460 PS1886.L8
"Hawthorne and the Tradition of Gothic Romance" (p. [81]–149) issued also separately, with slight variations, under title: Nathaniel Hawthorne and the Tradition of Gothic Romance (no. 4 in this series).
Bibliography: p. [191]–196.

2369. Warfel, Harry R., and George Harrison Orians, eds. American local-color stories. New York, American Book Co., 1941. xxiv, 846 p. 41–17552 PZ1.W23Am
A survey through short-story selections of the local color literary movement that flourished in the United States in the 19th century. This school placed primary emphasis on a local area, rather than on telling a story (although there usually was one), analyzing a person or situation, or presenting a thesis. The school relied heavily on dialect, landscape description, character types, etc. Most of the stories in this anthology were written after 1870, and the most recent in 1907. An attempt has been made to represent the various sections of the country in the 63 stories by 38 authors.

2370. White, Elwyn B., and Katharine S. White, eds. A subtreasury of American humor. New York, Coward-McCann, 1941. xxxii, 814 p. 41–52004 PN6161.W5223
This is a personal rather than a historical anthology of American humor. Within that limitation, its large quantity offers much variety, although mainly from modern authors. The work is available in a Modern Library reprint. Another such selection, but which shows a greater tendency to excise passages from longer works, is An Encyclopedia of Modern American Humor (Garden City, N. Y., Hanover House, Doubleday, 1954. 688 p.), edited by Bennett Cerf. A highly personal anthology with a tendency to rather long selections is H. Allen Smith's Desert Island Decameron (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1945. 406 p.). A humor anthology intended to serve historical purposes as well as general reading pleasures is Edwin Seaver's Pageant of American Humor (Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1948. 607 p.), which was compiled by means of responses to a questionnaire sent to several hundred writers. A collection that is more one of "jokes" than of the more general, and usually more literate, "humor" is Leewin B. Williams' Encyclopedia of Wit, Humor, and Wisdom (Nashville, Tenn., Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1949. 576 p.), which is an extensive, double-columned work arranged on a subject basis.

B. History and Criticism

2371. Aldridge, John W. After the lost generation; a critical study of the writers of two wars. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1951. xv, 263 p. 51–10588 PS379.A5
The author attempts to trace the change that has occurred between the novelists produced in the atmosphere of the First World War and those who developed in the shadow of World War II. In the first third of the book he discusses those authors (Hemingway, Fitzgerald, and Dos Passos) whom he considers to be "most illustrative of the artistic preoccupations of their age and whose work has had the most lasting influence on the young writers of today." The rest of the book is devoted to a study of the novelists who appeared in the forties: Vance Bourjaily, Norman Mailer, John Horne Burns, Irwin Shaw, Merle Miller, Gore Vidal, Paul Bowles, Truman Capote, Frederick Buechner, and others.

2372. Aldridge, John W., ed. Critiques and essays on modern fiction, 1920–1951, representing the achievement of modern American and British critics. New York, Ronald Press, 1952. xx, 610 p. 52–6180 PN3355.A8
"This book has been designed for use as a primary text in courses in the criticism of modern fiction, and as a collateral text in courses in the survey of modern fiction. . . . the governing intention of the book is that it should meet the needs . . . of serious students who are interested in fiction as an art rather than as a model, and who may be expected to be concerned with the element which most clearly distinguishes it as an art, its technique or form."—Introduction.

A considerable portion of the book is either criticism by Americans, or criticism about Americans. Authors discussed at some length include Faulkner, R. P. Warren, K. A. Porter, S. Crane, F. S. Fitzgerald, S. Anderson, T. Wolfe, T. Dreiser, J. T. Farrell, E. Hemingway, and E. Welty. There is added on p. 553–610 a sizable selective bibliography of criticism of modern fiction.

2373. Aldridge, John W. In search of heresy; American literature in an age of conformity. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1956. 208 p. 56–8166 PS221.A64

A discussion of American literature (fiction) after World War II. A heavy emphasis is laid on what the author regards as the pernicious influence of the universities—leading to conformity, camaraderie, and a limited, bland production.

2374. Arms, George W. The fields were green: a new view of Bryant, Whittier, Holmes, Lowell, and Longfellow; with a selection of their poems. Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1953. 246 p. 53–6445 PS541.A8

Bibliography: p. 238–241.

Each poet is discussed in terms of his value for the present-day reader. The selections included are usually not the standard anthology poems.

2375. Babbitt, Irving. Rousseau and romanticism. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1919. xxiii, 426 p. 19–26569 PN603.B3

Bibliography: p. [399]–419.

Babbitt (1865–1933) was one of the leaders of the neo-humanist movement. While his work was largely in comparative literature, his theories had influence in general American literary criticism. In this respect Rousseau and Romanticism was probably at once his most influential and his most important book. His other work includes Literature and the American College; Essays in Defense of the Humanities (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1908. 262 p.); The New Laokoon; an Essay on the Confusion of the Arts (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1910. 258 p.); Democracy and Leadership (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1924. 349 p.); and On Being Creative, and Other Essays (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1932. 265 p.). Irving Babbitt, Man and Teacher (New York, Putnam, 1941. 337 p.), edited by Frederick Manchester and Odell Shepard, is a collection of reminiscences about Babbitt by some 30 people who knew him. Louis J. A. Mercier's The Challenge of Humanism (New York, Oxford University Press, 1933. 288 p.) has much on the neo-humanist movement in general, and on both Babbitt and Paul Elmer More (q. v.) in particular. Of similar scope is Folke Leander's Humanism and Naturalism; a Comparative Study of Ernest Seillière, Irving Babbitt and Paul Elmer More (Göteborg, Elanders Boktryckeri Aktiebolag, 1937. 227 p.). The Critique of Humanism, a Symposium (New York, Brewer & Warren, 1930. 359 p.), edited by C. Hartley Grattan, is a collection of articles which demonstrate the position of humanism and the influence on American critics of both Babbitt and More. A general study is G. R. Elliott's Humanism and Imagination (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1938. 253 p.), the first section of which focuses on Babbitt and More, and the second on Emerson, with the two types of humanism shown in contrast.

2376. Beach, Joseph Warren. American fiction, 1920–1940. New York, Macmillan, 1941. 371 p. 41–6464 PS379.B38

Critical essays on John Dos Passos, Ernest Hemingway, William Faulkner, Thomas Wolfe, Erskine Caldwell, James T. Farrell, John P. Marquand, and John Steinbeck.

Beach (b. 1880) is best known as a critic; in addition to material in periodicals and the work cited above, he has published a study of Henry James (q. v.) and The Twentieth Century Novel; Studies in Technique (New York, Century, 1932. 569 p.), which devotes much space to American fiction. He is also known for his poetry; in this field his most recent volume is Involuntary Witness (New York, Macmillan, 1950. 97 p.). In 1930 he published a novel, Glass Mountain (Philadelphia, Macrae Smith Co. 330 p.) about American expatriates in France. Forms of Modern Fiction (Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1948. 305 p.), edited by William Van O'Connor, is a collection of essays in honor of Beach.

2377. Bretnor, Reginald, ed. Modern science fiction, its meaning and its future [by] John W. Campbell, Jr. [and others] New York, Coward-McCann, 1953. 294 p. 52–11714 PN3383.S4B7

A group of essays on the causes, meanings, and position of science fiction in the field of literature. A history of this form, which has in recent years undergone a phenomenal growth, may be found in James O. Bailey's Pilgrims through Space and Time; Trends and Patterns in Scientific and Utopian Fiction (New York, Argus Books, 1947. 341 p.). A book dealing with the audience for and the production of science fiction is Sam Moskowitz' The Immortal Storm; a History of Science Fiction Fandom (Atlanta, Atlanta Science Fiction Organization Press, 1954. 269 p.).

2378. Brooks, Cleanth. Modern poetry and the tradition. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1939. 253 p.
39-22007 PN1136.B75

CONTENTS.—Metaphor and the tradition.—Wit and high seriousness.—Metaphysical poetry and propaganda art.—Symbolist poetry and the ivory tower.—The modern poet and the tradition.—Frost, MacLeish, and Auden.—The waste land: critique of the myth.—Yeats: the poet as myth-maker.—A note on the death of Elizabethan tragedy.—Notes for a revised history of English poetry.

Brooks (b. 1906) has been one of the leaders in the "New Criticism" movement. His work, primarily in the field of poetry, is characterized by careful textual explication and structural analysis. In addition to his importance as a critic, he has had considerable influence on the teaching of literature through his college texts, such as Understanding Poetry (1938), Understanding Fiction (1943), and Modern Rhetoric (1949), works which he wrote in collaboration with Robert Penn Warren, and Understanding Drama (1945, 1948), which he co-authored with Robert B. Heilman.

2379. Brooks, Cleanth. The well wrought urn; studies in the structure of poetry. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1947. 270 p.
47-3143 PR502.B7

Reissued in 1956 in the Harvest books paperback series by Harcourt, Brace and Co.

2380. Brooks, Van Wyck. America's coming-of-age. New York, B. W. Huebsch, 1915. 183 p. 15-27963 E168.B8835

CONTENTS.—"Highbrow" and "lowbrow."—"Our poets."—The precipitant.—Apotheosis of the "lowbrow."—The Sargasso sea.

Brooks (b. 1886) has been one of the most widely read literary critics of the first half of the 20th century, outside the formal schools. He has done much work as a translator (from French) and as an editor, but is best known for the many books he has written, which include: Emerson and Others (New York, Dutton, 1927. 250 p.), the first half of which is on Emerson, the rest a series of essays on R. Bourne, A. Bierce, H. Melville, U. Sinclair, etc.; The Life of Emerson (New York, Dutton, 1932. 215 p.); Sketches in Criticism (New York, Dutton, 1932. 306 p.); The Ordeal of Mark Twain (New and rev. ed. New York, Dutton, 1933. 325 p.); Three Essays on America (New York, Dutton, 1934. 216 p.), the essays being "America's Coming of Age," "Letters and Leadership," and "The Literary Life in America"; Opinions of Oliver Allston (New York, Dutton, 1941. 309 p.), which indirectly expresses Brook's views on criticism; A Chilmark Miscellany (New York, Dutton, 1948. 315 p.), a selection from the author's other books; Scenes and Portraits; Memories of Childhood and Youth (New York, Dutton, 1954. 243 p.); and John Sloan, a Painter's Life (New York, Dutton, 1955. 246 p.).

2381. Brooks, Van Wyck. Makers and finders; a history of the writer in America, 1800–1915. New York, Dutton, 1936–52 [v. 1, 1944] 5 v.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. The world of Washington Irving [1800–1840] (PS208.B7 44-7345).—v. 2. The flowering of New England, 1815–1865 (PS243.B7 1936 36-27376).—v. 3. The times of Melville and Whitman [ca. 1847–1885] (PS201.B7 47-11390).—v. 4. New England: Indian summer, 1865–1915 (PS243.B72 1940 40-30493).—v. 5. The confident years: 1885–1915 (PS214.B7 51-14833).

The volumes in this series have been republished in Everyman's library.

2382. Brooks, Van Wyck. The writer in America. New York, Dutton, 1953. 203 p.
52-12957 PS31.B83

2383. Brown, Clarence A., comp. The achievement of American criticism; representative selections from three hundred years of American criticism. New York, Ronald Press, 1954. 724 p.
54-6962 PN99.U5B7

The selections, many in full, are assembled in categories such as the origins of American critical theory; neoclassicism, transition to romanticism; and realism and æstheticism. An anthology which attempts to present a cross section of the critical ideas and methods of various prominent and representative critics in the 20th century is Charles I. Glicksberg's American Literary Criticism, 1900–1950 (New York, Hendricks House, 1952. 574 p.). Another book undertaking "to make accessible the contemporary achievement in criticism," both American and British, is Robert Wooster Stallman's anthology: Critiques and Essays in Criticism, 1920–1948 (New York, Ronald Press, 1949. xxii, 571 p.).

2384. Brown, Herbert R. The sentimental novel in America, 1789–1860. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1940. 407 p. (Duke University publications) 41-135 PS377.B7

Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University.

Bibliography: p. 371–380.

A study of the popular novel in America up to the Civil War, showing the role it played in American life.

2385. Brownell, William Crary. American prose masters: Cooper—Hawthorne—Emerson—Poe—Lowell—Henry James. New York, Scribner, 1909. 400 p. 9–28257 PS362.B7

W. C. Brownell (1851–1928) was, with Woodberry and Stedman (qq. v.), considered one of the leading literary critics within the Genteel Tradition. However, he has also been viewed as a precursor of the New Humanism.

2386. Brownell, William Crary. William Crary Brownell, an anthology of his writings together with biographical notes and impressions of the later years, by Gertrude Hall Brownell. New York, Scribner, 1933. 383 p. 33–30961 PS1145.B6A6 1933

2387. Burke, Kenneth. Counter-statement. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1931. 268 p. 31–29768 PN511.B79

A group of statements of principles of literary aesthetics which counter prevailing views.

Works such as The White Oxen, and Other Stories (New York, Boni, 1924. 298 p.), Towards a Better Life (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1932. 219 p.), an experimental "novel," and Book of Moments; Poems, 1915–1954 (Los Altos, Calif., Hermes Publications, 1955. 96 p.) have given Kenneth Duva Burke (b. 1897) something of a reputation as an author of fiction and poetry. However, he is probably best known for his work as a literary critic. This has been heavily influenced by his interest in the modern semantics movement, as have been his probably less well known philosophical works such as Permanence and Change, an Anatomy of Purpose (New York, New Republic, 1935. 351 p.) and Attitudes Toward History (New York, New Republic, 1937. 2 v.).

2388. Burke, Kenneth. The philosophy of literary form; studies in symbolic action. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1941. 455 p. 41–11084 PN511.B795

A collection of articles, all of which have been previously published, except the first: "The Philosophy of Literary Form" (p. 1–137). Cf. Foreword. The problem of semantics is given considerable attention in this volume.

2389. Burke, Kenneth. A grammar of motives. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1945. xxiii, 530 p. 45–10249 B945.B773G7

This book is important for literary criticism, but its philosophical overtones and linguistic analyses render it important in other fields as well. It is the first volume of a trilogy on "motives" (vide infra).

2390. Burke, Kenneth. A rhetoric of motives. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1950. xv, 340 p. 50–5208 B840.B8

This, the second volume of an as yet uncompleted trilogy, analyzes literature and the human situation in terms of general semantics. Volume three is to have the title A Symbolic of Motives.

2391. Burke, William J., and Will D. Howe. American authors and books, 1640–1940. New York, Gramercy Pub. Co., 1943. 858 p. 43–1255 Z1224.B87 1943

"Facts about the writing, illustrating, editing, publishing, reviewing, collecting, selling, and preservation of American books . . . The material has been arranged in dictionary form, with cross-reference to related subjects. Bibliographical references for further study are given throughout the handbook."—Preface.

2392. Cady, Edwin H. The gentleman in America; a literary study in American culture. Syracuse, N. Y., Syracuse University Press, 1949. 232 p. 49–10671 BJ1601.C2

"What is attempted here is a study of the fate in America of the cluster of concepts, values, attitudes, and cultural forms implied by the word 'gentleman' as it is reflected in American literature. With that goes the effort to show how accurate criticism of certain interesting American authors depends upon a full reading of books which cannot be understood without a clear grasp of the gentlemanly configuration. Finally, it is hoped that something is here contributed toward a better understanding of the working relations among ideas, culture, and literature in America."—Introduction.

2393. The Cambridge history of American literature, edited by William Peterfield Trent, John Erskine, Stuart P. Sherman [and] Carl Van Doren. New York, Macmillan, 1931. 4 v. 38–36456 PS88.C3 1931

A pioneer comprehensive history of the subject. Special features are: The inclusive scale, expanded to cover subjects frequently neglected; monographic chapters contributed by scholars specializing in the topic being presented; the extensive bibliographies supplied (arranged by chapters, at the end of volumes 1, 2, and 4); and the emphasis on a relation between the life of the American people and their literature.

2394. Canby, Henry Seidel. Definitions; essays in contemporary criticism. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1922. 303 p. 22–16901 PS78.C3, 1st ser.

In his long career as English professor and editor,

Canby (b. 1878) has produced much literary criticism with a wide popularity. Like Van Wyck Brooks (q. v.), he flourished before the New Criticism became dominant, and has remained outside that movement. His many works include biographies of Whitman and Thoreau; a history of the Brandywine in the Rivers of America series (q. v.); and his autobiographical American Memoir (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. 433 p.) the first two parts of which, previously published independently as "The Age of Confidence," deal with his childhood in Wilmington, Delaware, while the third part, "Alma Mater," is a commentary on college life.

2395. Canby, Henry Seidel. Definitions; essays in contemporary criticism. (Second series) New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1924. 308 p.
24–22299 PS78.C3, 2d ser.

2396. Canby, Henry Seidel. American estimates. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1929. 287 p.
29–7862 PN511.C34
An informal continuation of the "definitions" series above.

2397. Canby, Henry Seidel. Classic Americans; a study of eminent American writers from Irving to Whitman, with an introductory survey of the colonial background of our national literature. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1931. 371 p.
31–25290 PS88.C35
"A selective bibliography": p. 353–360.
CONTENTS.—The colonial background.—Washington Irving.—James Fenimore Cooper.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.—Henry David Thoreau.—Hawthorne and Melville.—Edgar Allan Poe.—Walt Whitman.

2398. Canby, Henry Seidel. Seven years' harvest; notes on contemporary literature. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1936. 310 p.
36–28731 PN771.C3
All but one of these essays were published originally in the Saturday Review of Literature, a weekly periodical which Canby edited from 1924 to 1936.

2399. Cargill, Oscar. Intellectual America; ideas on the march. New York, Macmillan, 1941. xxi, 777 p. 41–21084 PS88.C37
Critical survey that undertakes to trace the effect of various European ideas on writers in America; concentrates chiefly on the period in American literature between 1890–1940.

2400. Carpenter, Frederic Ives. American literature and the dream. New York, Philosophical Library, 1955. 220 p. 56–193 PS88.C38
"This book began as a series of essays in interpretation of the major American authors. But in the process of writing, an idea crystallized: American literature has differed from English because of the constant and omnipresent influence of the American dream upon it. But this influence has usually been indirect and unconscious, because the dream has remained vague and undefined. . . . But the vague idea has influenced the plotting of our fiction and the imagining of our poetry. Almost by inadvertence our literature has accomplished a symbolic and experimental projection of it."—Introduction.

2401. Clark, Harry Hayden, ed. Transitions in American literary history; edited . . . for the American Literature Group of the Modern Language Association. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1953 [i. e. 1954] 479 p.
53–8269 PS88.C6
CONTENTS.—Introduction, by Harry Hayden Clark.—The decline of Puritanism, by Clarence H. Faust.—The late eighteenth century: an age of contradictions, by Leon Howard.—The decline of neoclassicism, 1801–1848, by M. F. Heiser.—The rise of romanticism, 1805–1855, by G. H. Orians.—The rise of Transcendentalism, 1815–1860, by Alexander Kern.—The decline of romantic idealism, 1855–1871, by Floyd Stovall.—The rise of realism, 1871–1891, by Robert Falk.

2402. Coan, Otis W., and Richard G. Lillard. America in fiction, an annotated list of novels that interpret aspects of life in the United States. 4th ed. Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1956. 200 p. 56–7269 Z1361.C6C6 1956
Includes best sellers as well as standard works. It is useful for its subject approach to aspects of American life as treated in novels. The emphasis is largely on realism rather than on literary merit.

2403. Coffman, Stanley K. Imagism, a chapter for the history of modern poetry. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1951. xi, 235 p.
51–9592 PS310.I5C6
Following a chronology of the Imagist movement in England and the United States, the book sketches the contributions of various important figures in the movement and also provides material on the sources of modern poetic forms.

2404. Conner, Frederick W. Cosmic optimism; a study of the interpretation of evolution by American poets from Emerson to Robinson. Gainesville, University of Florida Press, 1949. xiv, 458 p. 49–9861 PS310.E8C6
Bibliography: p. 433–442.

2405. Cowie, Alexander. The rise of the American novel. New York, American Book Co., 1951. xii, 877 p. (American literature series) 51-2714 PS371.C73 1951

Bibliography: p. 861-862.

Critical history of the novel from the beginning through the work of Henry James, with a final chapter on "new directions," 1890-1940.

2406. Cowley, Malcolm, ed. After the genteel tradition; American writers since 1910. New York, Norton, 1937. 270 p. 37-27387 PS221.C645

CONTENTS.—Foreword: The revolt against gentility.—Theodore Dreiser, by John Chamberlain.—Upton Sinclair, by Robert Cantwell.—Willa Cather, by Lionel Trilling.—Van Wyck Brooks, by Bernard Smith.—Carl Sandburg, by Newton Arvin.—Sherwood Anderson, by R. M. Lovett.—H. L. Mencken, by Louis Kronenberger.—Sinclair Lewis, by Robert Cantwell.—Eugene O'Neill, by Lionel Trilling.—The James Branch Cabell period, by P. M. Jack.—Two poets: Jeffers and Millay, by Hildegarde Flanner.—Dos Passos: poet against the world, by Malcolm Cowley.—Homage to Hemingway, by J. P. Bishop.—Thomas Wolfe, by Hamilton Basso.—Postscript: Twenty years of American literature.—A literary calendar: 1911-1930.—Biographies in brief.—Index of names.

Cowley (b. 1898) is in his own right a creative writer, but he is best known as a critic closely associated with the expatriate writers of the "lost generation." He has also done considerable work as an editor, including the volumes of writings by Faulkner, Hawthorne, and Hemingway in the Viking portable library series and The Complete Poetry and Prose of Walt Whitman for the American classics series.

2407. Cowley, Malcolm, ed. Books that changed our minds; edited by Malcolm Cowley & Bernard Smith. New York, Doubleday, Doran, 1939. 285 p. 39-29439 Z1003.C87

CONTENTS.—A foreword on the books that changed our minds.—Freud and "The interpretation of dreams," by George Soule.—"The education of Henry Adams," by Louis Kronenberger.—Turner's "The frontier in American history," by C. A. Beard.—Sumner's "Folkways," by John Chamberlain.—Veblen and "Business enterprise," by R. G. Tugwell.—Dewey and his "Studies in logical theory," by C. E. Ayres.—Boas and "The mind of primitive man," by Paul Radin.—Beard's "Economic interpretation of the Constitution," by Max Lerner.—Richard's "The principles of literary criticism," by David Daiches.—Parrington's "Main currents in American thought," by Bernard Smith.—Lenin's "The state and revolution," by Max Lerner.—Spengler's "The decline of the West," by Lewis Mumford.—An afterword on the modern mind.

2408. Cowley, Malcolm. Exile's return; a literary odyssey of the 1920's. New York, Viking Press, 1951. 322 p. 51-4022 PS221.C65 1951

A revised and enlarged version of a book that first appeared in 1934. The book deals with members of the "lost generation," particularly the expatriate authors.

2409. Cowley, Malcolm. The literary situation. New York, Viking Press, 1954. 259 p. 54-7984 PS221.C67

A discussion of the present-day situation of authors in America, and of the "new" fiction.

2410. Crane, Ronald S., ed. Critics and criticism, ancient and modern, by R. S. Crane [and others] Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1952. 647 p. 52-7330 PN81.C8

A collection of essays on critics which expresses the neo-Aristotelian views of the "Chicago school" of criticism.

2411. Criticism in America, its functions and status; essays by Irving Babbitt, Van Wyck Brooks, W. C. Brownell, Ernest Boyd, T. S. Eliot, H. L. Mencken, Stuart P. Sherman, J. E. Spingarn, and George E. Woodberry. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1924. 330 p. 24-3993 PS78.C7

"The first essay dates from 1910, the last from 1923, and virtually every critical point of view is given a hearing."—Prefatory note.

2412. Denny, Margaret, and William H. Gilman, eds. The American writer and the European tradition. Minneapolis, Published for the University of Rochester by the University of Minnesota Press, 1950. 192 p. 50-13091 PS157.D4

CONTENTS.—The Renaissance tradition in America, by Louis B. Wright.—The Enlightenment and the American dream, by Theodore Hornberger.—Benjamin Franklin, promoter of useful knowledge, by Robert E. Spiller.—Cosmopolitanism in American literature before 1880, by Stanley T. Williams.—Origins of a native American literary tradition, by Henry Nash Smith.—Americanization of the European heritage, by Leon Howard.—American writers as critics of nineteenth-century society, by Willard Thorp.—The reception of some nineteenth-century American authors in Europe, by Clarence Gohdes.—American naturalism; reflections from another era, by Alfred Kazin.—Contemporary American literature in its relation to ideas, by Lionel Trilling.—

The American poet in relation to science, by Norman Holmes Pearson.—Some European views of contemporary American literature, by Harry Levin.

2413. Deutsch, Babette. This modern poetry. New York, Norton, 1935. 284 p.
35–18099 PR601.D4

Babette Deutsch (b. 1895) has done much critical work on modern poetry, with articles appearing in a number of periodicals, and is the author of Walt Whitman, Builder for America (New York, Messner, 1941. 278 p.). In addition she has distinguished herself as a poet with volumes such as Banners (New York, Doran, 1919. 104 p.), Honey Out of the Rock (New York, Appleton, 1925. 129 p.), Fire for the Night (New York, Cape & Smith, 1930. 77 p.), Epistle to Prometheus (New York, Cape & Smith, 1931. 95 p.), One Part Love (New York, Oxford University Press, 1939. 86 p.), Take Them, Stranger (New York, Holt, 1944. 72 p.), and Animal, Vegetable, Mineral (New York, Dutton, 1954. 59 p.). Another aspect of her work in poetry is the large number of translations she has made from foreign poetry, principally from German and Russian and usually in collaboration with her husband, Avrahm Yarmolinsky. She has also published four novels: A Brittle Heaven (New York, Greenberg, 1926. 326 p.), which pictures a young woman's life in America, and in the character of Mark Gideon presents a view of Randolph Bourne (q. v.); In Such a Night (New York, Day, 1927. 260 p.), which depicts the guests at a housewarming party; Mask of Silenus, a Novel about Socrates (New York, Simon & Schuster, 1933. 249 p.); and Rogue's Legacy, a Novel about François Villon (New York, Coward-McCann, 1942. 392 p.).

2414. Deutsch, Babette. Poetry in our time. New York, Holt, 1952. 411 p.
52–6624 PR601.D43

A discussion of modern American and British poetry.

2415. De Voto, Bernard A. Forays and rebuttals. Boston, Little, Brown, 1936. 403 p.
36–28727 PS3507.E867F6 1936

A collection of magazine articles, some of which are literary criticism, but many of which reveal De Voto's more general journalistic activities. Similar in nature are Minority Report (Boston, Little, Brown, 1940. 346 p.) and The Easy Chair (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1955. 356 p.).

De Voto (1897–1956) is probably best known for his historical works (discussed elsewhere in this bibliography), but his widest audience was for his articles in periodicals, principally Harper's Magazine and, earlier, The Saturday Review of Literature. His first prominent literary role was that of a novelist, starting with The Crooked Mile (New York, Minton, Balch, 1924. 432 p.), which pictures life in a small western city. His next novel was The Chariot of Fire, an American Novel (New York, Macmillan, 1926. 356 p.), which presents a view of frenzied religion in a pioneering frontier community. His other novels include The House of Sun-Goes-Down (New York, Macmillan, 1928. 408 p.), which has for setting the opening of the West, but without the usual melodramatics and staging of "westerns"; We Accept With Pleasure (Boston, Little, Brown, 1934. 471 p.), which is about a group of Bostonian intellectuals in the post World War I period; and Mountain Time (Boston, Little, Brown, 1947. 357 p.), a psychological novel about a New York surgeon and an author's wife who find happiness and escape from neuroses in a city in the mountain west. In addition De Voto wrote mystery and espionage novels under the pseudonym of John August. The Hour (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1951. 84 p.) discusses, with a touch of humor, alcoholic beverages and the American tradition.

2416. De Voto, Bernard A. Mark Twain's America. Boston, Little, Brown, 1932. 353 p.
32–26989 PS1331.D4

Bibliography: p. [323]–334; "Newspaper humor of the Southwestern frontier": p. [335]–339.

A study of the contribution of frontier America to Mark Twain's writings. The work is by implication a discussion of a major series of factors in American literature. More specifically concerned with Mark Twain as creative artist is Mark Twain at Work (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1942. 144 p.).

2417. De Voto, Bernard A. The literary fallacy. Boston, Little, Brown, 1944. 175 p.
44–3169 PS221.D4

A discussion of an aspect of the literature of the "lost generation" and the twenties; in particular, it is an attack on some of the criticism of Van Wyck Brooks (q. v.) and its influence on some of the leading writers of the period.

2418. De Voto, Bernard A. The world of fiction. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1950. 299 p.
50–6694 PN3331.D4

A book on the production of fiction and the relationship between works of fiction and the reader.

2419. Duffey, Bernard I. The Chicago renaissance in American letters; a critical history. [East Lansing] Michigan State College Press, 1954. 285 p. 54–11828 PS285.C47D8

Deals principally with such authors as Henry Fuller, Hamlin Garland, Joseph Kirkland, Robert Herrick, Edgar Lee Masters, Sherwood Anderson, Carl Sandburg, and Vachel Lindsay. "By an inevitable if inexact usage, the continuous wave of literary activity in Chicago, beginning in the last decade of the nineteenth century and continuing through the first two decades of the twentieth, has come to be known as the Chicago renaissance. It was, of course, not a re-birth but the working out within the city of creative forces common to the nation at that time."—p. 6.

2420. Feidelson, Charles N. Symbolism and American literature. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1953. 355 p. 53–6890 PS201.F4

Bibliography: p. 220–227.

Discusses the theory and use of symbolism in American literature from the 17th century to the end of the 19th; emphasizes the works of Hawthorne, Whitman, Melville, and Poe, whom the author assesses as leading American symbolists.

2421. Fishman, Solomon. The disinherited of art; writer and background. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1953. xii, 178 p. (Perspectives in criticism, 2) 53–5797 PN85.F5

Written in the form of a series of related essays, the work is concerned with the ideas of American critics about the influence on American literature of the culture that produced it; considers major critical movements and conflicts in the United States since the time of the First World War; topics dealt with include literary nationalism, Marxism, agrarianism, and the "New Criticism." Wayne Shumaker's Elements of Critical Theory (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1952. 131 p.), the first volume in the Perspectives in criticism series, is a more general book dealing with the theory of criticism.

2422. Foerster, Norman. Nature in American literature; studies in the modern view of nature. New York, Macmillan, 1923. 324 p. 23–5206 PS163.F6

A study of the observations of nature reflected in the work of writers during the 19th and early 20th centuries. It includes material on Bryant, Whittier, Emerson, Thoreau, Lowell, Whitman, Lanier, Muir, and Burroughs.

Foerster (b. 1887) is one of the leading neohumanists. He has done much original and editorial work in the fields of literature and education in the humanities.

2423. Foerster, Norman. American criticism; a study in literary theory from Poe to the present. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1928. xvi, 273 p. 28–13812 PS62.F6

Contents.— Poe.— Emerson.— Lowell.— Whitman.—The twentieth century: conclusion.

2424. Foerster, Norman, ed. The reinterpretation of American literature; some contributions toward the understanding of its historical development, edited . . . for the American Literature Group of the Modern Language Association. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1928. 271 p. 28–25395 PS88.F6

Contents.—A call for a literary historian, by Fred Lewis Pattee.—Factors in American literary history, by Norman Foerster.—The frontier, by Jay B. Hubbell.—The European background, by Howard Mumford Jones.—The Puritan tradition, by Kenneth B. Murdock.—The romantic movement, by Paul Kaufman.—The development of realism, by Vernon Louis Parrington.—American history and American literary history, by A. M. Schlesinger.—American literary history and American literature, by Harry Hayden Clark.—Appendix A. Select bibliography, by Gregory Paine (p. 217–236).—Appendix B. List of dissertations and articles, and of Americana in libraries, by Ernest E. Leisy (p. 237–271).

2425. Foerster, Norman, ed. Humanism and America; essays on the outlook of modern civilisation. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1930. xvii, 294 p. 30–6560 B821.F6

"A list of books": p. 291–294.

Contents.—Preface, by Norman Foerster.—The pretensions of science, by Louis Trenchard More.—Humanism: an essay at definition, by Irving Babbitt.—The humility of common sense, by Paul Elmer More.—The pride of modernity, by G. R. Elliott.—Religion without humanism, by T. S. Eliot.—The plight of our arts, by Frank Jewett Mather, Jr.—The dilemma of modern tragedy, by Alan Reynolds Thompson.—An American tragedy, by Robert Shafer.—Pandora's box in American fiction, by Harry Hayden Clark.—Dionysus in dismay, by Stanley P. Chase.—Our critical spokesmen, by Gorham B. Munson.—Behaviour and continuity, by Bernard Bandler II.—The well of discipline, by Sherlock B. Gass.—Courage and education, by Richard Lindley Brown.

2426. Frankenberg, Lloyd. Pleasure dome: on reading modern poetry. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1949. 372 p. 49–50103 PS324.F7

The author's purpose is "to give clues to the relationships between sound and meaning in the poems of living poets," with major attention to T. S. Eliot, Marianne Moore, E. E. Cummings, and Wallace

Stevens to illustrate the variety of modern poetry, and with short statements on Ezra Pound, W. C. Williams, Ogden Nash, W. H. Auden, Robert Lowell, and Elizabeth Bishop.

2427. Frohock, Wilbur M. The novel of violence in America, 1920–1950. Dallas, Southern Methodist University, 1950. 216 p.
50–8028 PS379.F7

The thesis is that during the period under discussion the stream of American fiction bifurcated into two major streams, one carrying the theme of the passing of time, and the other that of violence. From this point of view the author discusses Dos Passos, T. Wolfe, Farrell, Cain, Faulkner, Caldwell, Steinbeck, and Hemingway.

2428. Geismar, Maxwell D. Writers in crisis; the American novel between two wars. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1942. 299 p. [His The novel in America]
42–15988 PS379.G4

CONTENTS.—Ring Lardner.—Ernest Hemingway.—John Dos Passos.—William Faulkner.—Thomas Wolfe.—John Steinbeck.

This is the first volume of a series entitled The novel in America.

2429. Geismar, Maxwell D. The last of the provincials; the American novel, 1915–1925. H. L. Mencken, Sinclair Lewis, Willa Cather, Sherwood Anderson, F. Scott Fitzgerald. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. 404 p. [His The novel in America]
47–11777 PS379.G36

2430. Geismar, Maxwell D. Rebels and ancestors; the American novel, 1890–1915: Frank Norris, Stephen Crane, Jack London, Ellen Glasgow [and] Theodore Dreiser. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1953. 435 p. [His The novel in America]
53–5730 PS379.G38

2431. Gelfant, Blanche H. The American city novel. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. 289 p.
54–5936 PS374.C5G4

A study of the metropolis in 20th-century American fiction.

2432. Gohdes, Clarence L. F. American literature in nineteenth-century England. New York, Columbia University Press, 1944. 191 p.
A44–1777 PS201.G6

Using illustrations from the post-1832 period, the author has written with the purpose of demonstrating that the English people displayed a wide interest in American literature during the 19th century. The author has also written The Periodicals of American Transcendentalism (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1931. 264 p.).

2433. Hart, James D. The Oxford companion to American literature. 3d ed. [rev. and enl.] New York, Oxford University Press, 1956. 890 p.
56–6557 PS21.H3 1956

A reference work in dictionary form. It contains entries on all types of matters pertaining to the written word in America. Entries may be found for authors, titles, movements, magazines, awards, groups, and individuals mentioned in literature, etc.

2434. Hart, James D. The popular book; a history of America's literary taste. New York, Oxford University Press, 1950. 351 p.
50–9417 Z1003.H328

"This study . . . examines the tastes that have guided Americans in selecting their popular reading over the past three centuries. Dealing with taste in relation to social compulsions, this inquiry is concerned with the connection between popular books read for pleasure by adult Americans and the times in which those books were read."—Postscript.

2435. Haycraft, Howard, ed. The art of the mystery story; a collection of critical essays, edited, and with a commentary, by Howard Haycraft. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1946. 545 p.
47–30017 PN3448.D4H28

"Putting crime on the shelf; for bibliophiles, bibliographers, and—readers": p. [451]–507.

2436. Haycraft, Howard. Murder for pleasure; the life and times of the detective story. New York, Appleton-Century, 1941. 409 p.
41–16907 PN3448.D4H3

"Who's who in detection": p. 340–386.

"Some reading about the detective story": p. 279–297. "A detective story bookshelf": p. 298–311.

A history of the detective story, starting with Edgar Allan Poe. This form of popular fiction originated and flourished in America, whence it spread to many other parts of the world. A history in the form of a bibliography with commentary is Queen's Quorum; a History of the Detective-Crime Short Story as Revealed by the 106 Most Important Books Published in This Field since 1845 (Boston, Little, Brown, 1951. 132 p.) by "Ellery Queen," the pseudonym of a pair of mystery writers who have published much of the highly popular work in this field. An analysis of the form and content basic to this type of fiction may be found in Marie F. Rodell's Mystery Fiction: Theory and Technique (New York, Hermitage House, 1952. 230 p.), which was written as a handbook for writers in this field.

2437. Hazard, Lucy Lockwood. The frontier in American literature. New York, Crowell, 1927. xx, 308 p. 27-2200 PS169.F7H3

"General bibliography": p. 301–304; bibliography at end of each chapter.

Based on F. J. Turner's thesis in The Significance of the Frontier in American History (q. v.), this work undertakes to trace the influence on American literature as conceived in a very broad sense. The first chapter is "The Puritan Frontier," and the last is "The Coming Age of Spiritual Pioneering."

2438. Herron, Ima Honaker. The small town in American literature. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1939. 477 p.

39–11443 PS169.S5H4 1935

"Check-list for the town in early literature": p. [433]–434. "Selected bibliography": p. [439]-468.

2439. Hicks, Granville. The great tradition; an interpretation of American literature since the Civil War. Rev. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1935. xv, 341 p. 36-27042 PS214.H5 1935

Bibliography: p. 331–336.

Marxian standards applied to 19th- and 20th-century literature in America. The first edition (1933) was later enlarged by a chapter on new proletarian writers. Since then the author has modified his extreme views. The work retains historical importance, however, both because of its influence and because it reflects the views of a once sizable trend in literary study.

2440. Hoffman, Frederick J. The twenties; American writing in the postwar decade. New York, Viking Press, 1955. 466 p.

55–7379 PS221.H58

Bibliography: p. 431–434.

Preoccupations, modes of thought, and attitudes in the United States, viewed from the perspective provided by American literature, roughly from 1918 to 1932, for the purpose of realizing the major issues of the times. Hoffman is also the author of Freudianism and the Literary Mind (Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1945. 346 p.), which does not limit its scope to American authors, but which does discuss a movement of major importance for contemporary American literature.

2441. Horton, Rod W., and Herbert W. Edwards. Backgrounds of American literary thought. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1952. 425 p. (Appleton-Century handbooks of literature)

52–12730 PS88.H6

A book which discusses American literature in terms of the milieu in which it was produced. The authors attempt to show that "Idealism and Opportunity have constantly been the principal dynamics of American civilization." Because of its condensed nature, few authors are discussed in detail; the organization is in terms of movements, such as Puritanism, Expansionism, Freudianism, Marxism, etc.

2442. Hubbell, Jay Broadus. The South in American literature, 1607–1900. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1954. xix, 987 p.

54–9434 PS261.H78

In scope and detail by far the most comprehensive work on the subject, being based on nearly 20 years of research. In his Foreword the author emphasizes the following objectives of the work: It aims to integrate the literature of the Southern states with that of the rest of the Nation; discusses Southern life as it is represented by writers from other sections; suggests the pattern of literary culture in the South and the books read by Southerners; devotes proportionately more space to narrative and exposition, particularly in connection with biographical information, than to criticism. A special feature is the critical bibliographical essay (p. 881–974), which also includes bibliographical references to facilitate the study of individual authors. A symposium of 29 essays dealing with modern Southern literature is Southern Renaissance: The Literature of the Modern South (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1953. 450 p.), edited by Louis D. Rubin and Robert D. Jacobs; most of the essays appeared originally in The Hopkins Review.

2443. Hyman, Stanley Edgar. The armed vision; a study in the methods of modern literary criticism. New York, Knopf, 1948. 417 p.

48–6970 PN94.H9

A study of modern critical methods as exemplified by a selected group of literary critics. The sources of the techniques are also studied, and possibilities for an integrative system of the best aspects examined. Critics studied include Edmund Wilson, Yvor Winters, T. S. Eliot, Van Wyck Brooks, Constance Rourke, R. P. Blackmur, and Kenneth Burke.

2444. Johannsen, Albert. The House of Beadle and Adams and its dime and nickel novels; the story of a vanished literature. With a foreword by John T. McIntyre. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1950. 2 v. illus.

50–8158 Z1231.F4J68

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 328–338.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. A history of the firm. Numerical lists of the various series of Beadle novels.—v. 2. The authors and their novels. Appendix.

2445. Jones, Howard Mumford. Ideas in America. Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1944. 304 p. A44–1981 PS121.J6

A study of the historical role of ideas in America, particularly in the field of literature. Prof. Jones (b. 1892) is a leading scholar in the field of American intellectual history and literature. He has written and edited a number of books in these fields, notably his America and French Culture, 1750–1848 (q. v.).

2446. Jones, Howard Mumford. The theory of American literature. Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1948. 208 p. (Cornell University. Messenger lectures on the evolution of civilization, 1947) 48–11948 PS31.J6

A survey of historical and critical attitudes toward American literature in the 19th and 20th centuries.

2447. Jones, Howard Mumford. Guide to American literature and its backgrounds since 1890. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 151 p. 53–9039 Z1225.J65

Part I comprises a list of monographic studies and of critical journals, designed to enable the student better to understand the social and economic backgrounds of literature. Part II includes a classified guide to works in American literature that are thought to have contributed to shaping the American mind.

2448. Kazin, Alfred. On native grounds, an interpretation of modern American prose literature. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1942. 541 p. 42–24811 PS379.K3

Believing that "Our modern literature in America is at bottom only the expression of our modern life in America," the author seeks to establish that relationship historically in three periods: 1890–1917, 1918–1929, and 1930–1940. In 1956 a somewhat abridged version with an appendix covering post-1940 writing was published in the Doubleday Anchor books series.

2449. Kazin, Alfred. The inmost leaf; a selection of essays. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. 273 p. 55–10810 PN511.K25

A group of 28 essays on literary figures and subjects. While there is a wide range of European and American topics, the emphasis is on the 19th century.

2450. Knight, Grant C. The critical period in American literature. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1951. xi, 208 p. 51–13564 PS214.K6

Bibliography: p. 177–194.

2451. Knight, Grant C. The strenuous age in American literature. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1954. xi, 270 p. 54–13124 PS221.K6

Bibliography: p. [231]–253.

The first of the books described in the two foregoing references covers 1890 to 1900; the second, its sequel, continues the examination through the years 1900–1910. The same approach is used in each, by giving literature a position in the social panorama and attempting to integrate literature with the social history of the time, in order that glimpses may be caught of other art forms, of politics, of philosophy, and of science. Cf. Foreword of The Strenuous Age, p. viii.

2452. Krieger, Murray. The new apologists for poetry. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1956. 225 p. 56–7811 PN1031.K7

A discussion of some of the new critics as they throw light on some of the problems of poetry. The three main sections of the book are "The Creative Process," "The Aesthetic Object," and "The Function of Poetry."

2453. Krutch, Joseph Wood. Experience and art; some aspects of the aesthetics of literature. New York, Smith & Haas, 1932. 222 p. 32–32159 PN45.K7

Krutch (b. 1893) has become prominent as a writer in a number of fields. His books on American literature include Edgar Allan Poe, a Study in Genius (New York, Knopf, 1926. 244 p.) and Henry David Thoreau (New York, Sloane, 1948. 298 p.). In a more philosophical vein are The Modern Temper; a Study and a Confession (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1929. 249 p.) and The Measure of Man: On Freedom, Human Values, Survival, and the Modern Temper (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1954. 261 p.). Krutch has also distinguished himself in the field of nature writing: The Best of Two Worlds (New York, Sloane, 1953. 171 p.) is an autobiographical work on his life as an urbanite who can spend most of his time in the country; The Desert Year (New York, Sloane, 1952. 270 p.) and The Voice of the Desert, a Naturalist's Interpretation (New York, Sloane, 1955. 223 p.) both record his observations of life in the Sonoran desert. In the same general field he has edited an anthology, Great American Nature Writing (New York, Sloane, 1950. 444 p.).

2454. Kunitz, Stanley J., and Howard Haycraft, eds. American authors, 1600–1900; a biographical dictionary of American literature . . . 1300 biographies and 400 portraits. New York, Wilson, 1938. 846 p. 38–27938 PS21.K8

Each biographical sketch, which emphasizes the individual's literary life, is followed by a brief bibliography. The work is especially useful for information about minor authors, although major authors are also discussed.

2455. Kunitz, Stanley J., and Howard Haycraft, eds. Twentieth century authors, a biographical dictionary of modern literature. With 1850 biographies and 1700 ports. New York, Wilson, 1942. 1577 p. (The Authors series)
43–51003 PN771.K86

"Supersedes . . . Living Authors (1931) and Authors Today and Yesterday (1933)."

——— ——— First supplement. Assistant ed.: Vineta Colby. New York, Wilson, 1955. 1123 p. ports. (The Authors series) PN771.K86s

These volumes are organized on the same principles as the above American Authors, 1600–1900. However, in these the scope is international. Nevertheless, the emphasis is very heavily on American authors, for the writers have been selected for inclusion on the basis of the influence or popularity of their books in America.

2456. Lawrence, David Herbert. Studies in classic American literature. New York, Seltzer, 1923. 264 p. 23–12810 PS121.L3

CONTENTS.—Foreword.—The spirit of place.—Benjamin Franklin.—Hector St. John de Crèvecoeur.—Fenimore Cooper's white novels.—Fenimore Cooper's Leatherstocking novels.—Edgar Allan Poe.—Nathaniel Hawthorne and "The scarlet letter."—Hawthorne's "Blithedale romance."—Dana's "Two years before the mast."—Herman Melville's "Typee" and "Omoo."—Herman Melville's "Moby Dick."—Whitman.

D. H. Lawrence (1885–1930) is best-known as a British novelist. His temporary residence in America led him to examine its "classical" literature in an attempt to reveal the American spirit. His resultant book presented ideas which are highly controversial and have been rejected in large part by most critics of American culture. Nevertheless, the book has been widely read and discussed, so that it has taken a historically important position in the criticism of this country's literature.

2457. Leary, Lewis G. Articles on American literature, 1900–1950. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1954. 437 p.
54–5025 Z1225.L49

A selective rather than an exhaustive bibliography, this is composed primarily of references to articles listed in "Articles on American Literature Appearing in Current Periodicals" in American Literature and "American Bibliography" in PMLA (qq. v.). Also, separate bibliographies of authors have been consulted when available. The main body of the work is arranged alphabetically by names of authors, followed by references to critical articles and reviews; there is also a subject bibliography of writings on American literature under topics such as "Diaries and Letters," "Literary History," and "Regionalism." The book is an extension and revision of a similarly titled book which was published in 1947 and covered the period 1920–1945.

2458. Leisy, Ernest E. The American historical novel. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1950. 280 p. 50–5331 PS374.H5L4

An examination of historical fiction by and about Americans. The arrangement is basically by subject. On p. 219–259 there is an appendix listing additional historical novels not discussed in the text of the book.

2459. Lewis, Richard W. B. The American Adam; innocence, tragedy, and tradition in the nineteenth century. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1955. 204 p. 55–5133 PS201.L4

"This book has to do with the beginnings and the first tentative outlines of a native American mythology. The period I cover runs from about 1820 to 1860; the scene, for the most part, is New England and the Atlantic seaboard. . . . I am interested . . . in the history of ideas and, especially, in the representative imagery and anecdote that crystallized whole clusters of ideas; my interest is therefore limited to articulate thinkers and conscious artists. A century ago, the image contrived to embody the most fruitful contemporary ideas was that of the authentic American as a figure of heroic innocence and vast potential—it is, poised at the start of a new history. This image is the title of the book."—Prologue.

2460. Literary history of the United States. Editors: Robert E. Spiller, Willard Thorp, Thomas H. Johnson [and] Henry Seidel Canby; associates: Howard Mumford Jones, Dixon Wecter [and] Stanley Williams. New York, Macmillan, 1948. 3 v. 48–11370 PS88.L5

A comprehensive, standard history of American literature from the colonial period to 1948. The third volume is a collection of bibliographies, with sections on "Literature and Culture," "Movements and Influences," and "Individual Authors." The role this work has played in limiting entries in the Literature section of the bibliography is explained in the introduction to that section (q. v.).

2461. ——— Rev. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1953. xxii, 1456 p.
53-13350 PS88.L5 1953

The text is much the same as in the earlier edition, except that a "Postscript at Mid-Century" has been added. On the other hand, in this edition the bibliography is greatly abridged for the lay reader rather than for the scholar.

2462. Long, Orie William. Literary pioneers; early American explorers of European culture. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1935. 267 p. 35-18097 PS201.L6

This book studies specifically George Ticknor (1791–1871), Edward Everett (1794–1865), Joseph Green Cogswell (1786–1871), George Bancroft (1800–1891), Henry Wadsworth Longfellow (1807–1882), and John Lothrop Motley (1814–1877). "The purpose of this volume is to record the many interesting relationships which these internationally minded men experienced in Europe, especially in Germany, and to show the part which they played afterwards in the advancement of American life. The revelation is found principally in their journals and correspondence, which furnish many parallels of impressions."

2463. Loshe, Lillie Deming. The early American novel. New York, 1907. 131 p.
8-34695 PS375.L6 1907

Thesis (Ph. D.)—Columbia University, 1907.

Published also as Columbia University studies in English, ser. 2, v. 2, no. 2.

The bibliography (p. 106–124) presents chronologically American novels that appeared through 1830.

2464. Lynn, Kenneth S. The dream of success; a study of the modern American imagination. Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. 269 p.
55-7459 PS379.L9

A study of the impact of the success myth on five American novelists: Theodore Dreiser, Jack London, David Graham Phillips, Frank Norris, and Robert Herrick.

2465. Marble, Annie (Russell) Heralds of American literature; a group of patriot writers of the revolutionary and national periods. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1907. 383 p.
7-39037 PS186.M3

Contents.—1. Introductory: Signs of the dawn. The impulse of Franklin.—2. Francis Hopkinson.—3. Philip Freneau: America's first poet.—4. John Trumbull: satirist and scholar.—5. A group of Hartford wits.—6. Joseph Dennie: "the lay preacher."—7. William Dunlap: the beginnings of drama.—8. Charles Brockden Brown.—Bibliography (p. [319]–353).—Index.

2466. Matthews, Brander. Aspects of fiction and other ventures in criticism. 3d ed., enl. New York, Scribner, 1902. 297 p.
2-21574 PN3335.M3 1902

Partial Contents.—American literature.—Two studies of the South.—The penalty of humor.—On pleasing the taste of the public.—On certain parallelisms between the ancient drama and the modern.—The importance of the folk-theatre.—Aspects of fiction: The prose tales of M. François Coppée; . . . Mr. Charles Dudley Warner as a writer of fiction.

In the late 19th and early 20th centuries James Brander Matthews (1852–1929) was not only a professor of drama at Columbia University, but one of the foremost students and critics of the subject. His outstanding study, Molière (1910), exemplifies his international interests. His interest in linguistics is revealed in works such as Americanisms and Briticisms (New York, Harper, 1892. 190 p.), Parts of Speech; Essays on English (New York, Scribner, 1901. 350 p.), and Essays on English (New York, Scribner, 1921. 284 p.). In his own lifetime he had a measure of fame as a short-story writer and as a novelist, but now receives attention as an author of fiction only for his depiction of New York life in sketches such as Vistas of New York (New York, Harper, 1912. 242 p.) and Vignettes of Manhattan: Outlines in Local Color (New York, Scribner, 1921. 376 p.). He is remembered mainly for his work in the field of the drama.

2467. Matthews, Brander. Recreations of an anthologist. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1904. 228 p. 4-22261 PS2372.R4 1904

Contents.—By way of introduction.—A theme, with variations.—Unwritten books.—Seed-corn for stories.—American satires in verse.—American epigrams.—A note on the quatrain.—Carols of cookery.—Recipes in rhyme.—The uncollected poems of H. C. Bunner.—The strangest feat of modern magic.

2468. Matthews, Brander. Inquiries and opinions. New York, Scribner, 1907. 305 p.
7-29534 PS2372.I5 1907

Partial Contents.—Literature in the new century.—The supreme leaders.—An apology for technic.—Old friends with new faces.—Invention and imagination.—Poe and the detective-story.—Mark Twain. The modern novel and the modern play.—The literary merit of our latter-day drama.—The art of the stage-manager.

2469. Matthews, Brander. The American of the future, and other essays. New York, Scribner, 1909. 355 p. 9–26987 PS2372.A4 1909

CONTENTS.—The American of the future.—American character.—The Americans and the British.—"Blood is thicker than water."—The scream of the spread-eagle.—American manners.—American humor.—The speech of the people.—English as a world-language.—Simplified spelling and "fonetic reform."—The question of the theater.—Persuasion and controversy.—Reform and reformers.—"Those literary fellows."—Standards of success.

2470. Matthews, Brander. A study of the drama. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1910. 320 p. illus. 10–7803 PN1661.M3

2471. Matthews, Brander. Gateways to literature, and other essays. New York, Scribner, 1912. 296 p. 12–21990 PR99.M33

CONTENTS.—Gateways to literature.—The economic interpretation of literary history.—In behalf of the general reader.—The duty of imitation.—The Devil's advocate.—Literary criticism and book-reviewing.—Familiar verse.—French poets and English readers.—A note on Anatole France.—Poe's cosmopolitan fame.—Fenimore Cooper.—Bronson Howard.

2472. Matthews, Brander. A book about the theater. New York, Scribner, 1916. 334 p. illus. 16–21742 PN2037.M35

CONTENTS.—The show business.—The limitations of the stage.—A moral from a toy theater.—Why five acts?—Dramatic collaboration.—The dramatization of novels and the novelization of plays.—Woman dramatists.—The evolution of scene-painting.—The book of the opera.—The poetry of the dance.—The principles of pantomime.—The ideal of the acrobat.—The decline and fall of the Negro-minstrelsy.—The utility of the variety-show.—The method of modern magic.—The lamentable tragedy of Punch and Judy.—The puppet-play, past and present.—Shadow-pantomime, with all the modern improvements.—The problem of dramatic criticism.

2473. Matthews, Brander. These many years, recollections of a New Yorker. New York, Scribner, 1917. 463 p. 17–25853 PS2373.A45 1917

An autobiographical work that reveals much of the literary world of the period, particularly drama. It is also useful for its picture of the life of a cultured, urban American.

2474. Matthews, Brander. The tocsin of revolt, and other essays. New York, Scribner, 1922. 295 p. 22–18663 PS2372.T6 1922

CONTENTS.—The tocsin of revolt.—The duty of the intellectuals.—The dwelling of a day-dream.—What is American literature?—The centenary of a question.—American aphorisms.—A plea for the platitude.—On the length of Cleopatra's nose.—Concerning conversation.—The gentle art of repartee.—Cosmopolitan cookery.—On working too much and working too fast.—The modernity of Molière.—Theodore Roosevelt as a man of letters.—Memories of Mark Twain.

2475. Matthews, Brander. Rip Van Winkle goes to the play, and other essays on plays and players. New York, Scribner, 1926. 256 p. 26–16526 PN1655.M25

CONTENTS.—Rip Van Winkle goes to the play.—Uncle Sam, exporter of plays.—What is a "well-made" play?—The question of the soliloquy.—On the right of an author to repeat himself.—Second-hand situations.—Claptrap.—The scene is laid.—The development of scenic devices.—Memories of actresses.—The art of acting.

2476. Matthiessen, Francis O. American renaissance; art and expression in the age of Emerson and Whitman. New York, Oxford University Press, 1941. xxiv, 678 p. 41–9633 PS201.M3

A philosophical interpretation of intellectual and literary elements in the American tradition as exemplified by Emerson, Thoreau, Hawthorne, Melville, Whitman, and their associates.

F. O. Matthiessen (1902–1950) early established himself as one of the leading commentators on American literature with such works as Sarah Orne Jewett (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1929. 159 p.), The Achievement of T. S. Eliot; an Essay on the Nature of Poetry (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1935. 159 p.), Henry James, the Major Phase (New York, Oxford University Press, 1944. 190 p.), The James Family, Including Selections from the Writings of Henry James, Senior, William, Henry & Alice James (New York, Knopf, 1947. 706 p.), and Theodore Dreiser (New York, Sloane, 1951. 267 p.).

2477. Matthiessen, Francis O. The responsibilities of the critic; essays and reviews. Selected by John Rackliffe. New York, Oxford University Press, 1952. xvi, 282 p. 52–12569 PS121.M3

A posthumous selection of fifty of his articles, originally published in various periodicals. The arrangement is more by subject (in broad categories such as modern poetry and literary critics and historians), rather than chronological.

2478. Miller, Perry. The raven and the whale; the war of words and wits in the era of Poe and Melville. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1956. 370 p. 56-6659 PS74.M5

A presentation of the conflict between the nationalists and the cosmopolitanites that centered in New York's literary circles during the middle of the 19th century.

2479. More, Paul Elmer. Shelburne essays. 1st series. New York, Putnam, 1904. 253 p. 4-22974 PR99.M7, v. 1

"All but one of these essays were written for magazines or for the daily press."

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—A hermit's notes on Thoreau.—The solitude of Nathaniel Hawthorne.—The origins of Hawthorne and Poe.—The influence of Emerson.—The science of English verse.—The religious ground of humanitarianism.

Paul Elmer More (1864-1937) was with Irving Babbitt (q. v.) one of the leaders of the new humanists. Between 1904 and 1921 he published eleven series of "Shelburne essays." These revealed his international interests and his university studies in the classics. Among the discussions of More is Robert Shafer's Paul Elmer More and American Criticism (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1935. 325 p.).

2480. More, Paul Elmer. A New England group and others; Shelburne essays, 11th series. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1921. 295 p. 21-5556 PR99.M7, v. 11

CONTENTS.—The spirit and poetry of early New England.—Jonathan Edwards.—Emerson.—Charles Eliot Norton.—Henry Adams.—Evolution and the other world. Samuel Butler of Erewhon.—Viscount Morley.—Economic ideals.—Oxford, women, and God.—Index to Shelburne essays.

2481. More, Paul Elmer. Selected Shelburne essays. New York, Oxford University Press, 1935. xiii, 297 p. (The World's classics, 434) 35-20684 PR99.M75

"The material here reprinted is selected from the eleven volumes of 'Shelburne essays' published between 1904-1921 . . . With the exception of the study of Criticism the essays follow the chronological order of publication, and, save for a few minor corrections, the original text is reproduced exactly."—Preface.

CONTENTS.—Criticism.—Lafcadio Hearn.—Christina Rossetti.—The Greek anthology.—George Gissing. — Thoreau's journal. — Chesterfield. — Sir Thomas Browne.—Shelley.—Thomas Henry Huxley.—Jonathan Edwards.—Viscount Morley.—Oxford, women, and God.

2482. Mott, Frank Luther. Golden multitudes; the story of best sellers in the United States. New York, Macmillan, 1947. 357 p. 47-11742 Z1033.B3M6

Other works on best sellers include James David Hart's The Popular Book; a History of America's Literary Taste (New York, Oxford University Press, 1950. 351 p.) and Alice Payne Hackett's Fifty Years of Best Sellers, 1895-1945 (New York, Bowker, 1945. 140 p.), a bibliographical work which was followed by a supplement: Seven Years of Best Sellers, 1945-1951 (New York, Bowker, 1952, 23 p.). A new edition of the Hackett work, with the title Sixty Years of Best Sellers, is scheduled for publication in the second half of 1956.

2483. Murdock, Kenneth B. Literature & theology in colonial New England. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1949. 235 p. 49-10048 PS195.R4M8

Murdock is a prominent scholar of American literature who has done most of his work in the field of colonial New England studies. This is exemplified by his biography Increase Mather, the Foremost American Puritan (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1925. 472 p.). He has also done considerable editorial work, notably in compilations such as Handkerchiefs from Paul, Being Pious and Consolatory Verses of Puritan Massachusetts . . . (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1927. lxxiii, 134 p.).

2484. O'Connor, William Van. Sense and sensibility in modern poetry. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1948. 278 p. 48-9231 PS324.O3 1948a

The chapters of the book are "The Dissociation of Sensibility," "The Employment of Myths," "The Break with Verism," "The Compromise with Prose," "The Influence of the Metaphysicals," "The Influence of the Pre-Modern Americans," "The Imagistic Symbol," "The Quality of Irony," "Tension and the Structure of Poetry," "The Isolation of the Poet," "Forms of Epigonism," "Tradition and Regionalism," "Forms of Dehumanization," "Forms of Obscurity," and "The Political Emphasis."

2485. Parrington, Vernon Louis. Main currents in American thought; an interpretation of American literature from the beginnings to 1920. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1927-30. 3 v. 27-8440 PS88.P3

Each volume has special t. p.

Bibliography at end of each volume.

CONTENTS.—1. The colonial mind, 1620-1800.—2. The romantic revolution in America, 1800-

1860.—3. The beginnings of critical realism in America, 1860–1920; completed to 1900 only.

"I have undertaken to give some account of the genesis and development in American letters of certain germinal ideas that have come to be reckoned traditionally American—how they came into being here, how they were opposed, and what influence they have exerted in determining the form and scope of our characteristic ideals and institutions. In pursuing such a task, I have chosen to follow the broad path of our political, economic, and social development, rather than the narrower belletristic; and the main divisions of the study have been fixed by forces that are anterior to literary schools and movements, creating the body of ideas from which literary culture eventually springs."—Introduction, v. 1.

Parrington (1871–1929), in investigating the social, economic, and political backgrounds of American literature from the position of a Jeffersonian liberal, produced a leading and seminal work in American literary history. These volumes influenced a large scale re-evaluation by many literary critics, and characterized an entire critical movement. The first two volumes were awarded the Pulitzer prize; the third volume was left incomplete at the author's death.

2486. Pattee, Fred Lewis. Sidelights on American literature. New York, Century, 1922. 342 p.
22–17738 PS121.P3

Contents.—The age of O. Henry.—A critic in C major [H. L. Mencken].—The prophet of the last frontier [Jack London].—The epic of New England.—On the terminal moraine of New England Puritanism [Mary E. Wilkins Freeman].—The shadow of Longfellow.—The modernness of Philip Freneau.—The centenary of Bryant's poetry.—Poe's "Ulalume."

2487. Pattee, Fred Lewis. The development of the American short story; an historical survey. New York, Harper, 1923. 388 p.
23–4306 PS374.S5P3 1923

A discussion of the history of the short story in America. It is presented largely in terms of individual authors. The development of the technique of the short story is not discussed at any length.

2488. Pattee, Fred Lewis. The first century of American literature, 1770–1870. New York, Appleton-Century, 1935. 613 p.
35–8357 PS88.P35

2489. Pattee, Fred Lewis. The feminine fifties. New York, Appleton-Century, 1940. 339 p.
40–8776 PS211.P3

A combination literary and social study of the decade of the 1850's.

2490. Pattee, Fred Lewis. Penn State Yankee . . . autobiography. State College, Pennsylvania State College, 1953. 384 p. illus.
53–63206 PS3531.A8Z5

Pattee (1863–1950) was a New Hampshire farm boy who grew up to be the first regularly appointed professor of American literature, in which capacity he passed much of his life at Pennsylvania State College. He was a literary historian, anthologist, editor, and minor creative writer (of poetry and fiction) in his own right. His extensive, if conservative, interest in "new" literature can be seen in books such as A History of American Literature since 1870 (New York, Century, 1915. 449 p.) and The New American Literature, 1890–1930 (New York, Century, 1930. 507 p.).

2491. Perry, Bliss. The American spirit in literature; a chronicle of great interpreters. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1918. 281 p. (The chronicles of America series, Allen Johnson, editor, v. 34)
18–16732 PS88.P4

Perry (1860–1954) was a noted editor and educator. His autobiography, And Gladly Teach (included in the Education section of this bibliography) tells the story of his work in the field of American literature. He has also written general studies such as A Study of Prose Fiction (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1920. 406 p.), which first appeared in 1902, and A Study of Poetry (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1920. 396 p.). He had written biographical studies of figures such as Dana, Whitman, and Whittier. He also published volumes of essays on predominantly literary subjects, as in The Amateur Spirit (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1904. 164 p.) and Park-Street Papers (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1908. 276 p.). His The American Mind (1912) is included in the Intellectual History section.

2492. Perry, Bliss. The praise of folly, and other papers. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1923. 230 p.
23–15166 PS2545.P4A16 1923

Contents.—The praise of folly.—The written word.—Poetry and progress.—Dana's magical chance.—John Burroughs.—The Colonel's quality.—Emerson's most famous speech.—Emerson's savings bank.—James Russell Lowell.—Woodrow Wilson as a man of letters.—Literary criticism in American periodicals.

2493. Piercy, Josephine K. Studies in literary types in seventeenth century America (1607–1710) In two parts. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1939. 360 p. (Yale studies in English, v. 91)
40–32466 PS186.P5

CONTENTS.—pt. 1. Literary types: "The times opinionists." "The latest newes." The almanac. The scientific essay. Personal essay. Personal records. Dedications, prefaces, introductions. Satire and invective. Meditations. The sermon and religious discourse. The beginnings of biography. Cotton Mather.—pt. 2. Influences: Literary forms. Seventeenth century prose style. The classical inheritance. "The times opinionists" answered.—Appendix A: Almanacs (in chronological order). Appendix B: S. Danforth, An astronomical description of the late comet (1665). Appendix C: Cotton Mather, Of poetry and of style. Samuel Sewall, On slavery. Thomas Thacher, A brief rule against small pocks.

2494. Pritchard, John Paul. Criticism in America; an account of the development of critical techniques from the early period of the Republic to the middle years of the twentieth century. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1956. 325 p.
56–5992 PN99.U5P69

Through a presentation of significant and representative figures, this book gives an account of the development of literary principles in the United States. Pritchard's Return to the Fountains (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1942. 271 p.) discusses classical sources of influential American criticism prior to the contemporary period.

2495. Quinn, Arthur H. American fiction; an historical and critical survey. New York, Appleton-Century, 1936. xxiii, 805 p.
36–30036 PS371.Q5

Bibliography: p. 725–772.

A historical and critical study of both the novel and the short story in America. Authors who began to publish after 1920 are not included. Also omitted are "juvenile fiction and . . . such interesting social developments as the dime novel or the detective story."

2496. Quinn, Arthur H., ed. The literature of the American people, an historical and critical survey. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1951. 1172 p. 51–10789 PS88.Q5

Bibliography: p. [985]–1107.

CONTENTS.—The colonial and revolutionary period, by Kenneth B. Murdock.—The establishment of national literature, by Arthur H. Quinn.—The late nineteenth century, by Clarence Gohdes.—The twentieth century, by George F. Whicher.

A history of American literature composed of monographic studies by scholars who are specialists in the literature of various periods. The bibliography has been made strictly selective to provide guidance of a positive character to standard works without including references to fugitive and derivative writings.

2497. Quinn, Bernetta. The metamorphic tradition in modern poetry; essays on the work of Ezra Pound, Wallace Stevens, William Carlos Williams, T. S. Eliot, Hart Crane, Randall Jarrell, and William Butler Yeats. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1955. 263 p.
55–9957 PS324.Q5

Aims to give a sense of direction in the study of contemporary poetry by isolating the special theme of metamorphosis, and also to facilitate understanding the work of those believed to have made the present century distinctive in poetry.

2498. Rahv, Philip. Image and idea; fourteen essays on literary themes. New York, New Directions, 1949. 164 p. 49–8967 PN511.R27

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—Paleface and redskin.—The cult of experience in American writing.—The dark lady of Salem.—The heiress of all the ages.—Attitudes toward Henry James.—Notes on the decline of naturalism.—Sketches in criticism. Henry Miller. Dr. Williams in his short stories. DeVoto and Kulturbolschewismus.

Rahv (b. 1908) is probably best known as an editor of Partisan Review, which post he assumed in 1934. He has also edited works of a number of authors and has compiled the anthology Discovery of Europe: the Story of American Experiences in the Old World (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. 743 p.), which in the form of extracts from diaries, journals, novels, etc., presents, with commentary, an account of the reactions of Americans visiting Europe.

2499. Raiziss, Sona. The metaphysical passion; seven modern American poets and the seventeenth-century tradition. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1952. 327 p.
52–9025 PS324.R3

An examination of modern American poetry in terms of the criticism of the last few decades. The seven poets analyzed are T. S. Eliot, J. C. Ransom, A. Tate, R. P. Warren, A. MacLeish, E. Wylie, and H. Crane (qq. v.). "In the present work a study is proposed of the character of metaphysical expression and the nature of the conditions that stimulated it, both in the seventeenth and the twentieth centuries."—Introduction.

2500. Rosenbach, Abraham S. Early American children's books, by A. S. W. Rosenbach, with bibliographical descriptions of the books in his private collection. Portland, Me., Southworth Press, 1933. lix, 354 p. illus.

33-33064 Z1037.A1R8 1933a

Arranged chronologically, 1682–1836, with author and title and printers and publishers indexes.

This work is largely a collector's guide to an unusually extensive collection of children's literature. However, the annotations and the lengthy introduction make the book something of a history of the subject. The volume will serve as an introduction or a guide for those who wish to familiarize themselves with this relatively obscure bypath of American literature.

2501. Rourke, Constance M. American humor; a study of the national character. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1931. 324 p.
31-7953 PS430.R6

A study treating of traditional types on which American humor has focused, such as the Yankee, the frontiersman, and the Negro. The work was reissued in 1953 as part of the Doubleday Anchor books series.

2502. Rusk, Ralph Leslie. The literature of the middle western frontier. New York, Columbia University Press, 1925. 2 v. (Columbia University studies in English and comparative literature) 25-11215 PS273.R8

Published also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University, 1925.

Bibliographies: v. 2, p. 39–364.

A detailed study which stops arbitrarily at 1840. Prof. Rusk later became a leading authority on, and editor of Emerson.

2503. Sherman, Stuart Pratt. Americans. New York, Scribner, 1922. 336 p.
23-224 PS121.S5

CONTENTS.—Mr. Mencken, the jeune fille and the new spirit in letters.—Tradition.—Franklin and the age of enlightenment.—The Emersonian liberation.—Hawthorne: a Puritan critic of Puritanism.—Walt Whitman.—Joaquin Miller: poetical conquistador of the West.—A note on Carl Sandburg.—Andrew Carnegie.—Roosevelt and the national psychology.—Evolution in the Adams family.—An imaginary conversation with Mr. P. E. More.

Sherman (1881–1926) was for some time (1907–24) a professor of English at the University of Illinois; in his last years he became editor of the literary supplement of the New York Herald Tribune. He early came under the influence of Babbitt and More (qq. v.) and the New Humanism, thus reinforcing his conservative tendencies. This led to his opposition to such commentators for the new generation as Mencken (q. v.). However, towards the end of his career, Sherman's writings took on a somewhat more "liberal" tone. As a spokesman for the highly conservative, he produced volumes such as The Genius of America; Studies in Behalf of the Younger Generation (New York, Scribner, 1923. 269 p.); The Main Stream (New York, Scribner, 1927. 239 p.), an attempt "to understand the entire 'conspiracy' of forces involved in the taste of his day"; The Emotional Discovery of America, and Other Essays (New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1932. 276 p.), a posthumous collection of previously published articles; and On Contemporary Literature (New York, P. Smith, 1931. 312 p.), which was first published in 1917 from articles originally appearing in The Nation. Jacob Zeitlin and Homer Woodbridge produced a two-volume study: Life and Letters of Stuart P. Sherman (New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1929).

2504. Sherman, Stuart Pratt. Points of view. New York, Scribner, 1924. 363 p.
24-27630 PS121.S54

CONTENTS.—Towards an American type.—Forty and upwards.—Unprintable.—For the higher study of American literature.—W. C. Brownell.—On falling in hate.—On falling in love.—American style.—An apology for essayists of the press.—The significance of Sinclair Lewis.—Where there are no Rotarians.—Mr. Tarkington on the midland personality.—Oscar S. Straus.—Brander Matthews and the Mohawks.—A note on Gertrude Stein.—Samuel Butler: Diogenes of the Victorians.—The Disraelian irony.—George Sand and Gustave Flaubert.

2505. Sherman, Stuart Pratt. Critical woodcuts. New York, Scribner, 1926. 348 p.
26-8769 PN761.S5

"The essays in this volume were all printed in 'Books,' the literary supplement of the Herald Tribune, in 1924 and 1925."

2506. Sievers, Wieder David. Freud on Broadway. New York, Hermitage House, 1955. 479 p. 55-7873 PS351.S5

Bibliography: p. 455–461.

The work is a historical review of various American dramas from the end of the 19th century to the present; it was undertaken to discover the impact of Freudian concepts on the work of playwrights of the 20th century.

2507. Smith, Bernard. Forces in American criticism; a study in the history of American literary thought. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. 401 p. 39-27825 PS88.S55

An interesting book, "Marxist" in tendency. Its thesis is that science is advancing while romanticism and the old genteel forces are in retreat. Most of the book presents social influences, but this becomes intrusive only towards the end.

2508. Smith, Thelma M., and Ward L. Miner. Transatlantic migration; the contemporary American novel in France. [Durham, N. C.] Duke University Press, 1955. 264 p.
55-6530 PS161.F7S6

Bibliography: p. 193-245.

Through focusing on the American novelists Faulkner, Hemingway, Steinbeck, Dos Passos, and Caldwell, the authors present a picture of the reception of American fiction in France. The extensive bibliography lists books, articles, and reviews produced in France about American novels.

2509. Snell, George D. The shapers of American fiction, 1798-1947. New York, Dutton, 1947. 316 p. 47-3071 PS371.S5

A study of leading American fiction writers from J. F. Cooper and C. B. Brown to Hemingway, Farrell, Dos Passos, Dreiser, and their contemporaries.

2510. Spiller, Robert E. The cycle of American literature; an essay in historical criticism. New York, Macmillan, 1955. 318 p.
55-3833 PS88.S6

A brief, concise view of American literary culture, presented according to a theory of a cycle in literature. "When applied to the story of American literature as a whole, the cyclic theory discloses not only a single organic movement, but at least two secondary cycles as well: the literary movement which developed from the Eastern seaboard as a center, and culminated with the great romantic writers of the mid-nineteenth century; and that which grew out of the conquest of the continent and is now rounding its full cycle in the twentieth century."—Preface.

2511. Spingarn, Joel Elias. Creative criticism and other essays. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1931. 221 p. 31-24167 PN81.S6 1931

Contents.—pt. 1. Creative criticism: The new criticism. Prose and verse. Dramatic criticism and the theatre. Creative connoisseurship.—pt. 2. Other essays: The younger generation: a new manifesto. The American critic. The American scholar. The growth of a literary myth.—Appendix: Non credo. Notes on the new humanism (1913-14). A note on French scholarship. The seven arts and the seven confusions.

This is a revision of a book first published in 1917. Spingarn (1875-1939) was one of the more controversial critics of his generation. His other literary writings include some poetry and A History of Literary Criticism in the Renaissance (New York, Published for the Columbia University Press by Macmillan, 1899. 330 p.).

2512. Stauffer, Donald A., ed. The intent of the critic, by Edmund Wilson, Norman Foerster, John Crowe Ransom [and] W. H. Auden. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1941. 147 p. [Princeton books in the humanities]
41-20238 PN81.S7

Contents.—Introduction: The intent of the critic, by D. A. Stauffer.—The historical interpretation of literature, by Edmund Wilson.—The esthetic judgment and the ethical judgment, by Norman Foerster.—Criticism as pure speculation, by J. C. Ransom.—Criticism in a mass society, by W. H. Auden.

2513. Stedman, Edmund Clarence. Poets of America. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1885. 516 p. 18-13421 PS303.S7 1885

Contents.—Early and recent conditions.—Growth of the American school.—William Cullen Bryant.—John Greenleaf Whittier.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.—Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.—Edgar Allan Poe.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.—James Russell Lowell.—Walt Whitman.—Bayard Taylor.—The outlook.—Index.

Stedman (1833-1908) was one of the leading representatives of the genteel tradition in literature. His An American Anthology, 1787-1900 (Cambridge, Mass., Riverside Press, 1900. 2 v.) represents this taste in poetry; he gave much insight into the theory of the genteel tradition in The Nature and Elements of Poetry (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1892. 338 p.); while it is exemplified in his own Poems (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1908. 475 p.), which went through many editions and stages during his own lifetime and after. His Life and Letters (New York, Moffat, Yard, 1910. 2 v.) was produced by Laura Stedman and George M. Gould. Other critics associated with Stedman were W. C. Brownell and George Woodberry (qq. v.).

2514. Stovall, Floyd. American idealism. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1943. 235 p. 43-4567 PS169.I3S8

The author believes that the philosophy of democracy and of America is basically idealistic, and in this book he traces the progress of idealism in this country as it is revealed in its literature.

2515. Stovall, Floyd, ed. The development of American literary criticism, by Harry H. Clark [and others] Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1955. 262 p.
55-1459 PN99.U5S75

Bibliography: p. 247–253.

A series of articles which are arranged so as to form something of a connected history and criticism of American criticism, particularly its flowering in the 20th century.

2516. Straumann, Heinrich. American literature in the twentieth century. London, New York, Hutchinson's University Library, 1951. 189 p. (Hutchinson's University Library: English literature) 52–664 PS221.S8

"The aim of this book is to give an outline of Twentieth-Century American Thought and Letters. It is not meant to be a history of modern literature in the usual sense of the word, and does not aim at anything like completeness. . . . The book is intended to be a study in attitudes. It attempts to describe the basic conceptions of life underlying the works of some of the outstanding writers of the century, and the values they believe in. Above all, it tries to establish the links between what novelists, dramatists, and poets, have expressed, and the views of some essayists and especially of the leading philosophers who, in fact, provide the natural framework of the whole."—Introduction.

2517. Taylor, Walter Fuller. The economic novel in America. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1942. 378 p. 42–36211 PS374.S7T35

CONTENTS.—The environment.—The lesser novelists.—Mark Twain.—Hamlin Garland.—Edward Bellamy.—William Dean Howells.—Frank Norris.—Summary and conclusions.—Bibliography (p. 341–365).

Taylor has also written a history of American literature, The Story of American Letters, Rev. ed. (Chicago, Regnery, 1956. 504 p.); the approach used is very largely one of essay studies of individual authors, with occasional survey chapters.

2518. Thompson, Ralph. American literary annuals & gift books, 1825–1865. New York, Wilson, 1936. 183 p. 37–14847 AY10.T5 1936

Thesis (Ph. D.)—Columbia University, 1936.

"A catalog": p. [102]–163; "Foreign gift books": p. [165]–166.

"Between 1825 and 1865 more than a thousand such miscellanies appeared in the United States; the number in other countries was probably even greater. My aim has been to explain the origin and character of the American examples and to make available an annotated catalog."—Preface.

2519. Trilling, Lionel. The liberal imagination; essays on literature and society. New York, Viking Press, 1950. 303 p. 50–6914 PS3539.R56L5 1950

Trilling (b. 1905) is best known as a perceptive liberal critic who publishes frequently in periodicals. He is also a creative writer of some note, who has received praise for his novel, The Middle of the Journey (New York, Viking Press, 1947. 310 p.), which attempts to deal with the problems of modern Americans and modern man.

2520. Trilling, Lionel. The opposing self; nine essays in criticism. New York, Viking Press, 1955. 232 p. 55–5871 PN511.T76

Books largely from the 19th century are used as perspectives on the 20th century. Although international in its literary perspectives, the book includes "William Dean Howells and the Roots of Modern Taste" and "The Bostonians."

2521. Tyler, Moses Coit. A history of American literature, 1607–1765. Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1949. 551 p. 49–11766 PS185.T8 1949

"In this reissue . . . the preface and the text of the first edition of 1878 have been strictly followed except in the numbering of the footnotes . . . Changes made in the printings and editions of 1879, 1881, and 1897 are added in bracketed notes in the present edition, as are likewise most of the marginal notes that Tyler put in his correction set of the two volumes of the first edition."—p. ix.

The Life of Moses Coit Tyler (Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1933. 354 p.), by Howard Mumford Jones, relates the story of this famous scholar of early American literature.

2522. Tyler, Moses Coit. The literary history of the American revolution, 1763–1783. New York, Published for Facsimile Library, by Barnes & Noble, 1941. 2 v. 41–6271 PS185.T82 1941

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 429–483.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. 1763–1776.—v. 2. 1776–1783.

2523. Van Doren, Carl C. The American novel, 1789–1939. Rev. and enl. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1940. 406 p. 40–4354 PS371.V3 1940

Bibliography: p. 367–382.

Van Doren (1885–1950) distinguished himself as a scholar of the American scene in works such as his essays in Many Minds (New York, Knopf, 1924. 242 p.); his anthology Modern American Prose (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1934. 939 p.); his general study What is American Literature? (New York, Morrow, 1935. 128 p.); his distinguished biography, Benjamin Franklin (New York, Viking Press, 1938. 845 p.); and many other historical and literary works, some of which are included elsewhere in this bibliography. His career is presented in his autobiography, Three Worlds (New York, Harper, 1936. 317 p.), which also reflects many aspects of life in America.

2524. Van Doren, Carl C. Carl Van Doren, selected by himself. New York, Viking Press, 1945. 628 p. (The Viking portable library) 45-35066 PS3543.A555A6 1945

A selection from his own numerous writings.

2525. Vestal, Stanley. The book lover's Southwest; a guide to good reading, by Walter S. Campbell (Stanley Vestal). Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1955. xii, 287 p. 55-6367 Z1251.S8V4

A guide to literature about the Southwest and by authors from that region. The work covers all aspects of the region's "literature," from dictionaries to novels.

2526. Wagenknecht, Edward Charles. Cavalcade of the American novel, from the birth of the Nation to the middle of the twentieth century. New York, Holt, 1952. 575 p. 52-7022 PS371.W3

A standard work on the American novel. Major authors are discussed at length in full essays; lesser authors are covered by brief notes.

2527. Waggoner, Hyatt H. The heel of Elohim, science and values in modern American poetry. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1950. xx, 235 p. 50-9322 PS324.W3

CONTENTS.—Poets, test tubes, and the heel of Elohim.—E. A. Robinson: the cosmic chill.—Robert Frost: the strategic retreat.—T. S. Eliot: at the still point.—Robinson Jeffers: here is reality.—Archibald MacLeish: the undigested mystery.—Hart Crane: beyond all sesames of science. Science and poetry: conclusions.

2528. Warfel, Harry R. American novelists of today. New York, American Book Co., 1951. 478 p. ports. 51-10144 PS379.W3

Made up of sketches of the life and writings of 575 contemporary American novelists, with emphasis on the decade of the 1940's. The work is inclusive rather than selective.

2529. Wellek, René, and Austin Warren. Theory of literature. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1949. 403 p. 49-1007 PN45.W36

Bibliographical references included in "Notes" (p. 299-346). Bibliography: p. 347-387.

A scholarly discussion of literary theory, evaluation, research, and historiography. The literary work is viewed in its own right, not as a facet of some social or political movement, nor as an exemplar of the laws of economic determinism. In this respect the book shows a spreading method of approach to literature in the graduate schools. Wellek is at work on a four-volume History of Modern Criticism: 1750-1950, of which the Yale University Press has so far published two volumes. Warren is the author of The Elder Henry James (New York, Macmillan, 1934. 269 p.) and Rage for Order; Essays in Criticism (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1948. 164 p.).

2530. Wells, Henry W. The American way of poetry. New York, Columbia University Press, 1943. 246 p. (Columbia studies in American culture, no. 13) 43-12056 PS303.W4

A study of American literary nationalism and the relation of American letters to English, European, and international traditions; special reference is made to the works of 16 major American poets who flourished from the time of the American Revolution to 1940.

2531. West, Ray B., ed. Essays in modern literary criticism. New York, Rinehart, 1952. 611 p. 52-5602 PN85.W4

A volume of essays in which leading literary critics discourse on aspects of modern literary criticism.

2532. Williams, Stanley Thomas. The American spirit in letters. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1926. 329 p. (The Pageant of America [v. 11]) 26-12988 E178.5.P2, v. 11

The author has in this volume produced an extensively illustrated history of American literature which is founded on his theory that a nation's life is reflected in its literature. Williams (b. 1888), a professor of American literature at Yale University, has also written a Life of Washington Irving (New York, Oxford University Press, 1935. 2 v.) and other works.

2533. Williams, Stanley Thomas. The beginnings of American poetry, 1620-1855. Uppsala, 1951. 148 p. (The Gottesman lectures, 1) 54-4634 PS303.W45

Bibliographical references included in "Notes" (p. [124]-148).

2534. Williams, Stanley Thomas. The Spanish background of American literature. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1955. 2 v. 54-5095 PS159.S7W5

A contribution toward placing European influences on American literature in proper critical perspective. The second volume is devoted in large part to individual studies of Washington Irving, William Cullen Bryant, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, George Ticknor, Bret Harte, William Dean Howells, and William Prescott.

2535. Wilson, Edmund. Axel's castle; a study in the imaginative literature of 1870–1930. New York, Scribner, 1931. 319 p.
31–26550 PN771.W55

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—Symbolism.—T. S. Eliot.—Gertrude Stein.

The work of Edmund Wilson (b. 1895) as a forceful expository writer has gained him a large audience and following in a number of fields, most notably in literary criticism. As a creative writer he has produced Discordant Encounters; Plays and Dialogues (New York, Boni, 1926. 297 p.); the novel, I Thought of Daisy (New York, Scribner, 1929. 311 p.); a controversial volume of short stories, Memoirs of Hecate County (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1946. 338 p.); and Five Plays (New York, Farrar, Straus & Young, 1954. 541 p.), dramas of ideas, within the experimental theater movement, which reflect life among New York intellectuals. He has also been accorded considerable attention for such volumes as Travels in Two Democracies (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1936. 325 p.), a report on Russia and the United States; To the Finland Station; a Study in the Writing and Acting of History (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1940. 509 p.), which traces modern revolutionary thought in Europe; Europe without Baedeker; Sketches among the Ruins of Italy, Greece & England (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1947. 427 p.); The Scrolls from the Dead Sea (New York, Oxford University Press, 1955. 121 p.), a best-selling report on a major discovery in the field of religion; and Red, Black, Blond, and Olive; Studies in Four Civilizations: Zuñi, Haiti, Soviet Russia, Israel (New York, Oxford University Press, 1956. 500 p.).

2536. Wilson, Edmund. The boys in the back room; notes on California novelists. San Francisco, Colt Press, 1941. 72 p.
41–51881 PS379.W5

CONTENTS.—The playwright in paradise.—James M. Cain.—John O'Hara.—William Saroyan.—Hans Otto Storm.—John Steinbeck.—Facing the Pacific.—Postscript.

2537. Wilson, Edmund. The wound and the bow; seven studies in literature. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1941. 295 p. 41–14343 PN511.W633

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—Justice to Edith Wharton.—Hemingway: gauge of morale.—Philoctetes: The wound and the bow.

2538. Wilson, Edmund, ed. The shock of recognition; the development of literature in the United States recorded by the men who made it. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1943. 1290 p. 43–9895 PS55.W5

Reissued in 1955 by Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, New York.

A collection of articles about important American authors written by their contemporaries during nearly a century, starting with 1845. The anthology is not only a collection of critical writings, it is also a contribution to the study of the development of American literature. A critical introduction has been provided for each selection.

2539. Wilson, Edmund. The triple thinkers; twelve essays on literary subjects. [Rev. and enl. ed.] New York, Oxford University Press, 1948. 270 p. 48–9262 PN511.W63 1948

First published in 1938 by Harcourt, Brace with the subtitle: "Ten Essays on Literature." The revised edition includes the essays "Mr. More and the Mithraic Bull," "Is Verse a Dying Technique?", "The Ambiguity of Henry James," "John Jay Chapman," "Marxism and Literature," and "The Historical Interpretation of Literature."

2540. Wilson, Edmund. Classics and commercials; a literary chronicle of the forties. New York, Farrar, Straus, 1950. 534 p.
50–10620 PS221.W55

"A selection of . . . literary articles written during the nineteen forties."

2541. Wilson, Edmund. The shores of light; a literary chronicle of the twenties and thirties. New York, Farrar, Straus & Young, 1952. 814 p.
52–13935 PS221.W56

2542. Wilson, Edmund. Eight essays. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1954. 238 p. (Doubleday Anchor books. A37)
54–7733 PS3545.I6245E5

PARTIAL CONTENTS.—Hemingway: gauge of morale.—Abraham Lincoln: the Union as religious mysticism.—The pre-presidential T. R.—The Holmes-Laski correspondence.

2543. Wilson, Edmund. A piece of my mind; reflections at sixty. New York, Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1956. 239 p.
57–5302 PS3545.I6245Z53

A volume of autobiographical reflections and critical summation.

2544. Winters, Yvor. In defense of reason. Primitivism and decadence: a study of American experimental poetry. Maule's curse: seven studies in the history of American obscurantism. The anatomy of nonsense. The significance of The bridge by Hart Crane, or What are we to think of Professor X? New York, Swallow Press & W. Morrow, 1947. 611 p. 47–2236 PS121.W53

Primitivism and Decadence was first published independently in 1937; Maule's Curse, which includes essays on Cooper, Melville, Jones Very, Emerson, and Dickinson, first appeared in 1938; The Anatomy of Nonsense, which has essays on H. Adams, W. Stevens, T. S. Eliot, and J. C. Ransom, was published in 1943. The volumes have not all been completely reproduced in this collection, although all the indicated essays have been included and represent nearly the whole of the earlier work.

The subjects and theorizing of Winters (b. 1900) are derived primarily from American literature. He is also well known for his poetry, which may be associated with the neo-classical school. Collected Poems (Denver, Swallow, 1952. 143 p.) is actually a selection of those poems which he most wishes to preserve. He is also the author of a prominent study of Edwin Arlington Robinson (Norfolk, Conn., New Directions Books, 1946. 162 p.).

2545. Woodberry, George Edward. Makers of literature; being essays on Shelley, Landor, Browning, Byron, Arnold, Coleridge, Lowell, Whittier, and others. New York, Macmillan, 1900. 440 p. 0–2177 PR403.W7

Woodberry (1855–1930) was a critic and poet associated with Stedman (q. v.) and others in the "Genteel Tradition." As a professor of comparative literature at Columbia University, and as one of the more widely read and admired critics of his day, he had a great influence on literary studies at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th centuries. Besides his literary studies, his poetry, and some travel writing, he produced a number of important biographies of literary figures: Poe (1885, revised 1909), Hawthorne (1902), and Emerson (1907).

2546. Woodberry, George Edward. Heart of man, and other papers. New York, Harcourt, Brace & Howe, 1920. 323 p. 20–20978 PS3351.H5 1920

CONTENTS.—Heart of man.—The praise of English books.—Two phases of criticism.—Wendell Phillips; the faith of an American.

2547. Woodberry, George Edward. Studies of a literature. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1921. 328 p. 21–7433 PR99.W75 1921

"The author has collected in this volume besides articles that were contained in his earlier books some papers of later years."—Note.

2548. Woodberry, George Edward. Appreciation of literature, and America in literature. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1921. 306 p. 21–7434 PN45.W62 1921

2549. Wright, Thomas Goddard. Literary culture in early New England, 1620–1730, by Thomas Goddard Wright . . . ed. by his wife. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1920. 322 p. 21–571 F7.W95

Bibliography: p. 295–304.

"The pages which follow will not attempt to weigh colonial literature, either to condemn or defend it . . . but rather will attempt to determine that which lies back of any literature, the culture of the people themselves, and to study the relation between their culture and the literature which they produced. In the attempt to determine the culture of the people of New England the writer has made a study of their education, their libraries, their ability to obtain books, their use and appreciation of books, their relations with political and literary life in England, and their literature."—Introduction.

2550. Zabel, Morton D., ed. Literary opinion in America; essays illustrating the status, methods, and problems of criticism in the United States in the twentieth century. Rev. ed. New York, Harper, 1951. xxv, 890 p. 51–2935 PN771.Z2 1951

Appendixes (p. [791]–890): 1. Recent works of American criticism.—2. Collections of contemporary American criticism.—3. American magazines publishing criticism.—4. Notes on contributors.—5. A supplementary list of essays in criticism: 1900–1950.—6. A note on contemporary English criticism.

C. Periodicals

2551. Accent; a quarterly of new literature. v. 1+ autumn 1940+ Urbana, Ill. 46–37972 AP2.A243

Since its inception Accent has included not only literary criticism and reviews, but also much fiction and poetry. It has held out against "commercialism," and it has been very receptive to younger, unknown writers, although it does include work by established authors. Its principal editors, Kerker Quinn and Charles Shattuck, included in Accent Anthology; Selections from Accent, a Quarterly of New Literature, 1940–1945 (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1946. 687 p.) about 40 percent of the material that appeared in the first 5 volumes of the periodical.

2552. American literature; a journal of literary history, criticism, and bibliography. v. 1+ Mar. 1929+ Durham, N. C., Duke University Press. 30–20216 PS1.A6

Published quarterly by the Duke University Press with the cooperation of the American Literature Group of the Modern Language Association of America. Beginning with volume 1, number 3, there has regularly appeared a list of "Articles on American Literature Appearing in Current Periodicals"; this has been one of the principal sources of Lewis G. Leary's Articles on American Literature, 1900–1950 (q. v.). The magazine has had a combined index of subjects, articles, and authors compiled by Thomas F. Marshall as An Analytical Index to American Literature, v. 1–20, Mar. 1929–Jan. 1949 (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1954. 154 p.).

2553. American quarterly. v. 1+ spring 1949+ Philadelphia. 50–4992 AP2. A3985

Published by the University of Pennsylvania and the American Studies Association.

Though the periodical is interested in all aspects of studies relating to American culture, considerable attention is devoted to literature. In the summer of 1955 appeared the first of a scheduled annual series of bibliographies listing "Articles in American Studies." More than 200 periodicals were searched for material, and roughly half the citations resulting from this could be considered of direct literary interest, although frequently correlated with other fields.

2554. The Antioch review. v. 1+ spring 1941+ Yellow Springs, Ohio. 44–660 AP2.A562

A quarterly published at Antioch College, this is one of the many such periodicals published at colleges and universities throughout the country. While it contains fiction, poetry, and book reviews, as well as essays of literary criticism, it also devotes a fair amount of space to articles on non-literary matters. An anthology based on it, and edited by Paul Bixler, is The Antioch Review Anthology; Essays, Fiction, Poetry, and Reviews from the Antioch Review (Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1953. 470 p.).

2555. The Atlantic monthly, a magazine of literature, science, art, and politics. v. 1+ Nov. 1857+ Boston. 4–12666 AP2.A8

From Nov. 1857 to Sept. 1865 title reads: The Atlantic Monthly, a Magazine of Literature, Art and Politics.

As a purveyor of creative literature, The Atlantic Monthly was more important in its early decades than it has been in recent years. However, it still reflects (largely through essays and reviews) the literary tastes of a large section of the better educated part of the public, as well as their interests in other fields.

2556. Chicago review. v. 1+ winter 1946+ [Chicago, University of Chicago Press] 55–35686 AP2.C5152

A literary quarterly published at the University.

2557. Harper's magazine. v. 1+ June 1850+ New York. 4–12670 AP2.H3

Title varies: June 1850–Nov. 1900, Harper's New Monthly Magazine.—Dec. 1900–May 1939, Harper's Monthly Magazine (cover title: Harper's magazine).

A monthly magazine which includes some poetry, short stories, and literary essays, often by "name" authors, as well as articles on matters of general interest. An anthology based on it is Harper Essays (New York, Harper, 1927. 314 p.), edited by H. S. Canby. A recent paperback selection more fully representing the magazine's scope is Harper's Magazine Reader: A Selection of Articles, Stories and Poems . . . (New York, Bantam Books, 1953. 372 p.).

2558. The Hudson review. v. 1+ spring 1948+ [New York] 50–2532 AP2.H886

A distinguished literary quarterly that includes poetry and fiction, as well as a considerable amount of literary criticism.

2559. The Kenyon review. v. 1+ winter 1939+ [Gambier, Ohio] Kenyon College. 42–51147 AP2.K426

A leading literary quarterly which has published a significant amount of important poetry and fiction, but which is most important for its literary criticism. Under the editorship of John Crowe Ransom (q. v.), it became a leading organ of the new critics, and especially of their leading representatives in the Southern agrarian movement. This aspect of the periodical is reflected in the anthology The Kenyon Critics; Studies in Modern Literature from the Kenyon Review (Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1951. 342 p.), edited by Ransom.

2560. New directions in prose & poetry. no. 1+ 1936+ New York, New Directions.
37–1751 PS536.N37

Title varies.

Intended as an annual, the publication of this work has been somewhat irregular. It is edited by James Laughlin, who heads the New Directions press. The volumes contain experimental modern writing of many types and from many sources. The emphasis is American though the scope is international. Much of the material is published in these volumes for the first time, although some of it is republished from other, not readily available sources.

2561. The New England quarterly; an historical review of New England life and letters . . . v. 1+ Jan. 1928+ [Orono, Me., The University Press] 29–23850 F1.N62

Imprint varies.

2562. The New Mexico quarterly review. v. 1+ Feb. 1931+ [Albuquerque, University of New Mexico] 35–9607 AP2.N6168

Title varies: 1931–40, The New Mexico Quarterly.

A literary quarterly which includes some general articles and which emphasizes the Southwest.

2563. New world writing. 1st+ Apr. 1952+ [New York] New American Library. (N. A. L. Mentor books) 52–1806 PN6014.N457

Issued irregularly and in paperback format at popular prices, the publication is designed to make available to a large audience essays, short stories, and poetry relatively esoteric and experimental in their literary quality, in many ways corresponding to the contents of "little magazines" having limited circulation.

2564. The New York times book review. v. 1+ 1896+ New York. AP2.N657

The weekly book review section, which now appears as a supplement to the Sunday edition, of The New York Times is probably by itself the most widely disseminated book review periodical in America. Its extensive coverage and its wide distribution render it one of the most important of such publications.

2565. The New Yorker. v. 1+ Feb. 21, 1925+ New York. 28–5329 AP2.N6763

The New Yorker is a sophisticated, humorous weekly without the "serious" approach to high literature that may be detected in most literary periodicals. However, it has managed to maintain a high level of writing, and many of the country's prominent authors have come to be regarded as part of the "New Yorker school." The short stories which they have published are represented in books such as Short Stories from the New Yorker (New York, Simon & Schuster, 1945. 440 p.), which selects 68 stories from the periodical's beginning through September 1940, and in 55 Short Stories from the New Yorker (New York, Simon & Schuster, 1949. 480 p.), which covers the preceding 10 years. Their poetry is represented in The New Yorker Book of Verse; Anthology of Poems First Published in the New Yorker, 1925–1935 (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1935. 311 p.). The magazine has also become famous for a new approach to short biography, a style represented in the anthology Profiles from the New Yorker (New York, Knopf, 1938. 400 p.). Among the most widely known and admired aspects of the magazine are its cartoons. These have appeared in a number of "New Yorker albums"; six of these were published by Doubleday Doran from 1928 to 1939. A broad survey of the form may be seen in The New Yorker Twenty-Fifth Anniversary Album, 1925–1950 (New York, Harper, 1951. unpaged), which has been supplemented by The New Yorker 1950–1955 Album (New York, Harper, 1955 unpaged). These are considered by some to be among leading examples of modern American humor in the cartoon form. A book by an outsider about The New Yorker and its editor is Dale Kramer's Ross and the New Yorker (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 306 p.).

2566. Partisan review. v. 1+ Feb./Mar. 1934+ New York. 42–20197 HX1.P3

Bimonthly, Feb. 1934–Nov. 1935; irregular, Feb. 1936–Dec. 1937; monthly, Jan.–Sept. 1938; quarterly, fall 1938–fall 1939; bimonthly, Jan. 1940+

Volume numbers irregular; v. 1–2 called no. 1–9.

Publication suspended from Nov. 1936 to Nov. 1937, inclusive.

Title varies: Feb./Mar. 1934–Oct./Nov. 1935, Partisan Review. Feb.–June 1936, Partisan Review & Anvil.

Editors: Feb./Mar. 1934+ Philip Rahv and others.

The Partisan Review has since its inception become one of the most distinguished of literary reviews. It publishes material from both well established and new authors in the fields of poetry, fiction, and critical essays. It also contains articles on current cultural problems, and it has a distinguished book review section. Some of its best material has been anthologized in The Partisan Reader; Ten Years of Partisan Review, 1934–1944 (New York, Dial Press, 1946. 688 p.) and The New Partisan Reader, 1945–1953 (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1953. 621 p.), both edited by William Phillips and Philip Rahv. Short stories from the magazine have been anthologized in the paperback volumes Stories in the Modern Manner (New York, Avon Publications, 1953. 282 p.) and More Stories in the Modern Manner (New York, Avon Publications, 1954. 252 p.).

2567. Poetry. A magazine of verse. v. 1+ Oct. 1912+ Chicago. 14-13059 PS301.P6

Under the editorship of Harriet Monroe (q. v.) Poetry became one of the leading mediums in America for the publication of modern poetry, and many of the leading poets of the first half of the 20th century first achieved wide notice through appearing in this periodical. Subsequent editors have shown a similar receptivity to new poetry, and they have maintained the reputation of the periodical as the best one in America devoted to poetry. Appearing monthly, the magazine also includes reviews of books in the field.

2568. Quarterly review of literature. v. 1+ autumn 1943+ Annandale-on-Hudson, N. Y. 45-10088 AP2.Q29

The Quarterly Review of Literature has several times shifted its place of publication; for some years now it has been published at Bard College. It presents primarily creative literature (poetry, short stories, novelettes, drama) rather than criticism. It does not, however, exclude critical essays. About once a year an entire issue is devoted to one important modern author.

2569. Saturday review. v. 1+ Aug. 2, 1924+ [New York] 27-5407 Z1219.S25

Title varies: 1924-51, Saturday Review of Literature.

Aside from works such as The New York Times Book Review, this weekly is probably the most widely distributed literary periodical in America. Its emphasis is on book reviews and general essays on the literary scene, although it also carries some poetry, a fair number of articles and editorials on the overall cultural scene, and a sizable number of reviews of long playing records. An early anthology, compiled while the magazine was almost exclusively literary in nature, is Designed for Reading; an Anthology Drawn from the Saturday Review of Literature, 1924-1934 (New York, Macmillan, 1934. 614 p.). Also based on the periodical is a recent paperback series of anthologies entitled Saturday Review Reader (New York, Bantam Books, 1951+), of which three issues have so far appeared.

2570. The Sewanee review, quarterly. v. 1+ Nov. 1892+ Sewanee, Tenn., The University Press. 9-33131 AP2.S5

Published at the University of the South, this is one of the leading literary periodicals in America, as well as the oldest in continuous publication.

2571. The South Atlantic quarterly. v. 1+ Jan. 1902+ Durham, N. C. 8-84 AP2.S75

The South Atlantic Quarterly is one of the oldest of the still functioning general and literary periodicals. In both aspects it has been a leading medium for the expression of Southern culture. An anthology from the magazine is Fifty Years of the South Atlantic Quarterly (Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1952. 397 p.), edited by William Baskerville Hamilton.

2572. Southwest review. v. 1+ June 1915+ Dallas, Tex. 17-4968 AP2.S883

Title varies: v. 1-9 (June 1915-July 1924) The Texas Review.

Published at the University of Texas, Austin, June 1915-July 1924; published at Southern Methodist University, Dallas, Oct. 1924+

While this quarterly is general in nature, it includes some material of literary interest, and it publishes an annual literary number.

2573. The University of Kansas City review. v. 1+ winter 1934+ [Kansas City] 48-27919 AP2.U735

Vol. 1, no. 1-4 called v. 4, no. 1-4 in continuation of the numbering of the university's University Bulletin.

A general literary quarterly.

2574. The Virginia quarterly review, a national journal of literature & discussion. v. 1+Apr. 1925+ [Charlottesville, University of Virginia] 30-14637 AP2.V76

A quarterly which devotes considerable space to poetry and short stories, but which also includes articles on matters of general interest.

2575. The Western humanities review. v. 1+ Jan. 1947+ [Salt Lake City, Utah Humanities Research Foundation] 48-27220 AP2.W426

Title varies: 1947-48, Utah Humanities Review.

A quarterly of general discussion which includes literary articles and creative writing.

2576. The Western review. v. [1]+ 1937+ Iowa City, State University of Iowa. 51-17051 AP2.W524

Titles varies: Rocky Mountain Review.

Editors: R. B. West and others.

The Western Review is a literary quarterly which provides a space emphasis on young writers.

2577. Yale review. v. 1–19, May 1892–Feb. 1911; new ser., v. 1+ Oct. 1911+ New Haven, 1893+ 8–8158 AP2.Y2

Title varies: May 1892–Feb. 1911, The Yale Review; a Quarterly Journal for the Scientific Discussion of Economic, Political and Social Questions. (Subtitle varies slightly.)

Preceded by the New Englander and Yale Review (1843–92).

The Yale Review is a general quarterly reflecting many aspects of American intellectual life and interests. It includes some literary material and a section of intellectual book reviews.

IV

Biography and Autobiography

Nos. 2578–2844

THIS section is primarily a supplement to the other sections; its purpose is to include biographical works, useful for the study of American history and culture, which would otherwise have been omitted. As in the other sections, we have striven towards some degree of balance, so that in a crowded field (e. g., Civil War diaries and journals) a good work may be left out in favor of another depicting a less well-represented aspect of American life. The material in this section is not meant to represent fully, in any respect, the field of American biography and autobiography. Any biography or autobiography pertaining directly to the subject field of another section of the bibliography has been left for possible inclusion in that section (e. g., a biography of an actress would appear, if at all, in the Entertainment section). The exceptions to this occur when a work does not easily or fully fall into one of our categories, or when it has particular significance in the development of American biography and autobiography, in which case, if it has not been selected for another section, it is included here. In short, while this section covers American biography and autobiography on the basis of its value as Americana, as literature, and as history, it does not cover any of these aspects thoroughly, but merely supplements the rest of the bibliography, which must be used through the index for any fuller view of the subject.

2578. LOUIS ADAMIC, 1899–1951

Adamic came to America from Yugoslavia in 1913 at the age of 14. Most of his writings concern the Americanization of immigrants; this includes such works as his novel, Grandsons (1935); My America, 1928–1938 (1938), a journalistic series of impressions; and From Many Lands (1940), a somewhat fictionalized series of biographical studies of some immigrants. The Native's Return (1934) is a report of a visit to the land of his birth. His writings form a link in the social literature of the period, especially with regard to the foreign born and laboring classes in which he was so interested.

2579. Laughing in the jungle; the autobiography of an immigrant in America. New York, Harpers, 1932. 335 p. 32–8633 E169.5.A18

2580. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, 1835–1915

Adams was a historian and a railroad executive, and both fields led to some of his writings: such as Three Episodes of Massachusetts History (1892), Studies Military and Diplomatic, 1775–1865 (1911), Lee at Appomattox, and Other Papers (1902), and Railroads: Their Origin and Problems (1878). His interest in literature was evidenced by his distinguished biography, Richard Henry Dana (1890. 2 v.). Civil War letters exchanged between C. F. Adams, his father, and Henry Adams may be found in Worthington Chauncey Ford's two volume A Cycle of Adams Letters, 1861–1865 (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1920).

2581. Charles Francis Adams, by his son, Charles Francis Adams. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1900. 426 p. illus. (American statesmen, v. 29) 0–1689 E467.1.A2A2 E176.A54, v. 29

A life of a son of John Quincy Adams. C. F. Adams, Sr., was a statesman and a diplomat, though possibly best remembered as the father of Henry and Brooks Adams.

2582. Charles Francis Adams, 1835–1915; an autobiography; with a Memorial address delivered November 17, 1915, by Henry Cabot Lodge. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1916. lx, 224 p.

16–6471 E664.A19A2

2583. MARY ANDERSON, 1872–

Mary Anderson was a Swedish emigrant who began in this country as a maid in Michigan, was later a factory worker, and then rose to be the second director of the Women's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor. Her autobiography reflects the position of employed women, particularly in industry, over a period of nearly a half century, hence depicting many of the advances made in this period in woman's situation in society.

2584. Woman at work, the autobiography of Mary Anderson as told to Mary N. Winslow. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press. 1951. 266 p. 51–14305 HD6095.A668

MARY ANTIN, 1881–1949

2585. The promised land. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1912. 373 p. illus.
12–10316 E169.5.A66 1912
An immigrant's autobiographical account of the situation of Jews in Europe as contrasted with that of those in America.

2586. HERBERT ASBURY, 1891–

Herbert Asbury was a descendant of Francis Asbury (1745–1816), who brought organized Methodism to America; this story Herbert Asbury tells in A Methodist Saint, the Life of Bishop Asbury (1927), a somewhat iconoclastic biography. Having broken with the fundamentalist views by which he was raised, Asbury turned to writing relatively liberal "informal" histories. One group dealt with the underworld of various cities: The Gangs of New York (1928), The Barbary Coast (1933) for San Francisco, The French Quarter (1936) for New Orleans, and The Gem of the Prairie (1940) for Chicago. Other works include Sucker's Progress, an Informal History of Gambling in America (1938) and The Golden Flood, an Informal History of America's First Oil Field (1942).

2587. Up from Methodism. New York, Knopf, 1926. 174 p. 26–17134 BX8334.A65
Autobiography.

2588. Carry Nation. New York, Knopf, 1929. xxii, 307 p. illus.
29–21266 HV5232.N3A7
Carry Nation (1846–1911) was a well-known champion of women's rights, prohibitionism, and general moral uplifting of all mankind, for which she worked assiduously and dramatically, leaving in the popular mind the image of a middle-aged woman chopping up the bars of the nation.

2589. GERALD AVERILL, 1896–194–

Averill was a Maine woodsman who died shortly after completing his reminiscences of the forests and those who live there.

2590. Ridge runner; the story of a Maine woodsman. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1948. 217 p.
48–5365 F25.A8

2591. RAY STANNARD BAKER, 1870–1946

Baker is probably best known for his biography of Woodrow Wilson (q. v.); however, he also achieved considerable renown for the autobiographical books he wrote under the pseudonym of David Grayson. These largely took the form of familiar essays in praise of rural life.

2592. Adventures in understanding, by David Grayson [pseud.] Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1925. 273 p.
25–20632 PS3503.A72

2593. Adventures of David Grayson [pseud.] Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1925. 249, 232, 342, 208 p. 26–457 PS3505.A75 1925
Contents.—Adventures in contentment.—Adventures in friendship.—The friendly road.—Great possessions.

2594. Adventures in solitude, by David Grayson [pseud.] Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1931. 180 p.
31–28301 PS3503.A5448A7 1931

2595. Native American; the book of my youth. New York, Scribner, 1941. 336 p.
41–51934 CT275.B313A3

2596. American chronicle. New York, Scribner, 1945. 531 p. 45–2441 PN4874.B25A3
Autobiography.

2597. ALBEN WILLIAM BARKLEY, 1877–1956

Alben Barkley was a prominent elder statesman-politician from Kentucky who achieved fame not only for his national services, but also for his humor. His autobiography gives a good sample of American political humor.

2598. That reminds me. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1954. 288 p.
54–10775 E748.B318A3

2599. WILLIAM BENTLEY, 1759–1819

Rev. Bentley, a Unitarian minister, was known to his contemporaries as a prominent intellectual clergyman. His subsequently published diary for 1784–1819 is now his main claim to be remembered. A mine of detail for historians, the work pictures not only the author, but more so life in a New England seaport at that period.

2600. The diary of William Bentley, D. D., pastor of the East Church, Salem, Massachusetts. Salem, Mass., Essex Institute, 1905–14. 4 v. illus.
6–10941 F74.S1B46

ARTHUR F. BERINGAUSE, 1919–

2601. Brooks Adams; a biography. New York, Knopf, 1955. 404 p.
55–8357 D15.A3B4

Bibliography: p. [392]–404.

Brooks Adams (1848–1927), brother of Henry Adams (q. v.), was a distinguished thinker and historian. Most of his influence was behind the scenes or indirect, as that upon Theodore Roosevelt. In The Law of Civilization and Decay (1895) he presented an interpretation of history which was not only the first such theoretical work by an American, but also in its own rights a contribution to American and Western intellectual history.

2602. LAUNCELOT MINOR BLACKFORD, 1894–

Blackford, an Atlanta, Georgia, doctor, is a descendant of Mary Blackford. His life of her, while depicting a woman of character who was far from the clinging vine of historical romances, shows some of the way of life in Virginia and a sample of the anti-slavery sentiment that existed in the South during the Civil War and pre-Civil War period.

2603. Mine eyes have seen the glory; the story of a Virginia lady, Mary Berkeley Minor Blackford, 1802–1896, who taught her sons to hate slavery and to love the Union. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1954. 293 p.
54–5018 F230.B65B6

2604. EDWARD WILLIAM BOK, 1863–1930

Bok was an American editor who as a child came to America from the Netherlands. His autobiography was awarded the Pulitzer price in 1921.

2605. The Americanization of Edward Bok; the autobiography of a Dutch boy fifty years after. New York, Scribner, 1920. 461 p. illus.
20–17333 PN4874.B62A4

2606. CATHERINE (DRINKER) BOWEN, 1897–

Mrs. Bowen is one of the most popular of the practitioners of fictionalized biography. Basing her books on much research, she imaginatively extrapolates unwitnessed events, and then proceeds to present such scenes as biographical facts.

2607. Yankee from Olympus; Justice Holmes and his family. Boston, Little, Brown, 1944. xvii, 475 p. illus. 44–3384 E664.H773B6

"Material and sources": p. [433]–451.

Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., was noted not only as a distinguished jurist, but also as one carrying on a notable American tradition; consequently, both his grandfather, a clergyman, and his father, the distinguished author-doctor (q. v.), are treated at some length in this book. Another view of the man may be gathered from the Holmes-Pollock Letters, the Correspondence of Mr. Justice Holmes and Sir Frederick Pollock, 1874–1932 (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1941. 2 v.), edited by Mark De Wolfe Howe.

2608. John Adams and the American Revolution. Boston, Little, Brown, 1950. xvii, 699 p. illus. 50–8182 E322.B68

Bibliography: p. 646–676.

A fictional biography of the younger years of a leading revolutionist who was to become the second President of the United States.

2609. HENRY MARIE BRACKENRIDGE, 1786–1871

Brackenridge, a Pennsylvania-Scotch lawyer, had a long career in law, politics, and diplomacy. His travels were the basis of several books of historical importance.

2610. Recollections of persons and places in the West. Philadelphia, Kay [1834] 244 p.
3–20912 F518.B78

One of the first descriptions of the pioneer West, meaning, at this time, in large part the Ohio Valley.

2611. GAMALIEL BRADFORD, 1863–1932

Bradford was a Massachusetts recluse of ill health who devoted most of his life to writing. He originated the "psychograph," a method of short biography by means of which he attempted to extract the essentially vital aspects of a person's life, and through them to give a "soul picture." Although influenced by psychology, he aimed at an artistic product. His studies were highly popular, and they initiated a whole new school of American biography.

2612. Lee the American. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1912. 324 p. illus.
12-7039 E467.1.L4B77
A study of Robert E. Lee (see also entries in index), the Confederate general.

2613. Confederate portraits. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1914. xviii, 291 p. 8 port.
14-7092 E467.B78
CONTENTS.—Joseph E. Johnston.—J. E. B. Stuart.—James Longstreet.—P. G. T. Beauregard.—Judah P. Benjamin.—Alexander H. Stephens.—Robert Toombs.—Raphael Semmes.—The battle of Gettysburg.—Notes.

2614. Union portraits. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1916. 330 p. 4 port.
16-11059 E467.B782
CONTENTS.—George Brinton McClellan.—Joseph Hooker.—George Gordon Meade.—George Henry Thomas.—William Tecumseh Sherman.—Edwin McMasters Stanton.—William Henry Seward.—Charles Sumner.—Samuel Bowles.—Titles of books most frequently cited (p. [297]-298).—Notes.

2615. Portraits of American women. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1919. 276 p. ports.
19-18303 E176.B82
CONTENTS.—Abigail Adams.—Sarah Alden Ripley.—Mary Lyon.—Harriet Beecher Stowe.—Margaret Fuller Ossoli.—Louisa May Alcott.—Frances Elizabeth Willard.—Emily Dickinson.

2616. American portraits, 1875-1900. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1922. 248 p. ports.
22-4659 CT219.B7
CONTENTS.—Mark Twain.—Henry Adams.—Sidney Lanier.—James McNeill Whistler.—James Gillespie Blaine.—Grover Cleveland.—Henry James.—Joseph Jefferson.

2617. Damaged souls. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1923. 284 p. ports.
23-9082 E176.B8
CONTENTS.—Damaged souls.—Benedict Arnold.—Thomas Paine.—Aaron Burr.—John Randolph of Roanoke.—John Brown.—Phineas Taylor Barnum.—Benjamin Franklin Butler.

2618. The journal of Gamaliel Bradford, 1883-1932, edited by Van Wyck Brooks. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1933. 560 p.
33-27386 PS3503.R2Z5 1933

2619. The letters of Gamaliel Bradford, 1918-1931, edited by Van Wyck Brooks. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1934. 377 p.
34-33655 PS3503.R2Z53 1934

2620. WILLIAM CABELL BRUCE, 1860-1946

Bruce was a lawyer and a United States Senator who achieved considerable fame as a biographer. He was awarded a Pulitzer prize for his biography Benjamin Franklin, Self-Revealed (1917), which relied mainly on presenting the subject through extracts from his own writings, with transitional passages supplied by Bruce.

2621. John Randolph of Roanoke, 1773-1833; a biography based largely on new material. 2d ed., rev. New York, Putnam, 1939. xv, 661, 803 p. illus. 39-25590 E302.6.R2B9 1939
First published in 1922 in 2 volumes.
John Randolph was a Virginia statesman of great force who, however, almost made a habit of opposition. An earlier (1882) biography by Henry Adams (q. v.) is well written, but considered by some critics to be prejudiced. Russel Kirk's Randolph of Roanoke, a Study in Conservative Thought (1951) outlines Randolph's ideas and their influence; the book was meant to be something of a supplement to Bruce's study.

2622. EDWARD McNALL BURNS, 1897-

Burns is a historian whose earlier works include a study (1938) of Madison's political and constitutional thought.

2623. David Starr Jordan: prophet of freedom. Stanford, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1953. 243 p. 53-5525 LD3025 1891.B87
Jordan was a famous ichthyologist and the first president of Stanford University; however, this biography is less concerned with his ichthyological and educational career than with his thought and crusades, so that the work becomes a chapter in the history of American thought.

2624. JOHN BURROUGHS, 1837-1921

Burroughs through his writings as a naturalist achieved a position in American literature (q. v.) He also wrote a number of autobiographical and biographical works, such as John James Audubon (1902) and Walt Whitman, a Study (1896). His biographer, Clara Barrus, produced a two-volume Life and Letters of John Burroughs (1925).

2625. Camping & tramping with Roosevelt. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1907. 110 p.
7–31186 E757.B97

Describes a trip in Yellowstone Park with Theodore Roosevelt in 1903, with an added section on a visit to Roosevelt at his home at Oyster Bay.

2626. The heart of Burroughs's journals. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1928. xvii, 361 p.
28–23950 PS1226.A52

2627. John Burroughs talks, his reminiscences and comments as reported by Clifton Johnson. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1922. xvi, 358 p. illus.
22–18205 PS1226.A54

2628. My boyhood, by John Burroughs, with a conclusion by his son, Julian Burroughs. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1922. 247 p. illus.
22–7305 PS1226.A5

2629. NICHOLAS MURRAY BUTLER, 1862–1947

Butler, who was a national and international statesman, is probably best remembered for his work during his long incumbency in the presidency of Columbia University.

2630. Across the busy years: recollections and reflections. New York, Scribner, 1939–40. 2 v. illus.
39–27850 LD1245 1902.A3

2631. HODDING CARTER

Carter, who does not usually use his first name, William, is a liberal, smalltown newspaperman from the Mississippi delta area. His writings present Southern problems from a Southern perspective. In addition to his non-fiction, he has written some novels, notably The Winds of Fear (1944), a polemical study of relations between Negroes and whites.

2632. Where Main Street meets the river. New York, Rinehart, 1953. 339 p.
53–6133 PN4874.C27A3 1953

An account, with opinions on many issues, which traces the author's career since he started a small newspaper in 1932.

2633. PETER CARTWRIGHT, 1785–1872

Cartwright was a clergyman who was long a Kentucky circuit rider, and then brought religion to frontier Illinois. Mrs. Helen Hardie Grant's Peter Cartwright, Pioneer (New York, Abingdon Press, 1951) presents a 20th century view of this once influential Methodist.

2634. Autobiography of Peter Cartwright, the backwoods preacher. Edited by W. P. Strickland. New-York, Carlton & Porter, 1857. 525 p.
12–3515 F545.C31

Supplemented by his later Fifty Years as a Presiding Elder (1872). A "centennial edition" of the autobiography was published in 1956 by the Abingdon Press in Nashville, Tenn.

CHARLES EDWARD CAUTHEN, ed.

2635. Family letters of the three Wade Hamptons, 1782–1901. Columbia, University of South Carolina Press, 1953. xix, 181 p. illus. (South Caroliniana; sesquicentennial series, no. 4)
54–7181 CS71.H23 1953

Letters of three Wade Hamptons (1754–1835, 1791–1858, 1818–1902), which illuminate major events in the South during a period of more than a century.

2636. MARY BOYKIN (MILLER) CHESNUT, 1823–1886

Mary Chesnut was a South Carolinian belle, wife of a U. S. Senator who later became a brigadier-general in the Confederate Army. She was acquainted with a large percentage of the great and near-great of the Confederate States.

2637. A diary from Dixie. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1949. 572 p.
49–11694 E487.C52 1949

This diary of the Civil War period was first published in 1905. The 1949 edition has more material; it was edited by the historical novelist Ben Ames Williams (1889–1953), who used it as a source model for Linda Dewain in House Divided (1947).

2638. SAMUEL CHOTZINOFF, 1889–

Chotzinoff is a musician and critic who was born in Russia of Jewish parents. His autobiography traces the family's coming to America and the years from his life in the slums of New York to his adult success. His biography of Arturo Toscanini, the orchestral conductor, Toscanini: An Intimate Portrait, was published in 1956 (New York, Knopf. 148 p.).

2639. A lost paradise; early reminiscences. New York, Knopf, 1955. 373 p.
54-7202 ML423.C564A3

2640. LOUISE AMELIA KNAPP (SMITH) CLAPPE, 1819–1906

Louise Smith Clappe was a doctor's wife who in her letters gave a detailed description of life in a California gold-mining community.

2641. The Shirley letters from the California mines, 1851–1852; with an introd. and notes by Carl I. Wheat. New York, Knopf, 1949. xxix, 216 p. illus. 49-11095 F865.C58 1949

Twenty-three letters written by the author to her sister, Mary Jane, in Massachusetts. They were originally published serially, under the pseudonym of Dame Shirley, in The Pioneer; or, California Monthly Magazine, Jan. 1854–Dec. 1855.

2642. IRVIN SHREWSBURY COBB, 1876–1944

Irvin S. Cobb was born in Kentucky. He later became a New York journalist, a World War I war correspondent, and a humorous columnist. While he wrote some serious fiction, he is better known for his works of humor in general and his autobiography in particular, which exemplifies much of the American attitude towards life in its comical aspects.

2643. Exit laughing. Garden City, N. Y., Garden City Pub. Co., 1942. 572 p.
42-36270,PS3505.O14Z5 1942

Autobiography.

2644. CYRENUS COLE, 1863–1939

Cole was born in Iowa and had a career as a newspaperman before he became a Congressman. In addition to an autobiography, he wrote a number of books which in large part deal with Iowa.

2645. I am a man; the Indian Black Hawk, a book . . . marking the one hundredth anniversary of the passing of Ma-ka-tai-me-she-kia-kiak. Iowa City, State Historical Society of Iowa, 1938. 312 p. 38-28006 E83.83.B638

Black Hawk (1767–1838) was a famous Sauk Indian chief who composed his own autobiography, Life of Ma-ka-tai-me-she-kia-kiak . . . (Cincinnati, 1833), by means of dictation and translation, in order to explain his side of the Indian wars in which he had a prominent part; a new edition appeared in 1955.

2646. MONCURE DANIEL CONWAY, 1832–1907

Conway, one of the most prominent figures of his day, was a leading clergyman, author, and liberal. Because of his stand against slavery, he was forced to leave his native Virginia. His many writings include a life of Thomas Paine which is generally considered one of the outstanding biographies of 19th-century America. A biography, Moncure Conway (New Brunswick, Rutgers University Press, 1952) was written by Mary Elizabeth Burtis.

2647. The life of Thomas Paine; with a history of his literary, political and religious career in America, France, and England. To which is added a sketch of Paine by William Cobbett (hitherto unpublished) New York, Putnam, 1892. 2 v. illus.
4-16014 JC178.V2C7

2648. Autobiography. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1904. 2 v. illus.
4-29207 BX9869.C8A3 1904

2649. DAVID CROCKETT, 1786–1836

Davy Crockett, frontiersman and politician, was a fable in his own lifetime. The tall tales told about him became a part of American folklore. A recent revival of the myth, with retouchings, has further removed him from even that degree of truth, robustness, and reality which is to be found in his autobiography (the authorship of which has been disputed). An attempt to identify "the Crockett God made" is James Atkins Shackford's David Crockett, the Man and the Legend no. 3353.

2650. Davy Crockett's own story as written by himself; the autobiography of America's great folk hero. New York, Citadel Press, 1955. 377 p. illus. 51-10010 F436.C9

"Consists of . . . A narrative of the life of David Crockett . . . written by himself, published in 1834; An account of Col. Crockett's tour to the North and down East, published in 1834, and Col. Crockett's exploits and adventures in Texas, published posthumously in 1836."

"Col. Crockett's exploits and adventures in Texas" is a pseudo-autobiography generally ascribed to Richard Penn Smith.

2651. WILBUR LUCIUS CROSS, 1862–1948

Wilbur Cross had a distinguished career as an English professor and Dean of the School of Graduate Studies at Yale University. In the course of his academic career he wrote Life and Times of Laurence Sterne (1909, rev. ed. 1925) and History of Henry Fielding (1918), both definitive works, and considered by some to be among the best biographies in the English language. After retiring from his scholarly career, he was four times elected Governor of his native State of Connecticut. His autobiography reflects not only New England life, but also American academic and political life.

2652. Connecticut Yankee; an autobiography. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1943. 428 p. illus. A43-2896 F100.C7A3

2653. HOMER CROY, 1883-

Croy started life as a Missouri farm boy. After working in journalism, he became a novelist. He is probably best-known, however, for his autobiographical and biographical works.

2654. Country cured. New York, Harper, 1943. 282 p. 43-14871 PS3505.R9554C6
Autobiography.

2655. Wonderful neighbor. New York, Harper, 1945. 204 p. 45-9878 PS3505.R9554Z53
A book of autobiographical sketches depicting life in a Midwestern farm community during the author's youth.

2656. He hanged them high; an authentic account of the fanatical judge who hanged eighty-eight men. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1952. 278 p. illus. 52-6782Law
A biography of Isaac Charles Parker (1838-96), who for three decades was sole U. S. judge over a large frontier area.

2657. Our Will Rogers. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1953. 377 p. 53-10229 PN2287.R74C7
A life of the cowboy-comedian-philosopher who achieved much of his fame as a journalist and as a motion-picture actor. His Autobiography (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1949) is actually a selection by Donald Day from the various newspaper columns, letters, etc., which Rogers wrote.

2658. JULIAN DANA, 1907-

Dana is a California biographer whose name originally was Morgan Mercer. Lost Springtime, the Chronicle of a Journey Far Away and Long Ago (1938) is an account of a camping trip in the Sierras, during which the author manages to recount much early Californian history.

2659. Sutter of California. New York, Press of the Pioneers, 1934. 423 p. illus. 35-27048 F865.S948
Bibliography: p. 397-401.
One of several biographies of John Sutter (1803-1880), on whose land gold was first discovered in California, this book was reissued by Macmillan in 1936. Another distinguished biography of Sutter is James Zollinger's Sutter, the Man and His Empire (New York, Oxford University Press, 1939).

2660. The man who built San Francisco; a study of Ralston's journey with banners. New York, Macmillan, 1936. 397 p. illus. 36-29826 F869.S3R155
William Chapman Ralston (1826-1875) was a capitalist whose career was much entwined with the early history of San Francisco, which receives considerable attention in this biography.

EUGENE DAVENPORT, 1856-1941

2661. Timberland times. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1950. 274 p. 50-6384 F572.G46D3
An autobiographical account of his youth, this book is also a record of how pioneer people lived and thought in the period when the Michigan timberlands were being cleared and turned into farms.

2662. PIERRE JEAN DE SMET, 1801-1873

Father de Smet was an early Jesuit missionary in the American Northwest. His published books include several on his journeys and his work. He also wrote knowingly on the Indians of the area.

2663. Life, letters and travels of Father Pierre-Jean de Smet, S. J., 1801-1873; missionary labors and adventures among the wild tribes of the North American Indians . . . edited from the original unpublished manuscript journals and letter books and from his printed works, with historical, geographical, ethnological and other notes; also a life of Father de Smet . . . by Hiram Martin Chittenden and Alfred Talbot Richardson. New York, Harper, 1905 [©1904] 4 v. illus. 4-33581 F591.S63

2664. WILLIAM ORVILLE DOUGLAS, 1898-

While mainly known for his work in the legal profession, Supreme Court Justice Douglas in his autobiography depicted little of his court activities, presenting instead a regional book about mountain-climbing and fishing in the Northwest.

2665. Of men and mountains. New York, Harper, 1950. xiv, 338 p. 50–7078 F851.7.D68

2666. DANIEL DRAKE, 1785–1852

Drake was a leading pioneer doctor who established his fame in frontier Kentucky and Ohio.

2667. Pioneer life in Kentucky, 1785–1800. Edited from the original manuscript, with introductory comments and a biographical sketch, by Emmet Field Horine. New York, Schuman, 1948. xxix, 257 p. illus. 48–7439 F451.D76 1948

A restoration of the original text of a work which first appeared in 1870.

2668. MARGARET L. (O'NEALE) TIMBERLAKE EATON, 1799?–1879

Mrs. Eaton's autobiography, written in 1873, is a crude but vivid defense of her reputation and an account of her activities in Washington social and political life during the administration of Andrew Jackson. Queena Pollack's biography Peggy Eaton, Democracy's Mistress (New York, Minton, Balch, 1931) offers further material for the sociologist and political historian. An impressive account is Samuel Hopkins Adams' fictional biography, The Gorgeous Hussy (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1934).

2669. The autobiography of Peggy Eaton. New York, Scribner, 1932. 216 p. 32–7318 E381.E15

2670. CHARLES WILLIAM ELIOT, 1834–1926

Charles W. Eliot was long a president of Harvard University. His writings are mainly scholarly, educational, or public-spirited in nature. However, he also wrote a distinguished short memoir of a guide who had been his friend to the time of his death.

2671. John Gilley, Maine farmer and fisherman. Boston, American Unitarian Association, 1904. 72 p. 4–27134 F29.S85E4

2672. PHILIP VICKERS FITHIAN, 1747–1776

Fithian was a schoolmaster, clergyman, and finally army chaplain. In his journal and letters he clearly recorded the reactions of the sections of the country he knew on the eve of the Revolution.

2673. Philip Vickers Fithian, journal and letters. Princeton, University Library, 1900–34. 2 v. illus. 1–30673 E163.F54

Volume 1, covering the years 1767–74, has the subtitle: "Student at Princeton College, 1770–72, Tutor at Nomini Hall in Virginia, 1773–74." Volume 2 covers the period 1775–76 and has the title continued as "Written on the Virginia-Pennsylvania Frontier and in the Army."

A revised edition covering the section for 1773–74 was published in 1943 at Williamsburg, Va., by Colonial Williamsburg, Inc.

2674. CLAUDE MOORE FUESS, 1885–

While rising to a position as headmaster of a private New England school, Fuess wrote a number of scholarly, biographical, and historical works, many of them reflecting his academic connections, such as: An Old New England School (1917), Men of Andover (1928), Amherst (1935), and Stanley King of Amherst (1955). His 1930 biography Daniel Webster (q. v.) is considered by many to be his masterpiece.

2675. Life of Caleb Cushing. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1923. 2 v. 23–12975 E415.9.C98F9

Cushing (1800–79) had an important judicial and diplomatic career, as well as serving some time as a Member of Congress.

2676. Rufus Choate, the wizard of the law. New York, Minton, Balch, 1928. 278 p. illus. 28–8613 E340.C4F9

Choate (1799–1859) was a leading 19th-century lawyer and orator.

2677. Carl Schurz, reformer (1829–1906) New York, Dodd, Mead, 1932. xv, 421 p. illus. (American political leaders) 32–26442 E664.S39F92

"Selected bibliography": p. 395–401.

Schurz was a German-American liberal who led an active diplomatic, political, and military career; his life is to some extent a history of political ideas of the period.

2678. Joseph B. Eastman, servant of the people. New York, Columbia University Press, 1952. 363 p. illus. 52–8268 HE2754.E3F8

Eastman (1882–1944) was a government career man whose career centered mainly about transportation; accordingly, this book is in some measure a review of the activities of the Interstate Commerce Commission during most of his lifetime.

2679. FERRIS GREENSLET, 1875–

Greenslet was successively an editor for The Atlantic Monthly, a literary adviser for Houghton

Mifflin, and then the occupant of several administrative positions in that publishing firm. His early work includes much literary criticism (largely book reviews), and several biographies of literary personages.

2680. Under the bridge, an autobiography. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1943. 237 p.
43–16298 PS3513.R4876Z5

2681. The Lowells and their seven worlds. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1946. xi, 442 p. illus. 46–25260 CS71.L915 1946

A multiple biography of ten generations (including James Russell and Amy Lowell) of a well-to-do Massachusetts family, this book reflects much of New England's history.

2682. HERMANN HAGEDORN, 1882–

Hagedorn, a longtime admirer and student of Theodore Roosevelt (q. v.), has used this lifelong interest as a topic source for many of his books, which frequently employ the biographical medium. These range from studies of aspects or portions of his life, through the editing of the Memorial Edition of Roosevelt's works, to The Rough Rider (1927), a novel dealing with the Spanish-American War activities of the president-to-be. However, Hagedorn has on occasion turned to other subjects, as in Edwin Arlington Robinson (1938), a life of the poet (q. v.); Prophet in the Wilderness (1947, rev. 1954), a life of Albert Schweitzer; and The Magnate William Boyce Thompson and His Time [1869–1930] (1935), an authorized biography. He ventured into collective biography in Americans (1946), a book of 17 biographical sketches designed originally to introduce foreigners to prominent Americans. In addition Hagedorn has written some conventional poetry and drama; his greatest popular success in poetry may have been The Bomb that Fell on America (1946, rev. 1950), a statement on the moral implications of the atomic bomb, stated in a loose Whitman-Sandburg free verse.

2683. Roosevelt in the Bad Lands. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1921. xxvi, 491 p. illus. (Publications of the Roosevelt Memorial Association, 1) 21–19415 E757.H142

A story of Roosevelt in Dakota that is also a story of frontier life.

2684. Leonard Wood, a biography. New York, Harper, 1931. 2 v. illus.
31–24003 E181.W83

Gen. Wood (1860–1927) was a friend of Theodore Roosevelt, a member of the "Rough Riders," a prominent candidate for a presidential nomination, and an administrator in Cuba and the Philippines.

"Authorities": v. 1, p. 430–436; v. 2, p. 496–503.

2685. Brookings; a biography. New York, Macmillan, 1936. 334 p. illus.
36–32578 CT275.B7554H3

Robert S. Brookings (1850–1932) was a merchant who, having made a fortune, became a philanthropist.

"Authorities": p. 317–324; "Publications of Robert S. Brookings": p. 325–326.

2686. The Roosevelt family of Sagamore Hill. New York, Macmillan, 1954. 435 p. illus.
54–11834 E757.3.H3

A view of the Roosevelt family in their home at Oyster Bay, New York. The book follows Theodore Roosevelt to Washington during his years in the presidency.

2687. FRANCIS JOHN HALFORD, 1902–1953

Halford was a medical doctor who practiced in the Hawaiian Islands.

2688. 9 doctors & God. Honolulu, University of Hawaii, 1954. 322 p. illus.
54–10046 R722.H23

The story of the first 9 missionary doctors sent from the United States to the Hawaiian Islands in the 19th century.

RALPH VOLNEY HARLOW, 1884–

2689. Gerrit Smith, philanthropist and reformer. New York, Holt, 1939. 501 p.
39–4639 HV28.S63H3

Gerrit Smith (1797–1874) was a wealthy reformer, philanthropist, and statesman. He was long active in the anti-slavery movement, among others. His life story almost constitutes a history of American philanthropic activities in that period.

2690. RACKHAM HOLT, 1899–

George Washington Carver, an American biography. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1943. 342 p. illus. 43–51106 S417.C3H6

Carver was a Negro scientist who became famous for his work in the development of byproducts of the peanut. His biography in a way reflects the progress of the Negro in America.

2691. PHILIP HONE, 1780–1851

Hone, at one time mayor of New York, was a member of the city's social and literary circles.

His diary indicates the attitudes of the Whig "aristocracy," and it gives a comprehensive picture of life in New York City at that time. It was first published in 1889 as edited by Bayard Tuckermann. The text cited below was edited by Allan Nevins, an American historian and biographer whose works are listed under various subjects in this bibliography.

2692. The diary of Philip Hone, 1828–1851. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1927. 2 v. illus.
28–26080 F128.44.H78

2693. MARK ANTONY DE WOLFE HOWE, 1864–

M. A. De Wolfe Howe was born in Rhode Island, but has become entrenched as the dean of Boston writers. His writings are based on much research, and are usually biographical in form, at times through the arranging and connecting of the subject's own writings. Howe has commonly written about Boston and New England figures in general, and people he himself has known in particular. While many of his books have been about less spectacular personages of history, he did in Holmes of the Breakfast Table (1939) produce a distinguished short biography of the prominent New England doctor-author (q. v.).

2694. Barrett Wendell and his letters. Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1924. 350 p. illus.
24–24596 PS3158.W7Z53

Wendell (1855–1921) was for 40 years a teacher of English literature at Harvard University, as well as the author of considerable literary criticism and history. This biography, composed largely of extracts from his letters, was awarded a Pulitzer prize for biography in 1925.

2695. James Ford Rhodes, American historian. New York, Appleton, 1929. 375 p. illus.
29–9826 E175.5.R44

2696. Portrait of an independent, Moorfield Storey, 1845–1929. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1932. 383 p. illus. 32–11810 E664.S883H7

Includes numerous letters written by Moorefield Storey. A book written to illustrate the position of the independent in American life.

2697. John Jay Chapman and his letters. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1937. 498 p. illus.
37–28704 PS1292.C3Z53

A life of Chapman (1862–1933) composed largely of selected and arranged letters, with connecting statements, which combine to reveal the personality of this New York critic, essayist, translator, and commentator on religious and educational matters. Chapman himself produced some lightly autobiographical work in Memories and Milestones (1915), which is more a commentary on those he has known.

2698. A venture in remembrance. Boston, Little, Brown, 1941. 319 p.
41–16365 PS3515.O858Z5 1941

Autobiography.

2699. WILL JAMES, 1892–1942

James, whose full name is William Roderick James, became an author and artist after a career as a cowboy. His various stories were quite widely read, but it is probably his autobiography, written in the "cowboy vernacular," which has continued to be most widely read, possibly because of its able picturing of the cowboy's life.

2700. Lone cowboy; my life story. New York, Scribner, 1930. 431 p. illus.
30–20657 F596.J287

2701. ALVIN SAUNDERS JOHNSON, 1874–

Alvin Johnson was born on a Nebraska farm, but went on to become an educator prominent in the fields of economics and social science. He founded the New School for Social Research and was the associate editor of the Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences (1930–35).

2702. Pioneer's progress, an autobiography. New York, Viking Press, 1952. 413 p.
52–12704 H59.J6A3

2703. ALFRED KAZIN, 1915–

Kazin is probably most generally known for his literary criticism (q. v.), but he has also published an autobiographical volume that is a lyrical evocation of his childhood in Brooklyn, N. Y., and which gives a view of city tenement life.

2704. A walker in the city. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1951. 176 p. illus.
51–13797 PN75.K3A3

2705. HELEN ADAMS KELLER, 1880–

Helen Keller was a blind and deaf, and hence mute, person who was educated to speak, read (Braille), and take a useful place in society. She has become a leading example of how successfully a handicapped child may overcome its difficulties. Miss Keller, in Teacher: Anne Sullivan Macy (1955), has written a biography of the dedicated woman who led her out of the deaf and blind child's world of isolation.

2706. The story of my life, by Helen Keller with her letters (1887–1901) and a supplementary account of her education, including passages from the reports and letters of her teacher, Anne Mansfield Sullivan, by John Albert Macy. New York, Doubleday, Page, 1903. 441 p. illus.
3–7188 HV1624.K4A15

2707. The world I live in. New York, Century, 1908. 195 p. 8–30582 HV1624.K4A2
"These essays and the poem in this book appeared originally in the Century magazine."—Preface.

2708. Midstream; my later life. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1929. xxiii, 362 p. illus. 29–23705 HV1624.K4A17 1929

2709. Helen Keller's journal, 1936–1937. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1938. 313 p.
38–27235 HV1624.K4A26

2710. ERASMUS DARWIN KEYES, 1810–1895

Keyes graduated from West Point in 1832. His memoirs trace his career after this, from his position on the staff of Gen. Winfield Scott (who is discussed in detail), through his activity in Indian warfare, to his initial participation as a general in the Civil War.

2711. Fifty years' observations of men and events, civil and military. New York, Schribner, 1884. 515 p. 11–23243 E181.K44

2712. RICHARD WILLIAM LEOPOLD

Leopold is a professor of American history at Northwestern University. His most recent biographical work is Elihu Root and the Conservative Tradition (1954).

2713. Robert Dale Owen. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1940. 470 p. illus. (Harvard historical studies . . . v. 45)
40–34930 HX696.O9L56
This biography of Owen (1801–1877) illustrates the important influence of one minor figure on the development of his period. Owen was active in many lines: socialism, politics, etc.
"A list of the writings of Robert Dale Owen": p. [419]–428. Bibliography: p. [429]–440.

2714. CHARLES AUGUSTUS LINDBERGH, 1902–

In 1927 Lindbergh became a popular hero when he flew across the Atlantic from New York to Paris. This pioneering effort still stands out in a lifetime devoted to aviation. His autobiography, which centers about this episode, is a closeup view of American aviation during the first third of the century.

2715. The Spirit of St. Louis. New York, Scribner, 1953. 562 p. illus.
53–11546 TL540.L5A85
Autobiography.

2716. ROBERT MITCHELL LINDNER, 1914–1956

Lindner, a psychoanalyst of literary skill who practiced in Baltimore, had been a criminal psychoanalyst, and had a strong interest in criminals and their causes (as distinct from the traditional approach of their symptoms). This is revealed in books such as Stone Walls and Men (1946) and Prescription for Rebellion (1952).

2717. Rebel without a cause; the hypnoanalysis of a criminal psychopath. New York, Grune & Stratton, 1944. 296 p.
SG44–211 RC602.L513
A case history of an actual, but atypical, Polish-American youth. The book, which depicts a slum childhood and the forming of a criminal, has been regarded as a fascinating, though tragic, major sociological document. At the same time, the novel means employed for obtaining the information, and the resultant unwilled and unmodified veracity, give this an unusual and almost unique position in the field of biography and autobiography.

2718. The fifty-minute hour: a collection of true psychoanalytic tales. New York, Rinehart, 1955, ©1954. 293 p. 54–9863 RC501.L5
True "short stories" about abnormal individuals; each comprises something of a case history, and hence is also something of a picture of abnormal types and the societal processes behind them. The stories have been praised for informative as well as literary qualities.

2719. CARL J. LOMEN

Lomen went to Alaska at the age of 19 to look for gold; he stayed to go into a successful deer-raising industry. Besides the reindeer industry, his book pictures the Alaskan Eskimo and the Klondike gold rush.

2720. Fifty years in Alaska. New York, McKay, 1954. 302 p. 54–13313 F909.L86

KATHARINE DU PRE LUMPKIN, 1897–

2721. The making of a Southerner. New York, Knopf, 1947. 247 p. 47–312 F215.L85

The autobiography of a sociologist who does much to explain Southern social conditions. She has achieved some of her objectivity towards the issue by her education and residence in the North.

2722. ALICE LEE MARRIOTT, 1910–

Alice Marriott is an ethnologist who has written a number of books depicting the customs of Indian groups in the Southwest. Even in her autobiographical works, the main interest is in the Indians she observes.

2723. María, the potter of San Ildefonso. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1948. 294 p. illus. (The Civilization of the American Indian [series]) 48–2101 E98.P8M28

A biography of María Montoya Martínez, a New Mexican Indian who became famous for her pottery.

2724. The valley below. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1949. 243 p. illus. 49–7779 F797.M35

An ethnologist's story of life in a predominantly Spanish American and Indian community in New Mexico.

2725. Greener fields; experiences among the American Indians. New York, Crowell, 1953. 274 p. 53–8436 E98.C9M3

2726. KATHRYN HARROD MASON

Mason was a descendant of James Harrod (1746–1793?), founder of the first settlement in Kentucky; she wrote his biography in an attempt to rescue him from what she felt to be an unjust obscurity. In the course of the book she produces an excellent picture of frontier life.

2727. James Harrod of Kentucky. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1951. xxii, 266 p. illus. (Southern biography series) 51–10080 F454.H3M3

Bibliography: p. [245]–254.

2728. JOHN JOSEPH MATHEWS

Mathews is an Osage Indian who has been very well educated in the white man's tradition.

2729. Wah'kon-tah; the Osage and the white man's road. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1932. 359 p. illus. ([The Civilization of the American Indian series]) 32–28153 E99.O8M3

A story of the Osage Indians and their country; based on the journal of Major Laban J. Miles (1844–1931), who in 1878 became an Osage agent and lived with them thereafter.

2730. Talking to the moon. Chicago, University of Chicago Press. 1945. 243 p. illus. A45–3207 CT275.M4644A3

A detailed observational story of a nature-lover living alone for 10 years on a Kansas prairie.

2731. Life and death of an oilman; the career of E. W. Marland. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1951. 259 p. illus. 51–13242 HD9570.M3M3

A study of an age and place through the study of the rise and decline of one of the last of the big-business tycoons, Ernest Whitworth Marland (1874–1941), an Oklahoma oilman.

2732. ROBERT MAUDSLAY, 1855–1939

Maudslay was an Englishman who settled in Texas in 1882 and engaged in sheep raising.

2733. Texas sheepman; the reminiscences of Robert Maudslay. Austin, University of Texas Press, 1951. 138 p. 51–13259 F391.M46

Letters to a niece which informally describe frontier life and the rapidly growing sheep industry.

2734. WILLIAM HENRY MAULDIN, 1921–

Bill Mauldin achieved fame as a war cartoonist, then as an author. Most of his books combine the two media.

2735. Up front. New York, Holt, 1945. 228 p. illus. 45–3484 D745.2.M34

A story of the regular soldier, based largely on the author's experiences in the European theater of World War II. In large part the text was written around his cartoons.

2736. Back home. New York, Sloane, 1947. 315 p. illus. 47–11625 E169.M426

Copiously illustrated with the author's cartoons, this book reflects his experience as a returning veteran after World War II. The book generalizes enough to be a statement on the position of most veterans.

2737. A sort of a saga. New York, Sloane, 1949. 301 p. illus.
49–11455 NC1429.M428 1949
The story of the author's childhood in New Mexico and Arizona.

2738. Bill Mauldin in Korea. New York, Norton, 1952. 171 p. illus.
52–12878 DS918.M34

2739. DAVID JOHN MAYS, 1896–

Mays is a lawyer with an extensive knowledge of American history. He has written a number of legal works.

2740. Edmund Pendleton, 1721–1803; a biography. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 2 v. illus. 52–5036 F230.P425
A scholarly, thorough, and detailed study of a conservative-revolutionary jurist. The book also deals with Virginia and Revolutionary War politics.

2741. ELLIOTT TUCKER MERRICK, 1905–

Elliott Merrick is the author of several books, fictional and non-fictional, dealing with Labrador and Vermont.

2742. Green Mountain farm. New York, Macmillan, 1948. 209 p.
48–10795 PS3525.E6394G7
A story of how, in order to simplify life during the depression, he purchased a farm in Vermont, and his subsequent experiences and observations there.

2743. GEORGE MIDDLETON, 1880–

In his autobiography Middleton, a playwright, presents a view of the theatrical world during the 45 years in which he was active in it. Middleton, married to a daughter of Robert M. LaFollette, also knew many people prominent in the world of politics.

2744. These things are mine; the autobiography of a journeyman playwright. New York, Macmillan, 1947. 448 p. illus.
47–30341 PS3525.I27Z5

LEE GRAHAM MILLER, 1902–

2745. The story of Ernie Pyle. New York, Viking Press, 1950. 439 p.
50–8918 PN4874.P86M53 1950
Ernie Pyle (1900–1945) became famous during World War II for his work as a war correspondent. A large mass market was reached with his books Here Is Your War (1943), Brave Men (1944), and the posthumous, postwar Last Chapter (1946). Pyle was killed in the Pacific theater of the war shortly before its close. His Home Country (1947) was a selection of articles published from 1935 to 1940, and it reflected the author's travels about America.

2746. MAX CARLTON MILLER, 1901–

Max Miller writes autobiographical-reportorial books in a clear, modern journalistic style that reveals his quiet humor, unpretentiousness, moderate philosophizing, frustration in a complex world, his defeat, and his identity with the common man and underdog. His books are mainly anecdotes and sketches of various persons, places, and events with which he has been connected; sometimes they approximate essays, and sometimes they approximate the short-story form. A number of these have reflected his service with the Navy, such as Daybreak for Our Carrier (1944), describing life on an airplane carrier; The Far Shore (1945), the Normandy and Southern France invasions as seen by naval officer Miller; I'm Sure We've Met Before (1951), which presents what he saw of the Korean War; and Always the Mediterranean (1952), a story of his experiences with the American Sixth Fleet. Other books include The Man on the Barge (1935), a view of humanity and the meek as seen by a bargeman; A Stranger Came to Port (1938), a novel about a businessman who escapes to a houseboat, a story which enables the author to give a good picture of the tuna industry and other harbor maritime activities; Harbor of the Sun (1940), a history of San Diego, California; Reno (1941), a picturesque-anecdotal story of Reno, Nevada; The Town with the Funny Name (1948), the author's nonguidebook view of La Jolla, California; The Cruise of the Cow (1951), a story of a cruise in the Gulf of California; and Speak to the Earth (1955), which deals with the petroleum industry.

2747. I cover the waterfront. New York, Dutton, 1932. 204 p.
32–26658 PS3525.I554I2 1932
A San Diego newspaperman's humorous account in sketch form of life along the waterfront; the work has become a reportorial classic.

2748. The beginning of a mortal. New York, Dutton, 1933. 253 p. illus.
33–33492 PS3525.I554Z5 1933
Childhood and youth in a Washington State lumber town, on a Montana homestead, and in the small California town where he began as a cub reporter.

2749. He went away for a while. New York, Dutton, 1933. 248 p.
33–6648 PS3525.I554H4 1933c
A story of the author's withdrawal to a coastal shack for purposes of meditation, interspersed with the thoughts resulting therefrom.

2750. The second house from the corner. New York, Dutton, 1934. 254 p.
34–25695 PS3525.I554S4 1934
Autobiographical story of a householder in the San Diego suburbs, told mainly in terms of the people he meets and observes.

2751. Fog and men on Bering Sea. New York, Dutton, 1936. 271 p. illus.
36–4911 F951.M56
A personal picture of the Alaskan coast and the Bering Sea.

2752. For the sake of shadows. New York, Dutton, 1936. 200 p.
36–21171 PS3525.I554F6 1936a
An account of the author's experiences as a scriptwriter in Hollywood.

2753. Land where time stands still. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1943. 236 p. illus.
43–4562 F1246.M7
The record of a trip from San Diego, through the desert country, to Cape San Lucas at the tip of Lower California, with a view of the passive life of the Indian natives.

2754. No matter what happens. New York, Dutton, 1949. 249 p. illus.
49–5277 PS3525.I554Z52
An informal, rambling autobiography.

2755. JOSEPH MITCHELL, 1908–

Mitchell's career has been largely as a New York City reporter and as a New Yorker author. His humorous, descriptive works offer a vivid impression of his observations of New York City. This appears not only in his reportorial writing, but also in his semi-fiction, such as McSorley's Wonderful Saloon (1943) and Old Mr. Flood (1948).

2756. My ears are bent. New York, Sheridan House, 1938. 284 p.
38–4768 PS3525.I9714M9 1938

2757. JAMES MONAGHAN, 1891–

James Monaghan, who often signs himself Jay Monaghan, is a historian long concerned with Illinois history. His scholarly, well-written works include Diplomat in Carpet Slippers: Abraham Lincoln Deals With Foreign Affairs (1945) and Civil War on the Western Border (1955). He has also produced a two volume Lincoln Bibliography, 1839–1939 (1943–45) and a pictorial work, This is Illinois (1949).

2758. Last of the bad men, by Jay Monaghan. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1946. 293 p. illus.
46–4731 F595.H8M6
At head of title: The legend of Tom Horn.
"List of sources": p. 275–284.
The life of Tom Horn (1860–1903), a Wyoming professional assassin who worked for a fee.

2759. The Great Rascal; the life and adventures of Ned Buntline. Boston, Little, Brown, 1952, ©1951. 353 p. illus.
52–5003 PS2156.J2Z75
A biography of Edward Zane Carroll Judson (1823–1886), a low quality, dime-novel literary hack and general rogue of great popularity during the 19th century.
Bibliography: p. 312–333.

2760. HARRIET MONROE, 1860–1936

Harriet Monroe was a minor Chicago poet who established a reputation for herself by founding in 1912 and editing Poetry: A Magazine of Verse. Through this she "discovered" many of the more important American poets of the period and helped to find an audience for them. Her autobiography thus becomes a reflection of the literary life of the period.

2761. A poet's life; seventy years in a changing world. New York, Macmillan, 1938. 488 p. illus.
38–27186 PS2423.A4 1938

2762. ANNA MARY (ROBERTSON) MOSES, 1860–

Familiarly known as "Grandma Moses," Anna Moses is an upstate New York country woman who took up painting at 80, and thus as an artist began one of America's phenomenal success stories.

2763. Grandma Moses: my life's history. Edited by Otto Kallir. New York, Harper, 1952. 140 p. illus.
51–11940 ND237.M78A22

JOSEPH NELSON

2764. Backwoods teacher. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1949. 288 p.
49–10524 PZ3.N33335Bac
The experiences of a teacher during his first year in an Ozark hillbilly community in Missouri.

2765. GEORGE HERBERT PALMER, 1842–1933

For more than 40 years Palmer taught philosophy at Harvard, working with men such as Royce, James, and Santayana. While he wrote a number of philosophical, literary, and educational works, he is remembered most for his two "personal" books.

2766. The life of Alice Freeman Palmer. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1908. 354 p. illus. 8–12560 LD7212.7 1882.P2

A life of the author's wife, who died in 1902. The book devotes much attention to her years as president of Wellesley College and her work to build it up. It is also a record of the personal relationship between two individuals with separate careers.

2767. The autobiography of a philosopher. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1930. 137 p. 30–23585 B945.P24A3 1930

A somewhat poetic work which not only shows how the author came to his beliefs, but which also depicts a method of education and the principles by which a major university department of philosophy was built up.

2768. WILLIAM BELMONT PARKER, 1871–1934

Most extensively engaged in his lifetime in Hispanic activities (including the editing of a comprehensive series of Latin American biographies), Parker also produced some American biography. This included The Life and Public Services of Justin Smith Morrill (1944); Morrill (1810–1898) was a New Englander long known as the "father of the Senate" and familiar with many of the famous of his day.

2769. Edward Rowland Sill; his life and work. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1915. 307 p. illus. 15–4670 PS2838.P3

Sill (1841–1887) was a very unprolific poet from Windsor, Conn., who wrote in an Emersonian-Tennysonian tradition, producing some good minor poetry and light essays. Much of his life was passed in Ohio and California. This biography is made up largely of his letters, with Parker supplying connecting passages. Parker also edited The Poetical Works (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1917) of Sill.

2770. JAMES PARTON, 1822–1891

Parton was the first professional biographer in America, and he has been called the father of American biography. With The Life of Horace Greeley (1855), he established himself as a literary force and one of the best paid (and more prolific) authors of his period in America. His lively, realistic, well-written, and well-organized volumes still hold a position in literature, but some also remain major sources. His first work in particular, and his life work in general form a historical landmark in this country's literature. While he ventured into other fields, his work was mainly biographical, occasionally collective. He usually wrote about Americans, although his life of Voltaire (1881, 2 v.) was a major work.

2771. Life and times of Aaron Burr . . . New York, Mason, 1858. 696 p. 7–14130 E302.6.B9P27

2772. Life of Andrew Jackson. New York, Mason, 1860. 3 v. 11–16615 E382.P27

2773. Life and times of Benjamin Franklin. New York, Mason, 1864. 2 v. 10–5354 E302.6.F8P27

2774. Famous Americans of recent times. Boston, Ticknor & Fields, 1867. 473 p. 6–1407 E339.P27

2775. Life of Thomas Jefferson, third President of the United States. Boston, Osgood, 1874. 764 p. 11–22428 E332.P27

2776. Flower, Milton Embick. James Parton, the father of modern biography. Durham, Duke University Press, 1951. 253 p. illus. (Duke University publications) 51–14735 E175.5.P3F6

Bibliography: p. [203]–211.

ANGELO M. PELLEGRINI

2777. Immigrant's return. New York, Macmillan, 1951. 269 p. 51–7138 E184.I8P4

Autobiography of a college professor who emigrated from Italy, as a member of a peasant family, to Washington State at the age of nine in 1913. The book includes an account of the author's return to Italy on a Guggenheim fellowship, and of his search for a definition of "Americanism."

2778. WILLIAM ALEXANDER PERCY, 1885–1942

Percy came from a prominent upper-class family and was well aware of his social responsibilities. During his life he was best known for his poetry, which was conservative in tenor; a volume of Collected Poems appeared in 1943.

2779. Lanterns on the levee; recollections of a planter's son. New York, Knopf, 1941. 347 p. 41–4570 PS3531.E65Z5 1941

An autobiography that depicts life in the Mississippi delta, and reflects the Southern "aristocrat's" view of life.

2780. LIZETTE WOODWORTH REESE, 1856–1935

As a minor poetess of considerable quality Lizette Woodworth Reese was well known through much of her long and relatively placid career for her short neo-Victorian lyrics. A volume of Selected Poems appeared in 1926, to be followed by poetry in volumes such as White April (1930), Pastures (1933), and The Old House in the Country (1936).

2781. A Victorian village. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1929. 285 p. 29–20040 PS2693.V5 1929

Reminiscences of the author's childhood in Maryland, her teaching career in Waverly (near Baltimore), and her career as a writer. The town of Waverly again figures prominently in her somewhat autobiographical The York Road (1931), a volume of essays, sketches, and poems on the village.

2782. JOHN ANDREW RICE, 1888–

Rice was raised in a South Carolina environment that still lived in the past. As an adult he became a liberal educator, finally cooperating in the founding of an experimental college. While much of his autobiography deals with the academic world of the twentieth century as he knew it, a very large part of it is devoted to his "eighteenth century" background.

2783. I came out of the eighteenth century. New York, Harper, 1942. 341 p. 42–36390 LA2317.R47A3

Autobiography.

2784. JACOB AUGUST RIIS, 1849–1914

Riis was a Danish-American journalist with a strong interest in social reform, particularly as it pertained to the worse aspects of urban life. In behalf of his interests he wrote a number of books describing such things as city slums.

2785. The making of an American. New York, Macmillan, 1901. xiii, 443 p. illus. 1–26930 CT275.R6A3 1901

Autobiography.

2786. MARY (ROBERTS) RINEHART, 1876–

Mary Roberts Rinehart is a very popular and prolific, and hence very well paid, novelist who has written to entertain, rather than to create literature.

2787. My story; a new edition and seventeen new years. New York, Rinehart, 1948. 570 p. illus. 48–9313 PS3535.I73Z5 1948

First edition: 1931.

2788. ANDREW DENNY RODGERS, 1900–

Andrew Denny Rodgers III, has, as an author, specialized in biographies of people concerned with the botanical sciences. His scholarly works regularly include much related material on the special field of the biographee. He has also written some poetry, such as Rocks Before the Mansion (1940), a long poem which reflects the history of Ohio.

2789. John Merle Coulter, missionary in science. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1944. 321 p. A44–2293 QK31.C87R6

Coulter (1851–1928) was a botanist who was president of Indiana University and of Lake Forest College before he became a professor at the University of Chicago in 1885, where he remained to the time of his death.

2790. Liberty Hyde Bailey; a story of American plant sciences. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1949. 506 p. 49–1927 SB63.B3R6

Bailey (1858–1955) was a Michigan botanist and horticulturist. In 1888 he became professor of horticulture at Cornell University, becoming dean and director of the College of Agriculture of Cornell in 1903, from which he retired in 1913. He continued his scientific writings and remained generally active in his field long after his retirement. The book reflects much of agricultural research, conservation, and the development of agricultural colleges.

2791. Bernhard Eduard Fernow, a story of North American forestry. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1951. 623 p. Agr51–517 SD129.F4R6

Fernow (1851–1923) was the first professional forester in North America.

2792. Erwin Frink Smith; a story of North American plant pathology. Philadelphia, American Philosophical Society, 1952. 675 p. (Memoirs of the American Philosophical Society, v. 31) 52–11937 QK31.S58R63 Q11.P612, v. 31

Smith (1854–1927) was a New York plant pathologist who for much of his career was employed by the National Government.

2793. THEODORE ROOSEVELT, 1858–1919

Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States from 1901 to 1909, was born in New York City, but is mainly associated with the open country. A great sportsman and exponent of the outdoor life, he expressed his philosophy through the essays in American Ideals (1897) and The Strenuous Life (1900), as well as his numerous autobiographical writings. His more intellectual side may be seen in his biographies, such as The Life of Thomas Hart Benton (1887); his literary and general essays, as in A Book-Lover's Holidays in the Open (1916); and other writings. A "Memorial Edition" of his works appeared in 1923–26 in 24 volumes, and a "National Edition" in 20 volumes appeared in 1926.

2794. Hunting trips of a ranchman; sketches of sport on the northern cattle plains. New York, Putnam, 1885. 318 p. illus.
31–32858 SK45.R6 1885

An early volume recording some of his big-game hunting in the Midwest. Subsequent volumes of his hunting adventures include The Wilderness Hunter (1893), Ranch Life and the Hunting Trail (1902), African Game Trails (1910), and Through the Brazilian Wilderness (1914). Donald Day has edited a selection of these writings in The Hunting and Exploring Adventures of Theodore Roosevelt (New York, Dial Press, 1955. 431 p.). Most of these works reveal not only his activities as a sportsman, but also his interests as a naturalist.

2795. Theodore Roosevelt; an autobiography. New York, Macmillan, 1913. 647 p. illus.
13–24840 E757.R79

2796. CONSTANCE MAYFIELD ROURKE, 1885–1941

Constance M. Rourke wrote a number of biographical and historical works interpreting the American scene. While most of these are predominantly biographical, American Humor (1931) is a historical study of the national character as revealed through its humor. Some of her work, such as Davy Crockett (1934), was aimed mainly at a youthful audience, although a scholarly note at the end discusses sources and the validity of various parts of the myth.

2797. Trumpets of jubilee: Henry Ward Beecher, Harriet Beecher Stowe, Lyman Beecher, Horace Greeley, P. T. Barnum. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1927. 445 p. 27–9542 E176.R85

Many aspects of American life in the early and middle 19th century are shown in this study of some of its leaders.

2798. Troupers of the Gold Coast; or, The rise of Lotta Crabtree. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1928. 262 p. illus.
28–22487 PN2287.L65R6

The history of the early California theater is given through this biographical study of a leading entertainer.

2799. MARI SUSETTE SANDOZ, 1907–

Mari Sandoz was the daughter of a Nebraska immigrant farmer who had been a Swiss medical student. Most of her writings vividly portray the frontier life she early knew. These include novels such as Slogum House (1937) and Miss Morissa, Doctor of the Gold Trail (1955), which have a biographical basis in history; and her more historical writings such as Cheyenne Autumn (1953), the tragic, slightly fictionalized history of the flight back to their native grounds of some Cheyenne Indians whom the American Army had sent to Indian Territory, and The Buffalo Hunters (1954), a story of the disappearing bison and the concomitant disappearance of the Plains Indians.

2800. Old Jules. Boston, Little, Brown, 1935. 424 p. illus. 35–27361 F666.S34

A biography of the author's father, Jules Ami Sandoz (1857?–1928).

2801. Crazy Horse, the strange man of the Oglalas. New York, Knopf, 1942. 428 p.
42–5340 E90.C94S3

Bibliography: p. 417–422.

A biography of Crazy Horse (ca. 1842–1877), a famous Oglala Sioux Indian chief.

2802. HENRY ROWE SCHOOLCRAFT, 1793–1864

Henry R. Schoolcraft took part in a number of exploratory trips through the Mississippi Valley area while it was still largely a frontier wilderness. His reports on these and his extensive books on American Indians constituted a major contribution to the knowledge of the frontier and of the Indians. Longfellow and many other authors were influenced by and made use of these writings. In 1851 Schoolcraft published a volume of Personal Memoirs of a Residence of Thirty Years with the Indian Tribes, which took a rough diary form and thus supplied a near-autobiography of this scholar-frontiersman.

2803. Narrative journal of travels through the northwestern regions of the United States, extending from Detroit through the great chain of American lakes to the sources of the Mississippi River, in the year 1820. East Lansing, Michigan State College Press, 1953. 520 p.
53–1985 F484.3.S37 1953

Included in the appendixes are letters, journals, newspaper accounts, official reports, and other materials relating to the expedition.

First edition: 1821.

2804. CHARLES COLEMAN SELLERS, 1903–

Sellers has written on such diverse biographical subjects as Charles Willson Peale (1947) and Benedict Arnold (1930).

2805. Lorenzo Dow, the bearer of the Word. New York, Minton, Balch, 1928. 275 p. illus. 28–24263 BX8495.D57S4

Lorenzo Dow (1777–1834) was a Methodist minister who toured America and labored long and rigidly in behalf of his God. His once-popular writings have a confused history in alterations of text and titles, but of most interest is History of Cosmopolite, or The Dealings of God, Man, and the Devil, probably the two best-known titles under which his autobiographical work may be identified. Supplementing these is Vicissitudes Exemplified: Or the Journey of Life (1814), by his "Rib," Peggy Dow.

2806. VINCENT SHEEAN, 1899–

Vincent Sheean established the journalistic type of book wherein the author's life is the nexus for observations of world events by a news reporter. Considered as one of the best such writers, Sheean has also written straight biography and much fiction, such as the novels Bird of the Wilderness (1941), Rage of the Soul (1952), and Lily (1954).

2807. Personal history. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1935. 403 p.
35–27062 PN4874.S46A3

London edition (H. Hamilton) has title: In Search of History.

Other volumes employing this personal-narrative technique include Between the Thunder and the Sun (1943) and This House Against This House (1946), both of which deal with problems of World War II.

2808. CORNELIA OTIS SKINNER, 1901–

Cornelia Otis Skinner is a stage actress who has produced a number of humorous autobiographical books. These are light nonfiction, often in the form of sketches in series, designed to entertain, rather than seriously to reflect any aspect of society, or to be instructional in any other way. However, they nevertheless do to some extent reflect upper-income society and the entertainment world.

2809. Our hearts were young and gay, by Cornelia Otis Skinner and Emily Kimbrough. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1942. 247 p.
42–36388 PS3537.K533O8

2810. Family circle. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1948. 310 p. 48–8306 PN2287.S4A3

2811. MONICA (ITOI) SONE, 1919–

Mrs. Sone was raised in Seattle, Washington; her parents, who were Japanese, ran a small hotel in a poor district. Mrs. Sone's autobiography reveals much of the West Coast conflict of cultures and races that occurred between whites and Orientals, climaxing in the family's incarceration in a temporary camp in Idaho during World War II. The book is also a record of the Americanization of a group highly divergent culturally from the basically European group that dominates, with its variations, in this country.

2812. Nisei daughter. Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 238 p. 52–12618 E184.J3S6

Autobiography.

2813. BERT STILES, 1920 or 21–1944

Stiles was an American bomber pilot in Europe during the Second World War, in the course of which he was killed at the age of 23. His book is not only an account of war in the air, but is also the record of a youth's hopes and fears for the world, revealing a personality combination of idealism, unusual sensitivity, and occasional asperity.

2814. Serenade to the big bird. New York, Norton [1952, ©1947] 216 p.
52–239 D790.S9 1952

First published in London in 1947.

2815. IRVING STONE, 1903–

Stone gave up a teaching career in economics to become a writer, primarily of plays and short stories. For a while he wrote pulp fiction in order to finance his career. With Lust for Life (1934), a fictionalized life of Van Gogh, he emerged as a biographer. This was followed by Sailor on Horseback (1938), a biography of novelist Jack London (q. v.). His goal was now to write biography that was interesting and vital as a novel. This led to an increasing fictional element in his otherwise carefully researched works, but also to greater acclaim and fame. While his biographies rapidly put him to the fore among fictional biographers, and were praised as novels, his straight novels in general received less attention.

2816. Clarence Darrow for the defense, a biography. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1941. xi, 570 p. 41-20757Law

Darrow (1857-1938) was a liberal agnostic lawyer who took part in some of the more famous trials of his period. His autobiography, The Story of My Life, appeared in 1932.

2817. They also ran; the story of the men who were defeated for the presidency. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1943. 389 p. ports. 43-8018 E176.S87

2818. Immortal wife, the biographical novel of Jessie Benton Fremont. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1944. 456 p. 44-8140 PZ3.S87872Im

Jessie Frémont (1824-1902) was the wife of the American explorer and geographer, John Frémont.

2819. Adversary in the house. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1947. 432 p. 47-31015 PZ3.S87872Ad

A fictional biography of Eugene Victor Debs (1855-1926), a leading Socialist who was five times a candidate for the presidency.

2820. The President's lady; a novel about Rachel and Andrew Jackson. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 338 p. 51-6885 PZ3.S87872Pr

2821. Love is eternal; a novel about Mary Todd Lincoln and Abraham Lincoln. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1954. 468 p. 54-9678 PZ3.S87872Lo

2822. GEORGE TEMPLETON STRONG, 1820-1875

Strong started a diary while at Columbia College and continued it through most of the rest of his life. One of the classic American diaries, it reflects life in New York City at that period, especially as seen by a member of the upper classes. Except for a brief overlapping period, it follows and supplements Philip Hone's Diary (q. v.).

2823. Diary; edited by Allan Nevins and Milton Halsey Thomas. New York, Macmillan, 1952. 4 v. illus. 52-11147 E415.9.S86A3

CONTENTS.—1. Young man in New York, 1835-1849.—2. The turbulent fifties, 1850-1859.—3. The Civil War, 1860-1865.—4. Post-war years, 1865-1875.

2824. IDA MINERVA TARBELL, 1857-1944

Ida M. Tarbell began her auctorial career in association with the muckrakers, producing, in addition to her journalistic work, a two-volume History of the Standard Oil Company (1904); this reflected what was to remain a basic concern with industry. Because of her interests, her autobiography showed much of the social issues of the day. Her late biographies were inclined to present in a favorable light and with praise the subjects, who supplied her with information. In addition to industry and social problems, she retained a lifelong interest in Lincoln, revealed in formerly popular books such as The Life of Abraham Lincoln (1900. 2 v.) and In the Footsteps of the Lincolns (1924).

2825. The life of Elbert H. Gary; the story of steel. New York, Appleton, 1925. xii, 361 p. illus. 25-22357 HD9520.G3T3

2826. Owen D. Young, a new type of industrial leader. New York, Macmillan, 1932. xiv, 353 p. 32-26673 E748.Y74T3

2827. All in the day's work; an autobiography. New York, Macmillan, 1939. 412 p. illus. 39-27284 PS3539.A58Z5 1939

2828. RICHARD TAYLOR, 1826-1879

Taylor's memoirs of the Civil War and the Reconstruction period form one of the classics of the South's numerous Civil War books. Prejudiced and bitter in his account of the Reconstruction era, Taylor is noted for his account of the Valley campaign of 1862.

2829. Destruction and reconstuction: personal experiences of the late war. New York, Appleton, 1879. 274 p. 2-22621 E470.T24

2830. ——— Edited by Richard B. Harwell. New York, Longmans, Green, 1955. xxxii, 380 p. 55-5755 E470.T24 1955

2831. STANLEY VESTAL, 1887–

Vestal is the pseudonym of Walter Stanley Campbell. An educator in Oklahoma, he has used his real name for a number of textbooks and scholarly works. His pseudonym is used for books about the West, particularly the old Southwest. These include many biographical works about the pioneers, explorers, trappers, Indian chiefs, etc., including books such as Kit Carson, the Happy Warrior of the Old West (1928), Warpath; the True Story of the Fighting Sioux Told in a Biography of Chief White Bull (1934), King of the Fur Traders, the Deeds and Deviltry of Pierre Esprit Radisson (1940), Bigfoot Wallace (1942), and Jim Bridger, Mountain Man (1946).

2832. Sitting Bull, champion of the Sioux, a biography. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1932. xvi, 350 p. illus. 32–25143 E99.D1S627

2833. Joe Meek; the merry mountain man, a biography. Caldwell, Idaho, Caxton Printers, 1952. 336 p. illus. 52–5211 F880.M513

2834. ANTHONY F. C. WALLACE, 1923–

Wallace as a biographer uses psychological and anthropological knowledge in an attempt to understand his characters and their situations.

2835. King of the Delawares: Teedyuscung, 1700–1763. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1949. 305 p. maps. 49–49266 E99.D2T4

Teedyuscung was a Delaware chief who tried to harmonize the differences between the whites and the Indians.

CHARLES WASHBURN

2836. Come into my parlor; a biography of the aristocratic Everleigh sisters of Chicago. New York, National Library Press, 1936. 255 p. 37–76 HQ146.C4W3

A study of a case of prostitution in Chicago.

2837. EDWARD AUGUSTUS WEEKS, 1898–

Edward Weeks has long been known as editor of The Atlantic Monthly. His autobiography at times takes the form of familiar essays; in it he depicts his childhood in New Jersey, life in the North Woods, his home in Boston, people he has known, and in general the life of a conservative-liberal American.

2838. The open heart. Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. 236 p. 55–10760 PN4874.W369Z5

2839. WALTER FRANCIS WHITE, 1893–

White has achieved fame as general secretary of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and as a Negro white enough to pass as a white, who has nevertheless chosen to be a Negro and to work actively in behalf of other Negroes. His autobiography is accordingly a presentation of his view of race relations in America since the early part of the century. He has written a number of other books on the general subject, including How Far the Promised Land? (1955).

2840. A man called White, the autobiography of Walter White. New York, Viking Press, 1948. 382 p. 48–8621 E185.97.W6A3

REBECCA (YANCEY) WILLIAMS, 1899–

2841. The vanishing Virginian. New York, Dutton, 1940. 277 p. 40–32286 F231.Y35

Sketches of the author's father, reflecting life in Virginia early in the 20th century.

2842. Carry me back. New York, Dutton, 1942. 320 p. 42–21571 PS3545.I5343Z5

Autobiographical book about the author's childhood in Lynchburg, Virginia.

2843. HANS ZINSSER, 1878–1940

Zinsser was a doctor, later a bacteriologist, who did much work abroad as well as in America. His first book, Rats, Lice, and History (1935), is an unusually well-written and witty "biography" of typhus which uses Sterne's Tristram Shandy for a model.

2844. As I remember him. Boston, Little, Brown, 1940. 443 p. 40–27536 R154.Z5A3

An autobiographical pseudo-biography of "R. S.," this book reflects an American scientific humanist's outlook on life, and it also gives much on the progress of medicine.

V

Periodicals and Journalism

A.	Newspapers: General	2845–2850
B.	Newspapers: Periods, Regions, and Topics	2851–2865
C.	Individual Newspapers	2866–2876
D.	Newspapermen	2877–2894
E.	Foreign Language Periodicals	2895–2899
F.	The Practice of Journalism	2900–2912
G.	Magazines: General	2913–2919
H.	Individual Magazines	2920–2926
I.	The Press and Society	2927–2932

IN A COUNTRY which aims at a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, an intelligent and informed public opinion is necessary, if the system is to function properly. From our colonial beginnings the task of informing the people has in large measure been carried on by periodicals, and, insofar as current events and public issues are concerned, principally by newspapers. This has placed on journalism a heavy responsibility, which has been met with varying degrees of success. The books listed in this chapter cover aspects of the development of journalism in this country; because of the prominent role individual editors and other journalists have played in this field, a proportionately large number of biographies and autobiographies have been included. There are also a number of works dealing with or reflecting problems of press responsibility.

Other phases of the history of the press which figure in this chapter are the provision of entertainment and the diffusion of culture. Both of these have often been closely connected, especially in the belletristic writing which has historically constituted a large proportion of American periodical publication. Because this field has been covered less extensively in books than have newspapers and newspaper journalism, the history, nature, and influence of non-newspaper journalism and its practitioners are represented by fewer entries here than we could have wished. However, since much of this material overlaps with literature, journalistic editors and authors and periodicals appear at many other points in the bibliography, notably throughout Chapter I on Literature and in the list of periodicals at the end of Chapter III, Literary History and Criticism. To a less extent this is also true of newspapermen—and the autobiographical work of journalists such as H. L. Mencken (especially his Newspaper Days, no. 1604) and Theodore Dreiser should be considered as being as important to this chapter as to that section in which they appear. Much of this additional material may be located through the index.

A. Newspapers: General

2845. Emery, Edwin, and Henry Ladd Smith. The press and America. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1954. 794 p. illus. (Prentice-Hall journalism series) 54-10508 PN4855.E6

A history of American journalism for the college student. The first 14 chapters, primarily the work of Professor Smith, consider "The Heritage of the American Press" and cover the years 1704–1865.

They are concerned less with details than with the principles upon which the profession was founded in this country. The remaining 15 chapters, chiefly the work of Professor Emery, "examine modern journalism—including newspapers, radio, television, magazines, and news-gathering organizations—and its role in an increasingly complex society." This function is seen mainly as "the continuing efforts by men and women to break down the barriers erected to prevent the flow of information and ideas upon which public opinion is so largely dependent." Throughout the book, the evolution of our mass media and the development of a tradition in American journalism are correlated to political, social, and economic trends. A valuable feature of the book is that at the end of each chapter there is provided a fairly extensive annotated bibliography of books, periodical articles, and monographs for further readings.

2846. Jones, Robert W. Journalism in the United States. New York, Dutton, 1947. xvi, 728 p. illus. 47–4147 PN4801.J6
Bibliography: p. [705]–716.
This history of American newspapers, their publishers and editors, emphasizes the evolution of policies and practices. The author discusses the 17th- and early 18th-century origins of the doctrine of freedom of the press and the growth of such traditions as the interpretation of news and the advocacy of causes, as well as the post-Revolution assertion of political leadership in passing upon the merits of candidates, criticizing local and national administrations, and generally speaking with authority. He points out that the editor, in colonial days "merely a printer who issued a publication to which others contributed the ideas," became after the Revolution a civic as well as a political leader; and his paper, previously a sideline made up in the main of extracts from English newspapers together with a column or so of advertisements of the "classified want ad" type, thereafter supported him financially through "pressure of advertising" and, in taking sides on all public questions, not infrequently abused its privilege of freedom. Throughout the history of American journalism, however, many editors have striven for the ideals of accuracy and the public good.

2847. Mott, Frank Luther. American journalism; a history of newspapers in the United States through 260 years: 1690 to 1950. Rev. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1950. xiv, 835 p. illus. 50–7326 PN4855.M63 1950
"Bibliographical notes" at end of chapters.
Designed especially for use as a teaching aid, this book combines certain attributes of a reference tool with a comprehensive and authoritative history of American journalism, principally newspapers. Arrangement is chronological by chapter within 10 sections, each marked off by events which ushered in a new period. Besides providing brief histories of individual newspapers and their makers, the author deals with: format and materials; concepts, coverage, and content of news; commentary on public affairs; provision of entertainment; advertising; and the relations between the press and the government, and the press and the public. Dean Mott also describes such trends of development as: the change in the status of editor from combined printer and entrepreneur to full-time professional; the rise in journalistic prestige during the Revolution; the emergence of the daily paper and the editorial in the early Republic; the advent of the penny press, sensational journalism, and the reporting of sports and society events in the 1830's; and, in the 1860's and 70's, the final triumph of news over editorials as the primary function of American newspapers. An almost equally massive textbook, Alfred McClung Lee's The Daily Newspaper in America (New York, Macmillan, 1937. xiv, 797 p.), which has unfortunately not been brought up to date in a revised edition, approaches the subject from the sociological point of view. "Significant developments in the manufacture of newspapers, in their advertising and publishing departments, and in society at large are here related to trends in editorial policy."

2848. Stewart, Kenneth, and John Tebbel. Makers of modern journalism. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1952. 514 p. (Prentice-Hall journalism series) 52–8617 PN4871.S7
The authors state in their foreword: "This book is a history of American journalism told in terms of men and motives. It is a biographical history, intended to encompass the story of newspapers in America (and a few of the significant magazine, radio, and television leaders) by means of the interconnected lives and times of the men who have made, and are making, the free press of this country." After a brief survey of the colonial press and the early years of the Republic, the book devotes six chapters to late 19th- and early 20th-century figures such as the Bennetts, Greeley, Dana, Pulitzer, Hearst, and Raymond. There follow chapters on the development of journalism outside the Northeast. The more recently established chains and prominent editors throughout the Nation are next considered. In the closing chapters some editors of magazines, columnists, and radio-television journalists are discussed.

2849. Villard, Oswald Garrison. The disappearing daily; chapters in American newspaper evolution. New York, Knopf, 1944. 285 p.
44-4038 PN4855.V47

This anecdotal report on the American press brings up to 1944 Mr. Villard's earlier work, Some Newspapers and Newspaper-Men, new and rev. ed. (New York, Knopf, 1926. 335 p.), and illuminates trends in "what was once a profession but is now a business." The noted editor and journalist finds these mainly negative: an "alarming mortality" among the dailies, with an accompanying tendency toward monopoly; the "appalling" loss of journalistic influence and prestige caused by the "reactionary and selfish character of much of the press"; and "marked deterioration" in the character and accuracy of reporting and editorials. The author expresses candid opinions of the press associations and of various newspapers, their publishers, editors, reporters, columnists, and correspondents. The recent lack of great editors he ascribes to the "commercialization of the press and its domination by the owners for whom the editors are but hired men."

2850. Wolseley, Roland E. The journalist's bookshelf; an annotated and selected bibliography of United States journalism. 6th ed. Chicago, Quill & Scroll Foundation, 1955. 212 p.
55-10927 Z6940.W86 1955

First published in 1939.

A comprehensive list of the principal books pertaining to American journalism, intended as "a general guide for lay readers in journalism, working journalists, and scholars wishing to know of the major books published up to, but not including 1955." The books, each provided with a brief descriptive or evaluative note, are entered within 26 sections. Twenty-three correspond to the usual divisions of the field, such as business journalism or editorial writing; one lists biographies and autobiographies of journalists; one includes fiction and other creative writing about journalism both for adults and children; and the last is a miscellany. Cross references are provided, but the entries are not numbered. An introductory essay deplores the poverty of the literature, both as to quantity (only about 2500 titles in all) and quality, and suggests that journalism offers a challenge as a subject to American novelists, historians, biographers, and technical writers.

B. Newspapers: Periods, Regions, and Topics

2851. Andrews, J. Cutler. The North reports the Civil War. [Pittsburgh] University of Pittsburgh Press, 1955. 813 p. illus.
55-6873 E609.A6

Bibliography: p. 761-780.

Based upon manuscript as well as published sources, this is a massive yet lively and anecdotal chronicle of the Northern "special correspondents" of the Civil War and their reporting. The author notes the journalistic revolution caused by abnormal wartime conditions: an immense increase in newspaper circulation and consequent improvement in printing and makeup, a widespread introduction of Sunday and afternoon editions, and a realization that the prime requisite of a newspaper is prompt and adequately reported news. The newspapers' eagerness to outdo each other in news enterprise induced considerable rivalry among the Washington correspondents, whom Professor Andrews characterizes as preponderantly honest reporters circumscribed by "capricious censorship" and surrounded by a "fog of misinformation." The more than 300 roving field reporters who accompanied the Northern forces he calls "a heterogeneous lot," who, in many instances, endeavored to ingratiate themselves with the officers; their shortcomings are ascribed to the irresponsibility of their editors. The volume reprints numerous extracts illustrating how the major campaigns of the war appeared to the reporters accompanying the Union armies. Bernard A. Weisberger's Reporters for the Union (Boston, Little, Brown, 1953. 316 p.), a briefer and less systematic treatment, emphasizes rather the newspapers' point of view, contrasting the appearance of the war in the pages of Horace Greeley's New York Tribune and other Republican papers, with its appearance in James Gordon Bennett's New York Herald and other Democratic papers. A contemporary biography of one of the leading Civil War correspondents is William Elliot Griffis' Charles Carleton Coffin, War Correspondent, Traveller, Author, and Statesman (Boston, Estes & Lauriat, 1898. 357 p.). As a result of his wartime experience, Coffin (1823-1896) became one of the most popular American historians of the period.

2852. Brigham, Clarence S. Journals and journeymen; a contribution to the history of early American newspapers. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1950. xiv, 114 p.
50-10321 PN4858.B7

The A. S. W. Rosenbach Fellowship in Bibliography.

Concerned with certain aspects of early American newspaper history, this collection of 15 informal lectures is an outgrowth of the author's History and Bibliography of American Newspapers, 1690–1820 (Worcester, Mass., American Antiquarian Society, 1947. 2 v.). He discusses late 18th- and early 19th-century efforts to record newspaper history and goes on to such matters as the similarity between early and modern newspaper titles, financial difficulties of the early publishers, time lag in the news, scurrility and political partisanship, and the careers of the 32 women who served as newspaper publishers in the years 1739–1820. Mr. Brigham remarks upon the historical value of the infinitely varied advertisements, the biographical and genealogical importance of the marriage and death records, and the political and social insights afforded by the Carriers' Addresses or New Year's Verses; and he indicates both scholarly accomplishments and lacunae in the field.

2853. Clark, Thomas D. The southern country editor. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1948. 365 p. facsims. 48–8524 PN4893.C5

Bibliography: p. 339–346.

The rural press has been an important factor throughout the country, but through much of the South it was long the dominant and almost the only journalistic expression to be found, for the region was until recently overwhelmingly rural and agrarian. This makes a study of country editors more important for this area than for others, where metropolitan papers served a larger immediate group, and competed in many cases with rural papers through distant distribution. The South also has social problems, such as race relations and a one-party system, which differentiate it from the rest of the country. The handling of these problems in the Southern rural press is discussed in some detail in this book, which gives its general history from the post-Civil War period to the near-present. It offers little in the way of statistics, which are unavailable in complete form, but is more concerned to study particular cases and representative situations. Although the author is sympathetic toward his editors, he has not hesitated to criticize the failings of Southern rural journalism. Professor Clark has also published three lectures on the part their rural newspapers play in the lives of the Southern people, in The Rural Press and the New South (Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1948. 111 p.).

2854. Cook, Elizabeth Christine. Literary influences in colonial newspapers 1704–1750. New York [Columbia University Press] 1912. 279 p. (Columbia University studies in English and comparative literature) 13–2143 PN4861.C72

Thesis (Ph. D.)—Columbia University, 1912.

Bibliography: p. 266–272.

"An attempt to describe the most typical literary efforts, and to analyze the most typical literary influences" in nine 18th-century American weekly newspapers: The New England Courant, The New England Weekly Journal, The American Mercury (Philadelphia), The Pennsylvania Gazette, The New York Gazette, The New York Weekly Journal, The Maryland Gazette, The Virginia Gazette, and The South Carolina Gazette. The author demonstrates that the colonial paper, cut off from news by irregular communications and from politics by official attitudes, became "a definite type of literary weekly." The editor relied upon reprints from The Spectator and other English works, as well as upon imitations of the Addisonian essay, and gave space to such traditional subjects as philosophical speculation, anecdote, reminiscence, and connected narrative. Miss Cook discovers in colonial diction "the very tricks and manners of Addison and Steele," Pope's manner of polite formal compliment, the vein of Butler's Hudibras, grim Swiftian humor, and the forthright democratic spirit of The British Cato of Gordon and Trenchard.

2855. Emery, Edwin. History of the American Newspaper Publishers Association. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1950. 263 p. 50–6013 Z479.E6

Bibliography: p. 251–254.

A scholarly and detailed history of the controversial American Newspaper Publishers Association which leaves the reader to draw most of his own inferences. Chapters I–IV and IX trace the growth of this national trade association of daily newspapers from 1887, when it was organized "primarily to further the business interests of its members," to 1949. The author, himself a professor of journalism, finds as continuing trends of activity the promotion of "group actions in the fields of advertising, mechanical development, labor relations, newsprint supply, circulation, and copyright and libel law." The 10 remaining chapters deal with matters that have at times become special issues, such as postal rates and regulations, radio competition for news and advertising, development of effective and economical methods of production and transportation, and government actions affecting the publishing business.

2856. Griffith, Louis Turner, and John Erwin Talmadge. Georgia journalism, 1763–1950. Athens, University of Georgia Press, 1951. 413 p. illus. 51–8385 PN4897.G6G7

While the large papers and chains dominate the journalistic scene by their mere bulk, the greater part of American journalism has been carried on in relatively small and obscure papers, which have had the problem not only of bringing national and foreign news to their readers, but, more important in some respects, of presenting local news and views. Perhaps no one state may be said to have had a "typical" journalistic development; however, that of Georgia is in many ways representative of developments on a state level. This study of Georgia journalism, sponsored by the Georgia Press Association, opens with a survey, by Mr. Talmadge, of the development of Georgia newspapers from 1763 to 1950. An expansion of Mr. Griffith's master's thesis, Part II is a history, based upon the official minutes, of the Georgia Press Association which was founded in 1887 to advance the business interests of the profession. Part III, an annotated directory of Georgia newspapers current in 1950, is a master's thesis by Mildred Lois Miscally, revised and enlarged by Mr. Griffith. James Johnston, editor of the first newspaper, The Georgia Gazette, in 1763, is characterized as "the one important figure in early Georgia journalism," who "more than anyone else 'established and sustained' the newspaper as an institution on Georgia soil." Henry W. Grady, editor of The Atlanta Constitution during the 1870's and 80's, apostle of the "New South" and of the "New journalism" of Joseph Pulitzer, is considered the single most important publicist.

2857. Hooper, Osman Castle. History of Ohio journalism, 1793–1933. Columbus, Ohio, Spahr & Glenn, 1933. 190 p. illus.
34–667 PN4897.O33H6

A pioneering history of Ohio journalism from its beginnings. The author distinguishes four periods: Jeffersonian-Federalist (1793–1815), during which the dominant idea of the territorial newcomers was freedom, statehood was won, and the Federalist papers fought a losing political battle; Jacksonian-Whig (1816–1856), when newspapers were established to promote the cause of John Quincy Adams, Clay, and Harrison against Jackson; Transition (1857–1900), which saw the formation of the Republican Party and the rise of the Republican reform press, the development of newspaper service to the community, and the appearance of evening papers; and the Present (1901–1933), in which the party organ per se has virtually disappeared, and community or city service is increasingly emphasized. Very briefly, Professor Hooper outlines the achievements of such notable figures as Charles Hammond of the Cincinnati Gazette, Edward W. Scripps of the Cleveland Penny Press, J. W. Gray and Charles F. Browne (Artemus Ward) of the Cleveland Plain Dealer, and D. R. Locke (Petroleum V. Nasby) of the Toledo Blade.

2858. Nevins, Allan. American press opinion, Washington to Coolidge; a documentary record of editorial leadership and criticism, 1785–1927. Boston, Heath, 1928. xxv, 598 p. illus.
28–24815 E173.N52

A collection of editorials from American newspapers selected according to Professor Nevins' theory "that specimens of the best work of Greeley, Dana, and Godkin are of immediate present-day interest to journalists, students, and many general readers; that some outstanding American editorials possess qualities entitling them to permanent preservation in easily accessible form; above all, that a wide variety of typical editorials from representative journals, chronologically arranged, will furnish a valuable record of the history of public opinion." Each of the four parts is introduced by a historical essay devoted to major trends and accomplishments of the press during its period. In the editor's opinion, no other American newspaper has equalled the long record of distinction maintained by The New York Evening Post under William Coleman, William Cullen Bryant, Carl Schurz, Edwin L. Godkin, Rollo Ogden, and Simeon Strunsky. Professor Nevins considers Horace Greeley preeminent among editors for the vigor, terseness, and persuasiveness of his writing in The New York Tribune and for his development of the modern American editorial page.

2859. Nevins, Allan, and Frank Weitenkampf. A century of political cartoons; caricature in the United States from 1800 to 1900. With 100 reproductions of cartoons. New York, Scribner, 1944. 190 p. 44–3029 E178.4.N47

In this volume a professor of American history at Columbia University, and the former curator of prints at the New York Public Library, have combined to produce a work illustrating the development of the 19th-century political cartoon in the United States. Each page of text faces a page reproducing the cartoon (in a few cases two) on which the text is based. Many of the cartoons are annotated in terms of their relation to the development of the art, as well as to the political situation with which they deal. While the cartoons at first appeared as separately published prints, with improved graphic methods they found a home in the illustrated journals of the day, and eventually in the daily newspapers. This attractive volume affords a piquant record of the political currents of the century, and of course exhibits the evolution of styles in cartooning, but Professor Nevins, well-informed as he is, does not always succeed in explaining the more baffling aspects of these cartoons.

2860. Rosewater, Victor. History of coöperative news-gathering in the United States. New York, Appleton, 1930. xiv, 430 p.
30–10687 PN4855.R6

Bibliography: p. 411–416.

The book begins with a discussion of early "systematic news-gathering." There follow chapters on the early means of disseminating news, such as horse express, railway express, transatlantic steamer, or telegraph. Subsequent chapters take up the problem of the forming of a news association in the 19th century, with attention concentrated on the Associated Press. The book concludes with a series of chapters on the major cooperative news-gathering agencies: the Associated Press, the United Press, and the International News Service. The author is mainly interested in presenting the story of the development of these agencies, and pays little attention to cooperative work within newspaper chains. The scope of the work does not permit any serious analysis of the social consequences of so great an increase in the freshness and quantity of the news, nor of the new problems of choice and balanced presentation confronting the editors of individual papers. Deadline Every Minute; the Story of The United Press, by Joe Alex Morris (New York, Doubleday, 1957. 356 p.), published to mark the completion of the Association's first half-century, is based in large part on interviews and information from past and present staff members, and, along with multitudinous anecdotes of spectacular coups, reveals much concerning the development of news techniques.

2861. Rosten, Leo C. The Washington correspondents. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1937. xx, 436 p. 37–37583 PN4899.W3C68

Bibliography: p. 393–421.

This book was written on a predoctoral fellowship, and was designed as an analysis of Washington press correspondents and their work. Because Washington as the Nation's capital is the source of a great portion of the Nation's news, an unusually large number of correspondents cover it for the Nation's newspapers, news syndicates, and other media. The first part of the book covers the historical development and methods of Washington reporting; it opens with a review of presidential press relations, and proceeds to other news sources (government agencies, sub rosa gossip, story plants, etc.). The second part of the book is based largely on two questionnaires, and studies the backgrounds, views, and working situations of the correspondents. The third part attempts to discover to what degree the backgrounds and prejudices of the correspondents, and such news sources as government releases and formal conferences, affect the news which is published. A series of appendixes tabulate the results of the questionnaires. The author is better known for his humorous writings published under the name of Leonard Q. Ross.

2862. Tebbel, John W. An American dynasty. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1947. 363 p. illus. 47–30087 PN4899.C4T83

This highly informative book opens with a detailed study of Joseph Medill and the Chicago Tribune, in which he acquired a partnership in 1855. In 1874 he assumed full control and directed it until his death in 1899. Medill was one of the founders of the Republican Party, and a basic Republicanism has continued in the paper and the family to this day. Medill built his paper into a major influence in the Midwest, and the Tribune continues to have the largest and widest circulation in the area, although the extent of its influence has been disputed, since a majority of its readers seem often to vote Democratic. After Medill's death in 1899, the Tribune was controlled until 1914 not by a monarch, but by an editorial board consisting of Robert W. Patterson, Medill McCormick, and James Keeley. In 1914 control was assumed by Robert Rutherford McCormick, who followed his grandfather's personalized journalism, to which he added an isolationism which at times seemed to regard the Eastern United States as an extension of Europe. A third part of the book is devoted to Joseph Patterson, another grandson of Joseph Medill; Patterson obtained control of the New York Daily News in 1919 and under his operation it became the most conspicuous tabloid in the country. Upon his death in 1946 control of the paper passed to a board headed by his sister, Eleanor ("Cissy") Patterson. Miss Patterson came into journalistic prominence when she became editor, working for the Hearst chain, of the Washington Herald in 1930; in 1937 she leased the Washington Times, so as to have an organ in which to express herself when she disagreed with Hearst. She purchased both these papers in 1939, combining them as the Washington Times-Herald, which paper she alined in the family tradition of slanted news, comics, personalities, and mass circulation. Some time after her death in 1948 the paper was sold to the liberal, independent Washington Post. The other papers, despite the death of the leading characters in An American Dynasty, continue to be edited as before. Their importance in American journalistic history resides in the fact that their combined circulation was surpassed only by that of the Hearst chain, though both groups on many leading issues ran counter to prevailing American beliefs.

2863. Turnbull, George S. History of Oregon newspapers. Portland, Or., Binfords & Mort, 1939. 560 p. illus. 40–1256 PN4897.O73T8

A record of the progress of Oregon journalism, 1846–1939, from the founding of the pioneer Oregon Spectator at Oregon City, the first newspaper issued west of the Missouri River, to the operations of the modern metropolitan press. Parts I–II are devoted to the metropolitan newspapers, most of them dailies. The more important journals are accorded separate chapters, the lesser, paragraphs or even a sentence or two. Parts III–IX are devoted to special aspects of the subject: journalism by counties, arranged in chronological order of the founding of their first papers; reporting; society writing; Sunday features; sports writing; trade and class publications; and the growth of the newspaper business. Professor Turnbull emphasizes the political bent and personal journalism of the early papers, as well as the emergence in the 1880's and 90's of the doctrine that news gathering and writing are the primary functions of the newspaper. He considers Harvey Whitefield Scott, editor of the Republican Oregonian, 1865–1872, 1877–1910, and C. S. Jackson, editor of the Democratic Oregon Journal, 1902–1919, as perhaps the most distinguished Oregon publicists.

2864. Watson, Elmo Scott. A history of newspaper syndicates in the United States, 1865–1935. Chicago, 1936. 98 p. illus. 36–18471 PN4888.S9W3 1936

Bibliography: p. 86–89.

"A directory of newspaper syndicates in the United States": p. 90–94.

A history of American newspaper syndicates, originating in a thesis for the degree of master of science in journalism at Northwestern University. Chapters I–II describe the experiments of the 1840's and 50's; the development in 1861 of an auxiliary service of Civil War news, miscellaneous matter, and advertising for five Wisconsin weeklies by The Wisconsin State Journal; and the establishment in 1865, exclusively for country papers, of the first independent newspaper syndicate by Ansel Nash Kellogg (1832–1886). Chapters III–VIII and X trace the expansion of syndicate operations among city dailies as well as country weeklies in every part of the country, the rise in numbers to some 130 businesses by 1935, and the elaboration of material offered into more than 1,600 separate features providing entertainment or enlightenment. Sunday magazines and the weekday use of syndicated fiction, special articles, and departmental matter have been important factors, the author believes, in reducing newspaper production costs and in stimulating circulation. The progress in mechanical means of reproducing syndicated features is incidentally described. Chapter IX is devoted to the cooperative press associations and the news agencies.

2865. Waugh, Coulton. The comics. New York, Macmillan, 1947. 360 p. illus. 47–12339 NC1426.W3

An informal and enthusiastic but detailed history of American comic strips, "largely put together from study of the actual comics as they have appeared in newspapers—both old and new." The author, himself a practitioner, surveys the field from its rather crude, sensational, and sadistic beginnings during the 1890's in the hands of James Swinnerton, Richard Felton Outcault, and Rudolph Dirks, to the literally illustrated, war-preoccupied strips of the early 1940's, and the reemergence of the earlier funny type in 1946. The comic, a sequence of pictures with a continuing character, aims to build newspaper circulation and to provide informal entertainment for the masses. "The comic sells the paper; the paper gives the comic-strip character his chance to invade millions of homes and impress his personality on millions of hearts." A nationwide phenomenon since the development of feature syndication in 1915, the strip normally appeals to basic human instincts and interests, and avoids racial, political, and other controversial matter.

C. Individual Newspapers

2866. Acheson, Sam Hanna. 35,000 days in Texas; a history of The Dallas News and its forbears. New York, Macmillan, 1938. 337 p. illus. 38–27540 PN4899.D34N4

A history of The Dallas Morning News, founded in 1885, and of its parent journal, the Galveston News, founded in the Republic of Texas in 1842 as "a struggling hope housed in a flimsy shack," but which had become by 1938 "the oldest business institution in Texas." Beside the presentation of news, both papers have been outspokenly concerned with state and national politics, particularly Democratic, and other public issues as well as local matters. Since the author quotes liberally from their pages, his book does not merely chronicle a pioneer publishing venture but reflects much of the political and social history of Texas. The first third of the volume traces the fortunes of the Galveston News to 1885, by which time it had been for 30 years "the most widely circulated, the wealthiest and the most influential paper in Texas"; the remainder is devoted mainly to The Dallas Morning News, originally almost a facsimile of its elder, and the first example of American chain journalism.

2867. Ashton, Wendell J. Voice in the West; biography of a pioneer newspaper. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1950. xv, 424 p. illus. 50–7381 PN4899.S385D4

A history of the Salt Lake City Deseret News, which still bears the name of "the land of the honeybee" applied by the pioneer Mormons to Utah and the adjacent territories where they settled. Founded by them in 1850, the News is now one of the oldest in continuous circulation in the West, and remains a major organ of the Mormon Church, for which it does much job printing, including books, other periodicals, and forms. Mr. Ashton's narrative is concise, sticks to facts, relates the paper's history to the general development of the intermountain West, and avoids the controversial issues involved in religious strife and the Mormons' relations with the outside world. He does, however, depict the early tribulations of the paper, and reports its failings along with its struggle to maintain the freedom of the press. There is a good bibliography (p. [400]–404) and an extensive index.

2868. Baehr, Harry W. The New York Tribune since the Civil War. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1936. 420 p. illus. 36–34595 PN4899.N42T73

"Note on sources": p. 397–401.

Although the New York Tribune was first issued in 1841, this detailed history, a Ph. D. thesis, begins with 1865, the year of "its real beginnings as a modern newspaper," and continues the chronicle to 1936. Chapters I–VI deal with the editorship of Horace Greeley, the founder; Chapters VII–XIX with those of Whitelaw Reid (from 1872), and his son and successor, Ogden Mills Reid (from 1912). The author attributes the position of the paper in 1865 as the "greatest organ of public opinion in the United States" to Greeley's opposition to slavery, the force and unrivaled eloquence of his editorials, his zeal for news gathering and political reporting, and his promotion of such fields as book reviews and scientific reports. Yet even then, Mr. Baehr considers, Greeley was a "man who had outlived his time." Whitelaw Reid "strove with great success to achieve the ideal of a paper of brains." Believing firmly in rugged individualism, the authority of law, and the widest freedom of individual initiative, he "voiced the underlying philosophy of the Tribune from the death of Greeley [1872] down to the present [1936]." In 1924 the New York Tribune purchased the New York Herald, and assumed the name New York Herald-Tribune. It is regarded by many as the leading Republican newspaper in the country.

2869. Berger, Meyer. The story of The New York Times, 1851–1951. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1951. xiv, 589 p. illus. 51–6775 PN4899.N42T53

This centennial history of the Times is in a way an official biography, and it maintains much of the objectivity which has been so prominent a part of the paper's policy. The Times was founded in 1851 by Henry Jarvis Raymond (1820–1869), whose goal was a conservative, objective news coverage. Raymond's career as a leading journalist and as a prominent Republican politician is studied in Ernest Francis Brown's Raymond of the Times (New York, Norton, 1951. 345 p.). Shortly after Raymond's death George Jones (1811–1891) took over as head and for a time continued the paper's conservative policy. He did almost no writing himself, but is important as the "first great businessman publisher." Under him the Times did some outstanding crusading, as in uncovering the Tweed Ring-Tammany Hall corruption. Under Jones there also occurred a notable policy shift; the Times, Republican since its inception, in 1872 opposed Blaine and supported Cleveland. Cleveland won the election, but the Times lost Republican advertising and went into a slump. After Jones' death, the paper was taken over by a group of employees. It was heavily in debt and its end seemed near when Adolf S. Ochs (1858–1935) took control in 1896. The bulk of this book is devoted to the story of the Times under Ochs, whose career is even more fully studied in Gerald W. Johnson's An Honorable Titan (New York, Harper, 1946. 313 p.). Ochs set out to restore the Times as a conservative, independent newspaper, with a policy of acting as "a forum for the consideration of all questions of public importance." He undertook to provide coverage of the "neglected non-sensational" news fields, such as financial and other commercial news, government affairs, books, education, and the like. The paper acquired a reputation as a bible for businessmen, rapidly built up advertising, and prospered in its nonsensational way. Many view it as America's foremost paper, and as usually having the most complete and accurate reports of worldwide general news, with major speeches and reports printed in full, elaborate studies of sociological problems, up-to-date reports for the layman on scientific advances, a wide coverage of commercial news, a leading book review section (see no. 2564), extensive reports on and criticism of the fine and popular arts, etc. After the death of Ochs in 1935, his policies were continued by his son-in-law, Arthur Hays Sulzberger (b. 1891). It has continued to grow in size, circulation, and other aspects. Berger's book concludes with a list of the many Pulitzer prizes won by the paper and members of its staff, to which many more could now be added.

2870. Chamberlin, Joseph Edgar. The Boston Transcript, a history of its first hundred years. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1930. 241 p. illus. 30–14830 PN4899.B6E8

A review of the first century of The Boston Transcript (1830–1930), based upon its files, and told chiefly in terms of the personalities and achievements of its successive editors, who usually "represented conservative prosperity" in a conservatively prosperous New England city. The author, a staff member of the Transcript at the time of writing, devotes only 6 of his 21 chapters to the 20th century. At its beginning, he notes, "the Transcript was indeed very welcome to the conservative classes as a reaction from the 'black journalism' of the time"; it soon espoused the arts, and eschewed sensationalism and the personal attack. Mr. Chamberlin clearly takes pride in the "respectable and intelligent character," the "recognized quality" of this Republican paper's readers, and does not question a policy that "has doubled the volume of the paper's advertising and trebled the rate in recent years, with no corresponding increase in the paper's circulation." The Transcript ceased publication in 1941.

2871. Dabney, Thomas Ewing. One hundred great years; the story of The Times-Picayune from its founding to 1940. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1944. 552 p. 44–5253 PN4899.N32T63

A composite history of The Times-Picayune, founded in 1837 and issued until April 6, 1914, as The Daily Picayune, and of 100 years in the life of New Orleans, its sponsoring city. The author, a former staff member, attributes its initial success to its relative cheapness, to its "broader interpretation of news values, to the brevity of its stories, to its humorous slant, and to the freedom of the publishers from political entanglements, as well as their fearlessness and the good nature of their criticisms." During the War with Mexico (1846–48), George Wilkins Kendall, a founder of the Picayune, "created the tradition of the war correspondent who followed the troops into battle to get the news." By 1904, Mr. Dabney notes, the growing population of the city and the expanding operations of the paper forced "the retreat of the editor's personality," and the Picayune became "impersonal and objective, a factual medium, a means of marshaling data from which the public could draw conclusions, without the guidance of those it knew and trusted."

2872. Laney, Al. Paris Herald, the incredible newspaper. New York, Appleton-Century, 1947. 334 p. 47–11001 PN4899.N42H44

In 1887 the younger James Gordon Bennett (q. v.) decided to start a paper in France; in its first few decades the paper, named the Paris Herald after Bennett's New York Herald, reflected the owner's views of what it should be. In time it was transformed from not much more than a social column to a genuine newspaper catering primarily to Americans in Europe. It became a leading news source, and it continued to appear until the Germans occupied Paris in 1940. It resumed publication as the European edition of the New York Herald-Tribune, almost immediately after the American liberation of Paris. Mr. Laney's account is primarily his personal view of the paper as an editor there during the 1920's and 30's, with a brief glance at its earlier and later history. The book reflects a relatively unusual activity of American journalism and also gives a picture of the work of foreign correspondents, many of whom began at, worked through, or cooperated with the Paris Herald. It also reflects the extensive activities of the surprisingly large number of Americans in Paris during Mr. Laney's sojourn.

2873. Nevins, Allan. The Evening Post; a century of journalism. New York, Boni & Liveright, 1922. 590 p. illus. 22–22717 PN4899.N42P7

A history to the year 1922 of the New York Evening Post, established as a Federalist journal in 1801 by Alexander Hamilton and a group of his followers. Aiming to avoid a "mere office-history" at the one extreme and the whole panorama of 19th-century America at the other, the author has selected "the most important, interesting, and illuminating aspects and episodes of the newspaper's history." More than half of the book is devoted to the 50-year editorship (1829–78) of William Cullen Bryant, who by 1850 was firmly established as New York's foremost citizen. His editorial greatness is here attributed to the rhetoric of his grand style, his soundness of judgment and unwavering courage in maintaining it, and his consistent adherence to the principles of freedom and democracy. Other editors of the Post, among them Bryant's son-in-law, Parke Godwin, Carl Schurz, E. L. Godkin, and Rollo Ogden, are more summarily dealt with.

2874. O'Brien, Frank M. The story of The Sun, New York: 1833–1928. New ed. New York, Appleton, 1928. xviii, 305 p. illus.
28–2925 PN4899.N442S8 1928

A history of the New York Sun, founded in 1833 as a popular penny newspaper by Benjamin H. Day, who overcame the lack of facilities for the transmission of news "by the simple method of using what news was nearest at hand—the incidental happenings of New York life," and who brought the paper to the people by instituting the first newsboy carrier system. A reason for The Sun's popularity in the 1850's and 60's, when it lacked real news guidance, spirited editorials, or political prestige, was the light fiction introduced by Moses S. Beach, proprietor of the paper from 1852 to 1868. Charles A. Dana, in his "reign" from 1868–97, "revived American journalism from that trance in which it had forgotten that everybody is human and that the English language is alive and fluid." Chiefly to him and to his great editorial writer, Edward Page Mitchell, who retired in 1920, the author attributes the quality and renown of The Sun's editorial page. At the time of writing Mr. O'Brien was himself editor of The Sun.

2875. Smith, James Eugene. One hundred years of Hartford's Courant, from colonial times through the Civil War. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1949. 342 p.
49–11937 PN4899.H35C6

Bibliography: p. [328]–329.

A report on the first century, 1764–1865, of the Hartford Courant. "Embellished news reprints, rumors, lamentations, predictions," and other tidings from England, the West Indies, and port towns along the Atlantic filled this provincial journal until well into the Revolution, "all suggesting the deep-running disapproval of an imperial meddling with the prosperity of trading." Strongly Federalist, the paper and its editors were "complacent and contented," Mr. Smith believes, during the first years of the Washington administration, but by 1800 were viewing Jefferson's presidency as "catastrophic," and saw Jackson's behavior in 1830 as a demonstration of an "unquenchable thirst for power." Van Buren was regarded as a mere henchman of Jackson and a plunderer of the public domain. In the 1850's, the Courant "drifted into the Republican party, supporting Lincoln's administration during the Civil War."

2876. The Sunpapers of Baltimore, by Gerald W. Johnson, Frank R. Kent, H. L. Mencken [and] Hamilton Owens. New York, Knopf, 1937. xii, 430, xvi p. illus. 37–9111 PN4899.B3S76

A centennial history of The Sun and The Evening Sun of Baltimore, which together are affectionately known as the "Sunpapers." In Chapters I–VI, Mr. Johnson deals with the era of personal journalism and brings the narrative to the death of A. S. Abell, "the Founder," who, impressed by the financial success of Benjamin H. Day's The Sun, New York, invaded the realm of the penny press for the people in 1837, and who established the policy "that the first business of a newspaper is to furnish its readers with the news in which they are interested, whether or not it conforms to the editor's prejudices." Mr. Kent, in Chapters VII–X, describes the papers' battles against the Democratic state machine in the 1880's and 90's. Mr. Mencken, in Chapters XI–XVIII, considers the partnership of the founder's sons and the subsequent formation of a corporation. Author of the three concluding chapters, Mr. Owens describes efforts of the directors to build up the news and editorial departments of their journals. All four writers have been closely connected with the "Sunpapers."

D. Newspapermen

2877. [Bennett] Carlson, Oliver. The man who made news, James Gordon Bennett. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1942. 440 p.
42–24810 PN4874.B4C3

Bibliography: p. 423–428.

James Gordon Bennett (1795–1872) was a Scottish immigrant whose early employment in this country was in jobs mainly connected with newspapers; in this connection he is said to have been "the first real Washington correspondent." In 1835 he founded the New York Herald and rapidly built it up to the newspaper of largest circulation in New York; in time it became the best known American paper in the world. This was due to Bennett's many innovations as a journalist. When he started the Herald, newspapers were organs of particular groups, usually political. Bennett conceived of the newspaper as an organ for the dissemination of news without partisan coloration. This radical view led to a far greater variety of material being included than had previously been considered suitable. This led to charges of sensationalism, and the bruising of many tender sensibilities. Denunciations of Bennett and the sales of his paper increased in a direct ratio. In adding topics to the categories of what might be considered news, and in consciously seeking information for full presentation, Bennett revolutionized journalism, so that most papers at the end of his career were far different from what they had been at its outset. Shortly after the Civil War Bennett turned the editorship of his paper over to his son of the same name (1841–1918) who also played an important role in the history of journalism. Both are studied in Don C. Seitz's The James Gordon Bennetts, Father and Son, Proprietors of the New York Herald (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1928. 405 p.).

2878. [Bonfils and Tammen] Fowler, Gene. Timber line; a story of Bonfils and Tammen. Garden City, N. Y., Garden City Books, 1951, ᶜ1933. 480 p. 52–2466 PN4874.B623F6 1951

A study of Frederick Gilmer Bonfils (1860–1933) and Harry Heye Tammen (1856–1924) and of 38 years of their newspaper; they became partners in 1895 and took over The Denver Post. The paper was a phenomenally successful example of yellow journalism, having set out to out-Hearst Hearst. In tracing its history, the author recounts so many digressive anecdotes that his work is as much a lively history of early Denver as it is a biography or study of the paper. Although an entertaining work that provides a good idea of the nature of the paper and the background against which it was produced, it undertakes no journalistic analysis. The author began his writing career as a reporter for the Post. The book itself is written in a lively journalistic style. Mr. Fowler's own autobiography, A Solo in Tom-toms (New York, Viking Press, 1946. 390 p.), which has some warm admirers, is largely taken up by his boyhood, and only the last hundred-odd pages describe his beginnings in journalism.

2879. [Bowles] Merriam, George S. The life and times of Samuel Bowles. New York, Century Co., 1885. 2 v. 7–12040 E661.B78 PN4874.B63M4

Bowles (1826–1878) in his teens went to work for his father's paper, the Springfield Republican. In the mid-1840's the son was instrumental in changing the paper to a daily, and he assumed a rapidly increasing share of the writing and policy burden. Springfield, Massachusetts, was then a provincial town, but Bowles made his paper into one of the most important in the Nation. He thus became one of the first small-town editors to secure a national audience. Merriam's biography details much of his journalistic activity, which became increasingly tied in with the national events of the period, and prints copious extracts from his letters. From 1855 Bowles was one of the leaders of the new Republican Party, and his biography is an important source for its history during the next two decades.

2880. [Bradford] De Armond, Anna Janney. Andrew Bradford, colonial journalist. Newark, University of Delaware Press, 1949. 272 p. facsims. 50–3419 PN4874.B66D4 1949a

Bibliography: p. 247–251.

Andrew Bradford (1686–1742) was one of the pioneers of printing in the middle colonies. The American Weekly Mercury, which he founded in Philadelphia in 1719, was the first newspaper in Pennsylvania and the third in the Thirteen Colonies. Since little is known about Bradford's apparently uneventful life, this University of Pennsylvania dissertation is mainly a study of the newspaper. Under Bradford it maintained itself as one of the best and most widely read newspapers in the Colonies. It is important not only as one of the better examples of colonial journalism, but also for the principles of the freedom of the press which Bradford expressed in it, thus providing Andrew Hamilton with many of the arguments used in the trial of John Peter Zenger (no. 2931), the point usually taken to mark establishment of the freedom of the press in this country. After her husband's death in 1742, Cornelia Bradford continued to publish the paper into 1746.

2881. [Dana] Stone, Candace. Dana and the Sun. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1938. 431 p. 39–11931 PN4874.D3S8 1938

The early career of Charles Anderson Dana (1819–1897) included residence at Brook Farm and partial adherence to the Transcendentalist movement, editorial work under Greeley on the Tribune, and service as "foreign correspondent" in Europe observing the revolutions of 1848–1849. His letters from Europe appeared in five papers and have been called the first "syndicated" column in American journalism. During the Civil War Dana disagreed with Greeley on editorial policy and resigned. Soon after he took an active part in the war as adviser and observer working with Lincoln, Stanton, and Grant. After the war, in 1868, he was able to purchase the New York Sun, which he continued to edit until his death in 1897. In these three decades he made the paper one of the foremost in American journalism. He made it a vehicle for news as such, but he also made it a personal organ noted for its style, vigor, and independence, so that it was read by many who disagreed with its somewhat erratic policies. Stone's biography, a Columbia University dissertation, emphasizes Dana's career with the Sun and is in large part an analysis of the editorial policies revealed in the paper. A more general biography is James Harrison Wilson's The Life of Charles A. Dana (New York, Harper, 1907. 544 p.). A history of the paper itself is by Frank O'Brien (no. 2874).

2882. Godkin, Edwin Lawrence. Life and letters; edited by Rollo Ogden. New York, Macmillan, 1907. 2 v. 7–12877 PN4874.G5O3

Godkin (1831–1902) was born in Ireland, educated for the law, and became a practicing journalist. In 1856 he came to America where, after touring the South as a correspondent, he founded the Nation (also treated in no. 2921). To this he applied his wide learning and considerable writing ability, making of it a periodical with whose views thinking contemporaries had to reckon, even when they disagreed. Its circulation was never large, but its influence on other journals was from the beginning extensive. In 1881 the Nation and the New York Evening Post effected a merger of sorts, whereby the weekly printed the editorial matter appearing during the week in the daily paper. Carl Schurz (q. v.) was editor-in-chief of both periodicals, with Godkin under him. In 1883 Schurz left, and Godkin became editor-in-chief, continuing in this position until his retirement, because of declining health, in 1900. In both the daily and the weekly paper he maintained his liberal position, never giving in to personal favoritism, waging battle for many worthy causes, and establishing an impressive record as an independent editor. The present work is made up largely of excerpts from the numerous writings of Godkin, especially from his letters. Volume 2 provides an incomplete bibliography (p. 260–268) of Godkin's books and articles.

2883. [Greeley] Van Deusen, Glyndon G. Horace Greeley, nineteenth-century crusader. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1953. 445 p. illus. 53–9554 E415.9.G8V3

Bibliography: p. [431]–437.

Greeley (1811–1872) began newspaper work as an apprentice printer at the age of fifteen. He undertook a succession of printing ventures followed by publishing and editing ones, including literary and political periodicals. In 1841 he established the New York Tribune, and as its editor became one of America's leading journalists. Greeley was important as an idealistic crusader who fought for many reforms, some of them quite radical in his own day. He was of further significance in making his paper an organ for the vigorous expression of varying views on crucial issues; many of the leading writers and thinkers of his day were represented in the columns and on the staff of the Tribune. His career ended in anticlimax with his defeat in the 1872 presidential election, when he ran as the Democratic candidate against Grant. Greeley's vigorous and complex personality has inspired many biographies, from James Parton's early The Life of Horace Greeley (New York, Mason Bros., 1855. 442 p.) to William Harlan Hale's Horace Greeley, Voice of the People (New York, Harper, 1950. 377 p.). His autobiography remains a valuable book for understanding Greeley: Recollections of a Busy Life (New York, Ford, 1868. 624 p.).

2884. [Hearst] Tebbel, John W. The life and good times of William Randolph Hearst. New York, Dutton, 1952. 386 p. 52–8258 PN4874.H4T4

It is generally agreed that Hearst (1863–1951) was one of the greatest forces in American journalism; there is radical disagreement as to what he was a force for. Part of Hearst's vision was derived from the popularization techniques of Pulitzer (no. 2889). A man of extremes, boundless energy, and great inherited wealth (his father was a multimillionaire), Hearst set out to surpass Pulitzer. In the course of pursuing this ambition he created a newspaper empire across the country, attracted a phenomenal mass readership for his periodicals, entered on a grand scale into allied fields such as magazine publishing and radio broadcasting, and brought yellow journalism to its peak. However, it was not merely his sensationalism which aroused his opponents, but also the "causes" for which he fought in front page editorials, slanted news coverage, etc. With his tendency to extreme stands he managed, it has been said, to achieve the almost unique position of having at some time or other offended every person or group exposed to his papers. He also had large political ambitions, first as a candidate and then as a picker of candidates, and as a swayer of public opinion at the polls. Because of his certitude of rightness on so many occasions, and because of the mass communications power with which he backed up his convictions, Hearst usually aroused strong emotions in those exposed to him. For that reason the problem of writing a definitive biography is often regarded as insurmountable, at least for some time to come. Tebbel's account is an attempt to be objective, but for that very reason the many with extreme views of Hearst find it pallid and inadequate. An earlier and somewhat more colorful biography, which approximated a middle view, is Hearst, Lord of San Simeon (New York, Viking Press, 1936. 332 p.), by Oliver Carlson and Ernest Sutherland Bates. A more critical work which appeared in the same year is Ferdinand Lundberg's

Imperial Hearst, a Social Biography (New York, Equinox Cooperative Press,' 1936. 406 p.), which was issued in 1937 in a Modern Library edition. Also published in the same year, and contrasting with these, was Mrs. Fremont Older's William Randolph Hearst, American (New York, Appleton-Century, 1936. 581 p.), a semiofficial and extremely favorable presentation of the "most misunderstood man in America." A recent favorable study, but one of greater moderation, is John K. Winkler's William Randolph Hearst, a New Appraisal (New York, Hastings House, 1955. 325 p.), a revision of the author's W. R. Hearst, an American Phenomenon (New York, Simon & Schuster, 1928. 354 p.). Of special interest is William Randolph Hearst, a Portrait in His Own Words (New York, Simon & Schuster, 1952. 309 p.), which, with the approval of Hearst, was compiled from his letters and other writings by Edmond D. Coblentz, who started working for Hearst in 1900.

2885. Howe, Edgar W. Plain people. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1929. 317 p.
29–7426 PS2014.H5Z5 1929

E. W. Howe (1854–1937) spent most of his life as a small-town newspaper man. As editor of the Atchison, Kansas, Globe he achieved a modest national prominence for his philosophical paragraphs, and it has been said that for a while his paper was one of the most frequently quoted in the country. This autobiography therefore provides a good background for successful small-town journalism. Howe was also a literary figure of some note, and his work is discussed in the Literature chapter of this bibliography (nos. 959–963).

2886. McRae, Milton A. Forty years in newspaperdom; the autobiography of a newspaper man. New York, Brentano's, 1924. xviii, 496 p. illus.
24–25208 PN4874.M47A3

McRae (1858–1930) established or bought control of many newspapers throughout the United States. Much of his work was done with E. W. Scripps (no. 2890), and their joint chain was known as the Scripps-McRae League, since transformed into the Scripps-Howard newspapers. McRae's loosely written autobiography reveals his acquaintanceship with many of the nation's leading newspapermen, and gives insight into much of the journalistic history of forty years. The remainder of the book is devoted to his wide travels and to general observations.

2887. [Nelson] Johnson, Icie F. William Rockhill Nelson and the Kansas City Star; their relation to the development of the beauty and culture of Kansas City and the Middle West. Introd. by William Allen White. Kansas City, Mo., Burton Pub. Co., 1935. 208 p. 36–19204 PN4874.N3J6

Nelson (1841–1915) and a partner founded the Star in 1880. Shortly afterwards Nelson took over full control, maintaining the paper as a highly personal journal until his death. The paper was always "independent politically, . . . [but] by no means . . . neutral." It was conceived as a low-priced family journal, with emphasis on local affairs and general reading matter. With this policy it rapidly built up an extremely large circulation, and became quite influential throughout a large part of the Midwest. However, its greatest importance was as a crusading city paper. The Star was instrumental, through its campaigns, in advancing many programs for civil improvements: better roads, parks, public transportation, etc. While Nelson himself did not write for the paper, he maintained close personal control even when it became a large metropolitan publication. This biography is written in a spirit of admiration, but has no footnotes, no index, and no bibliography. The source even of direct quotations is often left in doubt. An earlier book is William Rockhill Nelson; the Story of a Man, a Newspaper, and a City (Cambridge, Riverside Press, 1915. 274 p.), a memorial volume written "by members of the staff of the Kansas City Star."

2888. Older, Fremont. My own story. New York, Macmillan, 1926. xx, 340 p.
26–19123 F869.S3O43

Older (1856–1935) begins his book at the time when he became editor of the San Francisco Bulletin in 1895; he subsequently published a narrative of his earlier life: Growing Up (San Francisco, San Francisco Call-Bulletin, 1931. 168 p.). The first part of his story is largely that of the newspaper's involvements in politics and his fight against corruption in the local government during the Schmitz-Ruef regime (1901–08). In the latter part of the book he presents his attempts to understand the criminal personality and his code of social responsibility in the sphere of crime. The author's frankness and questioning of motives make the book a good and characteristic report on journalistic activity during a corrupt administration. The same frankness made it injudicious for him to publish his "confession" while he was still editor of the paper; he resigned, rather than drop the Mooney case, in 1917. My Own Story was first published, in a briefer form, at San Francisco in 1919 and again at Oakland, California, in 1925.

2889. [Pulitzer] Barrett, James Wyman. Joseph Pulitzer and his World. New York, Vanguard Press, 1941. xvi, 449 p.
41–21082 PN4874.P8B3

Joseph Pulitzer (1847–1911) was a Hungarian immigrant who began his journalistic career under Carl Schurz (q. v.) on the Westliche Post. After he learned English, he transferred to the St. Louis Post-Dispatch and rose rapidly in the journalistic world. In 1883 he went to New York, where he acquired ownership of the World, and soon built it into one of the most popular and influential of newspapers—partly from a talent for judging what was of popular interest, partly from a flair for uncovering and even creating sensational news. While Pulitzer introduced "yellow journalism," he also held a firm belief in the responsibility of the press. It was this motive that made him a major figure; this, with his battles for the liberty of the press, and his demand that newspapers present the facts of each case, helped raise the press to its latter-day level. He also founded the country's first school of journalism, at Columbia University. At the end of his career he established funds for annual awards in fields such as journalism, literature, and history. These were to go to books, articles, or cartoons presenting the atmosphere of American life, exemplifying good manners, promoting the public good, etc. The annual awarding of the Pulitzer prizes remains a major event, despite occasional controversy, and the prizes have distinguished some of the more important American work in the fields concerned. Barrett (who was city editor for the New York World when it came to an end 20 years after Pulitzer's death) regards Pulitzer as a great American and the greatest of journalists, and the paper itself as having been a major public institution. However, Barrett employs a sentimental, loosely anecdotal approach expressed in a staccato journalese that is inadequate to its theme. He is able to give a first hand account of much of the later history of the paper, and he does outline its earlier history, but leaves room for a more scholarly treatment.

2890. Scripps, Edward W. Damned old crank, a self-portrait of E. W. Scripps drawn from his unpublished writings; edited by Charles R. McCabe. New York, Harper, 1951. xvii, 259 p.
51–10365 PN4874.S37A3

Scripps (1854–1926) was a midwestern journalist who achieved the distinction of establishing the first newspaper chain in this country; in the end he controlled newspapers in 15 states. He also established a news service, the United Press, which eventually supplied hundreds of newspapers. Much of his work was done with his brothers, James and George, and with Milton A. McRae (no. 2886). The Newspaper Enterprise Association was founded in 1901 for the purpose of supplying syndicated material. Scripps insisted that all his newspapers be independent, while they strongly championed the working man. The book is a striking self-portrait of this man who worked vigorously for a full and honest presentation of the news, and who spoke for the workers of the country while most newspapers were speaking for the corporations; it is largely derived from the manuscripts produced by Scripps in his two attempts at autobiography. A study in some respects more detailed is Negley D. Cochran's E. W. Scripps (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1933. 315 p.). A slightly earlier life is Gilson Gardner's Lusty Scripps (New York, Vanguard Press, 1932. 274 p.).

2891. Sullivan, Mark. The education of an American. New York, Doubleday, Doran, 1938. 320 p. illus. 38–28922 PN4874.S78A3

While Sullivan (1874–1952) was one of the leading political columnists of his day, and was busy to the day of his death in recording and commenting upon the contemporary scene, his autobiography has little to say of direct bearing on his journalistic career. Its primary value lies in its picture of the shaping of an American journalist, with its glimpse of his life on the family's Pennsylvania farm, and his approach to journalism. The picture of farm life is by itself an important piece of Americana. Through it the author brings out those elements which shaped his personality and his career. The volume closes with the Wilson administration, when Sullivan had been closely connected with Collier's for about a decade, but before he had become famous as a political commentator.

2892. [Watterson] Wall, Joseph Frazier. Henry Watterson, reconstructed rebel. With an introd. by Alben W. Barkley. New York, Oxford University Press, 1956. 362 p.
56–5672 PN4874.W3W3 1956

Watterson (1840–1921) was a Kentucky journalist who has been called the "last great personal editor"; his career spanned the years in which the old personal and largely political journalism gave way to the large mechanized, news-service newspaper. He began his career in 1858 as a reporter for The New York Times; there followed a variety of activities, largely connected with journalism, even while in the Confederate Army. In 1868 he became editor of the Louisville Daily Journal, which was soon merged with the Courier to become the Journal-Courier, and retained it until he sold control in 1918. He is credited with having been a major factor for the reunification of North and South during the years of strain after the Civil War. He was a major influence in his region, where his editorials were considered news, and as such were repeated by newspapers throughout the country. His style gave special force to his views, and for a period he may well have been "the most widely quoted" man in America. An earlier study of this leading editor is Isaac F. Marcosson's "Marse Henry" (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1951. 269 p.). An important primary source which, however, runs to anecdote and general comment, is his own "Marse Henry"; an Autobiography (New York, Doran, 1919. 2 v.).

2893. White, William Allen. The autobiography of William Allen White. New York, Macmillan, 1946. 669 p. illus.
46–1656 PN4874.W52A3

White (1868–1944) was editor of the Emporia, Kansas, Gazette from 1895 until his death. As editor of a small-town newspaper, he built up a position of national influence. He was not only an oracle in state and national politics, but, more important, he came to be regarded throughout the Nation as a spokesman for midwestern middle-class society. His editorials were reprinted or quoted in numerous papers, so that he was followed by millions, though he sold only a few thousand copies of his own paper. His autobiography, which at the time of his death had only reached 1923, was published posthumously, and in 1947 it was awarded a Pulitzer prize. It reflects not only the work of a leading journalist, but also the situation of a large part of American society for a period of nearly half a century. The story of White's entire life is told in Walter Johnson's William Allen White's America (New York, Holt, 1947. 621 p.). Mr. Johnson also edited Selected Letters of William Allen White, 1899–1943 (New York, Holt, 1947. 460 p.).

2894. [Winchell] McKelway, St. Clair. Gossip; the life and times of Walter Winchell. New York, Viking Press, 1940. 150 p.
40–32480 PN4874.W67M25

Walter Winchell (b. 1897) started his career as a gossip columnist in the twenties. Scandalmongering and ordinary gossiping were new and natural additions to yellow journalism, and Winchell rose rapidly to national prominence. While his work appeared in the New York Mirror and other papers of the Hearst chain, a number of imitators arose to spread the latest rumors of divorce, adultery, romance, incompetence, larceny, etc., among the prominent. Winchell, however, was the one who rode the crest of the wave, and he achieved a vast following for his syndicated column, while millions tuned in on his radio (and later television) broadcasts. In the thirties Winchell became a great enemy of fascism, and the broad field of rumored subversion was added to his repertoire. While he had begun by making public the private life of entertainers and then added the social élite, he now broadened his activities, and is credited with the early demise of many a political and business career. His eminence was such that on occasion both the F. B. I. and prominent gangsters provided him with bodyguard protection. Because Winchell has scrupulously published the most embarrassing secrets of both his friends and his enemies, the latter group has tended to increase with the passing of the years. One result is that most studies of the man do not find his services to have been an unmixed blessing. McKelway's study was the first on Winchell to be published in book form; it was originally published in part in the New Yorker, and remains one of the more readable and objective studies; it deserves to be brought up to date. Lyle Stuart's The Secret Life of Walter Winchell ([n. p.] Boar's Head Books, 1953. 253 p.) is a hostile exposé. A friendly study which also follows Winchell's career past its peak of prestige is Edward Weiner's Let's Go to Press (New York, Putnam, 1955. 270 p.).

E. Foreign Language Periodicals

2895. Backlund, Jonas Oscar. A century of the Swedish American press. Chicago, Swedish American Newspaper Co., 1952. 132 p. illus.
53–17283 PN4885.S8B3

A brief review of the 100-year history (1851–1951) of the Swedish language press in the United States, which omits the more ephemeral or insignificant papers. Although the first publication, Skandinaven (New York, 1851–53), was a news sheet, most papers of the first decade were denominational organs, and none survived infancy. Of the Swedish-American newspapers of general circulation established in the 1870's, the author finds most notable the still surviving Svenska Amerikanaren Tribunen of Chicago and Nordstjernan of New York; less successful has been the Swedish-American journalism of the West. Only one percent of the 1500 Swedish papers that have commenced publication still appear. Mr. Backlund concludes with brief mention of the personalities of the profession and of the organs of special interests: religious, political, fraternal, and literary.

2896. Kolehmainen, John I. Sow the golden seed. Fitchburg, Mass., Raivaaja Pub. Co., 1955. 150 p. illus. 55–32553 PN4885.F5R35

A history of the first 50 years of Raivaaja, a Finnish-language newspaper founded in 1905 in Fitchburg, Mass., to meet the needs of Finnish immigrants, as well as to propagandize for socialism. Although it remained socialist, it early turned against communism. The paper has achieved a national circulation, and even reaches the Finnish areas in Canada. It is of value not only as a study of an individual foreign-language newspaper, but also as an example of the "radical" press of the late 19th and early 20th centuries in America. The book opens with a discussion of the circumstances which led to the founding of the paper. Since the paper also ran a publishing company, this too is discussed, and a bibliography of the paper's publications is supplied at the end of the book. It might be noted that while the Raivaaja Publishing Company is the publisher, the book is not "official," but was compiled through private initiative. However, it is a favorable study which seeks to present the functioning of a foreign-language paper and its services to its community.

2897. Park, Robert E. The immigrant press and its control. New York, Harper, 1922. xix, 487 p. tables, diagrs. (Americanization studies) 22–2469 PN4884.P3

A history and analysis of the immigrant press in America, which opens with a study of the factors leading to the establishment of foreign language presses. It continues with an analysis of the typical contents of foreign language newspapers, followed by a brief history of the immigrant press, and concludes with a section on the various means such as advertising and censorship, which have been used or suggested for the purpose of controlling these. Because of their topicality at the time of publication, much attention is given to World War I and its postwar issues as they were handled in such papers. Unfortunately, no more recent or inclusive history of the immigrant press as a whole has appeared. However, some of the language and nationality groups involved have received individual treatment in other books, a few of which are listed in this section. A brief study of the current situation of the immigrant press may be found in Brown and Roucek's One America (no. 4426).

2898. Soltes, Mordecai. The Yiddish press, an Americanizing agency. New York, Teachers College, Columbia University, 1950. xvi, 242 p. illus. 50–13966 PN4885.Y5S6 1950

Bibliography: p. [223]-230.

This work, written as a dissertation at Columbia University, was first published in 1924. The new "Foreword" offers something of a survey of more recent events, but the original text is unchanged. While the work is really a study of the Yiddish press in New York City, it reflects the Yiddish press throughout the United States, since the New York papers were national in influence and tended to provide a model for such papers elsewhere. The opening section of the book discusses the origin, development, and nature of the Yiddish press in New York. There follows a study of the readers of the newspapers. The author then turns to his main subject, the scope, frequency, and nature of the editorial materials presented. He concludes with some generalizations about the Yiddish press and its Americanizing efforts. While no up-to-date book in English has appeared on the subject, there is a more recent study in Yiddish, covering the Yiddish press in America from its founding in 1870 to the anniversary year of 1945, Joseph Chaikin's Yidishe Bleter in Amerike (New York, 1946. 424 p.).

2899. Wittke, Carl F. The German-language press in America. [Lexington] University of Kentucky Press, 1957. 311 p. 57–5832 PN4885.G3W5

A history of the American German-language press from its beginning in 1732 through 1956. Since this group was once the largest of the foreign language presses, and there have been hundreds of German-language newspapers, the author has not undertaken a tabulation of all of them, although he has studied a few in some detail. His study is primarily an attempt to discover the importance these publications have had in the Americanization of the immigrants, and the difficulties attending such publication ventures. Dean Wittke's "emphasis has been primarily upon the role which the German press and its readers played in American social, political, and economic history." The development of the press is traced for the most part in chronological order. Because the German press has been much reduced since World War I, the great bulk of the book is devoted to the press prior to the 1920's, although some attention is given it in its present diminished state.

F. The Practice of Journalism

2900. Allen, John Edward. Newspaper designing. New York, Harper, 1947. 478 p. illus. 47–31234 PN4775.A64

The first part of Mr. Allen's book is in large part a presentation of the historical background of newspaper designing in America; however, since the author's main interest is in current good practice, much of his material is an explanation of various practices and how they evolved, rather than a general chronological study of newspaper designing as a whole. The second part of the book is a study of the present-day application of these practices. Little attention is given to the technical problems behind the design, and the book concentrates on such topics as the esthetics and the readability of various types, layouts, etc.

2901. Brown, Charles H. News editing and display. New York, Harper, 1952. 457 p. illus. 52–10826 PN4784.C75B7

This textbook for journalism students has been designed as a codification of the rules and practices of newspaper production in so far as they enter into the "desk man's job." It is emphasized that these are not final and unalterable procedures, but rather those generally accepted among newspaper staffs. In the preface the author thus outlines his book: "The first chapters explain the routine procedures of preparing copy for the printers. These are followed by chapters on headline writing and make-up. Then come chapters on fundamental policies and problems. . . . Descriptions of the jobs of departmental editors comprise the final chapters." While the author has sought to distinguish between large and small newspapers, he notes his own bias in favor of the small ones, since they are the type for which the majority of journalism students will go to work.

2902. Elfenbein, Julien. Business journalism, its function and future. Rev. ed. New York, Harper, 1947. xxii, 359 p. illus., forms, diagrs. 47–4246 PN4784.C7E4 1947

This book was designed primarily as a textbook for students of business journalism. It can also be used as something of a guide to the history and present state of the thousands of American business newspapers. House organs and noncommercial journals, sometimes included in this classification, are passed by. Using his more restricted definition, the author in his first part discusses the service these papers perform for the business world and for the community; this is followed by a brief history of the business press in America. Of special interest to the prospective business journalist is the second part of the book, a guide to the functions and methods of various staff members (publisher, editor, advertising sales manager, etc.) of a business paper. The appendixes include a chronological list of American business papers before 1900 (p. 293–304), and a brief dictionary of trade terminology.

2903. Herzberg, Joseph G. Late city edition, by Joseph G. Herzberg and members of the New York Herald Tribune staff. New York, Holt, 1947. 282 p. 47–31261 PN4775.H37

In 29 essays as many members of the Herald Tribune staff here discuss the activities involved in the preparation of a daily paper. While the point of departure is their own paper, the symposium is meant to present the general problems of any American large metropolitan daily. The emphasis of the book is on reportorial work in its many categories, but background rewriting, editing, arranging, etc., are not neglected. Each contributor speaks of his own specialty; thus Geoffrey Parsons, chief editorial writer, does the chapter on "The Editorial Page."

2904. Liebling, Abbott J. The wayward pressman. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1947. 284 p. 47–11624 PN4867.L5

Mr. Liebling (b. 1904) in the first part of this book presents a narrative of his career as a newspaperman in Providence and New York. In a humorous and anecdotal style the author presents a good picture of the development of a journalist, including his departure from newspaper reporting. The burden of his tale is the arbitrariness of newspaper owners, the precariousness of newspaper employment, and the dubious professional status of journalism. In his case the transfer was to The New Yorker, in which a large part of the book's material first appeared. In that magazine Liebling published a series of articles under the general title "The Wayward Press." These were perceptive analyses of sins of commission and omission by the press, particularly in New York City. This critical commentary, in addition to covering aspects of the journalistic world not usually dwelt upon by journalists in their how-to-do-it books, also reveals indirectly much of the inner workings of newspapers. Liebling's Mink and Red Herring, the Wayward Pressman's Casebook (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1949. 251 p.) is made up entirely of articles from The New Yorker, and in it he continues to underline the errors, carelessness, stagnancy, debatable publishing ethics, etc., found in a number of city newspapers.

2905. MacDougall, Curtis D. Newsroom problems and policies. New York, Macmillan, 1941. 592 p. 41–9341 PN4731.M27

This book is designed as an integrative textbook for the journalism student, and is meant to be "of value to the young person about to begin a newspaper career," especially "in forming a philosophy about the job." It focuses upon the problems of the newsroom employee, and the business and mechanical aspects of newspaper work enter only as they affect decisions on matters such as what should be printed and in what manner it should be presented. "How," for instance, "should newspapers handle news related to sex?" "What is libel and how can the newspapers avoid committing it?" The large number of "case studies" showing the actual handling of such problems in various papers enables the book to reflect much of the policy practices prevailing in the American press. The author's own views take account (as of 1941) of what exists, what is ideally desirable, and what steps in that direction are presently practicable. A book which discusses the techniques and policies of reporting is Victor J. Danilov's Public Affairs Reporting (New York, Macmillan, 1955. 487 p.), which "attempts to acquaint the embryo reporter with the various types of public affairs news, to point out where to look for it, and to show how to cover it." Of especial value is its detailed study of the structure and functioning of American governmental units, from the local to the national level.

2906. MacNeil, Neil. Without fear or favor. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1940. 414 p. 40–27336 PN4855.M3

When Mr. MacNeil wrote this book he had been assistant managing editor of The New York Times for about a decade. In it he describes the process of producing a newspaper, from gathering the news to committing it to the presses. The bulk of the book is made up of chapters on reporting and editing various types of news: politics, finance, sports, features, local news, etc. There are also a number of "policy" chapters such as "Without Fear or Favor," "Libel, Ethics, Principles," "Freedom of the Press," and "The Devil's Advocate," which last is a review of propaganda and slanted news releases. It is the American press, he believes, which "has made the United States the most successful democracy in history."

2907. Mott, Frank Luther. The news in America. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 236 p. (The Library of Congress series in American civilization) 52–8218 PN4855.M65

"In this essay I have attempted to define and describe news in the United States, and the way it is assembled, edited, and disseminated." While his primary aim is thus expository, he carries it out in a critical manner throughout, and in the light of a major distinction: "the editor works under a double standard: he has to decide what news he will print, on the one hand, because his readers demand it for the easy reading which brings immediate responses, and what he will select, on the other hand, because he thinks it may, in the long run, affect the lives and fortunes of his readers." However, publishers, news-gatherers, and especially the readers themselves must divide with the editors the responsibility for the present state of things. "The chief fault and failure of American journalism today—and this applies to all media of information—is the disproportionate space and emphasis given to the obviously interesting news of immediate reward ('soft news') at the expense of the significantly important news of situations and events which have not yet reached the stage of being exciting for the casual reader ('hard news')." A second major distinction is developed in Chapter 8, "Objective News vs. Qualified Report." Among the complexities of 20th-century life, reporting no more than the overt event which catches the eyes is seldom enough; it is essential rather, in the words of Kent Cooper of the Associated Press, to have "reporting that digs below the surface and tells the true story" in its deeper significances. But such qualification of the apparent manifestly can lead to editorial tampering with the truth. Dean Mott, while he critically assesses such forms as the weekly news-magazine style of report and the weekly summaries of news which appear in Sunday or Saturday issues of newspapers, judges in conclusion that, "day in and day out, American reporters and editors generally do an honest and tremendously painstaking job."

2908. Rothstein, Arthur. Photojournalism: pictures for magazines and newspaper[s.] New York, American Photographic Book Pub. Co., 1956. 197 p. 56–11558 PN4784.P5R6

This study of photojournalism begins with a brief history of the subject, but as a whole is more concerned with the current esthetics of journalistic photography and the technical problems of processing and layout. The numerous photographs reproduced are in part specimens of journalistic excellence, and in part illustrations of graphic work in progress in newspaper offices. A final chapter, "Privileges and Restrictions," discusses the still fluid subjects of the ethics and the law of photojournalism. An earlier study of one aspect of the field is Daniel D. Mich and Edwin Eberman's The Technique of the Picture Story (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1945. 239 p.); the authors were part of the staff of Look, and their material largely reflects the usages of that magazine. A study which uses the technique of Life magazine as its norm is Wilson Hicks' Words and Pictures, an Introduction to Photojournalism (New York, Harper, 1952. 171 p.). An idea of the life of at least one type of photojournalist may be obtained from Jimmy Hare, News Photographer (New York, Macmillan, 1940. 304 p.) by Cecil Carnes; this is a study of the career of James H. Hare (1856–1946), an Anglo-American war-correspondent photographer whose half-century of activity all over the globe earned him fame as the greatest of news photographers.

2909. Rucker, Frank W., and Herbert Lee Williams. Newspaper organization and management. Ames, Iowa State College Press, 1955. 547 p. illus. 55-9003 PN4775.R8

In the preface the authors state their two purposes in writing this book: the first, "to outline and describe for those now active in newspaper work the best methods and practices used in producing and promoting newspapers," and the second, "to provide for journalism students a textbook revealing important details of newspaper organization and management, the challenging issues and problems that publishers must face, and the qualifications needed for success in directing and managing newspapers." They analyze problems in fields such as newspaper organization, types of newspaper plant equipment, obtaining profitable advertising and public good will, reliable financial and accounting procedures, and maintaining satisfactory interstaff relationships.

2910. Sutton, Albert Alton. Education for journalism in the United States from its beginning to 1940. Evanston, Ill., Northwestern University, 1945. 148 p. (Northwestern University studies in the humanities, no. 10 [i. e. 14])
A45-4968 PN4788.S8

Bibliography: p. 125–126.

This book opens with a historical survey of its subject, from the first program of education for journalism proposed by President Robert E. Lee at what is now Washington and Lee University, and the establishment of the first accredited school of journalism at the University of Missouri in 1908, through 1940, when the study was begun. Dr. Sutton next analyzes in detail the distribution of the schools teaching journalism and the nature of their courses. Of the 542 schools found to be offering one or more courses in journalism, only 32 were schools accredited by the American Association of Schools and Departments of Journalism, while 384 offered neither a major nor a minor in the subject. Attention is also given to the student body, job placements, and curriculum trends. The data accumulated has been brought together in a series of tables which appear both in the text and in the appendix. The information was obtained from questionnaires circulated to the institutions, nearly all of which responded. The story of one journalism school has been told in some detail in one of the volumes comprising the Bicentennial history of Columbia University: Richard Terrill Baker's A History of the Graduate School of Journalism, Columbia University (New York, Columbia University Press, 1954. 144 p.).

2911. Thayer, Frank. Newspaper business management. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1954. 438 p. illus. (Prentice-Hall journalism series)
53-12347 PN4775.T5 1954

This volume was designed as a textbook covering the major factors in the field of newspaper management, and many minor ones as well. While it is partly theoretical, it also includes much in the way of description of actual situations. The chapters cover such aspects as staff organization, circulation, advertising rates, promotion, accounting, and financing. An earlier book on much the same subject was James E. Pollard's Principles of Newspaper Management (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1937. 462 p.).

2912. Wolseley, Roland E., and Laurence R. Campbell. Exploring journalism; with emphasis on its social and professional aspects. 3d ed. Englewood Cliffs, N. J., Prentice-Hall, 1957. 636 p. illus. (Prentice-Hall journalism series)
57-9143 PN4775.W65 1957

This textbook attempts to investigate those mass media which involve journalism in its broader meaning. Thus magazines, books, radio, and television are discussed as well as newspapers. In large part it discusses the requirements of the various media, standard operating techniques in each, and the professional responsibilities imposed by their social implications. This is carried from the problems of gathering straight news, writing it, front page make-up, etc., through those of interpretation and coverage. Each of the chapters concludes with a list of books that may be consulted for further information on the subject. The book originally appeared in 1943; for this edition it has been considerably revised and its coverage expanded.

G. Magazines: General

2913. Britt, George. Forty years—forty millions; the career of Frank A. Munsey. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1935. 309 p. illus.
35–20872 PN4874.M8B7

Munsey (1854–1925) was a big businessman whose major field of operation was publishing. His principal venture was probably Munsey's Magazine, which was evolved in 1891 from Munsey's Weekly, an imitation of the humorous Life. In 1893 Munsey reduced the price from 25 to 10 cents, thus reaching a mass market with his magazine, which was both cheaper and of poorer quality, though having more illustrations than its main competitors. It rapidly achieved the widest circulation of any magazine in America. Munsey in general worked for sales and did not hesitate to kill off any publication that failed to make him a profit. His various magazines were distinguished by a low grade of fiction, often staff-produced; non-crusading and politically conservative articles; an absence of sensationalism; and low prices. In time Munsey extended his activities to the newspaper field, never bringing creative ideas to journalism, but always an important factor in its financial affairs. He also wandered outside the field of journalism finance by such activities as becoming owner of the Mohigan grocery store chain. His positive contribution was that he got magazines into multitudes of low-income homes. Britt's biography is based on interviews and previously published accounts. While Britt did not have access to Munsey's private papers, his book remains a revealing and readable biography of this pioneering capitalist.

2914. Hoffman, Frederick J., Charles Allen, and Carolyn F. Ulrich. The little magazine; a history and a bibliography. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1946. 440 p. illus.
A46–17 PN4836.H6

"List of references": p. [399]–403.

The term "little magazine" refers not to physical size, but to smallness of circulation, usually, however, one of relatively high education and sophistication; further, the term is limited to primarily literary periodicals. Most of these appear quarterly, but a few appear monthly or at other intervals. By virtue of their small circulations, their price is usually relatively high, and their life expectancy is quite low. This type of periodical has existed in various guises for a long time, but it began its full flowering and became of major importance after 1910. Accordingly, this book is a study of the little magazine in the 20th century. It includes general chapters on the history of these periodicals by decades, as well as chapters on various types and subjects, such as poetry, regionalism, political directions, the use of psychoanalytic themes, and criticism. The main importance of the little magazines is that they have served as vehicles for new and experimental writers. Many modern American authors of literary importance have had their reputation established in such magazines before they were accepted by more remunerative publishers. Further, much literature of importance even by established writers appears in these periodicals long before it is published in book form. In addition to the history and analysis this study includes a bibliography (p. 233–398) of all little magazines, arranged chronologically by the year of the initial appearance of each, and each entry is supplied with a brief history and description.

2915. Mott, Frank Luther. A history of American magazines. Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1938–57. 4 v. illus.
39–2823 PN4877.M63 1938

"Chronological list of magazines" at end of each volume.

CONTENTS.—[v. 1] 1741–1850.—v. 2. 1850–1865.—v. 3. 1865–1885.—v. 4. 1885–1905.

Frank Luther Mott (b. 1886) in his continuing history of American magazines has presented the world with an outstanding scholarly and readable work which indirectly reflects much of American culture while it serves directly as an enlightened guide to one area of that culture. He attempts "to illustrate the main currents of the thought and feeling of the American people by some analysis of the contents of the magazines and by carefully chosen quotations from periodicals in order to give a proper idea of the integration of magazines with social movements." For the purposes of this history a magazine has been defined as any non-newspaper periodical appearing more often than semi-annually. Each of the four volumes opens with extensive accounts of the principal events and characteristics of a period, and the main line of development in the magazines of that period. There follow individual chapters on the leading magazines. The periodicals individually treated are not necessarily all the leading ones begun in the period; for, when a periodical reaches its greatest importance in a later period, its history is given in full in the volume on the later period. Further, all these chapters on individual periodicals trace their history beyond the formal time limit of the volume to the date either of the periodical's end or of the writing of the volume in which it is discussed. While Dean Mott's work is remarkably detailed, it is not meant to serve as an exhaustive checklist, that function being left to Winifred Gregory's Union List of Serials (New York, Wilson, 1943. 3065 p.). For the first 70 years a more detailed list including information on personnel is now available: A Register of Editors, Printers, and Publishers of American Magazines, 1741–1810, by Benjamin M. Lewis (New York, New York Public Library, 1957. 40 p.). The first 50 years have received monographic treatment, in greater detail than Dean Mott's and with a different presentation and emphasis, in Lyon N. Richardson's A History of Early American Magazines, 1741–1789 (New York, T. Nelson, 1931. 414 p.).

2916. Noel, Mary. Villains galore; the heyday of the popular story weekly. New York, Macmillan, 1954. 320 p. illus. 54–9474 PN4877.N6

In the 19th century periodicals first began to reach a true mass market, and it was soon discovered that literacy did not necessarily prove either a desire or an ability to cope with large intellectual and esthetic matters. To the dismay of many, and the delight of millions, a "popular literature" was rapidly developed for this new "literate" market. In addition to cheap novels and newspapers, fiction magazines became purveyors of literary fare for the masses. Many of these periodicals were weeklies with most of their stories stolen from one another or written by members of the staff. They provided much of the popular entertainment of the time, serving the same function as movies, radio, and television in the 20th century. Mary Noel's study of this phenomenon opens with an account of about 40 of the more popular story weeklies. There follows a group of chapters with more general comments on and analyses of the contents of such magazines, tracing from their earliest beginnings to the present era the various transformations of the theme of sweetness and violence which formed the substance of most such tales.

2917. Paine, Albert Bigelow. Th. Nast, his period and his pictures. New York, Harper, 1904. xxi, 583, xx p. illus.

26–22753 NC1429.N3P3 1904a

Thomas Nast (1840–1902) is remembered as one of the Nation's first and greatest cartoonists. Most of his work appeared in Harper's Weekly, where he advocated one political reform after another; his main achievements included uncovering the corruption of the Tweed Ring and helping to elect Grover Cleveland to the presidency. While it was a pictorial form in which he expressed himself, he may be regarded as one of the more important journalistic figures of the period. Paine's biography is not so much a study of Nast's personality as a record of Nast's work and influence. The book is therefore a valuable commentary on many aspects of the history of the period.

2918. Peterson, Theodore B. Magazines in the twentieth century. Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1956. 457 p. 56–5683 PN4877.P4

Bibliography: p. [397]–411.

This book reviews the "modern magazine" from its inception in the late 19th century to the present. It is regarded as having arisen out of the transformation from an agrarian to an industrial society, and the need for advertising goods that must be sold. Crucial dates in its evolution were the establishment of favorable postage rates (1879), the introduction of low-priced magazines (1893), and the conscious catering to popular taste, entered upon by The Saturday Evening Post under Lorimer from 1899. For this study the author has limited his attention mainly "to commercial magazines edited for the lay public." In attempting to cover so wide a field, Dr. Peterson first presents chapters on topics such as advertising in the modern popular magazine and the financial structure of its production. The magazines themselves are studied in groups, under categories such as journals now defunct and those still popular. Some attention is devoted to magazines intended for minorities. However, such periodicals as house organs, and scholarly and professional journals, are omitted from consideration.

2919. Wood, James Playsted. Magazines in the United States. 2d ed. New York, Ronald Press Co., 1956. 390 p. illus.

56–10175 PN4877.W6 1956

The author states his purpose in the preface: "This book attempts to show, from general magazines that were important in their time and from important nationally circulated magazines of today, what magazines are and in what directions they exert their social and economic influence. It traces and gauges the force of periodicals from Benjamin Franklin's General Magazine to the weeklies and monthlies of the present. It shows how magazines have both reflected and helped to mould American tastes, habits, manners, interests, and beliefs; how they have shaped opinion on public questions; how they have crusaded effectively for social and political reforms; and how magazine advertising, as well as magazine editorial content, has affected the American home and standard of living." The book, originally published in 1949, is thus more of a social study than a detailed history. Most of the chapters analyze intermagazine trends or developments, such as the handling of the slavery question and of political corruption, magazines during World War II, changes in and expansion of coverage, etc. Some chapters are studies of groups or types of magazines, such as the farm and grocery-store magazines. A few are primarily devoted to particular magazines, such as The Saturday Evening Post, The Reader's Digest, and The New Yorker. A selected bibliography appears on p. 379–383. A book written less for the magazine reader and more for the worker inside the magazine field is Roland E. Wolseley's The Magazine World; an Introduction to Magazine Journalism (New York, Prentice-Hall, 1951. 427 p.), which aims to present a picture of the work that goes into the production and distribution of American magazines.

H. Individual Magazines

2920. Bainbridge, John. Little wonder; or, The Reader's Digest and how it grew. New York, Reynal & Hitchcock, 1946. 177 p.
46–4584 PN4900.R3B3

The Reader's Digest was founded in 1922 by DeWitt Wallace (b. 1889). It started out as an attempt to present in short form the best articles currently appearing in other periodicals. In time it developed to a point where most of its articles originated in its own editorial offices, but were ordinarily "planted" in other periodicals which received inducements of various kinds. With a strong undertone of conservatism and religious orthodoxy the Digest presents folksy stories and informative articles on current issues, with all complexities of language, problems, and thought removed for the benefit of the common reader. This has brought it the largest circulation of any magazine in the world; it also sets records in a number of foreign language editions, and appears in Braille and on phono-discs. Its multimillion circulation has made of it a major social force. Bainbridge's study, a large part of which appeared originally in the New Yorker, investigates the background of the magazine's production more than of its influence. The book is deftly and amusingly written, at times satirical, at all points based on much research (though retailing some gossip), and on the whole critical of its subject. In defense of the Reader's Digest it has been pointed out that its standards are no lower than those of many newspapers and magazines aimed at mass audiences, and that it obviously meets a mass desire, on which level it does much good.

2921. Grimes, Alan Pendleton. The political liberalism of the New York Nation, 1865–1932. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1953. 133 p. (The James Sprunt studies in history and political science, v. 34)
53–62070 F251.J28, v. 34
PN4900.N3G75

Bibliography: p. [123]–129.

The Nation was founded in 1865 by Edwin Lawrence Godkin (no. 2882) as a weekly journal that would express the views of "liberalism" in America. Today it still calls itself "America's leading liberal weekly since 1865." While its subject matter has largely consisted of current issues in domestic politics, it has also commented on world affairs in general, and its literary department has often achieved distinction. Its appeal has been to well educated readers rather than to the masses, and its circulation has always remained relatively small. However, its select readership has established it as a highly influential periodical, and among its contributors have been many of the leading thinkers and writers of the country. An earlier book on the Nation was Gustav Pollak's Fifty Years of American Idealism; The New York Nation, 1865–1915 (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1915. 468 p.). After an introduction on editors and contributors, it traces the chronological development of the paper by outlining its treatment of leading issues from year to year and concludes with a selection (p. 237–454) of "Representative Essays."

2922. Howe, Mark Antony De Wolfe. The Atlantic Monthly and its makers. Boston, Atlantic Monthly Press, 1919. 106 p.
19–4003 PN4900.A7H8

The Atlantic Monthly was founded in 1857 as a literary and current events magazine cultivating the American field. From the beginning it received contributions from leading authors, and it became an immediate success. With the passing of the decades the Atlantic became somewhat less literary and displayed a greater tendency to survey those factors going into the making of America. At present the general essay and review dominate the magazine, but it still publishes some poetry and short stories. Mr. Howe approaches the story of The Atlantic Monthly largely in terms of its successive editors: James Russell Lowell, James Thomas Fields, William Dean Howells, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, Horace Elisha Scudder, Walter Hines Page, and Bliss Perry, with a brief mention of Ellery Sedgwick, who became editor in 1909. His successor, Edward Weeks, took charge in 1938. On the occasion of the Atlantic's centenary Mr. Weeks combined with the managing editor, Emily Flint, to produce an anthology of selections from the magazine: Jubilee; One Hundred Years of the Atlantic (Boston, Little, Brown, 1957. 746 p.). It emphasizes the current period, but also reflects much of the history and past importance of the Atlantic; this is further developed by the editorial introductions to the several parts of the volume.

2923. Johnson, Robert Underwood. Remembered yesterdays. Boston, Little, Brown, 1923. xxi, 624 p. illus. 23–17557 PN4874.J6A3

Johnson (1853–1937) began work for the Century magazine in 1873; in 1909 he became editor, although he had long been doing much editorial work. His autobiography contains much information on his work for the magazine through 1913, as well as the background of many projects undertaken by this magazine. The work also includes numerous short sketches of individuals connected with the periodical, most of them as contributors. Since the Century was a leader in the field of the general magazine, its contributors included a surprisingly large percentage of the prominent people of the period. Johnson's autobiography also deals with some nonjournalistic matters such as his service as Ambassador to Italy (1920–1921).

2924. Luxon, Norval Neil. Niles' Weekly Register, news magazine of the nineteenth century. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1947. 337 p. 47–30723 JK1.L8

"Critical essays on authorities": p. 308–320.

In 1811 Hezekiah Niles (1777–1839) of Baltimore founded the Weekly Register, which soon became Niles' Weekly Register, and for the last 12 years of its existence (1836–1849) was known as Niles' National Register. At a time of partisan periodicals the register was outstanding for its near impartiality. It was designed as a periodical or record, meant to be of service to the future; in this it succeeded, and it remains a major source for the historian of the period. While foreshadowing a newspaper of record such as the New York Times, the Register was far larger than contemporary newspapers; indeed, it was often regarded as a magazine, and in this respect it may be regarded a forerunner of modern news magazines such as Time. However, like the Times rather than Time, the Register commonly printed important speeches, official reports, etc., in full or in large part. Less spectacular than many of its contemporaries, it nonetheless had a more substantial backing than most, and for most of its career had a national and international circulation surpassing that of any other American paper of the period. Dr. Luxon's book has a long chapter on the first editor, Hezekiah Niles, and individual chapters on the Register's presentation of slavery, the West, Anglo-American relations, and other political and commercial topics.

2925. Stewart, Paul R. The Prairie Schooner story; a little magazine's first 25 years. Lincoln, University of Nebraska Press, 1955. 203 p. 55–8931 PN4900.P7S7 1955

Bibliography: p. 199–203.

The Prairie Schooner began publication at the University of Nebraska in 1927. From the beginning it has placed an emphasis on creative writing, fiction and poetry, with some general expository articles and reviews. It has been particularly noted for the quality of its short stories. Originally it was regional in intent and in its contributors, but it rapidly became as general as the majority of little magazines. Unlike many of them, it has shown a conservative editorial bent, but has nevertheless maintained its quality. Dr. Stewart's study, a University of Illinois dissertation, approaches the periodical from several points of view, including its editorial policy and its financial history. It provides a useful supplement to The Little Magazine, by Hoffman, Allen, and Ulrich (no. 2914), by studying the development of one such publication in concrete detail.

2926. Tebbel, John W. George Horace Lorimer and The Saturday Evening Post. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 335 p. 48–6490 PN4874.L63T4

Lorimer (1868–1937) joined the staff of The Saturday Evening Post as literary editor in 1898, at a time when it seemed to be a small and failing magazine. Next year he was appointed editor-in-chief, and with new policies he rapidly made it one of the most successful magazines in the country. Its great popularity has been attributed to his "infallible" sense for the literary taste of the large middle-class audience. A large part of Mr. Tebbel's study is devoted to the fiction that appeared in the magazine, and to Lorimer's relations with the authors. In addition to a pro-Republican editorial page (which was progressive until continuing attitudes became conservative with the passage of time), the magazine featured numerous articles. The articles were informative, and were not written as a result of editorial dictation, but their acceptance usually depended upon the editor's agreement with the views expressed. The magazine also included essays, autobiographical sketches, humor, and verse; and it flourished on its advertising. To the time of Lorimer's retirement in 1936 the policy in all departments was one of realism, but a realism tempered by the many taboos resulting from an applied turn-of-the-century middle-class morality. Mr. Tebbel's admiring and sympathetic account is in large part based on interviews with those who knew the editor personally, or had business dealings with him.

I. The Press and Society

2927. Bird, George L., and Frederic E. Merwin, eds. The press and society; a book of readings. [Rev. ed.] New York, Prentice-Hall, 1951. xv, 655 p. (Prentice-Hall journalism series)
51–11016 PN4735.B5 1951

First published in 1942 under title: The Newspaper and Society.

This volume, largely an anthology of writings on the press with introductory commentaries by the editors, is a textbook designed primarily for journalism students. It attempts to present historical perspective as well as the pros and cons of the various issues discussed. The first part, introductory in nature, discusses the nature of "public opinion" and the ways and means of press influence; here, as elsewhere, "press" means mainly newspapers, but includes other forms of mass communications, such as radio. The second part, "The Press at Work in Society," shows how the press functions, especially in terms of the selection or suppression of news, attitudes conveyed, methods employed, and press reliability. The concluding sections cover those forces which have molded the press as it is: chain ownership, pressure groups, press agents, government, etc. Each chapter of the book concludes with a list of further readings.

2928. Brucker, Herbert. Freedom of information. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 307 p.
49–7938 PN4735.B7

This book by the editor of the Hartford Courant (born in 1898) analyzes the American press in terms of its principles, functions, and methods. While much attention is given to its faults in reporting news, the main concern is to report what has been and is being done to improve American journalism. Mr. Brucker deals with such problems as the freedom of the press, governmental and economic controls and influences, and the nature and standards of objective reporting.

2929. Duniway, Clyde Augustus. The development of freedom of the press in Massachusetts. New York, Longmans, Green, 1906. xv. 202. p. (Harvard historical studies, v. 12)
6–15096 Z657.D93

"Bibliographical notes": p. 175–186.

This book attempts to "explain the significant features of the rise of a free press in Massachusetts." It opens with a discussion of press control in England to 1603. There follow chronological chapters on the changing censorship laws and controls in Massachusetts, which led to limited freedom of the press in the middle of the 17th century, and to fairly full freedom during the Revolutionary War and after the adoption of constitutional guarantees. The book concludes with a chapter on the "reactionary tendencies" of 1789–1812, and their subsequent modification. Since Massachusetts in many respects was typical of such problems throughout the Colonies, this book is significant for the early development of a free press in America.

2930. Pollard, James E. The presidents and the press. New York, Macmillan, 1947. 866 p.
47–1213 PN4888.P7P6

An investigation of the relationships between the press and the presidents, from George Washington to Harry S. Truman. The story proceeds chronologically president by president, with each studied in considerable detail. Mr. Pollard's work is thus an important contribution to both political history and journalistic history. The later chapters add much to an understanding of present-day Washington news reporting and commentating.

2931. Rutherfurd, Livingston. John Peter Zenger, his press, his trial and a bibliography of Zenger imprints; also a reprint of the first edition of the trial. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1904. 275 p. illus.
4–8588 Z232.Z5R9

Bibliography of the issues of the Zenger press, 1725–1751: p. [133]–169.

Bibliography of the trial of John Peter Zenger: p. [247]–255.

Zenger (1697?–1746) was by origin a Palatinate German who came to this country as a youth. In 1733 he established the New-York Weekly Journal, in which he printed criticisms of the administration of the royal governor of New York, William Cosby. This led to his arrest in 1735 on a charge of criminal libel. The judge was hostile, but, after listening to the brilliant pleadings of Andrew Hamilton of Philadelphia, the jury entered a verdict of not guilty. The case itself is regarded as crucial in the establishment of the freedom of the press in this country and is hence a starting point for the study of the principles of American journalism. Rutherfurd's study opens with a chapter on the political conditions and the general situation of the press in the period preceding the trial. The second chapter narrates the events leading to Zenger's arrest and the preparations for the trial. The third chapter is an account of the trial itself, with a summary of Zenger's subsequent career and of the effects of the trial on subsequent libel law. Also included is a reprint of Zenger's own (1736) verbatim account of the trial. While Mr. Rutherfurd's volume was originally published in a small edition, it has since been reprinted by photographic process (New York, Peter Smith, 1941. 275 p.).

2932. Siebert, Fredrick Seaton. The rights and privileges of the press. New York, Appleton-Century, 1934. xvii, 429 p. 34–784 Law

This book does not attempt to present the historical evolution of the rights and responsibilities of the press. It does attempt to describe the situation in America, as of its date, with regard to the limits of press privileges and rights, and it is designed to help the practicing journalist on points of law likely to arise. After an introductory chapter on the general subject of the freedom of the press, the first main section is "The Right To Gather News," with chapters on matters such as the rights of access to various governmental records and proceedings. The second section, "The Right to Publish News," covers the limitations upon it and seeks to indicate when stories become obscene and immoral, false and defamatory, professionally injurious, etc. The final section is "The Right to Comment on the News," which is discussed with regard to individuals, institutions, and governmental personages and agencies. In keeping with the author's primarily legal viewpoint, the appendix contains a table of the many cases mentioned in the book (p. 401–418).

Siebert is also the author, with Theodore Peterson and Wilbur Schramm, of Four Theories of the Press: the Authoritarian, Libertarian, Social Responsibility, and Soviet Communist Concepts of What the Press Should Be and Do (Urbana, University of Illinois Press, 1956. 153 p.), which attempts to assess the main theories of press functioning, and their consequences for the form the press has taken in the United States and other nations.

VI

Geography

A.	General and Physical Geography	2933–2941
B.	Geology and Soil	2942–2947
C.	Climate and Weather	2948–2953
D.	Plants and Animals	2954–2966
E.	Historical Geography and Atlases	2967–2976
F.	Polar Exploration	2977–2981

THIS chapter offers a selection from the writings that describe the natural setting within which the civilization of the United States was brought into being, and upon which it must depend, as well as others that interpret the interrelations of continent and culture. The subject has long received the searching attention of scientific geographers and geologists, who have produced a vast literature merely to list which would require a number of volumes the size of this one. The great bulk of it, however, consists of scientific monographs and articles in professional journals, more or less completely technical in character, and inappropriate if not unintelligible to most of those whose primary interest lies in American civilization. From this whole literature we have therefore selected comparatively a mere handful of titles, which seem likely to be particularly helpful and interesting to students of that civilization. They are naturally, as a rule, the more general works, but some quite detailed and technical volumes (such as nos. 2961 and 2969) have been included when they seemed to give valuable insights not readily obtainable elsewhere.

It will be noted that most of the manuals included in Sections A and B treat North America as a unit, since the northern and southwestern boundaries of the United States have little significance for the physiographer or the geologist. Two of the books in Section A (nos. 2938 and 2942) are concerned with the discipline itself, the pursuit of scientific geography in the United States, with the entire globe for its subject matter. The books on soil science in Section B deal with a subject that has been exhaustively pursued by the U. S. Department of Agriculture during the last 60 years, but that seems to be little adapted to summary treatment. There is of course no sharp division between these and related titles that will be found in Chapter XXVII, Land and Agriculture. The selection in Section D on Plants and Animals is perhaps unfair to our native fish, reptiles, amphibians, and insects, as well as to several types of vegetation less conspicuous than the trees, all which groups have been effectively described in books intended for the general reader.

Section E on Historical Geography is less selective than its predecessors, for there is less to select from; the subject has hardly received the cultivation it deserves. Academic historians were in some degree alienated from a geographical approach by the rather exaggerated determination of an earlier school of which Miss Semple (no. 2975) was a representative. Messrs. Gilbert and Brown (nos. 2971, 2968, and 2969) have since exemplified a more fruitful approach to historical geography, but their followers remain few. (There is, however, much matter of geographical interest in the sections on Discovery and Exploration in Chapter VIII, General History.) It is furthermore true that more and more specialized atlases of American history are a desideratum; here the high cost of printing has been one of the effective deterrents.

The final section on Polar Exploration calls attention to a sphere in which the specifically American contribution to a fundamentally international enterprise has been outstanding. We should not wish to omit mention of the achievements of Kane, Greely, Peary, and Byrd, and this seemed the most appropriate place to notice them. Works on the exploration of the North American continent will be found in Chapters VIII and XII below.

A. General and Physical Geography

2933. Atwood, Wallace W. The physiographic provinces of North America. Boston, Ginn, 1940. xvi, 535 p. 40–33578 GB115.A8

"Selected references for additional reading" at end of each chapter.

The regional idea is essential to the progress of geography, and the fundamental basis of regional subdivision is neither climate, agriculture, politics, vegetation, industry, nor soil, but "contrasts in topography, or relief," which "are not made by human occupation or affected by it." The regions of this volume are the Atlantic and Gulf coastal plain, the Appalachian highlands (in northeastern and southwestern divisions), the Laurentian upland, the central lowlands, the interior highlands, the Great Plains, the Rocky Mountains, the Cordilleran plateaus, and the Pacific borderlands. For each one the author opens with a general description, proceeds to characteristic features, and concludes with "an approach to the human drama." The treatment here is bolder and in larger strokes than in either Bowman or Fenneman below. A selected list of topographic maps, usually those of the U. S. Geological Survey, follows the references for each regional chapter. The 281 illustrations are exceptionally well chosen and reproduced.

2934. Bowman, Isaiah. Forest physiography; physiography of the United States and principles of soils in relation to forestry. New York, Wiley, 1911. xxii, 759 p. 11–29383 GB121.B7

When Dr. Bowman undertook this work, a knowledge of the physiography of the United States "depended upon one or two short and general chapters on the subject, or upon a study of hundreds of original papers and monographs." In writing "a book on physiography for students of forestry," he produced an authoritative synthesis which has influenced all subsequent writing in the field. The first hundred pages expound the origin and features of soils, while the remainder survey 32 physiographic regions of the United States. Such regions are characterized by "uniformity of topographic expression," are often of great size, are widely varied in character, and in some instances exhibit features unique on the earth's surface. Five plate maps and 292 figures illustrate the text.

2935. Fenneman, Nevin M. Physiography of western United States. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1931. 534 p. 31–4608 GB124.W4F4

2936. Fenneman, Nevin M. Physiography of eastern United States. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1938. 714 p. 38–9303 GB124.E4F4

In these volumes physiography is equivalent to geomorphology and is limited to the genetic study of land forms; it "may be said to represent the overlap of the two major sciences," geology and geography. The materials for the two treatises are largely geological monographs, but the information derived from them has been organized rather than merely assembled, and the large proportion of purely descriptive material is included for "its evidential value in the interpretation of physiographic history." The author, a professor of geology at the University of Cincinnati, divides the western United States into 10 and the eastern into 13 "provinces." These are determined by a scheme of division "which makes possible the largest number of general statements about each." Both volumes have folding maps as well as plans and photographs in the text.

2937. The Geographical review. Readings in the geography of North America, a selection of articles from The Geographical review. New York, American Geographical Society, 1952. 466 p. (American Geographical Society [of New York] Reprint series, no. 5) 52–2969 E41.G4

Bibliography: p. 221–226.

The Geographical Review assumed its present form in 1916 and began issuing volumes of reprints of its articles concerned with a particular area during World War II; the present volume coincided with the centennial of the American Geographical Society and with the 17th Congress of the International Geographical Union meeting in Washington and New York. It reprints by photographic process 22 of the more than 500 articles on North America published by the Review since 1916, selected to "present as wide a range as possible of the many areas of geographical research," and arranged in the order of their appearance in the Review, 1916–1950. Most of the articles have maps, charts, or photographs, and there is one large folding map in color to accompany Charles Warren Thornthwaite's "An Approach toward a Rational Classification of Climate" (1948), which revises the influential "The Climates of North America according to a New Classification" that Thornthwaite contributed to the Review in 1931. The other articles include James W. Goldthwait's "A Town that has Gone Downhill" [Lyme, N. H.] (1927); Wolfgang L. G. Joerg's "The Geography of North America: A History of Its Regional Exposition" (1936); Richard Hartshorne's "Racial Maps of the United States" (1938); and Edward L. Ullman's "The Railroad Pattern of the United States" (1940).

2938. James, Preston E., and Clarence F. Jones, eds. American geography: inventory & prospect. John K. Wright, consulting editor. Maps by John C. Sherman. Syracuse, N. Y., Published for the Association of American Geographers by Syracuse University Press, 1954. 590 p.
54–9225 G73.3.U5J3

This coöperative work "deals with the fruits of American learning in the last two generations," and "is written not only for the trained geographer, but also for the educated layman, for the apprentice geographer, and for workers in another discipline who may want to know what American geographers are thinking and doing and what they hope to accomplish." Its scope extends to American studies in world geography, and not merely in the United States or North America. Each chapter is followed by a series of references in which the relevant books and articles are enumerated. Chapters are devoted to such varieties as historical, settlement, urban, political, agricultural, transportation, plant, animal, medical, and military geography. The volume concludes with discussions of field techniques, the interpretation of air photographs, and geographical cartography.

2939. Jones, Llewellyn Rodwell, and Patrick W. Bryan. North America, an historical, economic, and regional geography. [10th ed., rev.] London, Methuen; New York, Dutton, 1954. xvi, 582 p.
56–61 E38.J75 1954

A standard text by two English university geographers, originally published in 1924. The last major revision was that of 1938. Prof. Jones died in 1947, but Dean Bryan has continued to make corrections and additions in the two editions published since. The organization of the book is indicated by the subtitle: Part I, "Historical Geography" (from the discovery to the Civil War), was originally written by Jones; Part II, "Economic Geography," has ten chapters by Bryan and five by Jones; Part III, "Regional Geography," was by Jones. This work of great clarity and concision is illustrated by 122 maps and plans. A shorter text, by an English geographer who has migrated to Indiana University, is Norman J. G. Pounds' North America (London, Murray, 1955. 230 p.). It devotes a chapter to New York City, and separate treatment to Canada.

2940. White, Charles Langdon, and Edwin J. Foscue. Regional geography of Anglo-America. 2d ed. New York, Prentice-Hall, 1954. xxii, 518 p. illus.
54–6526 E169.W54 1954

"Selected bibliography" at end of each chapter.

A revised and reorganized edition of a textbook originally published in 1943. Anglo-America is one of the two major divisions of the Western Hemisphere, divided from Latin America by the northern border of Mexico. Geographical "regions are formed by man as he adjusts himself to the natural environment"; they are determined by "the attitudes, objectives, and technical abilities of the settlers" as much as by the physical quality of the land, and they have ever-changing boundaries, readily altered by technological or economic innovation. The authors divide Anglo-America into 14 mutually exclusive regions, such as the Cotton Belt, the Agricultural Interior, the Subtropical Pacific Coast, and the Tundra, and a 15th, the American Manufacturing Belt, which extends discontinuously from Boston to St. Louis, and overlaps four of the other regions. Appendix A enables the reader to distinguish the authors' geographical regions from physiographic, climate, and soil regions as established by standard authorities. Subregions are distinguished within most of the 14. Under each region or subregion the authors describe the physical setting, sometimes the "sequent occupance," the major forms of economic exploitation, and, finally, "the outlook," which in some instances, especially the Atlantic Coastal Plain and the Piedmont, is difficult to forecast. An earlier, more detailed, and even more critically diagnostic regional survey, which unfortunately has not been brought up to date, is North America, Its People and the Resources, Development, and Prospects of the Continent As the Home of Man [rev. ed.] (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1942. 1016 p.), by Joseph Russell Smith and Merton Ogden Phillips. An up-to-date textbook concentrating on utilization of the national resources, but considering them only under four large conventional regions, is Geography of North America, 3d ed. (New York, Wiley, 1955. 664 p.), by George J. Miller, Almon E. Parkins, and Bert Hudgins. Alfred J. Wright's United States and Canada; a Regional Geography, 2d ed. (New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1956. 590 p.), emphasizes the effect of constant change in the national economy upon the data of economic geography.

2941. Wright, John K. Geography in the making; the American Geographical Society, 1851–1951. New York, The Society, 1952. xxi, 437 p. 52–11527 G3.A56W7

A centennial history of the leading American organization for the scientific study of geography, by an outstanding geographer who has been a staff member since 1920, and Director during 1938–49. Dr. Wright is concerned with the gradual transformation of the Society's function, from the advancement of exploration and the investigation of remote regions, toward the development of geography as a profession and an educational discipline. As landmarks he points out the presidency of Archer M. Huntington (1907–11) and the service of Isaiah Bowman as director (1915–35). He gives special emphasis to the compilation of the "millionth map" of South America, which was undertaken in 1920, took 25 years to complete, and cost $570,000.

B. Geology and Soil

2942. Eardley, Armand J. Structural geology of North America. New York, Harper, 1951. 624 p. 22 x 29 cm. (Harper's geoscience series) 51–10958 QE41.E2

Bibliography: p. 601–620.

An imposing textbook for advanced students which aims "to describe the structural evolution of the North American continent in post-Proterozoic time." The editor of the series calls it "the first book in any language which described in some detail the structural evolution of an area as large as a continent." The unusual shape provides for the numerous large maps and cross sections. No list is provided of the 343 numbered figures in the text. The author states that the backbone of the study resides in the two kinds of maps: the paleogeographic maps which show the surface distribution of the various rocks at different times in the past, and the more numerous paleotectonic maps which show the basins, arches, domes, and other structural features that formed during a certain time. The chapters "chronicle the crustal unrest of the continent" and treat of "the procession of deformational and sedimentary events," but emphasis has been placed on geographic position rather than on time. The structural terminology employed in the book is explained in Chapter 2.

2943. Hulbert, Archer Butler. Soil; its influence on the history of the United States, with special reference to migration and the scientific study of local history. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1930. 227 p. 30–30109 E156.H91

"The material . . . has been elaborated from an outline delivered on the Goldwin Smith lectureship foundation at Cornell University, New York, in 1925."—Preface.

Its title notwithstanding, this is no narrow monograph, but a general work on the historical geography of American settlement. Its seeks only to add the "edaphic" factor to such recognized ones as climate and waterways, and expressly disclaims "the devil of one idea" as a method of interpretation. The author discusses the five main classes of soils and reviews the sections of the Preliminary Soil Map of the United States, published by the U. S. Bureau of Soils in 1911. He notes that the settlers' ideas or prejudices concerning the virtues of soils, and vegetation as an index of soil quality, were positive influences. The final 14 chapters discuss soils and agriculture in successive phases of pioneer settlement from New England to the Pacific. An appendix calls for a new emphasis upon primary topography and original surveys in town, township, and county history.

2944. Kellogg, Charles E. The soils that support us; an introduction to the study of soils and their use by men. New York, Macmillan, 1941. 370 p. 41–16797 S591.K425

Modern soil science is a highly developed specialty whose technicalities tend to leave the ordinary reader far behind. Dr. Kellogg, successor to C. F. Marbut in charge of the U. S. Soil Survey, succeeds in making the subject both intelligible and significant to the layman in this attractively presented and produced primer. While the theme is the worldwide one of man in relation to the soil, the great majority of the examples are taken from American regions, and the "soils of the grasslands," "of the desert," "of temperate forested lands," and even "of warm and tropical lands" are all presented through appropriate examples within the continental United States. Appendix I provides an introduction to soil classification and soil maps.

2945. Miller, William J. An introduction to historical geology, with special reference to North America. 6th ed. New York, Van Nostrand, 1952. 555 p. 52–6381 QE651.M5 1952

The author of this very successful textbook, first published in 1916, is Emeritus Professor of Geology, University of California at Los Angeles; the 6th edition is a thorough revision incorporating new topics and illustrations. The use of technical terms, especially the names of fossils, has been kept to a reasonable minimum. After eight introductory chapters on the elements of earth history, the book proceeds by treating successive eras and periods, from the Archeozoic to the Cenozoic, according to a uniform plan. Surviving formations and fossils from each age within the United States are emphasized.

2946. Mohr, Charles E., and Howard N. Sloane, eds. Celebrated American caves. New Brunswick, Rutgers University Press, 1955. 339 p. 55–12228 GB604.M6

One of the features of American geology is the great number of large underground caverns which it includes—some 2000 in Kentucky, 1500 in Tennessee, 1200 in Virginia, and 1000 in Missouri, to name only the leading states. Mammoth Cave in Kentucky has been in continuous operation as a natural showplace since 1816. The National Speleological Society, founded in 1941, aims "to foster interest in the knowledge to be gained from cave exploration, and to protect from thoughtless vandalism the national features of the underground world." Fifteen of its members have contributed to the present volume sketches of individual caves, caves of various regions, or of particular cave phenomena, such as vampire bats and prehistoric burials.

2947. U. S. Dept. of Agriculture. Soils and men. [Washington] U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1938. 1232 p. (Its Yearbook of agriculture, 1938) Agr 55–13 S21.A35 1938

The United States Soil Survey was initiated in 1899, and from 1910 to 1934 was under the direction of Curtis Fletcher Marbut (1863–1935). In cooperation with state research institutions it has produced several thousand maps and reports on particular localities and is responsible for nearly all the detailed knowledge of American soil varieties and their distribution. It has naturally developed a progressive refinement of technique and classification, which has rendered its earlier surveys more or less obsolete. The first large summary of its results was the U. S. Bureau of Soils' Bulletin no. 96, Soils of the United States, by Marbut, Hugh H. Bennett, Jesse E. Lapham, and Macy H. Lapham (Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1913. 791 p.), which included a detailed soil map of the United States. Marbut's own lifework was summed up in "Soils of the United States," Part 3 of the Atlas of American Agriculture (q. v.) which appeared in the year of his death. The methods and objectives of the Survey have since 1903 been set forth in a succession of fieldbooks, the latest being the Soil Survey Manual, issued in August 1951, by the U. S. Bureau of Plant Industry, Soils, and Agricultural Engineering (Washington [U. S. Govt. Print. Off.] 503 p.); it includes a "Special Bibliography" of recent (1937–50) surveys in contrasting soil regions (p. 447–454). The 1938 Yearbook, like its companion volumes, is a huge miscellany by various hands treating all aspects of the subject. It is included here because of Part V, "Soils of the United States" (p. [1017]–1161), in which members of the Soil Survey Division "bring together and summarize, on a comparatively small scale, the data accumulated during the past half century on the enormous variety of soils in this country." The descriptions are offered in conjunction with a map of the "soil associations" of the United States at the end of the volume. The Yearbook also contains "A Glossary of Special Terms" used in it (p. 1162–1180) and an alphabetical list of "Literature Cited" comprising 476 entries (p. 1181–1207).

C. Climate and Weather

2948. Flora, Snowden D. Tornadoes of the United States. [Rev. ed.] Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. xvi, 221 p. 54–8922 QC955.F6 1954

Tornadoes are more numerous and violent in the United States east of the Rockies than anywhere else in the world. The Director of the Weather Bureau for Kansas explains them, so far as they are understood, calculates their destructiveness, gives practical advice, and inventories the worst examples on record.

2949. Hoyt, William G., and Walter B. Langbein. Floods. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1955. 469 p. 54–6075 GB1215.H68

Bibliography: p. 433–443.

677676 O–63–19

Estimates of the damage caused by floods in the U. S. in an average year range from $200,000,000 to $500,000,000. The authors discuss the causes of floods, and the kinds of antidotes which human ingenuity can devise. They go on to expound the national flood-control policy, survey problems, projects, and plans in the several basins, and conclude with a detailed history of American floods since 1900.

2950. Kimble, George H. T. Our American weather. Maps and charts by Jean Paul Tremblay. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1955. 322 p. 54–9711 QC983.K5

"There is nothing quite like American weather anywhere else in the world." Its highly individual "style" results from two main factors: the invasion of air masses from six different quarters, and a strongly articulated terrain which facilitates the flow of heat and cold while it restrains the flow of moisture. This individuality is elaborated in a month-by-month survey, in which the prevalent "spectacles of the weather parade," and their regional modifications, are described. This popular presentation puts much solid meteorological information into an ingenious and palatable form.

2951. U. S. Dept. of Agriculture. Climate and man. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1941. xii, 1248 p. (Its Yearbook of agriculture, 1941) Agr 55–10 S21.A35 1941

A massive symposium undertaken before the transfer of the Weather Bureau from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Commerce in 1940. It is in large part inspired by the progress in weather science achieved by Scandinavian scientists during World War I, when the importance of movements in the upper atmosphere was demonstrated, and since by American scientists, whose actual observations and measurements in this area have led to large research projects which prepare the way for long-range forecasting. Nearly half the book (p. 634–1228) presents climatic data in map or tabular form, for the United States as a whole, and particularly for each of the 48 States in alphabetical order, with respect to temperature, precipitation, and killing frosts. Several papers describe the methods of recent meteorology, including "How the Daily Forecast is Made" and the problems of forecasting floods. Two considerable sections deal with the influence of climate on agricultural settlement in various regions of the United States and in its territories, and with the relations of climate to particular crops such as cotton, tobacco, orchard crops, and livestock.

2952. Visher, Stephen S. Climatic atlas of the United States. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1954. 403 p. Map 53–383 G1201.C8V5 1954

Bibliography: p. 393–395.

The typical or average phenomena of American weather are presented in a series of 1031 figures, mostly maps of the continental United States, and the rest graphs. The first 371 are concerned with temperature; the remainder are divided among winds and storms, sunshine, humidity and evaporation, precipitation, consequences of climate in agriculture and topography, and climatic regions and changes. Over 400 of the maps are original compilations by Prof. Visher, and the remainder have been adapted to a uniform style. This reference book summarizes the result of decades of observation by the United States Weather Bureau and its coöperators. The American Automobile Association's Climatic Guide (Washington, 1950. 131 p.) presents average monthly figures on temperatures, precipitation, humidity, wind, and cloudiness for 250 American cities—a convenient compilation not merely for motorists. An older but still valuable compilation of climatic data will be found in Part 2, "Climate," of the Atlas of American Agriculture (q. v.).

2953. Ward, Robert De Courcy. The climates of the United States. Boston, Ginn, 1925. 518 p. 25–21094 QC983.W3

The author was a professor of climatology at Harvard University, and his book, the product of 25 years of study and teaching, has retained its authority through three decades. It defines climate as average weather, but insists that mere averages are misleading, since "it is the irregular weather changes from day to day which give climates their real character." The author enumerates the seven major climatic controls, arrives at a working scheme of eight climatic provinces for the United States, and summarizes their outstanding features in Chapter 20. Its predecessors are largely topical, analyzing the phenomena of temperature, frost, prevailing winds, rainfall, snowfall, humidity and "sensible temperatures" (i. e., as affecting human comfort or discomfort), sunshine and cloudiness, thunderstorms, cold waves and blizzards, hot waves and the Indian Summer, and winds and breezes of various types. Concluding chapters consider the American climate in relation to health and to crops, and the climates of Alaska.

The Climates of North America, by Ward, Charles F. Brooks, and A. J. Connor, comprises Band II, Teil J (Berlin, Borntraeger, 1938. 424 p.) of a large Handbuch der Klimatologie, edited by W. Köppen and R. Geiger. The second and largest section, "The United States" (p. 80–903), was originally condensed by Ward from his 1925 volume, but was revised by Prof. Brooks of the Blue Hill Meteorological Laboratory, Harvard University, in the light of new contributions published through 1935. New maps were prepared, and 92 pages of tables compiled from published and unpublished materials of the U. S. Weather Bureau (p. 197–288). The volume includes separate treatments of Mexico, Alaska, and Canada.

D. Plants and Animals

2954. Cahalane, Victor H. Mammals of North America. With drawings by Francis L. Jaques. New York, Macmillan, 1947. 682 p. 47–4195 QL715.C3

"List of references": p. 647–676.

2955. Hamilton, William J. American mammals; their lives, habits, and economic relations. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1939. 434 p. 40–27054 QL715.H16

These two works complement each other admirably. Mr. Cahalane, who aims at "a popular book which will summarize existing information on the principal kinds of mammals of North America," has reduced the 1500 existing species and subspecies under 94 headings. For each he gives a generalized and quite lively life history, in which he consciously runs the risks of "humanizing" animal behavior, enumerates the principal varieties, gives a concise general description, identifies the distinguishing characteristics for the benefit of field observers, and delimits the geographical range. Mr. Hamilton has aimed to produce a "reference text" for layman, teacher, and professional zoologist alike, but, save for a technical chapter on classification, it is little behind the popular work in readability. Here the treatment is topical, such large subjects as adaptations, food, reproduction, hibernation, migration, and behavior receiving illustration from a variety of species. Chapters 14 and 15 discriminate between "Useful" and "Injurious Mammals"; but it is explained that "any mammal may be of considerable value in one locality and highly destructive in another." Mr. Jaques' drawings have a distinction lacking in the illustrations of American Mammals; the latter's photographs are poorly reproduced. A complete systematic account is provided by Gerrit S. Miller and Remington Kellogg's List of North American Recent Mammals (Washington, Smithsonian Institution, 1955. 954 p.).

2956. Ecological Society of America. Naturalist's guide to the Americas, prepared by the Committee on the Preservation of Natural Conditions of the Ecological Society of America, with assistance from numerous organizations and individuals, assembled and edited by the chairman, Victor E. Shelford. Baltimore, Williams & Wilkins, 1926. xv, 761 p. 26–8906 QH102.E25

This unusual book was the result of seven years' effort by members of the Ecological Society to list "all preserved and preservable areas in North America in which natural conditions persist." Materials on Central America, and on South America north of the Amazon, are confined to p. 514–709. Section III attempts to arrive at the "original Biota of the Americas" (necessarily limited to general vegetation, mammals, and birds) and distinguishes 19 characteristic areas north of central Mexico. The bulk of the book (p. 87 ff.) consists of detailed descriptions of particular areas by various hands. The Society's larger objective was "the preservation of natural areas with original flora and fauna (or as nearly so as may obtain) and the maintenance of the natural biotic balance in existing preserves."

2957. Harshberger, John W. Phytogeographic survey of North America; a consideration of the phytogeography of the North American continent, including Mexico, Central America and the West Indies, together with the evolution of North American plant distribution. Leipzig, Engelmann; New York, Stechert, 1911. lxiii, 790 p. (Die Vegetation der Erde, hrsg. von A. Engler und O. Drude, v. 13) DA

"Kurzgefasste deutsche Inhaltsübersicht," by O. Drude: p. [xiii]–lxiii.

Dr. Harshberger believed that it was essential for the botanists of his day to leave "a record of the original appearance of the country before the march of civilization has destroyed primeval conditions," since "all future botanic and forestry work must be based on considerations of what was the native growth." He begins with a review of earlier botanic investigations and literature (p. 1–45) and continues with a bibliography in geographical arrangement (p. 45–92). Part 3 outlines the history of North American flora through geological time since the Cretaceous Period, discusses its relationship to other continental floras, and glances briefly at earlier attempts at its phytogeographic classification. Part 4, comprising about half the book, is a systematic review of the several zones, regions, formations and associations into which the author has divided the continent. In each area the author aims "to give a succinct account of the vegetation . . . not exclusively from the floristic standpoint, but also from the ecologic."

2958. Herrick, Francis Hobart. The American eagle; a study in natural and civil history. New York, Appleton-Century, 1934. xx, 266 p. 34–36763 QL696.A2H46

"In the course of from fifty to sixty centuries the eagle has symbolized not only power, courage, and conquest, but freedom, independence, magnanimity, truth, the soul or its bearer, the Holy Spirit, and immortality." It was therefore not surprising that William Barton placed a heraldic eagle on the original design for the Seal of the United States; but it was an inspiration on the part of Charles Thomson, permanent Secretary of the Continental Congress, to alter this conventional fowl to Haliaeetus leucocephalus, the American or bald eagle. Mr. Herrick traces our eagle's heraldic appearances on successive seals and coins, and also describes its natural life in the eyries about Vermilion, Ohio. These he has approached by means of a 96-foot steel observatory tower, enabling him to take a unique series of photographs of the American eagle at home.

2959. Livingston, Burton E., and Forrest Shreve. The distribution of vegetation in the United States, as related to climatic conditions. Washington, Carnegie Institution of Washington, 1921. xvi, 590 p. (Carnegie Institution of Washington. Publication no. 284) 21–15878 QK115.L8

"Literature cited": p. 587–590.

A first attempt "to discover quantitative relations between vegetation characters on the one hand and environmental conditions on the other" for the geographic area of the United States. The authors regard plant physiology as the key to causal relations within the field. Their problems have led them to work out the general vegetation zones of the United States, and to map the distribution of particular species or groups of species. The bulk of the book is taken up by detailed tables of climatic phenomena and of vegetation-climate correlations. The most important correlation discovered is that between vegetation zones and "the moisture ratio for the average frostless season."

2960. Martin, Alexander C., Herbert S. Zim, and Arnold L. Nelson. American wildlife & plants, a guide to wildlife food habits; the use of trees, shrubs, weeds, and herbs by birds and mammals of the United States. New York, McGraw-Hill, 1951. 500 p. 51–11545 QL756.M27

"Prepared under the direction of the United States Fish and Wildlife Service, Department of the Interior, at the Patuxent Research Refuge, Laurel, Maryland."

This manual provides detailed information concerning the foods upon which the several species of American wild birds and mammals depend. The object is to further wildlife preservation, but the attractive method of presentation—species by species with neat drawings and thumbnail maps showing distribution for each—affords a compact survey of present-day wildlife in the United States. Part II deals successively with water birds, land birds, birds of prey, fur and game mammals, small mammals, and "hoofed browsers." Part III reviews the plants, indicating the several animal species to which each is useful, and concludes with 10 pages of tables: "Wildlife Plants Ranked According to Their Value."

2961. Morgan, Lewis H. The American beaver and his works. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1868. 330 p. 6–26710 QL737.R6M84

Castor Americanus, physically a rather unimpressive rodent, is the only mammal beside man who has developed complex engineering skills. It was his misfortune to bear a pelt which was long regarded as the finest material for the hats of Western man; after two centuries of trapping he was threatened with extinction, but was saved, early in the 19th century, by the substitution of silk hats for fur ones. This classic monograph by the great pioneer of American anthropology pays especial attention to the beaver's dams, lodges, burrows, canals, and trails, which have so conspicuously modified the primeval American landscape, and to the callously cruel methods by which he has been trapped.

2962. National Geographic Society, Washington, D. C. The book of birds; the first work presenting in full color all the major species of the United States and Canada. Edited by Gilbert Grosvenor and Alexander Wetmore. With 950 color portraits by Major Allan Brooks. [2d ed.] Washington, National Geographic Society, 1939. 2 v. 39–23274 QL676.N285 1939

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Diving birds, ocean birds, swimmers, wading birds, wild fowl, birds of prey, game birds, shore birds, marsh dwellers, birds of the northern seas.—v. 2. Owls, goatsuckers, swifts, woodpeckers, flycatchers, crows, jays, blackbirds, orioles, chickadees, creepers, thrushes, swallows, tanagers, wrens, warblers, hummingbirds, finches, and sparrows.

A popular presentation in the familiar manner of the National Geographic Magazine, the systematic sections being eked out by little articles on "Encouraging Birds around the Home," and the like. The systematic sections are written chiefly by Dr. Wetmore and T. Gilbert Pearson, with lesser contributions from Arthur A. Allen, Robert Cushman Murphy, and the illustrator, Major Brooks. Each such section opens with a general discussion of the group and concludes with descriptions of individual species which are by no means uniform in treatment. Major Brooks' "950 color portraits" appear on 204 plates reproduced from paintings. There are nearly as many halftones from photographs, a majority of them action shots of wild birds. A number of other popular treatments of the subject have appeared since, but nothing on the same generous scale. Arthur A. Allen's Stalking Birds with Color Camera, published by the National Geographic Society in 1951 (328 p.), contains a large number of magnificent color photographs of American birds in their natural environment, but is neither comprehensive nor systematic.

2963. Peattie, Donald Culross. A natural history of trees of eastern and central North America; illustrated by Paul Landacre. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1950. xv, 606 p. 50–10354 QK481.P4

2964. Peattie, Donald Culross. A natural history of western trees; illustrated by Paul Landacre. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1953. xiv, 751 p. 52–5263 QK481.P42

Mr. Peattie is a living representative of an old American tradition which combines sound natural knowledge with mastery of expression. These two books, which are to be supplemented by others on the trees of the South, and on "cultivated trees of exotic origin," review the native species in a uniform manner. The popular and Latin names are followed by alternative names, the range of the species, a description "couched in language using the minimum of technical terms," and finally a little essay in which landscape, historical circumstances, and economic factors are gracefully combined. There are frequent quotations from early naturalists, and the author often seizes upon a single example to make the species memorable: for the Swamp White Oak, for instance, he mentions the Big Tree of Geneseo, N. Y., "towering 100 feet high with a circumference of 27 feet," beneath which in 1797 Robert Morris purchased much of western New York State from the Seneca Indians. Paul Landacre's stylized drawings contribute to the distinction of these volumes.

2965. Roe, Frank G. The North American buffalo; a critical study of the species in its wild state. Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1951. 957 p. 52–1647 QL737.U5R73

Bibliography: p. 897–914.

The Bison Americanus, or historic American buffalo, "is the only known creature which has ever thronged in such prodigious hosts a geographical range which climatic and ecological characteristics or potentialities made a natural home for a really large white population." In consequence, it has affected North American civilization "perhaps more vitally than has ever been the case with any other species in its indigenous environment in any portion of the globe." Nevertheless, Mr. Roe, who disclaims biological expertness and has labored only "to ascertain and classify the historical evidence," has written a huge book polemic in purpose and sharply controversial in tone. He masses his evidence to prove that the buffalo had no uniformity or regularity in their migrations, and so could not have determined the course of the earliest human trails; and that the Indians were not habitually wasteful in their hunting of the buffalo herds, whose sudden disappearance must therefore have been the work of the white men.

2966. Weaver, John E., and Frederick W. Albertson. Grasslands of the Great Plains: their nature and use. With special chapters by B. W. Allred and Arnold Heerwagen. Lincoln, Neb., Johnsen Pub. Co., 1956. 395 p. 56–9095 QK938.P7W37

Bibliography: p. 379–387.

An exhaustive study of the natural vegetation of the "Mixed Prairie," the most extensive grazing area in North America, and especially as affected by a climate of extremes which is commonly called semiarid but is humid in some years and desertlike in others. Intensive local studies have made possible a profound understanding of the processes at work during the great drought of 1933–40, the good decade of 1941–52, and the renewed and even more severe drought of 1953–55. "Extended periods of drought are a part of the plains climate. The grasslands have survived throughout the ages. Slowly but surely the depleted vegetation was always restored . . . It is only when man aids in the destruction by overgrazing and trampling and by plowing that conditions are worsened and the vegetation is destroyed." A companion volume by Prof. Weaver, North American Prairie (Lincoln, Neb., Johnsen Pub. Co., 1954. 348 p.), is equally meticulous, but without such striking applications.

E. Historical Geography and Atlases

2967. Adams, James Truslow, ed. Atlas of American history. James Truslow Adams, editor in chief; R[oy] V. Coleman, managing editor. New York, Scribner, 1943. 360 p.
Map 43–126 E179.A3

A supplement to the Scribner Dictionary of American History (no. 3070), this atlas consists of 147 plates (usually one but sometimes two to a map) in black-and-white line, prepared by LeRoy H. Appleton under the direction of 64 historians (whose names appear at the foot of their contributions). The editors aimed to produce "a concise, easy to use, carefully thought out, authoritative atlas," which "would interpret our history through the location of places as they actually existed and exactly where they existed at a given time." The maps are small (24 cm.) and simplified in their topography; but the selection of significant subjects, the comparatively brief time-span of each, and the restriction of detail to sites of contemporary importance, have attained the latter object more adequately than in any other general work of the kind. The result is a very useful companion to studies in many aspects of American history.

2968. Brown, Ralph H. Mirror for Americans; likeness of the eastern seaboard, 1810. New York, American Geographical Society, 1943. xxxii, 312 p. (American Geographical Society. Special publication no. 27, edited by Elizabeth T. Platt)
43–9759 F106.B9

Bibliography: p. [248]–259.

2969. Brown, Ralph H. Historical geography of the United States. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1948. 596 p. 48–1500 E179.5.B9

Bibliography: p. [539]–571.

The first title conceals a scientific purpose beneath a pleasant veneer of archaism: the real author invents a fictitious one, a Philadelphia collector of American geographical literature in the year 1810, who digests the contents of his shelves into a descriptive treatise of which "the style and the organization are both designed as composites of the geographical exposition of the time." There is a preliminary discussion of the literature itself, and many well-reproduced illustrations from contemporary sources, some of the maps being skillfully redrawn. The future is ingeniously kept open: "Will the Potomac become the great highway to the west? He would be foolhardy indeed who answered one way or the other."

The later work is a more straightforward application of the same basic method to the settlement and economic exploitation of successive areas of the United States and Canada. In each phase the physiography and vegetation of the land to be conquered are set against the institutional and technological equipment of the settlers, and the primary economy of the region is shown to emerge as a consequence of both factors, which have themselves become modified in the process. This treatment is applied to the occupation of the Atlantic Coast in the colonial period, of the Old Northwest to 1830, of Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota to 1870, and of the Great Plains and the Pacific Coast to the same year.

2970. Douglas, Edward M. Boundaries, areas, geographic centers and altitudes of the United States and their several states, with a brief record of important changes in their territory and government. 2d ed. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1932. 265 p. (U. S. Geological Survey. Bulletin 817) GS34–40 E179.S.D73 1932
QE75.B9, no. 817a

The original form of this useful document, a compilation of precise information very difficult to find elsewhere, was issued by the Geological Survey in 1885, under the authorship of Henry Gannett, and the present edition is in fact the sixth revision. It defines the boundaries of the several accessions to the territory of the continental United States, the outlying possessions, and the 48 states, with emphasis upon peculiarities arising out of historical circumstances. A separate section outlines the history of the Public Domain. Ten tables of "General Statistics Relating to the United States" conclude the text.

2971. Gilbert, Edmund W. The exploration of western America, 1800–1850; an historical geography. Cambridge [Eng.] University Press, 1933. 233 p. 33–18707 E179.5.G56

In 1800 the trans-Mississippi West was largely terra incognita; by 1850 "the main geographical features of this vast area had been revealed." The author, who has since become professor of geography at Oxford, seeks "to reconstruct the geographical setting in which the explorers accomplished their work," and so to estimate the importance of geographical factors in the process. Six chapters are devoted to a geographical analysis of western America as of 1800—such systematic reconstruction being "the true function of historical geography." Concise narratives follow of the discovery of the northern, central, and southern trans-continental routes, and of the Great Basin and the routes over the Sierra Nevada. Noteworthy for its selection and arrangement of facts, the volume remains one of the most important English contributions to American studies.

2972. Lord, Clifford L., and Elizabeth H. Lord. Historical atlas of the United States. Rev. ed. New York, Holt, 1953. xv, 238 p.
53–10208 G1201.S1L6 1953

"The startlingly rapid growth and development of the United States make its history particularly susceptible to visual portrayal . . . By mapping developments in particular fields every few years, so that one can almost see them grow or shift, this atlas tries to combine the usefulness of the animated [-cartoon] map with the advantages of being able to sit down . . . for study at such length as need be." Thus there are maps of population density for every census year from 1790 to 1950. The atlas also attempts to juxtapose basic social and economic maps against those for our political history. Map styles are frequently modelled on those of Paullin's atlas (no. 2974). Authors and publisher have produced an inexpensive volume, but, with 312 maps on 196 medium-sized pages, the detail often becomes so minute as to bewilder. The authors warn that their work is meant, not as a reference atlas, but as a help for students.

2973. Muelder, Hermann R., and David M. Delo. Years of this land, a geographical history of the United States. New York, Appleton-Century, 1943. 243 p. 43–7107 E179.5.M96

For the general reader, an outline of American history which emphasizes the geological and geographical factors in such large movements as discovery, colonization, the westward movement, national expansion, industrialization, conservation, and inter-American relations. The authors would not claim to be systematic or profound, but they are quite successful in placing familiar facts in unfamiliar perspectives, and in pointing out seldom-realized relationships between physical and historical phenomena.

2974. Paullin, Charles O. Atlas of the historical geography of the United States. Edited by John K. Wright. Washington, Published jointly by Carnegie Institution of Washington and the American Geographical Society of New York, 1932. 162 p. 688 maps (part col.) on 166 plates (part double) ([Carnegie Institution of Washington. Publication no. 401])
Map 32–54 G1201.S1P3 1932

"This is the first major historical atlas of the United States and probably the most comprehensive work of its kind that has yet been published for any country." After nearly 25 years it remains unrivaled. It was just 20 years in the making, work having been begun in 1912 on a plan drawn up nine years earlier by J. Franklin Jameson, who closely supervised the enterprise through its first 15 years. Many scholars, scientists, libraries, archives, and Government agencies coöperated in its making. The text comments upon each individual map and indicates the sources upon which it was based. The major subdivisions are concerned with geography, cartography (1492–1867), lands, population, boundaries, politics, reforms, and economics. In spite of the efforts lavished, all parts of the atlas are not of equal quality. The boundary maps, and those concerned with presidential elections and crucial votes in Congress, are outstanding; but the reproductions of old maps, which comprise the cartographic section and parts of several others, are too small for full legibility, and the military history section is quite unsatisfactory.

2975. Semple, Ellen Churchill. American history and its geographic conditions. Rev. in collaboration with the author by Clarence Fielden Jones. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1933. 541 p.
33–8691 E179.5.S47 1933

"Supplementary readings": p. [443]–468; "Literary reading lists": p. [469]–505.

The author, a follower of Friedrich Ratzel, was professor of anthropogeography at Clark University, and her book, originally published in 1903, was long the standard work on geographical factors in American history. The present edition, which appeared the year after her death, included some additions and alterations from her pen, but the detailed task of bringing it up to date was carried out by Mr. Jones. The majority of the chapters emphasize the geographic basis of striking events such as the Louisiana Purchase, the War of 1812, and the Civil War; but there are also more analytical treatments such as "Geography of the Atlantic Coast in Relation to the Development of American Sea Power," "The Geography of the Inland Waterways," and "The Geographical Distribution of Railroads."

2976. Stewart, George R. Names on the land, a historical account of place-naming in the United States. New York, Random House, 1945. 418 p. 45–3640 E155.S8

The study of place-names usually issues in an inventory, but Mr. Stewart has succeeded in interpreting the giving of such names within the continental United States as a significant historical process, and makes clear how "the names had grown out of the life, and the life-blood, of all those who had gone before." Particular names have been included 1) as of large units, states or cities, interesting to all Americans; 2) as illustrating habits or fashions of place-naming; 3) as connected with the work of some individual; and 4) as of unusually interesting origin. The work achieves an original synthesis of geographical, linguistic, and historical factors. The considerable local literature is arranged by states in the Bibliography of Place Name Literature: United States, Canada, Alaska, and Newfoundland, by Richard B. Sealock and Pauline A. Seely (Chicago, American Library Association, 1948. 331 p.).

F. Polar Exploration

2977. Byrd, Richard Evelyn. Little America, aerial exploration in the Antarctic, the flight to the South Pole. New York, Putnam, 1930. xvi, 422 p. 31–26036 G850 1928.A3 1930

"The geological sledge trip, by Dr. Laurence M. Gould": p. 393–412.

2978. Byrd, Richard Evelyn. Discovery; the story of the second Byrd Antarctic expedition. New York, Putnam, 1935. xxi, 405 p. 36–27041 G850 1933.A3

Admiral Byrd (b. 1888), if a comparatively late comer to Antarctic exploration (Amundsen reached the South Pole in 1911), has nevertheless a secure place through his systematic application of improved scientific equipment to permit continuous occupation, and prolonged observation and experiment. His narratives cover his first two expeditions, but he has not yet continued them to include several later and larger ones under Government auspices.

2979. Hobbs, William Herbert. Peary. New York, Macmillan, 1936. xv, 502 p. 36–32070 G635.P4H6

"Publications of Robert Edwin Peary": p. 456–465.

Robert Edwin Peary (1856–1920) engaged in 19 years of almost continuous Arctic exploration, beginning in 1891, and concerned himself with a steady improvement of technique which would permit a final dash to the Pole itself by a few men and dog-sledges. His second attempt in 1905 was defeated by exceptionally severe weather, but his third brough him success on April 6, 1909. It was not until 1937 that Soviet scientists reached the Pole under conditions that permitted of extensive scientific observations. Unfortunately for Peary, an impostor of considerable literary skill, Dr. Frederick A. Cook, after wintering on the northern coast of Greenland, got in a claim to have reached the Pole the year before. Mr. Hobbs necessarily devotes much of his volume to a refutation of this claim and a description of the heated controversies which it engendered. In order to raise funds for his costly expeditions, Peary publicized his successive explorations at some length: Northward over the "Great Ice"; a Narrative of Life and Work along the Shores and upon the Interior Ice-Cap of Northern Greenland in the Years 1886 and 1891–1897 (New York, Stokes, 1898. 2 v.); Nearest the Pole: a Narrative of the Polar Expedition of the Peary Arctic Club in the S. S. Roosevelt, 1905–1906 (New York, Doubleday, Page, 1907. 411 p.); and The North Pole, Its Discovery in 1909 under the Auspices of the Peary Arctic Club (New York, Stokes, 1910. 373 p.).

2980. Mirsky, Jeannette. Elisha Kent Kane and the seafaring frontier. Boston, Little, Brown, 1954. 201 p. (The Library of American biography) 54–6886 G635.K2M5

Polar exploration is a cosmopolitan achievement to which many nations have contributed, and which can best be followed in a general narrative such as Miss Mirsky's To the Arctic! The Story of Northern Exploration from Earliest Times to the Present ([Rev. ed.] New York, Knopf, 1948. 334 p.). The American share, however, can be summarized in the lifework of four men: Kane, Greely, and Peary in the Arctic, and Byrd in the Antarctic. Kane (1820–57) was a young physician with a heart weakened by rheumatic fever, who headed two successive expeditions financed by the New York merchant Henry Grinnell, in search of the missing British explorer Sir John Franklin. His health gave way shortly after he completed the narrative of the second expedition. He was far in advance of his time in understanding the Eskimo adaptation to the Arctic climate. Kane's own narratives tell the story at considerably greater length: The U. S. Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin; a Personal Narrative (New York, Harper, 1853. 552 p.) and Arctic Explorations; The Second Grinnell Expedition in Search of Sir John Franklin, 1853, '54, '55 (Philadelphia, Childs & Peterson, 1856. 2 v.)

2981. Mitchell, William. General Greely; the story of a great American. New York, Putnam, 1936. xiv, 242 p. 36–27206 G635.G7M5

Adolphus W. Greely (1844–1935) was placed in charge of the American station at Lady Franklin Bay on Ellesmere Island, northernmost of the eleven international circumpolar stations which, as a result of the International Polar Conference at Hamburg in 1879, were to make observations during 1882–83. Greely and his 25 subordinates were taken to their station in the summer of 1881, but the relief ships of 1882 and 1883 were incompetently commanded, and only Greely and six others were alive when Winfield S. Schley got through on June 22, 1884. General Mitchell devotes the greater part of his concise and appreciative biography to the Arctic episode, but also calls attention to Greely's important work in the Signal Corps, the Weather Bureau, and in the early development of military aviation. Greely's own narrative was first published in 1886: Three Years of Arctic Service; an Account of the Lady Franklin Bay Expedition of 1881–84 and the Attainment of the Farthest North (New York, Scribner. 2 v.).

VII

The American Indian

A.	General Works	2982–2989
B.	Archaeology and Prehistory	2990–2997
C.	Tribes and Tribal Groups	2998–3014
D.	Religion, Art, and Folklore	3015–3021
E.	The White Advance	3022–3037
F.	The Twentieth Century	3038–3043

THE literature of the American Indian began with the Columbus Letter of 1493, has flourished through more than four and a half centuries, and continues to range from the romantic to the technically ethnological in the publications of the current year. The red man has ever exercised a compelling fascination upon the imagination of the European of all nationalities, and upon his American descendants, young or old, nor is this fascination diminished by increase of knowledge. The Indian makes an equally powerful appeal to scientific curiosity: the origins of his race, the sources of his culture, and the innumerable facets of his interrelations with the white man and his civilization have been and remain problems of the first importance for the systematic study of the human race. The Indian, however, is an abstraction: he exists only as a member of one among hundreds of individual tribes, speaking one among dozens of languages, and pursuing one among many contrasting ways of life. All of these subdivisions invite, and practically all have received, monographic treatment, resulting in an extraordinary accumulation of facts and an equally extraordinary proliferation of books. Few would maintain that this outpouring of monographs has been accompanied by a corresponding work of digestion and synthesis, for recent and good general works on the Indian, or on the larger aspects of Indian life and history, are rarer than they should be. We have, therefore, had the task of selecting a relatively small group of monographic studies, on particular tribes or on some aspect of Indian culture among one or a few tribes, as representative of the whole. Obviously many alternative choices could have been made with approximately equal justification. The monographic material is listed at length, under 253 tribal groups, in George Peter Murdock's Ethnographic Bibliography of North America, 2d ed. (New Haven, Human Relations Area Files, 1953. 239 p.).

We have gone beyond the geographical limits of our proper subject, the United States, by including in Section B one title on the Maya and one on the Aztec civilization (nos. 2994 and 2997). This is on purely historical grounds: these cultures, along with that of the Incas in South America, were in all respects the highest developed in the New World by the Indian race, which is inadequately presented without them; the cultures of many other North American tribes were in some measure a diffusion and a dilution of these (cf. no. 3012); and the impingement of the Spaniards upon them was a decisive fact for the entire subsequent course of the European occupation of the New World. The user of this chapter will doubtless note that among the tribal studies the Indians of the Plains and of the Southwest predominate. This is largely because these alone survived in sufficient numbers, and with their original cultures reasonably intact, when anthropology had become a systematic discipline. Yet in smaller degree it is because to the American and the European imagination the Plains Indian is the American Indian par excellence, and his ways the proper ways of Indian kind—as is testified by the universal adoption of his war-bonnet.

In considering any Indian group, three varieties of fact may be distinguished: its culture prior to regular contact with white settlement; the processes of contact; and the consequences for the group. Some of our titles consider only one of these aspects or moments, but we have looked for books which take two or all three of them into consideration. The third aspect introduces the vexed questions of Federal Indian policy, which most of our authors criticize more or less severely. They do not, perhaps, always realize the advantage conferred by the wisdom of hindsight, as well as by an accumulated body of knowledge, affording an insight into the lives and minds of primitive peoples, which was not available a century ago. Two deficiencies which recent scholarship has hitherto failed to supply may be noted: any considerable study of individual Indians who have been absorbed into the white community, and documented studies of developments during the last quarter-century.

A. General Works

2982. Hodge, Frederick Webb, ed. Handbook of American Indians, north of Mexico. Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1907–10. 2 v. (Smithsonian Institution. Bureau of American Ethnology. Bulletin 30) 7–35198 E77.H682

Bibliography: pt. 2, p. 1179–1221.

This immense compilation (2193 p.) had its inception as early as 1873, and Mr. Hodge was engaged upon it from 1889. It was originally conceived as a "tribal synonymy," attempting to order the multiple and conflicting nomenclature of Indian groups, but steadily expanded into an alphabetical arrangement of Indian knowledge of every kind. The original purpose appears in the 158-page "Synonymy" in vol. 2 (p. 1021–1178). The majority of the articles are devoted to linguistic families, tribes, subtribes, towns, and villages. Another large group presents individual Indians of note. Fewer but longer articles deal with elements of material culture (copper, hammers), social organization (chiefs, confederation), custom (cremation, dance), relations to white societies (German influence, legal status), and aspects of civilized progress (education, Hampton Institute). While up-to-the-minute anthropologists regard "Hodge" as hopelessly out of date, both as to information and to "the concepts by which the material is organized," it must remain the first resort of every inquirer until it has been replaced by a work on the new lines equally systematic and meticulous.

2983. Kroeber, Alfred L. Cultural and natural areas of native North America. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1939. 242 p. maps (8 fold. in pocket) tables (1 fold. in pocket) (University of California publications in American archaeology and ethnology, v. 38)

A40–56 E51.C15, v. 38
E98.C9K73

This work, which receives the almost uniform admiration of the recent generation of American ethnologists, was completed in 1931, but remained unprinted because of the depression, and was only partially brought up to date in 1936 and 1939. "It aims, first, to review the environmental relations of the native cultures of North America," and, second, "to examine the historic relations of the culture areas, or geographical units of cultures." It arrives, by refined methods of classification, at 84 areas dividing the whole continent, within each of which culture is relatively uniform. It discovers a number of close correspondences of physiographic provinces with cultural and ethnic areas, but explains why "any one set of natural factors, geologic, vegetational, climatic, or hydrographic," is unlikely to affect culture with uniform potency. In fact, "the interactions of culture and environment become exceedingly complex when followed out." This complexity, which tends to make generalization unprofitable, is increased when cultural intensity—special content and special system—is considered.

2984. Roe, Frank G. The Indian and the horse. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1955. xvi, 434 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian [series]) 55–6359 E98.H55R6

Bibliography: p. 400–417.

Assembles the "scattered comparative data" provided by qualified observers in the past—from whom he excludes the plainsmen as habitual exaggerators of anti-Indian bias—and by recent anthropologists, in order "to summarize in conveniently co-ordinated form the existent evidence . . . concerning the impact of the historic horse upon the principal horse-raising tribes of the North American continent in the predominating aspects of chronology, geography, and tribal reactions." As in his book on the buffalo (no. 2965), Mr. Roe engages in strenuous refutation of the views of other writers with which he disagrees. He concludes that the horse "widened the Indian's spiritual horizon," and especially that of the squaw, but otherwise it "merely widened the stage on which the Indian had always moved, and enabled him to do more easily the things he had always done." The dog travois preceded the horse, which did not create nomadic habits, but enabled native products to be transported in increased bulk.

2985. Swanton, John R. The Indian tribes of North America. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1952. 726 p. (81st Cong., 2d sess. House. Document no. 383)
52–61970 E51.U6, no. 145
E77.S94

Smithsonian Institution, Bureau of American Ethnology. Bulletin 145.

Bibliography: p. 643–682.

This substantial volume, the result of years of work, presents a map of North America showing the location of the Indian tribes about 1650; when the earliest data is of a later year, the date is placed on the map along the tribal name. Dr. Swanton recognizes that "tribe" is a term of imprecise significance, and that only "a town and band map" would embody present-day anthropological concepts, but since the data for the latter are uncompiled, he proceeds with "a relatively conventional classification, having in view popular convenience." He organizes his data by States, in geographical order from Maine to California, followed by the remaining parts of the continent from Alaska to Central America. Under the "main entry" for each tribe are given long lists of subdivisions and villages, concise statements on connections, location, population at various periods, and "Connections in which they have become noted," and a longer history. The map is inserted in four large folding sections, and the text provides a work of basic reference.

2986. Underhill, Ruth Murray. Red Man's America; a history of Indians in the United States. Illus. by Marianne Stroller. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1953. 400 p. 53–10535 E77.U456

Bibliography: p. 357–369.

The author has aimed at a single-volume account of the history and culture of the Indians of the United States, based on the latest anthropological research but designed for "the average citizen." Two introductory chapters speculate on the original migrations to the Americas and describe "the high cultures of Nuclear America"—the Andean area, Central America, Yucatan, and the Valley of Mexico. Thenceforward the tribes of the United States are presented under ten major groups, with the text for each group considering origins, culture, and history after the first contact with Europeans. At the end of each chapter are tables of present reservations and numbers of surviving groups, if any, and a tabloid presentation of culture: food, hunting methods, clothing, house types, equipment, war, and games. A concluding chapter presents a favorable view of United States Indian policy, at least since 1921.

2987. Wissler, Clark, The American Indian, an introduction to the anthropology of the New World. 3d. ed. New York, P. Smith, 1950. xvii, 466 p. A51–3696 E58.W832

"Linguistic tables and bibliography": p. [389]–439.

2988. Wissler, Clark. Indians of the United States; four centuries of their history and culture. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1946. xvi, 319 p. (The American Museum of Natural History. Science series)
47–7240 E77.W799 1946

2989. Wissler, Clark. Indian cavalcade; or, Life on the old-time Indian reservations. New York, Sheridan House, 1938. 351 p.
38–39407 E98.S7W57

Clark Wissler (1870–1947) of the American Museum of Natural History and Yale University was a preëminent interpreter of the American Indian, to whose study he devoted his life. His experience extended from visits to the Indian reservations in preallotment days, which gave him a warm and personal appreciation of Indian character, to the refined ethnological techniques of our own day, which he did as much as anyone to develop. The American Indian, first published in 1917 and last revised in 1938, has not been replaced as a lucid exposition of the anthropological approach. As an "outgrowth of museum experience," it assumes a point of view "mainly taxonomic, or classificatory and descriptive." After identifying the food areas of the New World, it proceeds through methods of transportation, the textile arts, the ceramic arts, decorative designs, stone and metal work, social grouping, social regulation, ritual, and mythology, to a chronology of cultures and four major schemes of classification: culture areas, archaeological areas, linguistic and somatic types. Indians of the United States, originally published in 1940, is more historical in approach and popular in appeal. Its theme is the Indians of the American frontier, their struggles to resist its advance, "their mode of life and its modifications due to residing among white people," and their outstanding personalities. The review of the tribes in Part II proceeds by language families. A chapter on "The Mystery of the Indian Mind" grapples with the genuine and long-standing problem of why the Indian and the white man, however well disposed, have had such difficulty in understanding one another. Indian Cavalcade is a unique book of reminiscence and reflection based on the young anthropologist's visits to several reservations during the first five years of the present century.

B. Archaeology and Prehistory

2990. Griffin, James B., ed. Archeology of eastern United States. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1952. 392 p. 52–14698 E53.G7

Bibliography: p. 371–392.

This volume in large format with double-column pages is formally a Festschrift in honor of Fay-Cooper Cole, Emeritus Professor and Chairman of the Department of Anthropology at the University of Chicago, but it was so planned as to offer nearly complete coverage of the field indicated in its title. Of the 28 contributions, all but one by pupils of Prof. Cole, the great majority (22) are regional in scope, and usually general in their treatment of the region. Of the remaining six, three are general—such as "Twenty-five Years of Archeology in the Eastern United States," by Carl E. Guthe, and "The Ethnological Cultures and Their Archeological Backgrounds," by Fred R. Eggan—and the other three topical. The papers in general, and the regional ones in particular, are severely technical in nature, with great emphasis on such matters as stratigraphy, foci, and taxonomy, but the general reader has no alternative for thorough coverage and up-to-date information. Figures 3–205, consisting of drawings, photographs, and maps, and usually complex, are placed at the end of the book.

2991. Holmes, William H. Handbook of aboriginal American antiquities. Part I. Introductory; the lithic industries. Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1919. xvii, 380 p. (Smithsonian Institution. Bureau of American Ethnology. Bulletin 60) 19–27642 E51.U6, no. 60 E59.A63H7

Bibliography: p. 368–372.

This impressive fragment is unfortunately the only completed portion of a monumental work projected by the first curator of the archaeological collections at the National Museum. It was to have extended to all the arts and industries practised by the native peoples, but is in fact limited to "the acquirement of the substances used in the arts" and "the manipulation of stone," on both of which it is more systematic and thorough than any other authority. After an exposition of archaeological first principles, chapters 11–27 are concerned with aboriginal quarrying and mining, and describe in much detail surviving quarries, such as the unique red pipestone (catlinite) quarry at Pipestone, Minn. Chapters 28–36 reconstruct the stone-shaping arts, and discriminate the several processes of percussion fracture, pressure fracture, fire fracture, crumbling, abrading, incising, and piercing. The second volume was to have dealt with the results: the implements, utensils, and other minor artifacts of stone.

2992. McGregor, John C. Southwestern archaeology. New York, Wiley, 1941. 403 p. 41–26543 E78.S7M15

"General bibliography": p. 380–392.

Ostensibly concerned with the archaeology of Arizona and New Mexico, this book is in fact largely confined to Arizona, which its covers very thoroughly. Precision has been arrived at in this field through the development of dendrochronology, based on the study of tree rings as uniform indicators of annual growth. Through the work of A. E. Douglass, a University of Arizona astronomer, which was begun in 1904 and achieved maturity in 1929, a continuous ring series reaching back to A. D. 700 was established. As a result it has been possible to date the several sites and stages of the Mogollon Culture of the central mountain belt, which goes back to the time of Christ, the Hohokam Culture of the southern desert, and the Basket Maker Culture of the northern plateau. The great drouth of 1300 A. D. caused a great withdrawal southward, and the desertion of many northern sites.

2993. Martin, Paul S., George I. Quimby, and Donald Collier. Indians before Columbus; twenty thousand years of North American history revealed by archeology. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1947. xxiii, 582 p. 47–1434 E61.M36

"A contribution of the Chicago Natural History Museum."

Bibliography: p. [521]–543.

"This book has been written for the interested layman and for students taking introductory courses in anthropology. It is not intended as a general reference book for professional anthropologists"—who can, however, hardly fail to find it a useful outline of nearly the entire field. The presentation is concise and lucid, and a three-page glossary precedes the text. The authors note the omission of Canada from the St. Lawrence to the Yukon, much of Alaska, and the Middle Atlantic Seaboard, from poverty of data or lack of space. Part I discusses archaeological method and the origin of the Indians. Part II describes arts and industries, including primitive trade and commerce. Part III presents the earliest cultures, and the "embarrassingly real" hiatus between them and the later ones, which go back only to about 1 A. D. The next four parts comprise the regional survey, with "The Plains Area" included under "Eastern North America." Part VIII, "Chronology and Correlation of Sequences of Cultures," consists of a chronological chart spanning four pages, with four more of commentary. The halftone illustrations are indifferently reproduced.

2994. Morley, Sylvanus Griswold. The ancient Maya. [2d ed.] Stanford University, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1947. xxxii, 520 p.
47-4830 F1435.M75 1947

"Classified bibliography": p. 467–502.

The recovery of the Maya civilization, the author thinks, began with John L. Stephens' Incidents of Travel in Central America . . . (New York, Harper, 1841. 2 v.), and was continued by the English archaeologist, Alfred P. Maudslay, between 1881 and 1894, by the Peabody Museum of Archaeology and Ethnology of Harvard University between 1885 and 1915, and, since the latter date, by the Carnegie Institution of Washington, which sent 25 annual expeditions to the Maya area. The present lavishly illustrated (95 plates and 57 figures) volume, by one of the Carnegie Institution's principal archaeologists, is a thoroughly assimilated synthesis of these results—"a complete picture of Maya civilization, harmoniously balanced, animated, and understandable," as a Mexican scholar has termed it. It falls into four parts: two chapters on the people and their country; five chapters of history from A. D. 317–1697, subdivided into the Old Empire (to 987), the New Empire, and the Spanish Conquest; nine chapters on ancient and modern manners and customs; and a final chapter of comparison and appraisal. Morleyana: A Collection of Writings in Memoriam Sylvanus Griswold Morley—1883–1948 (Santa Fé, School of American Research and the Museum of New Mexico, 1950. 268 p.) is a tribute of admiration and love from 59 colleagues, perhaps the warmest ever paid to an archaeologist. John Eric S. Thompson's The Rise and Fall of Maya Civilization (Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1954. 287 p.) is a briefer outline which emphasizes the Maya intellectual achievement, with its curious disregard of the practical, and Maya religion; it has some excellent drawings from the ancient sculptures by Avis Tulloch.

2995. Sellards, Elias H. Early man in America; a study in prehistory. Illus. by Hal Story. Austin, University of Texas Press, 1952. xvi, 211 p.
52-14173 E58.S44

"A publication of the Texas Memorial Museum."

Bibliography: p. 155–205.

Archaeological method has acquired a new chronological precision through the properties of radioactive Carbon^{14}, the disintegration of which permits the age of organic matter to be determined within quite narrow limits. The present work reviews the several finds of the earliest artifacts in North America in the light of C^{14} datings of associated animal remains. Specimens from Gypsum Cave, Nevada, are some 10,500 years old; from Lubbock, Texas, some 9,900 years; from southern Nebraska, some 9,500 years. A picture emerges of "hunters of the plains" pursuing the elephant, the mastodon, the bison, the camel, and the sloth with weapons of some refinement as early as 8,000 B. C. Folsom points, once regarded as the oldest evidence of man in America, are now considered more recent than the Sandia points found in New Mexico. The book is handsomely produced with excellent drawings, but the text is rather severely technical.

2996. Shetrone, Henry Clyde. The mound-builders; a reconstruction of the life of a prehistoric American race, through exploration and interpretation of their earth mounds, their burials, and their cultural remains. New York, Appleton, 1930. 508 p.
30-22078 E73.S55

Bibliography: p. 491–496.

The mounds in question are found throughout the lands drained by the Mississippi and its tributaries, as far west as, roughly, the 95th meridian, and in all the Southeastern States as well. As conspicuous features of the trans-Appalachian landscape, they naturally became the first great problem in American archaeology; Thomas Jefferson was the first to excavate one (one of the simpler Virginia mounds), and William Henry Harrison, in his Discourse on the Aborigines of the Valley of the Ohio (Cincinnati [Printed at the Cincinnati Express] 1838. 51 p.), attributed them to a superior and vanished race, akin to the Aztecs, as did most of his contemporaries. Modern archaeology has reduced their importance by demonstrating their complete continuity with the Indian cultures that preceded and followed, although it has found no conclusive explanation of the fact that the custom of moundbuilding became extinct shortly before the arrival of the whites. The author, who was the Director of the Ohio State Archaeological and Historical Society, has provided a definitive summary of their varieties, contents, and relationships, and a clear definition of "the Mound-builder burial complex."

2997. Vaillant, George C. Aztecs of Mexico; origin, rise and fall of the Aztec nation. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1941. xxii, 340 p. (The American Museum of Natural History. Science series) 41-12191 F1219.V13
Bibliography: p. 299-325.

The Aztecs were comparative latecomers to the Valley of Mexico, about the middle of the 13th century, and they did not begin to establish their empire, first over neighboring and then over outlying tribes, until the second quarter of the 15th. Theirs was a blood-stained imperialism, for their conquests yielded victims for sacrifice to Huitzilopochtli, the War God—20,000 in one ceremony of 1487, according to one Aztec source. The author, who was Professor of Anthropology and Director of the University of Pennsylvania Museum when he died at the age of 44, has based a popular interpretation of Aztec history and culture upon his own thorough knowledge of Mexican archaeology. The succession of pre-Aztec cultures in the Valley of Mexico is clearly outlined, and Aztec origins are traced to Cholula in the State of Puebla. There is a chapter on the Aztec economy, domestic and tribal, and another offering a fascinating "Glimpse of Tenochtitlán," the Aztec capital which became Mexico City. The 64 plates and 28 text figures include many native drawings from the Codex Florentine of Bernardino de Sahagun's history. John Eric S. Thompson's Mexico before Cortez (New York, Scribner, 1933. 298 p.) is slighter and without much archaeological information, but is detailed and useful for Aztec religion, including ritual, the sacred feasts, the priesthood, and the temples and tombs.

C. Tribes and Tribal Groups

2998. Drucker, Philip. Indians of the Northwest coast. New York, Published for the American Museum of Natural History [by] McGraw-Hill, 1955. 208 p. ([American Museum of Natural History, New York] Anthropological handbook no. 10) 55-9543 E78.N78D7
Bibliography: p. 197-199.

The fourteen tribes, with such unfamiliar names as Tlingit, Kwakiutl, and Nootka, who parceled out the Northwest Coast from Yakutat Bay in southeast Alaska to Trinidad Bay in northern California, departed more widely from the popular conception of the American Indian than any other group. These tribes had practically no agriculture, but lived by fishing supplemented by hunting and berry-gathering. They had, nevertheless, a complex culture, such as seldom accompanies so primitive an economy, and a highly original and striking repertory of art forms. This Handbook naturally emphasizes the material culture illustrated by the Museum's collections but also sketches in "the cultural background of the specimens by relating briefly not only how the various material objects were made and used, but recounting something of the general way of life of the makers and users." Like the other volumes of this series, it is a model of economical and efficient book-production.

2999. Grinnell, George Bird. The Cheyenne Indians, their history and ways of life. Photographs by Elizabeth C. Grinnell and Mrs. J. E. Tuell. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1923. 2 v. 23-17688 E99.C53G77

3000. Grinnell, George Bird. The fighting Cheyennes. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1956. xvii, 453 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian series)
56-10392 E99.C53G8 1956
First published in 1915.

Dr. Grinnell (1849-1938), explorer, hunter, naturalist, osteologist, and long-time editor and publisher of Forest and Stream, was also an old Indian hand whose experience went back to the year of his graduation from Yale (1870), and whose intercourse with the Cheyennes was continuous from 1890. He was never able to regard the Indian as a mere museum specimen: "a half-century spent in rubbing shoulders with them . . . forbids me to think of them except as acquaintances, comrades, and friends." Much of his intimate knowledge was obtained through his interpreters, a man who had married into the tribe in 1850, and George Bent, the halfbreed son of Col. William Bent of Bent's Old Fort. The volumes of The Cheyenne Indians present, in the abundance of detail necessary to make the Indian viewpoint clear, their whole social life. Among other subjects, volume 1 deals with village life and camp customs, social organization, childhood, women, industries, subsistence, games, and tribal government; volume 2 with warfare, religious beliefs, disease and healing, and death customs. The latter also contains very detailed descriptions of the Medicine Lodge, or midsummer ceremony, and of the four-day Massaum ceremony, sometimes called the Crazy Dance. The Fighting Cheyennes is a detailed history of the tribe's wars from about 1819. "A fighting and a fearless people, the tribe was almost constantly at war with its neighbors, but until 1856 was friendly to the whites." The first 100 pages are concerned with the intertribal conflicts before that date, as recalled by Cheyenne tradition, and the subsequent narrative seeks to supplement white sources with Indian ones whenever the latter are available. The author's By Cheyenne Campfires (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1926. 305 p.) is a collection of 66 tales, arranged in the major classes of "War Stories," "Stories of Mystery," "Hero Myths," and stories about Wihio, the Cheyenne trickster. Dr. Grinnell had published similar collections for the Pawnees in 1889, and for the Blackfeet in 1892 and 1913.

3001. Haines, Francis. The Nez Percés: tribesmen of the Columbia Plateau. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1955. xvii, 329 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian series)
55–9626 E99.N5H28

Based on thesis, University of California.

Bibliography: p. 311–318.

The Nez Percés were a small but impressive tribe of intermediary culture, fishing for salmon in the Columbia and its tributaries, and also ranging widely to fight other tribes for a share of the Montana buffalo-hunting grounds. The author is chiefly concerned with their 90 years of contact with white civilization, from the arrival of Lewis and Clark in 1806 to the distribution of the tribal lands in 1895. Turning points were the arrival of the Protestant missionaries, at the Nez Percés' own request, in the 1830's, and the Nez Percé War of 1877, provoked by a series of white encroachments that followed the discovery of gold on their lands, and resulting in eight years of miserable exile at Fort Leavenworth.

3002. Heizer, Robert F., and Mary Anne Whipple, eds. The California Indians; a source book. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1951. 487 p. 51–61951 E78.C15H4

The editors emphasize that this collection of essays is intended for a lay rather than a professional public, that it constitutes a survey rather than an encyclopedia for reference work, and is not meant as a substitute for Alfred L. Kroeber's authoritative but encyclopedic and highly technical Handbook of the Indians of California, published as Bulletin no. 78 of the U. S. Bureau of American Ethnology (Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1925. 995 p.). The California Indians consists of twelve contributions by Kroeber himself, as well as by Roland B. Dixon, E. W. Gifford, Sherburne F. Cook, and others. The essays are grouped under the headings "General Surveys," "Archaeology," "Historical Accounts (1775–1851)," "Material Culture," and "Social Culture." The California Indians, relatively unwarlike and divided into numerous groups with little political organization, offered minimal resistance to white penetration.

3003. Hyde, George E. Red Cloud's folk; a history of the Oglala Sioux Indians. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1937. 331 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian [series])
37–16051 E99.O3H9

"Brief bibliography": p. 321–324.

A careful history of the Oglala tribe, the first Sioux to pass west of the Missouri, from about 1650 to 1879, when it was confined to a reservation and "broken to pieces by the policy then favored by the United States government." As such, it is largely the story of the Oglalas in relation to other Indian tribes and to the advancing whites. Mr. Hyde makes the valuable point that the living memory of the Plains Indians is reasonably valid for events 90 years in the past, but no earlier; his narrative becomes detailed only from 1834. It was the migration from Minnesota to the Black Hills that transformed the Teton Sioux "from little camps of poor people afoot in the vast buffalo plains into seven powerful tribes of mounted Indians." In the final troubles of 1870–79 he stresses the friendly role of the agency Sioux, the major group, who were nevertheless penalized equally with the hostiles in the final settlement.

3004. Lockwood, Francis C. The Apache Indians. New York, Macmillan, 1938. xvi, 348 p.
38–6746 E99.A6L6

Bibliography at end of each chapter.

An Arizona historian tells the history of the Apaches, naturally emphasizing their nuisance value in the history of the Southwest. "From the first, the Apaches have been the most hardy, warlike, mobile tribe known to history . . . Pity was a feeling unknown to the Apache; cruelty an ingrained quality." Ethnological matters are disposed of in one 25-page chapter, and the years of peace since 1886 in another. The harassing of the relatively civilized Pueblo Indians, of the Spaniards, and of the Mexicans by these marauders from the desert is described at greater length, and the Apache troubles after Cochise went on the warpath in 1861 comprise the bulk of the book (p. 100–319). Uncle Sam never had so tough an Indian nut to crack: it took 14 years to dispose of Cochise (1861–74), and another ten for Geronimo (1876–86). The author makes the most of the dramatic story and does not attempt to condone the treacheries to which the Federal authorities, in their desperation, sometimes resorted.

3005. Lowie, Robert H. The Crow Indians. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1935. xxii, 350 p. 35–9409 E99.C92L913
"Sources": p. 335–339.

Mr. Lowie, Emeritus Professor of Anthropology at the University of California and one of the foremost American anthropologists, began his professional career with a visit to the Crow Reservation in 1907, and on several returns, the latest in 1931, learned to speak Crow so well as to be conscious of its complexities and refinements, and of the limitations of his own knowledge. He ventured, indeed, to participate in the jeering and jesting which makes up so large a part of male Indian conversation, and notes that he usually got the worst of it. His book has thus the rare distinction of being based on Crow words for Crow ideas, and of exhibiting processes of thought radically different from our own. He gives a number of tales which he took down from the dictation of the septuagenarian Yellow-Brow. There are exceptionally intimate glimpses of club life, and of ceremonies such as the Sun Dance and the complex associated with the Tobacco Society. A final chapter adumbrates the Crow "World-View," in a book which displays Crow society and thought from the inside about as far as is possible for a white man tc do.

3006. Lowie, Robert H. Indians of the Plains. New York, Published for the American Museum of Natural History [by] McGraw-Hill, 1954. xiii, 222 p. ([American Museum of Natural History, New York] Anthropological handbook no. 1) 54–8815 E78.W5L6
Bibliography: p. 205–207.

The Plains Indians include six different linguistic families and a number of tribes who lived outside the short-grass regions, but are defined by a set of cultural traits prevalent among them and not similarly combined elsewhere: dependence on the buffalo, residence in skin-covered tepees, use of the horse for hunt and for transport, a peculiar style of decorative and of pictographic art, the sign language, the ideology of warfare, and the Sun Dance and other less conspicuous features of supernaturalism. This handbook, copiously illustrated with photographs, drawings, and diagrams, describes their culture from the time of their discovery until their virtually complete assimilation of white ways. There are large sections on material culture and social organization, and lesser ones on recreation, art, and supernaturalism. The conclusion calls attention to the appearance of particular Plains Indian features among tribes of other culture areas.

3007. Marriott, Alice Lee. The ten grandmothers. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1945. xiv, 306 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian [Series]) 45–1584 E99.K5M36
The Ten Grandmothers are the ten medicine bundles of the Kiowas, which have not been opened since the 1890's. On the chronological thread provided by the Kiowa year count, a painted mnemonic record beginning in 1832–33, Miss Marriott has strung 33 "sketches," eyewitness accounts derived from the aged Kiowas Hunting Horse, Spear Woman, and Eagle Plume. They are retold simply, but with such great skill and delicacy as to convey the significance of the event to the participant. She had been able to assign them to specific years between 1847 and 1944, and each "represents Kiowa behavior under given circumstances at a given time . . . Where the feelings of a person are described, it is only because he himself said that he felt that way." Such sketches as those of Hunting Horse's first war party, or of Spear Woman accepting her granddaughter as interpreter at the general store, demonstrate that imagination and literary art have their place in ethnology.

3008. Morgan, Lewis H. League of the Ho-de-no sau-nee, or Iroquois. New Haven, Reprinted by Human Relations Area Files, 1954. 2 v. (Behavior science reprints) 55–3694 E99.I7M84
Bibliography: v. 2, p. 307–312.

3009. Hunt, George T. The wars of the Iroquois; a study in intertribal trade relations. Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1940. 209 p. 40–3755 E99.I7H8
Bibliography: p. 185–200.

Lewis Henry Morgan (1818–1881) was a practicing lawyer in Rochester, N. Y., in 1851, when his epoch-making work on the Iroquois was published. The imprint listed is photographically reproduced from Herbert M. Lloyd's edition published by Dodd, Mead in 1904. In his earlier home of Aurora, N. Y., Morgan had become a friend of Ely S. Parker, the Seneca sachem who later served as General Grant's military secretary and Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Morgan had been adopted into the Hawk Clan of the Seneca tribe in 1847, and had organized a secret society modelled after the Iroquois Confederacy; League of the Iroquois originated in lectures to the society. His work has been called "the first scientific account of an Indian tribe given to the world," but it is safer to call it the first which sought to describe an Indian society sympathetically, from the inside, and as a whole. Morgan himself, who went on to become "the Father of American Anthropology" in a whole series of more technical and rigorous studies, soon came to realize its shortcomings, and especially its failure at several points to interpret Indian life in terms of itself. It remains, however, the classic description of the once-mighty Iroquois, and while many corrections of detail have appeared, no overall picture has been forthcoming to take its place. The work will always be a unique authority for the structure of the Iroquois League in Morgan's own day, and its careful descriptions of material culture have proved quite dependable. Frank G. Speck's The Iroquois, a Study in Cultural Evolution, 2d ed. ([Bloomfield Hills, Mich.] 1955. 94 p. Cranbrook Institute of Science. Bulletin no. 23), prepared as background material for interpreting exhibits and illustrated from objects in the Institute's museum, is a balanced survey in brief compass. Bernhard J. Stern's Lewis Henry Morgan, Social Evolutionist (University of Chicago Press, 1931. 221 p.) traces the development of Morgan's ideas and assesses his significance for his discipline. Mr. Hunt's volume, which dwells on the deficiencies of Morgan's historical information, puts forward an incisive economic interpretation of Iroquois history in the 17th century, with the European demand for furs as the primary factor. "The European trade was the major circumstance of all intertribal relations in the Great Lakes area, and the Iroquois and all their works were phenomena of that contact."

3010. Opler, Morris Edward. An Apache lifeway; the economic, social, and religious institutions of the Chiricahua Indians. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1941. xvii, 500 p. (University of Chicago publications in anthropology. Ethnological series) 41–24474 E99.A6O73

The life experiences of over 30 Chiricahua Apaches, three of whom have served as interpreters for the rest, are drawn upon for a presentation which, by introducing events "in the order in which they are experienced in the course of the normal Chiricahua Apache life-cycle," endeavors "to show how a person becomes a Chiricahua as well as to indicate what he does because he is a Chiricahua." The author aims to make the average Chiricahua intelligible and sympathetic, "in the sense that the reader understands what he has become in terms of what he has experienced." The subdivisions are therefore "Childhood," "Maturation," "Social Relations of Adults," "Medical Practice and Shamanism," "Maintenance of the Household," "Marital and Sexual Life," and "The Round of Life." There is naturally much of interest—such as the Apache's equation of aberrant sex behavior with witchcraft—but on the whole the author's treatment of his interview material is external and formal.

3011. Speck, Frank G. Penobscot man; the life history of a forest tribe in Maine. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1940. xx, 325 p. 40–9335 E99.P5S7

"List of publications quoted": p. 313–317.

Professor Speck (1881–1950), who taught anthropology at the University of Pennsylvania for nearly 40 years, was an assiduous field worker whose investigations ranged widely over the tribes of the United States and Canada. However, in his annual visits to the Penobscot Indians of Maine between 1907 and 1918, he had the field largely to himself and produced the only full-scale study of a surviving group of the Indians of the northeastern United States. The Penobscot, who lived and hunted in the valley of the River to which they have given their name, took over elements of culture from both French and English, but remained largely isolated until about 1870. The present work surveys their material culture with its many uses of birch bark, their arts, and social life (with special attention to "Relationship Restrictions"), but does not incorporate the work on religious beliefs and other topics which Dr. Speck had previously published in serials. On a return to Indian Island opposite Oldtown in 1936, he found that the tribe was increasing in numbers, and that the old culture was dying more slowly than he had anticipated, but also that 20th-century urban ways were steadily prevailing.

3012. Swanton, John R. The Indians of the southeastern United States. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1946. 943 p. 107 (i. e. 109) plates on 55 l., maps (part fold.) tables (1 fold.) ([U. S.] Bureau of American Ethnology. Bulletin 137) 46–26581 E51.U6, no. 137 E78.S55S9

Bibliography: p. 832–856.

Apart from the Five Civilized Tribes, the Indians of the Southeast have been comparatively little studied, and this massive volume, "in the main a collection of source materials," supplies a needed body of organized information. The aboriginal population during the first half of the 17th century has been estimated at 172,000, of which some 30,500 lived on the coast as against 141,500 belonging to the horticultural tribes of the interior. The largest linguistic stock was the Muskoghean, with 66,600 members; the other stocks unique to the area, the Timucua and the Tunican, with 13,000 and 6,000 respectively, were inferior to the Iroquoian (30,200: these were the Cherokees), the Siouan, and Algonquian colonies. After an exhaustive report on the 173 identifiable tribes (p. 81–216), the author turns to an equally exhaustive analysis of the aboriginal cultures, with abundant extracts from Spanish, French, and English observers of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries. "The cultures of all of the tribes of this area were basically the same," and their fundamental factors derived from the civilizations of Mexico, Central America, and Peru.

3013. Underhill, Ruth Murray. The Navajos. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1956. xvi, 299 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian series) 56–5996 E99.N3U32

Bibliography: p. 275–288.

The Navajos, shepherds and horsemen of the rocky canyons and desert plateaus of New Mexico and Arizona, number 70,000 and are the largest Indian tribe in the United States. They speak a language allied to the Athapascan of British Columbia, and were relatively late comers to the Southwest; the author of this careful and balanced history of the tribe thinks that they arrived soon after 1100 A. D. In their long relationship with Spaniards and Anglo-Americans, she notes three fresh beginnings: the acquisition of horses and sheep from the Spaniards, and the art of weaving from Pueblo refugees, toward the end of the 17th century; their exchange of banditry for a settled life on their reservation in 1868; and the long-range rehabilitation program enacted in 1950, under which the tribe's capital has risen to $15,000,000. The Navajo Indians, by Dane and Mary Roberts Coolidge (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1930. 316 p.), is a sympathetic description of their life a quarter of a century ago by a couple who had made regular tours of the reservation for 17 years; it emphasizes arts and crafts, and mythology and ceremonies.

3014. Wallace, Ernest, and Edward Adamson Hoebel. The Comanches: lords of the south plains. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1952. xvii, 381 p. ([The] Civilization of the American Indian [series])

52–11087 E99.C85W3

Bibliography: p. 355–364.

Throughout the Southwest the Comanche name "has become a synonym for wildness, fierceness, and savagery." For a century and a half the Comanches "successfully defended the High Plains and prairie country south of the Arkansas River against all intruders, red and white." The present book undertakes to "present the salient facts of Comanche history and culture in a way that will satisfy the interests and curiosity of the general reader and also the anthropologist and the historian." Few works on individual tribes have so successfully combined a presentation of historical circumstances with the analysis of culture. The cultural chapters make effective use of the distinctions and techniques of recent ethnology without descending into jargon or losing sight of the human beings who are being studied, and are quite free from either sentimentalism or patronizing.

D. Religion, Art, and Folklore

3015. Alexander, Hartley Burr. The world's rim; great mysteries of the North American Indians. With a foreword by Clyde Kluckhon. Lincoln, University of Nebraska Press, 1953. 259 p.

53–7703 E98.R3A4

A work first published 18 years after its completion and 14 years after the death of its author, a distinguished philosopher whose second subject was the thought-world of the American Indian. It selects eight types of Indian ritual "with the intention of showing his heritage and achievement at its best," and seeks to develop their implications concerning "the red men's conception of the natural world and of the human action which takes place within it." Among the ceremonies thus interpreted are the pipe or calumet rite, the rite of purification by the sweatbath, and the corn dance or corn ritual. Many analogies with early European or Asiatic ritual or philosophy are traced, not as evidences or diffusion, but as examples of the human mind drawing like instruction from natural experience. To the Indian mind, the author thought, the physical world is a sense-born phantasm; man is placed upon this earth to show his mettle; and the fulfillment of this world's life lies beyond it.

3016. Covarrubias, Miguel. The eagle, the jaguar, and the serpent; Indian art of the Americas. [v. 1] North America: Alaska, Canada, the United States. New York, Knopf, 1954. xviii, 314 p.

52–6415 E98.A7C63

The well-known Mexican artist presents Indian art "as an important and little-known part of our continental heritage," hitherto insufficiently studied "from the combined points of view of its aesthetic values and its historical implications in an effort to understand the mental processes of its creators and the social factors that helped its formation." The new and broadly synthetic viewpoint, together with the creative ability of the author, give this work exceptional interest, and the splendid color plates, line drawings, and well-reproduced photographs have few rivals elsewhere.

3017. Douglas, Frederic H., and René d'Harnoncourt. Indian art of the United States. [2d ed.] New York, Museum of Modern Art, 1949, ©1941. 204 p. 49–35040 E98.A7D6 1949

Bibliography: p. 195–203.

Based on an exhibition at the Museum of Modern Art prepared by Mr. Douglas, Curator of Indian Art of the Denver Art Museum, Mr. d'Harnoncourt, General Manager of the U. S. Indian Arts and Crafts Board, and Mr. Henry Klumb, architect, this exceptionally well-made volume is by no means an ephemeral production, but a concise and authoritative survey of a very large field. Nearly every page has one or two illustrations in very satisfactory halftone, and the 16 plates "indicating the traditional range of color in Indian art" are truly brilliant (in the original edition of 1941; the reissue of 1949 has only eight, mostly in duller hues). The two principal sections review "Prehistoric Art" in five main regions, and "Living Traditions" in eight culture areas. A concluding section on "Indian Art for Modern Living" distinguishes "good Indian work, done without the interference of whites," from the worthless knickknacks turned out for the tourist trade, which usually reflect the customer's rather than the maker's idea of Indian art. The participation of the Museum is thus justified: "This subtle control of its elements and the close relationship between function and form are what bring Indian work so near to the aims of most contemporary artists and make it blend with surroundings that are truly of the twentieth century."

3018. Ewers, John Canfield. Plains Indian painting; a description of an aboriginal American art. Stanford University, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1939. xiv, 84 p. 39–2775 E98.A7E93

Bibliography: p. 71–79.

Buffalo hides, or robes with the hair left intact, were used as topcoats by the Plains Indians, being wrapped about the body with the head of the animal to the wearer's left. The painting of such hides with geometric designs, by women, and with life forms, by men, was generally practiced until the disappearance of the buffalo, but is now a lost art. Of the surviving specimens some are crudely done, but many "possess a decorative quality which is both unique and undeniably pleasing." This thorough monograph describes the technique of painting, classifies the patterns and forms, reviews the mentions by early explorers and travelers, notes other surfaces which the Indians painted, such as drums and tepee covers, and presents evidence for hide painting among other Indian groups, even in South America. An appendix lists the museum specimens examined by the author. The numerous illustrations are large and well reproduced.

3019. Park, Willard Z. Shamanism in western North America; a study in cultural relationships. Evanston, Northwestern University, 1938. 166 p. (Northwestern University. Studies in the social sciences, no. 2) 38–14755 E98.R3P23

"The present study has developed from a dissertation presented for the degree of doctor of philosophy at Yale University [1936]."

Bibliography: p. 159–163.

Shamanism, in the author's labored definition, is "all the practices by which supernatural power may be acquired by mortals, the exercise of that power either for good or evil," and all associated concepts and beliefs. He spent three summers with the Paviotso or Northern Paiute of western Nevada, and devotes one of his two main chapters to an account of "Paviotso Shamanism" (p. 11–71). This he finds to be a comparatively simple affair; its dominant idea is that of curing diseases, and all other aspects are secondary. The second main chapter is a comparative study of "The Shamanistic Complex in Western North America," in which he particularly seeks to show the distribution of the elements of Paviotso shamanism "among the neighboring tribes of the Great Basin, the Plateau, California, and several of the so-called Western Rancheria tribes of the non-pueblo Southwest." He is surprised to find that these affiliations "cut across the conventional boundaries of culture areas." He allows his methodological perplexities to intrude upon his exposition, but his is the only recent investigation, and the largest comparative study, of a crucial topic in Indian thought and culture.

3020. Petrullo, Vincenzo. The diabolic root; a study of peyotism, the new Indian religion, among the Delawares. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, the University Museum, 1934. 185 p. 34–32555 E98.R3P38

Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) University of Pennsylvania.

Bibliography: p. 183–185.

Peyote is a species of small and spineless cactus, Lophophora Williamsii, limited to northern Mexico and southern Texas. Eaten, it produces first physical nausea, and then a state of psychic tranquility, exhilaration, power, and superiority, as well as an intensification of perception which tends toward the visionary. Once a minor cult of a few Mexican tribes, peyotism has become an all-sufficient religion in the Indian reservations east of the Rockies, through which worries are erased, cures performed, and revelations received. The two Delaware communities in Oklahoma acquired it, probably from the Comanches, about 1880. Two main cults have developed, the Big Moon cult of John Wilson, in which Christian elements have mingled, and the Little Moon cult of Elk Hair, which adheres more closely to the traditional Delaware religion. The author visited the reservations in 1929–30 and obtained personal statements of religious experience from several Delawares, including the venerable Elk Hair himself. He carefully describes the considerable variety of ritual and creed that has developed within the two cults. Notwithstanding the violence with which peyotism has been attacked, it is difficult to discover anything either orgiastic or degraded in the objective account here given of it.

3021. Thompson, Stith, ed. Tales of the North American Indians. Selected and annotated by Stith Thompson. Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1929. xxii, 386 p.
29–18693 E98.F6T32
Bibliography: p. [371]–386.

A century of field work among the Indians has gathered "by far the most extensive body of tales representative of any primitive people," but most of them are scattered in sets of government reports, folklore journals, and publications of learned societies. Professor Thompson has therefore selected 96 "typical examples of such of these tales as have gained any general currency," whether in one culture area, or in the whole East or the whole West, or even over practically the whole continent. They are arranged in a classified order: mythological stories, mythical incidents, trickster tales, hero tales, journey to the other world, animal wives and husbands, miscellaneous, tales borrowed from Europeans, and Bible stories. In the latter part of his introduction, the compiler characterizes the tales of the several culture areas: the Eskimos and the California Indians have the smallest range of interest, while the Plains Indians have practically every class of tale current anywhere else. Elaborate "Comparative Notes" (p. [271]–360), by listing all known parallels, "show the extent of the distribution of each tale and each motif." There are also a classified "List of Motifs Discussed in the Notes" (p. [361]–367) and, preliminary to the bibliography, a list of "Sources Arranged by Culture Areas and Tribes" (p. [368]–370).

E. The White Advance

3022. Cook, Sherburne F. The conflict between the California Indian and white civilization. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1943. 4 v. (Ibero-Americana 21–24)
A43–411 F1401.I22, no. 21–24
E78.C15C69
Includes bibliographies.
Contents.—1. The Indian versus the Spanish mission.—2. The physical and demographic reaction of the nonmission Indians in colonial and provincial California.—3. The American invasion, 1848–1870. —4. Trends in marriage and divorce since 1850.
"The present work consists of an examination of the reaction of a primitive human population to a new and disturbing environment. As such it constitutes a study in human ecology . . . In particular, those factors are considered which lend themselves to at least semiquantitative treatment . . . The effect of racial impact and competition was here unusually complete. It resulted in the substantial disappearance of the primitive population and the utter extinction of its civilization." The basic fact is a decline of the native population from 133,500 in 1770 to 20,500 in 1880. An interesting conclusion is that Indians who remained outside the missions maintained themselves better than did the mission Indians, in spite of warfare, disease, and forced removal. "The racial fiber of the native decayed morally and culturally in the misions, . . . confinement, labor, punishment, inadequate diet, homesickness, sex anomalies, and other social or cultural forces, sapped his collective strength and his will to resistance and survival."

3023. Dale, Edward Everett. The Indians of the Southwest; a century of development under the United States. Norman, Published in cooperation with the Huntington Library, San Marino, Calif., by the University of Oklahoma Press, 1949. xvi, 283 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian [series])
49–10762 E78.S7D28
Bibliography: p. 261–271.
In 1848 the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo gave the United States a vast territory whose scanty population consisted of a few thousand whites and a variety of Indian tribes whose numbers are variously estimated at from 125,000 to 200,000. Such white influence as they had undergone came from Spanish colonial culture and the Catholic Church. They were of two great classes: peaceful, sedentary, and agricultural tribes such as the pueblo dwellers of New Mexico and the Mission Indians of California, and "the wilder and more warlike tribes of the deserts and mountains." The author aims at "a broad general survey of the more important aspects of Indian administration in the Southwest, with special emphasis on those activities which have proved of permanent value." Developments during the 19th century are treated in chronological chapters for the three areas of California, Arizona and New Mexico, and Utah and Nevada, and conditions since 1900 in topical chapters with special attention to education and public health. In both centuries the crucial role of the Indian agent is emphasized.

3024. Debo, Angie. The rise and fall of the Choctaw Republic. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1934. xvi, 314 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian [series])
34–18340 E99.C8D4
Bibliography: p. 219–299.

3025. Debo, Angie. And still the waters run. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1940. 417 p. 41–3348 E78.I5D4
Bibliography: p. [396]–402.

Miss Angie Debo (b. 1890) is a homegrown Oklahoma historian who has been the most productive disciple of Grant Foreman; the present volumes supplement and continue his own listed below. The Rise and Fall is a history of the Choctaws as a "domestic dependent nation," which emphasizes the period after removal to the Indian Territory, and especially the years from the close of the Civil War to the dissolution of tribal interests after "the surrender to the United States" in the Atoka Agreement of 1898. Topical chapters treat economic development, public finance, political institutions, crime and justice, and society. The Road to Disappearance (Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1941. 399 p.) performs the same task for the more conservative Creek nation. The Creeks were disheartened and impoverished by the Civil War; their subsequent "attempt to replace their group loyalties with the white man's individualism brought a spiritual collapse from which they never fully recovered." And Still the Waters Run is a grim narrative of developments after the Five Civilized Tribes had surrendered their tribal organization at the beginning of this century. "The orgy of exploitation that resulted is almost beyond belief. Within a generation these Indians, who had owned and governed a region greater in area and potential wealth than many an American state, were almost stripped of their holdings, and were rescued from starvation only through public charity." The Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma; Report on Social and Economic Conditions ([Philadelphia] Indian Rights Association, 1951. 35 p.) is a somber report on a survey conducted in the summer of 1949. "Appalling poverty" was still the prevailing condition among all but the oil-enriched Seminoles.

3026. Foreman, Grant. Indian removal; the emigration of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1953. 415 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian [series]) 53–7431 E78.I5F8 1953
First published in 1932.
Bibliography: p. [387]–394.

3027. Foreman, Grant. The Five Civilized Tribes. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1934. 455 p. (The Civilization of the American Indian [series]) 34–38511 E78.O45F6
Bibliography: p. 427–431.

Grant Foreman (1869–1953) was an Oklahoma lawyer who, after serving with the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes in 1899–1903, became an indefatigable student of the history of Oklahoma and of the Indian tribes within it, and was a pioneer in the intensive utilization of Federal archives and other little-known sources for these purposes. His histories are not remarkable for their arrangement and are by no means easy reading, but each is a thorough piece of research, with the primary sources quoted at length. Indian Removal covers the transfer of Choctaws, Creeks, Chickasaws, Cherokees, and Seminoles from their original homes to the Indian Territory, during 1830–1843. Over 60,000 Indians were thus forcibly uprooted. "Inadequate preparation by the government and the appointment of a horde of political incompetents to posts of authority, resulted in woeful mismanagement and cruel and unnecessary suffering by the emigrants." The Five Civilized Tribes covers their first three decades (1832–1860) in their new homes, and describes "the rehabilitation and reconstruction of these immigrants after the demoralization and impoverishment caused by their forcible removal"—a period of remarkable development and progress. Other works by Mr. Foreman dealing with Indian history are Indians and Pioneers; The Story of the American Southwest before 1830, rev. ed. (Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1936); Advancing the Frontier, 1830–1860 (University of Oklahoma Press, 1933); Sequoyah (University of Oklahoma Press, 1938); and The Last Trek of the Indians (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1946).

3028. Harmon, George Dewey. Sixty years of Indian affairs, political, economic, and diplomatic, 1789–1850. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1941. 428 p.
A42–2412 E93.H274 1941a

Bibliography: p. [383]–414.

Thesis (Ph. D.)—University of Pennsylvania, 1930.

A review of the political, diplomatic, economic, and especially the financial aspects of Federal Indian policy during the first six decades under the Constitution. Throughout the period the primary objective of the Government was the acquisition of legal title to their lands and the transfer of the Indians themselves to reservations in the remote West. This aim, the employment of more direct coercion after 1825, and the unsuitable method of proceeding by treaties appropriate only to negotiations between two genuine sovereigns, all gave Federal policy an inconsistent and arbitrary appearance. It had, nevertheless, a more humane side evidenced in the donation of agricultural equipment, the establishment of schools, the setting up of trust funds, and the payment of annuities. The intentions of the Government were regularly good, and the higher officials concerned were honest. A History of the United States Indian Factory System, 1795–1822, by Ora B. Peake (Denver, Sage Books, 1954. 340 p.), describes this "first attempt of the United States Government to enter business in competition with private industry" in great detail from the original records in the National Archives, and emphasizes its economic failure.

3029. Kinney, Jay P. A continent lost—a civilization won; Indian land tenure in America. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1937. xv, 366 p.
37–2999 E93.K56

Bibliography: p. 345–349.

A very detailed history of the Federal policy concerning Indian land tenure, written by a staff member with 25 years' service in the Bureau of Indian Affairs, chiefly from Government documents and to a lesser degree from unpublished files of the Bureau. His central theme is the allotment policy, of which he traces the early indications following the War of 1812, and the experimental applications following the large-scale Indian removals of Jackson's second administration. The policy itself, as adopted in 1887, was defeated in its main purpose by subsequent enactments. That of 1891 permitted the lease of allotment lands and produced "a tendency to stop farming and eke out an existence from rentals." That of 1902 permitted heirs of a deceased Indian to sell an inherited allotment notwithstanding prior restrictions upon its alienation. The hundred million acres held by Indians in 1900 had shrunk to fifty million, of which only about thirty million had productive value, by 1933. The book's title and optimistic conclusion seem to have small relation to the facts presented.

3030. Macleod, William Christie. The American Indian frontier. London, Paul, Trench, Trubner; New York, Knopf, 1928. xxiii, 598 p. (The History of civilization [Historical ethnology])
28–24819 E58.M17

Bibliography: p. 565–595.

"The first attempt at an analysis of American frontier history made particularly from the viewpoint of the Indian side of the frontier development." It considers the Indians of Latin America as well as those to the north, but since the situation was there stabilized at a relatively early period, winds up this portion of the narrative with Part II. Part IV offers six chapters contrasting the fate of the Indians in the two spheres in such respects as slavery and forced labor, the success of Indian missions in the South and their failure in the North, and the Anglo-American frontiersman's attitude of hate and policy of extermination, to which nothing in Latin America corresponds. The later narrative summarizes the major conflicts of Indian and white, with emphasis on the multitribal reactions led by Pontiac and, half a century later, by Tecumseh, and on the Indians' "cry for a saviour" and the several Messiahs who responded in the later 19th century. Attempting a colossal task, the volume is an imperfect synthesis which does achieve some large views of value, if it seldom troubles to be fair to any Anglo-American settler or official. It has hitherto had no competitor.

3031. Pearce, Roy Harvey. The savages of America, a study of the Indian and the idea of civilization. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1953. xv, 252 p.
53–6486 E93.P4

A study of the Indians' way of life as reflected in American thought and literature from 1609, the year of Robert Johnson's Nova Britannia (London, S. Macham. 28 p.), to 1851, the year of L. H. Morgan's League of the Iroquois (no. 3008). Its central concern is what the author calls the idea of savagism, the rise of which he dates from 1777, the year of William Robertson's History of America (London, W. Strahan. 2 v.). Its acme he finds in the work of Henry Rowe Schoolcraft, and its death is implicit in Morgan's great work, which absorbs it "into a universal theory of progress."

From the 1770's Americans abandoned their attempt to see the Indian as a European manqué; he was now recognized as one radically different from their proper selves; bound inextricably in a primitive past, he could only be destroyed by the advance of civilization. The author relates his study to previous explorations of the ideas of primitivism, progress, and manifest destiny conducted at Johns Hopkins. If at times he indulges in artificial schematizations, he supplies the reader with a corrective in his extensive quotations from the sources.

3032. Peckham, Howard H. Captured by Indians; true tales of pioneer survivors. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1954. 238 p. 54–11931 E85.P4

Captivities among the Indian tribes adjacent to the advancing frontier were a recurrent feature of pioneer life, and the narratives in which such experiences were described for a fascinated public were a form of American literature once as popular as it is now extinct. Mr. Peckham has made concise summaries of 14 such narratives, from Mary Rowlandson who was taken captive by King Philip's Narragansetts in 1676, to Fanny Kelly who was taken by the Oglala Sioux in 1864. While his condensations eliminate much extraneous matter, they are somewhat lacking in tension and color.

3033. Peckham, Howard H. Pontiac and the Indian uprising. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1947. xviii, 346 p. 47–11041 E83.76.P4

Bibliography: p. 326–332.

Formally, a life of the Ottawa Chief (ca. 1720–1769), "a warrior of heroic proportions who set in motion the most formidable Indian resistance the English-speaking people had yet faced, or ever would face, on this continent." The author disclaims any attempt to rewrite Parkman's "monumental history" (included in Chapter VIII), but although he prints all of Pontiac's surviving speeches and dictated letters, the personal materials are so scanty as to leave the major interest in the dilemma of the Indians after the Peace of 1763, and in the details of the uprising, for which Dr. Peckham has found much fresh material in the manuscripts of his own Clements Library. "Pontiac fought to restore the relative independence enjoyed by the western Indians and to force the British to change their fundamental policy toward peoples of inferior culture. His aims appear to us today just and ethical, even though his savage manner of warfare is revolting and his hope to maintain a primeval wilderness on the edge of civilization was impractical."

3034. Priest, Loring Benson. Uncle Sam's stepchildren; the reformation of United States Indian policy, 1865–1887. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1942. 310 p. 42–8373 E93.P95

A documented study of two decades of Federal Indian policy which utilizes Indian Office archives supplemented by the Papers of Secretary Carl Schurz and Senator Henry L. Dawes. The close of the Civil War and the accelerated occupation of the West made clear the need for a permanent solution of Indian problems. Down to 1880 the four policies of concentration, transfer, church nomination of Indian officials, and civilian advice through the Board of Indian Commissioners, were tried out and abandoned as failures. Intensive efforts at reform during the next seven years were summed up in the Dawes Severalty Act of 1887, by which "individual ownership, citizenship, and sale of surplus land were finally accepted as the only possible means of improving American Indian affairs." The change was supported by nearly all the friends of the Indian, but was unacceptable to the great majority of the Indians themselves. It was the decision to dispense with gradualism, and use force in imposing it upon the tribes, rather than any flaw in the ideal of turning the Indian into an independent and self-reliant landowner, that produced the consequences so often deplored.

3035. Seymour, Flora Warren (Smith). Indian agents of the old frontier. New York, Appleton-Century, 1941. 402 p. 41–12500 E93.S45

Indian policy was formulated in Washington, but its application to tribes and individuals usually depended upon "the Major," as even the most unmilitary Indian agent was regularly called. Mrs. Seymour sketches the early stages of the agent's evolution from "a commercial agent or consul" in an alien sovereignty, to an administrator with nearly complete discretion. Her narrative of the careers of particular agents begins with the changes of 1869–71, when President Grant embarked upon a comprehensive peace policy, and Congress abolished the traditional procedure of making treaties with the tribes. A few of these agents have left memoirs, but the bulk of her materials are drawn from the annual reports of the Commissioners of Indian Affairs. In addition to such agencies as Laurie Tatum among the Kiowa, Thomas J. Jeffords among the Apaches, Father James H. Wilbur among the Yakimas, and William F. N. Arny among the Pueblos, Mrs. Seymour presents the achievements of such army officers as Richard H. Pratt, who founded Carlisle Indian School, and Hugh L. Scott, whose rare knowledge and influence acquired in many frontier missions made him the War Department's foremost Indian specialist.

3036. Stewart, Edgar I. Custer's luck. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1955. xvi, 522 p. 55–6368 E83.866.S85

Bibliography: p. 496–506.

A minute reconstruction of the most famous, and probably the most controversial, episode in two and a half centuries of Indian warfare. On June 25, 1876, at the Little Big Horn, a famous Civil War general (George Armstrong Custer, b. 1839) and five troops of regular cavalry were killed to the last man by some 2500 Sioux and Cheyennes under the famous chiefs Sitting Bull and Crazy Horse. This outcome is traced to its remoter sources in the Indian policy and the internal politics of the Grant administration. After an exhaustive analysis of Custer's campaign, the author concludes that he, and especially his two subordinates, Reno and Benteen, allowed the Indians to score a startling success, "not by an overmastering strategy of their own but simply by taking advantage of the mistakes of the soldiers." Some four months later the capacity of the Plains Indians to offer further armed resistance was brought to an end.

3037. Tucker, Glenn. Tecumseh; vision of glory. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1956. 399 p. 56–8618 E99.S35T35

"Bibliographical note": p. 366–367. "Bibliography": p. 368–381.

By September 1812 Tecumseh (1768–1813) dominated a "prairie empire of almost half a million square miles, an area greater than that of the seventeen states of the Federal Union, extending from northern Ohio to the far Dakotas." "The ardent personality and militant patriotism of this Shawnee chief" had brought 32 tribes beneath his battle standard, and seemed about to check or reverse the American occupation of the Northwest. Thirteen months later he died in battle, his cause shattered. There is more evidence for Tecumseh's career than for any other Indian of comparable historical importance; Mr. Tucker has diligently assembled and sifted it, and has exploited its dramatic qualities to the full in an outstanding Indian biography. Tecumseh he assesses as exceeding all other Indian leaders, before or since his time, in knowledge and breadth of vision, in sincerity and humanity, in perseverance, racial patriotism, political sagacity, and military ability, and in sheer personal impressiveness.

F. The Twentieth Century

3038. Brookings Institution, Washington, D. C. Institute for Government Research. The problem of Indian administration; report of a survey made at the request of Honorable Hubert Work, Secretary of the Interior, and submitted to him, February 21, 1928. Lewis Meriam, technical director [of the survey] Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1928. xxii, 872 p. (Its Studies in administration [no. 17]) 28–13503 E93.B873

This epoch-making survey was undertaken by the Institute for Government Research at the instance of the Secretary of the Interior in June 1926, and financed by the Institute entirely out of funds received from private sources. It was carried out by the Technical Director and a staff of nine specialists in such fields as law, economics, health, etc. After seven months of field work, during which 95 jurisdictions were visited, another eight months were spent in preparing this report. The "Detailed Report," consisting of seven topical chapters, follows p. 189; the volume begins with a "General Summary of Findings and Recommendations," and offers "A General Policy for Indian Affairs," as well as suggestions for the "Organization of the Federal Indian Work," and "Personnel Administration." The basic fact of the Indian situation is that "an overwhelming majority of the Indians are poor, even extremely poor, and they are not adjusted to the economic and social system of the dominant white civilization." The ineffectiveness of the Bureau of Indian Affairs in educating and advancing the Indian has resulted from inadequate appropriations and, as a consequence, unqualified personnel. Reforms in Federal Indian policy since 1928 have nearly all stemmed from this searching diagnosis.

3039. La Farge, Oliver. As long as the grass shall grow. Photographs by Helen M. Post. New York, Alliance Book Corp., 1940, 140 p. (The Face of America; Edwin Rosskam, editor) 40–27492 E93.L17

A popular presentation of the Indian problem in the recent past, by an anthropologist and friend of the Indian who is also a successful novelist; the numerous photographs are excellent and finely reproduced. "I take the year 1923 as the nadir of the Indians"; they were expropriated, impoverished, diseased, despondent, and dwindling in numbers—all long-range consequences of the land allotment act of 1887. The later 1920's saw a steady improvement in Indian administration; in 1933 John Collier became Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and in 1934 Congress passed the Indian Reorganization Act. The volume concludes with an enthusiastic presentation of the subsequent revitalization of tribal life, with an upswing in morale, prosperity, and vital statistics. There is no adequate summary of recent developments, which must be gathered from such formidable Congressional documents as the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs' Report with Respect to the House Resolution Authorizing . . . an Investigation of the Bureau of Indian Affairs (Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1953–54. 1594, 576 p. 82d Cong., 2d sess. House report 2503; 83d Cong., 2d sess. House report 2680).

3040. Lindquist, Gustavus E. E. The red man in the United States; an intimate study of the social, economic and religious life of the American Indian. New York, Doran, 1923. 461 p. illus.
23–10398 E77.L74

The American Indian Survey was initiated in 1919 by the Interchurch World Movement, "at the request of Indian missionaries and workers gathered in conference at Wichita, Kansas"; it was taken over in 1921 by the Committee on Social and Religious Surveys and completed the following year. The Director, Mr. Lindquist, came from the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Associations, and the text was prepared in part and edited throughout by Stanley Went. The Survey, "which is of a more comprehensive nature than has ever before been undertaken, has attempted to collect all the data available concerning social, economic, religious and educational conditions among the 340,000 Indians scattered through the United States," and especially such as "will assist the Protestant churches to extend their constructive work in the Indian field." Of the 1921 total, 80,000 Indians were adherents of Protestant, and 65,000 of Roman Catholic Christianity. The book strongly advocates the assimilation policy, with tribal relations liquidated and "the Indian put on an individual basis"; it gives special attention to "the use of alcohol and peyote, the indulgence in degrading dances and the extent of sexual immorality, or non-morality." Its substance lies in Chapters 7–14 (p. 91–389) containing the geographical survey, with eight areas further subdivided by States, tribes, and reservations; reservations not individually described here appear in Appendix I (p. 401–420). The state of schools and missions in each local unit is carefully described. The book has enduring value as a panorama of the reservations 35 years ago.

3041. Linton, Ralph, ed. Acculturation in seven American Indian tribes. New York, Appleton-Century, 1940. xiii, 526 p.
40–3756 E98.C9L6

Bibliography at end of most of the chapters.

CONTENTS.—Introduction, by Ralph Linton.—The Puyallup of Washington, by Marian W. Smith.—The White Knife Shoshoni of Nevada, by J. S. Harris.—The southern Ute of Colorado, by M. K. Opler.—The northern Arapaho of Wyoming, by Henry Elkin.—The Fox of Iowa, by Natalie F. Joffe.—The Alkatcho Carrier of British Columbia, by Irving Goldman.—The San Ildefonso of New Mexico, by William Whitman.—Acculturation and the processes of culture change, by Ralph Linton.—The processes of culture transfer, by Ralph Linton.—The distinctive aspects of acculturation, by Ralph Linton.

A volume of composite origin: the field work was financed by Columbia University and carried out between 1930 and 1937, while the theoretical framework was supplied by a subcommittee on acculturation, of which Prof. Linton was one of the members, appointed in 1935 by the Social Science Research Council. The subcommittee eventually worked out an impressive "Outline for Report on Acculturation in any Given Tribe," but only after the field work was completed. The seven reports here printed have all been organized, so far as possible, in conformity to this outline, but the material was not collected on its basis in the first instance. The reports are straightforward enough, and naturally concerned with white influence on Indian society rather than the converse. Prof. Linton's three concluding theoretical chapters do not confine themselves to the data presented in the preceding reports; they are primarily of interest to sociological theorists, but put one point effectively: "One of the most tragic features of our own dealings with the American Indians has been the constant changes in policy which, together with tribal removals, have rendered the adaptations which they successively developed successively unworkable."

3042. Mead, Margaret. The changing culture of an Indian tribe. New York, Columbia University Press, 1932. 313 p. (Columbia University contributions to anthropology, edited by Franz Boas, v. 15)
32–28812 E51.C7, v. 15
E98.S7M33

Miss Mead spent five months on the "Antler" (said to be the Omaha) Reservation in 1930 in order to investigate the little-known question of women's place in recent Indian society. She carried out her mission effectively, but her findings were most striking in their revelation of the degradation of Indian life as a whole in the latter days of the allotment policy. Women, for instance, had retained their lands more successfully than men, but a husband with a landed wife usually did his best to cash in his wife's heritage and squander the money. Women now had a larger economic role—because they still kept house and gardened, while their menfolk loafed or got drunk. They were still subject to a fixed theory of sexual morals with a puritanical double standard—but the Antler male regarded every unaccompanied woman as fair prey, and a great increase in the number of loose women and promiscuous young girls had been the consequence.

3043. U. S. National Resources Board. Land Planning Committee. Report on land planning. Part 10. Indian land tenure, economic status, and population trends, prepared by the Office of Indian Affairs, Department of the Interior. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1935. 73 p.
36–26092 HD183.N3A5 1938, pt. 10

One of the eleven parts of a supplementary report of the Land Planning Committee, containing "a large volume of basic data and information" which could not be included in the National Resources Board's report to the President, Nov. 28, 1934. This part, prepared by the Office of Indian Affairs, presents the problems of most concern to its then director, John Collier. The first and largest section describes the "Complexities of Indian Land Tenure Arising from the Allotment System." The absurdities to which the heirship system had led are graphically illustrated by the estate of the Chippewa Lizette Denomie, whose original allotment of 80 acres had been distributed among 39 heirs, four of whom had an interest of .22 acre each, and two an interest of .11 acre each. A "Social and Economic Survey of Selected Indian Reservations" "reveals the average Indian as a petty capitalist and an intermittent wage earner, rather than a commercial or even a subsistence farmer." "The Trend of Indian Population" criticizes earlier statistics and emphasizes the recent rapid growth, effected through mixed marriages; "the ratio of full bloods to mixed bloods has been declining very rapidly."

VIII

General History

A.	Historiography	3044–3069
B.	General Works	3070–3152
C.	The New World	3153–3175
D.	The Thirteen Colonies	3176–3236
E.	The American Revolution	3237–3272
F.	Federal America (1783–1815)	3273–3311
G.	The "Middle Period" (1815–60)	3312–3358
H.	Slavery, the Civil War, and Reconstruction (to 1877)	3359–3417
I.	Grant to McKinley (1869–1901)	3418–3451
J.	Theodore Roosevelt to Wilson (1901–21)	3452–3474
K.	Since 1920	3475–3500b

THE ATTEMPT to cover the history of the portion of the earth's surface which is now the United States in some 450 titles would be a manifest absurdity if it were not for an important consideration which affects, not merely the selections for this chapter, but the work of library catalogers and classifiers, the writing of general American histories, and all thinking about the nature of history, whether by historians, social theorists, or philosophers. This same consideration has entered into the selections for nearly every other chapter, and has given a persistent perplexity to our whole enterprise which a number of quite arbitrary resolutions have by no means dispersed. Let us characterize it as briefly as possible.

The question "What is history?" gives rise to chains of thought sufficiently complex, and may receive answers ranging from the naïve to the highly sophisticated. But this chapter is not entitled "History"; our whole Guide is concerned with history and the transitory present to which it leads, and we understand well enough what we mean by history even if we do not attempt to arrive at a watertight definition. Our question is rather: "What is General History?" What is history when it is not qualified as literary history, diplomatic history, religious history, economic history, constitutional history, or political history, or by any other adjective from the other 31 chapters of this Guide, or from wider or narrower spheres? What, specifically, is American history, or the history of the United States, or of the American Nation, or of the American people, or of American civilization?

Seventy-five years ago this question would hardly have been asked, and, if it were, would have been immediately and dogmatically answered. "History is past politics, and politics is present history," Edward A. Freeman is supposed to have said, and the report has been seized upon because it condenses in an epigram the convictions of two generations of historians, preacademic and academic alike. History tout court was political history, conceived broadly enough to include constitutional, diplomatic, and military affairs as well as the fortunes of rulers, ministers, and parties. Other matters might be adduced when required to make these intelligible, and in practice, of course, other matters have always been adduced at length. In sum, proper history was the history of the State or of the relations of States. Twentieth-century historiography has been in large part a reaction against this Victorian orthodoxy. Dogmatic exclusiveness usually succeeds in provoking a contrary exclusiveness, and it was not long before there appeared vigorously worded manifestoes implying or asserting that the history of war and of politics was not worth studying at all. Neither, it came to be alleged, was more than a secondary and superficial manifestation, without real causal potency; the great changes took place in the depths of economic production, social organization, and human thinking and feeling. A single factor or sphere might be alleged as exclusively causal, reducing all the others to derivative and partially illusory phenomena: there is Marxian history, for instance, as well as Freudian history, and other radical simplifications with smaller followings. The multiplicity of spheres receiving newly intensive historical investigation became a perplexity and a burden to all who were looking for larger views, and "Synthesis" became a slogan which, as usual, was more easily pronounced than embodied.

We have no desire to promulgate a theory of history, but operation itself demands some theoretical assumptions. We can only hope that ours will seem to others as innocent and as simple as they do to us. We have supposed that, as long as there are records or remains, every sphere of human life, in the past as in the present, is worthy of serious and disciplined investigation. There is still no master key to man's mind or man's life, and until there is one there can be no definitive way of writing general history, whether of the race or of one of its units. But the human mind cannot cope all at once with the phenomena of life, in their natural entanglement and sporadicity. There must be a subordination which the mind imposes upon phenomena as much as it draws it from them. The mind's native approach to a temporal succession of events, which comprises a development or an evolution, is that of narrative, not different in kind from primitive folktale or heroic epic. General history, therefore, requires a focus, and must provide for movement. It should avoid negative dogmas of exclusion, but must have its own principles of selectivity. Especially in our own day does it require a skill in selection, in organization, and in combining description and analysis with narration, so subtle and varied as to be little distinguishable from the processes of the artist. If the history is that of a people with its own political organization, it neither should nor can dispense with the idea of the nation as a unifying concept.

Borrowing from various sources, but especially from Professor Richard B. Morris' Encyclopedia of American History (no. 3072), we have therefore conceived of this chapter as a selection of books which most effectively present the mainstream of American history, regarded as a movement which received its general form in 1492, and its special character in 1607, effected its national determination in 1776–87, and survived its greatest internal crises in 1861–65 and 1929–33, and its greatest external ones in 1917–19 and 1941–45. Beginning with Section C, there are few titles which could not plausibly have been placed in one or another of our topical chapters, just as there are many titles in those chapters which could just as plausibly appear here. In some cases, we are well aware, our dispositions have been quite arbitrary, and in a few they are recognized errors of judgment which the circumstances of publication do not permit us to rectify.

Section A on Historiography represents a new self-consciousness of the historical profession which is even now being gradually and somewhat painfully achieved. It is not an easy subject to study, for it is considerably more difficult to extract the ideas and attitudes of an historian from his work than it is those of a philosopher. There remain much detailed work to be done, and definitive surveys to produce. We have included here some titles on the collection and organization of historical materials in archives, historical societies, and museums, some manuals of historical research and editing which illustrate American practice, and some works on the teaching of American history.

Section B contains a great variety of general works on the whole course of American history, although some take their departure from 1776 or 1789 rather than from an earlier date. There are a number of reference books, but of a kind in which one may profitably or even pleasantly browse, if no one is likely to read them through. A number of collections of historical "documents" and other primary source materials are included; most of them are intended for use in college courses, and the more recent ones seek to present "problems" which will induce the student to reason as well as to remember. Other books produced for classroom use are the general surveys, in one volume or in two, with one author or more, and here the problem was the usual one of selecting a few titles from many whose resemblances are more remarkable than their differences. There are a number of guides to American biography and autobiography, of which the Dictionary of American Biography (no. 3080) is facile princeps; writings of individual biographers, supplementary to the biographies which appear in the topical chapters of this Guide, will be found in Chapter IV. The numerous biographies in the succeeding sections of this chapter are intended to be limited to figures who took a significant or at least a highly representative part in the main current of national development. And, finally, there are in Section B a number of titles which treat the westward movement of the American people as a major and continuing theme of American history, from the first settlements until the close of the 19th century. Books which consider the subject rather from the viewpoint of the successive Wests to be occupied will be found in Chapter XII on Local History, but we do not expect everyone to agree in detail with our distribution.

Section C is chiefly concerned with the overture to American history: the revelation of the Western Hemisphere to European man from the great venture of Christopher Columbus until that point, some three centuries later, when the major outlines of the New World were clearly understood. Here have also been placed a limited number of titles on the two European empires in America which preceded or accompanied the British colonization, which conditioned its development, and which have given a distinctive character to large parts of the Americas. Too often neglected are the West Indies (no. 3168), which since the 17th century have been the most cosmopolitan part of the New World, and which, during the first three centuries after their discovery, played a far more important role than they have since.

The remaining sections constitute in the main a straightforward chronological progression, but with two important qualifications: works concerned with the assertion of colonial rights against the imperial government, which went on for nearly 12 years before the actual outbreak of hostilities, are placed in Section E rather than D. Similarly, works on slavery as a system and an interest, and the dispute which it engendered for three decades before secession, have been collected in Section H, and the story prolonged to the withdrawal of the Federal troops from the South in 1877. In the case of either war, and of the other national wars, books concerned with the more technically military aspects, the conduct of campaigns, the administration of the armed forces, and the lives of the principal commanders—if they did not become Presidents—will be found in Chapter X on Military History. Concerning Section F it may be said that the best books on the most important event within it, the making of the Federal Constitution, will be found in Chapter XXX on Constitution and Government. As for Section G, it was dubbed the "Middle Period" when the post-Civil War perspective was far shorter than it is today, but since no better term has appeared to indicate the years of strenuous nationalism and democracy between the Peace of Ghent and the election of 1860, we have retained it with the addition of quotation marks. Many of the most significant developments for Section I, covering the age in which American industry so spectacularly mushroomed and achieved its dominant position, are best described in Chapter XXIX on Economic Life. The breaks at 1901 and 1921 are chiefly for convenience, and represent no endorsement of the "Presidential synthesis"—but who can deny that the three periods thereby set off have each a tone and temper of its own?

A. Historiography

3044. Adams, Herbert B. Historical scholarship in the United States, 1876–1901: as revealed in the correspondence of Herbert B. Adams. Edited by W. Stull Holt. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1938. 314 p. (The Johns Hopkins University studies in historical and political science, ser. 56, no. 4) 39–1218 H31.J6, ser. 56, no. 4 E175.5.A1797

3045. Jameson, John Franklin. An historian's world; selections from the correspondence of John Franklin Jameson. Edited by Elizabeth Donnan and Leo F. Stock. Philadelphia, American Philosophical Society, 1956. 382 p. (Memoirs of the American Philosophical Society, v. 42) 56–6729 Q11.P612, v. 42 D15.J27A4

Adams (1850–1901) built up the first successful American department of graduate study in history, at Johns Hopkins University (from 1876), initiated the publication of the Johns Hopkins studies (1882), led in the organization of the American Historical Association (1884), and served as its first secretary. Jameson (1859–1937) received the first Ph. D. in history from Johns Hopkins (1882), edited the American Historical Review (1895–1901, 1905–28), headed the Bureau of Historical Research at the Carnegie Institution of Washington (1905–28) and the Manuscript Division of the Library of Congress (1928–37), and was the prime mover in bringing about the establishment of the National Archives (1934). Each man exerted a wide and salutary influence among the new and growing "guild" of academic historians, although his own published work remained relatively limited in quantity. These two collections of their correspondence, principally with other American historians, give much the best picture available of the first six decades of the new professional history in the United States.

3046. Beale, Howard K., ed. Charles A Beard: an appraisal. [Lexington] University of Kentucky Press, 1954. 312 p.

53–5517 E175.5.B37

"Bibliography of Beard's writings [by] Jack Frooman [and] Edmund David Cronon": p. [265]–286.

Charles A. Beard (1874–1948) was a unique figure among American historians, whose writings ranged over a wide variety of subjects, whose belief in democracy and the freedom of thought was basic and practical, and who followed his ideas wherever they led him, into economic determinism, into historical relativism, or into a narrow isolationist corner. His violent attacks on the foreign policy of President F. D. Roosevelt lost him much of the esteem in which he had been held and delayed the appearance of the present symposium, from which several of the original contributors withdrew, until after his death. Twelve friends and admirers contribute 13 essays on Beard as a historian, a historical critic, a political theorist, an interpreter of the Constitution, a teacher, and a public man, as well as in other lights and relationships. Professor Robert E. Brown of Michigan State University devotes a small volume, Charles Beard and the Constitution (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1956. 219 p.), to a critical analysis of Beard's best-known and most controversial book, An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States (New York, Macmillan, 1913. 330 p.). He is led to deny "that the Constitution was put over undemocratically in an undemocratic society" by a personalty-interests group, and to affirm that it was, so far as conditions permitted, created by the whole people in their own best interests. Volumes by single hands on other historians who span the two centuries are Eric F. Goldman's John Bach McMaster, American Historian (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1943. 194 p.), on the author of the famous History of the People of the United States (1883–1927. 9 v.), which is more original in plan than in execution; and Abraham S. Eisenstadt's Charles McLean Andrews, A Study in American Historical Writing (New York, Columbia University Press, 1956. 273 p.), on the "historical science" of the Yale professor who did most to place the Thirteen Colonies in their contemporary setting as part of a great empire with its center at Whitehall.

3047. Carter, Clarence E. Historical editing. [Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off.] 1952. 51 p. (National Archives publication no. 53–4. Bulletins of the National Archives, no. 7)

A52–9688 D13.2.C3

Dr. Carter, since 1931 editor of the Territorial Papers of the United States, has drawn upon his long experience and the best recent practice in this general discussion of the problems that regularly arise in historical editing, especially for the benefit of staff members of the National Archives and of participants in the program of the National Historical Publications Commission. In its analysis of selection, transcription, and annotation, and in its emphasis upon responsibility "to furnish the material in its full and unaltered shape," it exemplifies the editorial standards of the historical profession in the United States.

3048. Caughey, John W. Hubert Howe Bancroft, historian of the West. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1946. 422 p.

A47–18 E175.5.B199

A leading Pacific Coast historian writes a well-proportioned biography of his most conspicuous predecessor, H. H. Bancroft (1832–1918), based on the latter's voluminous writings supplemented by his papers in the Bancroft Library and by contemporary newspapers. The house of H. H. Bancroft & Co., Booksellers and Stationers, set up in San Francisco in 1856, prospered beyond anticipation, enabling its proprietor to assemble an extraordinary collection of imprints, manuscripts, and transcripts concerning the history of the United States west of the Rockies, and to employ a group of assistants to digest these sources for a large-scale history of the region, with Bancroft providing plans, editorial supervision, and a substantial share of the actual writing. Believing that Bancroft's early critics had seized upon some of his defects, so that "it came to be the fashion to disparage him not only for these shortcomings but in all that he had done," Professor Caughey emphasizes the great achievements involved in the 39 large volumes of the Native Races and the History of the Pacific States, and in the Bancroft Library of the University of California.

3049. Coleman, Laurence Vail. The museum in America; a critical study. Washington, American Association of Museums, 1939. 3 v. (730 p.)

39–27719 AM11.C6

Museums, even of natural history, constitute a concentration of nonliterary materials for history and may be regarded as a primary stage of the historiographical process. The first museum in the United States—the Charleston Museum, which originated in 1773 as a natural history collection of the Library Society of Charles-Town—antedated the Revolution, and by the end of 1938 the number of American museums had reached 2,489, nearly four-fifths of which had been established during the previous quarter-century. The author, who has been director of the American Association of Museums since 1927, calls his work "a commentary on the condition, the strengths and weaknesses, and the limitations and opportunities of museums." Volume 1 reviews the whole development as a social movement and points to the rise of historic house and trailside museums as consequences of the automobile. It classifies existing institutions into museums of science, history, art, and industry; discusses their relations to locality, State, and Nation; surveys sources of museum income, which is never quite adequate; and describes the museum building of yesterday and today. Volume 2 is an analysis of museum work, the central function of which is display, necessitating a dual arrangement of materials into an exhibition and a reserve, or study, collection. Museum work, he concludes, "is capable of being a profession," and its personnel has achieved varying degrees of professionalism. Volume 3 classifies and lists museums by field ("General Museums," p. 487–492), by control, and by location, and concludes with ten statistical tables (p. 663–678) and two chronological lists, of museums established before 1850, including those which have ceased to exist, and of all buildings constructed for use as museums since 1814, when Peale's Museum was built in Baltimore. Dr. Coleman has since published, under the same imprint, works on College and University Museums (1942. 73 p.) and Company Museums (no. 4716), and the first volume of a treatise on Museum Buildings (1950).

3050. Committee on American History in Schools and Colleges. American history in schools and colleges; the report of the Committee on American History in Schools and Colleges of the American Historical Association, the Mississippi Valley Historical Association, the National Council for the Social Studies. Edgar B. Wesley, director of the committee. New York, Macmillan, 1944. xiv, 148 p. 44–611 E175.8.C6

A reexamination of the purpose, extent, and quality of instruction in American history provoked by World War II, sponsored by three learned societies, financed by the Rockefeller Foundation, and conducted from June through September 1943. The committee concluded that while the number of courses offered in American history was sufficient, there was too much overlapping in subject matter between them, too few college students took them, and improvement in the quality of curriculum and teaching was the major concern. Colleges were cautioned not to stress research at the expense of good teaching, and teachers urged to aim at significance in a limited number of topics rather than the meaningless enumeration of details. The Report offers a model organization for American history courses through the grades and an "Item Analysis of the Test of Understanding of United States History" (p. [125]–144) which revealed so much ignorance of the subject among diverse groups of testees.

3051. Craven, Wesley Frank. The legend of the Founding Fathers. New York, New York University Press, 1956. 191 p. (New York University. Stokes Foundation. Anson G. Phelps lectureship on early American history) 56–8593 E175.C7

"For better or for worse, the American community has consistently looked to its origins for an explanation of its distinctive qualities and thus for an explanation of what its future should hold." There was, however, a founding of the body social in 1607 and 1620, and a founding of the body politic in 1776 and 1787. Professor Craven devotes these exploratory lectures to the relative emphasis given to each founding, both in the historiography of various eras and in the ceremonial observances of successive anniversaries, and seeks as well the sources of the "debunking" impulse which has provided a countercurrent during the present century.

3052. Dunlap, Leslie W. American historical societies, 1790–1860. Madison, Wis., Priv. Print. [Cantwell Print. Co.] 1944. 238 p. 44–7046 E172.D8

Societies organized primarily to collect, preserve, and make available materials for history arose in Europe from the first decade of the 18th century, and spread to the United States by its last. In Part 2 (p. 137–219) of this study, Dr. Dunlap sketches briefly the careers of the 65 local societies which arose in the United States between 1791, when the efforts of Rev. Jeremy Belknap brought about the organization of the Massachusetts Historical Society, and 1859, when the Historical Society of New Mexico was founded at Santa Fé. Part 1 discusses the movement as a whole, such general features as membership, finances, collections, and publications, and the value of these societies to our early writers, especially of state and local history.

3053. Hesseltine, William B. Pioneer's mission; the story of Lyman Copeland Draper. Madison, State Historical Society of Wisconsin, 1954. 384 p. 54–7271 E175.5.D763

"Materials for a biography": p. 357–359.

Draper (1815–1891) spent much of his time from his 24th year in journeys, largely made on foot, through the older Middle West, collecting or transcribing manuscripts, and taking down the oral testimony of the oldest inhabitants, especially concerning the warfare which harassed the earliest settlements. As the founder and long-time secretary of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin (1854–1886), he was a pioneer in the collection and publication of historical source material, and in the organization of historical activities, in this part of the United States. The author unfortunately takes a rather dim view of Draper's character and of his failure to write the large-scale history he had planned, but he bases a very concrete and absorbing biography upon a thorough assimilation of the abundant personal materials in the Draper Collection at Madison.

3054. Hockett, Homer C. The critical method in historical research and writing. New York, Macmillan, 1955. 330 p. 55–13664 E175.7.H6446

"A rewritten and expanded edition of the author's Introduction to Research in American History [1931]."

Bibliography: p. 265–295.

An introduction to method for graduate students in American history, which illustrates the time-honored canons of historical criticism from exclusively American examples, gives concrete bibliographical and procedural instructions for preparing a master's thesis, and proceeds to more general considerations on the past and present state of historical bibliography, research, and writing. A very typical product of American graduate schools of history, which throws much light upon the profession's understanding of its own tasks.

3055. Jordy, William H. Henry Adams: scientific historian. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1952. xv, 327 p. (Yale historical publications. Studies, 16) 52–5362 E175.5.A1755

Bibliography: p. 291–317.

Adams as a man of letters is considered under Literature (no. 688–700). Dr. Jordy's concern is with Adams' conception of "scientific history" as practiced in his History of the United States (nos. 3274–3275) and later formulated in his Letter to American Teachers of History (1910). Its pursuit, however, involves a widespread exploration of Adams' studies, thought, and character. The "master key" to the History is found in the positive philosophy of Auguste Comte. In the Letter's theory of inevitable degradation, Dr. Jordy thinks, the "erstwhile Comtist . . . ended his writing career by turning Comte upside down." In The Mind and Art of Henry Adams (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1957. 430 p.) Jacob C. Levenson is concerned with Adams as man of letters, artist, and thinker, but urges that the only sound approach to these aspects is through a detailed study of "the first modern historical scholar in America." Adams' work after 1891 was all stamped by his earlier practice of "the craft of history, as the one technical discipline to which Adams ever fully submitted." The continuity of Adams' second literary career with his first, and of Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres and The Education of Henry Adams with the History of the United States is not easy to demonstrate, but the author does his sophisticated best.

3056. Kraus, Michael. A history of American history. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1937. 607 p. 37–20447 E175.K73

3057. Kraus, Michael. The writing of American history. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1953. 387 p. 53–8815 E175.K75

These two titles are actually successive editions of the same book. The later, according to its preface, "has been rewritten and expanded to carry the study to date," but the rewriting is relatively minor and the expansion in the nature of patchwork. On the other hand, there has been a general reduction of the original text, and much information concerning the earlier historians has simply been dropped. The 1937 volume is therefore still useful as the most comprehensive survey of American historiography hitherto made. The author's method, ideas, and style are sufficiently pedestrian, and there is rather more quotation from the histories themselves than is necessary for the purpose, but there is more basic information concerning the authors and their books than in any other single work. Old as it is, John Franklin Jameson's The History of Historical Writing in America (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1891. 160 p.) contains still pertinent observations, and affords an introduction as pleasant as it is brief to the earlier historians. John Spencer Bassett's The Middle Group of American Historians (New York, Macmillan, 1917. 324 p.) contains, along with brief treatments of lesser writers, objective if somewhat condescending descriptions of the life and work of Jeremy Belknap, George Bancroft, Jared Sparks, and Peter Force, regarded as the major figures of "the old school [that] came to its end with the advent of the critical spirit." Wendell Holmes Stephenson's The South Lives in History (Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1955. 163 p.) includes a general review of historical scholarship concerned with the region, detailed studies of William E. Dodd, Ulrich B. Phillips, and Walter Lynwood Fleming, and an exceptionally thorough and valuable "Essay on Authorities."

3058. The Marcus W. Jernegan essays in American historiography, by his former students at the University of Chicago. Edited by William T. Hutchinson. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1937. 417 p. 38–27 E175.5.M37

CONTENTS.—George Bancroft, by Watt Stewart.—Richard Hildreth, by A. H. Kelly.—Francis Parkman, by J. P. Smith.—Hermann Eduard von Holst, by C. R. Wilson.—James Schouler, by L. E. Ellis.—Woodrow Wilson, by L. M. Sears.—John Bach McMaster, by W. T. Hutchinson.—John Fiske, by J. B. Sanders.—James Ford Rhodes, by R. C. Miller.—Henry Adams, by H. S. Commager.—Alfred Thayer Mahan, by J. W. Pratt.—Theodore Roosevelt, by H. J. Thornton.—Frederick Jackson Turner, by Avery Craven.—Herbert Levi Osgood, by E. C. O. Beatty.—Edward Channing, by R. R. Fahrney.—George Louis Beer, by A. P. Scott.—Clarence Walworth Alvord, by Marion Dargan, jr.—Claude Halstead Van Tyne, by P. G. Davidson.—Ulrich Bonnell Phillips, by Wood Gray.—Albert J. Beveridge, by T. E. Strevey.—Vernon Louis Parrington, by W. T. Utter.

Professor Jernegan was one of the first to offer a graduate seminar in American historiography. His pupils have shown their appreciation in these informative and documented essays, from 10 to 27 pages in length, concerning 21 American historians whose work is finished, and who were mainly concerned with United States history prior to 1865. Another four studies, including Charles Hirschfeld's "Edward Eggleston, Pioneer in Social History," appear in Historiography and Urbanization; Essays in American History in Honor of W. Stull Holt, edited by Eric F. Goldman (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1941. 220 p.).

3059. National Council for the Social Studies. The study and teaching of American history. Richard E. Thursfield, editor. Washington, 1947. xviii, 442 p. (Its Yearbook, 17th, 1946)
31–6192 H62.A1N3, no. 17

The National Council, the department of social studies of the National Education Association, offers this symposium primarily to secondary-school but also to elementary-school and college teachers, in order to improve the teaching and study of American history "as the essential core of any program for intelligent American citizenship in this interdependent world." Section 2 has chapters by six historians on the "Newer Interpretations and Emphases in American History," while Section 3 discusses the relations of American history to the other social studies and other school subjects. The four concluding sections are more directly concerned with pedagogical techniques: the articulation of American history with the several school grades, teaching methods and materials, "evaluation" and tests, and teacher training.

3060. Nye, Russel B. George Bancroft, Brahmin rebel. New York, Knopf, 1944. x, 340, xii p.
44–6406 E175.5.B196

Bibliography: p. [324]–340.

George Bancroft (1800–1891) published the 12 volumes of his History of the United States, from the discovery of America to the establishment of government under the Constitution, through 5 eventful decades of the Republic (1834–82). Written in an exuberant style, and pervaded by a robust faith in the Providential mission of the United States as the embodiment of liberty, democracy, and civilized progress, it brought its author immediate fame at home and abroad. Prof. Nye's life of the historian, which won a Pulitzer prize in biography, is based on the two main collections of Bancroft's manuscripts as well as his published writings, and emphasizes as much as his history his political and diplomatic career, and his influence as the thinker who, perhaps, "caught the spirit of his age best."

3061. Parker, Donald Dean. Local history; how to gather it, write it, and publish it. Rev. and edited by Bertha E. Josephson for the Committee on Guide for Study of Local History of the Social Science Research Council. [n. p.] 1944. xiv, 186 p.
A45–1091 E175.7.P3

Bibliography: p. 179–186.

The title page's authorship statement does duty for a rather more complex origin: the Committee discovered that Dr. Parker of the South Dakota College of Agriculture had already prepared an appropriate manuscript, which they proceeded to adapt and expand into harmony with their own purposes, with Rodney Loeher and Richard H. Shryock as well as Miss Josephson supplying some writing or rewriting. The objective of the Council is to stimulate the writing of sound local history, as supplying essential materials for social science, and, since professionally trained historians are likely to be absorbed by larger themes, to supply laymen with a body of practical rules and suggestions for recording the significant past of their own communities. The three parts are concerned with gathering materials, from books in libraries to inscriptions on gravestones, with the processes of taking and organizing notes and of writing and documenting a text, and with various means of publishing and of obtaining community coöperation. Chapter 8, largely the work of Dr. Shryock, is "A Model [i. e., exhaustive] Outline for a Local History."

3062. Saveth, Edward N., ed. Understanding the American past; American history and its interpretation. Boston, Little, Brown, 1954. 613 p.
53–7320 E178.6.S3 1954

A carefully organized essay on the periods and types of American historiography precedes 30 selections from recent writers which the editor regards as outstanding interpretations of some topic or figure. To each of these he contributes an introduction indicating its place in the professional discussion of the subject. The result is an anthology affording an unusually clear perspective of its field. The Making of American History, edited by Donald H. Sheehan, 2d ed. enl. (New York, Dryden Press, 1954. 2 v. (912 p.)) presents rather longer extracts from 34 historians from Parton and Parkman to Henry K. David and C. Vann Woodward, but has less of a positive contribution on the part of the compiler.

3063. Schellenberg, Theodore R. Modern archives: principles and techniques. [Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1956. 247 p. 56–58525 CD950.S3

In the United States the archival profession has achieved self-consciousness and influence only since the establishment of the National Archives in 1934, followed by the organization of the Society of American Archivists in 1937 and the inauguration of its quarterly organ, The American Archivist, in the next year. During 1954 Dr. Schellenberg, Director of Archival Management at the National Archives, served as Fulbright lecturer in Australia, and there became concerned with the differences between American and foreign archival practices. His book is an outgrowth of his lectures, which he expanded to fill in a "well-rounded and well-considered statement on the basic principles and techniques of managing" modern public records—the first systematic American book on the subject. An introductory part considers the nature and relationships of archives and archival institutions. Part 2 is concerned with record management—the production, organization, and control of public records in the agency where they originate, as well as the policies that govern the disposal of noncurrent records. Part 3 expounds archival management, first in its essential conditions, and then in the principles governing its several functions: appraisal of potential accessions, physical preservation, arrangement of record groups and of the items within groups, finding aids and other descriptions, publications, and reference services to Government and public.

3064. Scott, Franklin D., and Elaine Teigler, eds. Guide to the American Historical Review, 1895–1945; a subject-classified explanatory bibliography of the articles, notes and suggestions, and documents. With a foreword by Guy Stanton Ford. In American Historical Association. Annual report. 1944; v. 1. Washington, 1945. p. 65–292. 46–25831 E172.A60 1944, v. 1

The American Historical Review was established in 1895 by an ad hoc meeting held in New York City, and was at first controlled by a coöpting Board of Editors and financed by an Association of Guarantors. Two years later it entered into a contractual relationship with the American Historical Association, which did not acquire ownership until 1916. It has, nevertheless, since its foundation been the major periodical of the historical profession in the United States, and it has from the first issue aimed at the widest possible representation of all ages, areas, and aspects of human history. In the present Guide, American history occupies 82 pages, European and Near Eastern history 76 pages, and all other areas and varieties 50 pages. Nearly every American historical scholar of any eminence has contributed at least one article to its pages, and it supplies a reliable indication of changes in the prevailing subjects, ideas, and techniques among academic historians. The present Guide to the first half-century of the Review, prepared over a period of years by Professor Scott of Northwestern University and his assistant, is arranged in subject sections, and in an order "roughly chronological by content" within each, so that the Review's contribution to any period or topic is easily discerned. The entries for articles are provided with abstracts "intended to guide readers to the articles they wish to consult, not to compress the entire content," and there is a 7-page index of authors. The early history of the journal is charmingly narrated by its first and greatest editor, John Franklin Jameson, in an article contributed to the Review for its 25th anniversary: "The American Historical Review, 1895–1920," v. 26, Oct. 1920, p. 1–17.

3065. Social Science Research Council. Committee on Historiography. Theory and practice in historical study: a report of the Committee on Historiography. New York, Social Science Research Council, 1946. 177 p. ([Social Science Research Council] Bulletin 54, 1946) 46–3597 D13.S6

Contents.—Foreword, by Merle Curti.—Grounds for a reconsideration of historiography, by C. A. Beard.—Controlling assumptions in the practice of American historians, by J. H. Randall, Jr., and George Haines, IV.—What historians have said about the causes of the Civil War, by H. K. Beale. Bibliography (p. 93–102).—Problems of terminology in historical writing: Note on the need for greater precision in the use of historical terms, by C. A. Beard. Illustrations, by Sidney Hook.—Propositions.—Selective reading list on historiography and the philosophy of history, by Ronald Thompson.

This report is the result of conferences and correspondence by a representative group of American historians seeking to arrive at agreement on the nature of their discipline as revealed by its relations with other fields in the social science area. The 21 "Propositions" (p. 133–140) were originally drafted by Charles A. Beard, but have been modified to meet the criticism of other historians; with the supporting essays they provide a recent example of coöperative and systematic thought on the part of the historical profession in the United States seeking to clarify its basic ideas and assumptions.

3066. U. S. National Archives. Guide to the records in the National Archives. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1948. xvi, 684 p. (Its Publication no. 49–13)
A49–10088 CD3023.A46 1948

3067. U. S. National Archives. Your Government's records in the National Archives. [Rev. by Bess Glenn under the direction of Philip M. Hamer and G. Philip Bauer. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off.] 1950. viii, 102 p. [Its Publication no. 51–4] A51–9171 CD3023.A46 1950

The Federal Government has been accumulating records since 1774, but during its first 160 years these were scattered, inadequately described, and under varying conditions of access or nonaccess. The creation of a unified National Archives, administering a coherent policy concerning the preservation and management of Federal records, was primarily the achievement of the American Historical Association and, more than any other individual, of John Franklin Jameson (no. 3045), but it required over a quarter-century of promotion before the first records were transferred to the new Archives building at the end of 1935. The present is the third general Guide to the records administered by the National Archives, its predecessors having been issued in 1937 (as part of the Archivist's Third Annual Report) and in 1940, but it is now seriously out of date. It describes over 813,000 cubic feet of records arranged by "Record Groups" in their numerical order; since this is, in general, the order of their acquisition by the Archives, it does not make for convenient use. Your Government's Records, of which a first and smaller edition appeared in 1946, seeks to "put the National Archives and its vast store of records in a nutshell," and is particularly useful in that it arranges the record groups by branch and department. Records transferred to the Archives since June 30, 1947, are described in National Archives Accessions, a periodical supplement to the Guide which at first was a quarterly, but now appears at irregular intervals.

3068. U. S. National Historical Publications Commission. A national program for the publication of historical documents; a report to the President. Washington, 1954. 106 p.
54–60038 E175.4.A417

"A selective list of documentary historical publications of the United States Government": p. 98–106.

The publication of volume 1 of The Papers of Thomas Jefferson (no. 3292) on May 17, 1950, was marked by President Truman's announcement that he had instructed the National Historical Publications Commission to report on the possibility of further enterprises of like thoroughness and scholarship. This document, prepared by the Executive Director of the Commission, Dr. Philip M. Hamer, presents the results of nearly four years of consultation and planning, and reflects the tremendous stimulus given to documentary publications by Dr. Julian P. Boyd's example and President Truman's initiative. As a result of the Commission's recommendations, major editions of the complete papers of Franklin, J. and J. Q. Adams, Madison, and Hamilton have been handsomely endowed. The Commission's plans for its own documentary histories of the ratification of the Constitution and the Bill of Rights, and of the First Congress of the United States (1789–91), are here set forth.

3069. Wade, Mason. Francis Parkman, heroic historian. New York, Viking Press, 1942. 466 p. 42–25856 E175.5.P28

"Bibliographical note": p. 453–456.

Parkman's prose epic of the French Empire in North America is no. 3171 below; this biography emphasizes "the heroic virtues: courage, self-reliance, perseverance, austerity, modesty," which went into its making, as its author struggled against the physical breakdown brought on by overdriving himself in his youth. Before his nervous and visual collapse in 1847, Parkman (1823–1893) had roughed it in the woods of New England and New York, toured Western Europe, and made two journeys into the American West, the second of which included his famous sojourn in a Sioux village (no. 3348). Mr. Wade quotes extensively from Parkman's own travel records here, and has presented them at length in his edition of The Journals of Francis Parkman (New York, Harper, 1947. 2 v. (xxv, 718 p.)). The remainder of the book tells how Parkman lost and regained the power to work, and then turned his handicaps into assets: having to digest his materials in his mind, he achieved a tighter organization of his narrative; and, employing his sleepless nights in mental composition, he arrived at a style at once economical, fluent, and muscular.

B. General Works

3070. Aaron, Daniel, ed. America in crisis; fourteen crucial episodes in American history. New York, Knopf, 1952. 363 p.
51–13214 E178.6.A17

Probably 14 other episodes equally "crucial" could be selected, but these were the examples chosen at Bennington College in 1949–50 "for an experimental course designed to bring out the role and operation of values in American history." Each is a concise but serious attempt at interpretation of a striking event, from the Great Awakening of the 1740's to the Nazi-Soviet Pact of 1939, by an authority in the field.

3071. Adams, James Truslow, ed. Dictionary of American history; James Truslow Adams, editor in chief; R. V. Coleman, managing editor. 2d ed. rev. New York, Scribner, 1942. 5 v.
44–1876 E174.A43 1942
——— ——— Index. New York, Scribner, 1942. 258 p. E174.A43 1942 Index

3072. Morris, Richard B., ed. Encyclopedia of American history. New York, Harper, 1953. xv, 776 p. maps, diagrs. 53–5384 E174.5.M847

The Scribner Dictionary was begun in 1936 and first published in 1940; it bears the name of J. T. Adams, a historical popularizer of the interwar decades, but was largely the work of Roy V. Coleman and his staff, as well as "more than a thousand historians" to whom the 6,000 articles were farmed out. After 17 years it remains an indispensable work of reference, and the easiest first approach to many or most topics in the history of the United States from the discoveries down to the eve of World War II. It has the advantage of ready reference conferred by the alphabetical arrangement of its articles, and the inconveniences of such an arrangement applied to a subject matter which orders itself according to geography and chronology. The articles vary in length from four or five lines ("Assiniboine, Fort") to three or four pages ("Civil War"), and nearly all have from one to six references at the end. A number of serious errors remain uncorrected even in the second edition. The valuable Atlas supplementary to this Dictionary has been separately listed in Chapter VI (no. 2967). Professor Morris' Encyclopedia is not greatly less comprehensive, and is an object-lesson in the quantity of information that may be crammed within a single pair of covers by intelligent organization, condensation, and book design. Here the material is arranged into a basic chronological section—the mainstream of national history—and six topical chronologies covering Expansion, Population and Immigration, the Constitution, the Economy, Science and Invention, and Thought and Culture. Three hundred brief biographies are alphabetically arranged, and there is a 40-page index with three columns to the page.

3073. Beard, Charles A., and Mary R. Beard. The rise of American civilization. New York, Macmillan, 1927. 2 v. 27–9541 E169.1.B32

These thick volumes by one of the best-known Americans and his accomplished wife, Mary Ritter Beard (b. 1876), are a conscious attempt to return to the history of civilization, albeit within a single nation, as it was understood by Voltaire in the 18th century and by Henry Thomas Buckle in the 19th. Ever since its publication The Rise of American Civilization has won the highest encomiums from professional historians and laymen alike; critics of the highest qualifications have used such phrases as "the high-water mark of modern historic presentation in America," and "the most brilliant historical survey of the American scene." Certainly few readable works have ever been so successful in incorporating so much economic, social, and intellectual detail into a coherent general narrative. It remains true that the presentation is uncommonly fluid and formless, rendering the book relatively unserviceable for systematic students or classroom use. Written at a time when Dr. Beard had abandoned the extremer tenets of his economic interpretation, it takes a moderate view of the movement eventuating in the Constitution, but it gives a strong economic coloring to its account of the Civil War. Volume I is "The Agricultural Era" and Volume II "The Industrial Era," and the transition between them is effected by "The Second American Revolution" of 1861–65. This is viewed as the irrepressible conflict between two phases of society which overthrew the custodians of the old order, as the Southern planter aristocracy had constituted themselves, and effected a permanent shift of the center of political gravity in American society. The discussion of military matters is always jejune, and some readers will feel that the views and actions of leading American statesmen are regularly looked at through the wrong end of the telescope. Mrs. Beard saw to it that the circumstances of American women were given a larger place than is common in general histories.

The same publishers issued a two-volumes-in-one reprint in 1930. The narrative, which comes down to 1926, was continued on an even larger scale in America in Mid-Passage (no. 3479).

3074. Billington, Ray Allen. Westward expansion, a history of the American frontier, by Ray Allen Billington with the collaboration of James Blaine Hedges. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 873 p. 49–3099 E179.5.B63

"Bibliographical note": p. 757–834.

Professor Hedges, a pupil of F. J. Turner, was to have collaborated in a joint enterprise, but was prevented by circumstances from contributing more than three chapters and a critical reading of the manuscript. The book was planned "to follow the pattern that Frederick Jackson Turner might have used had he ever compressed his voluminous researches on the American frontier within one volume," and Professor Billington explains that it is not a work of primary research, but "a synthesis of thousands of pages of writings—in texts, monographs, and learned journals—inspired by Professor Turner's original essays." "The Frontier Hypothesis" itself, and the criticisms it has encountered since 1925, are considered in Chapter 1 and the corresponding part of the bibliography, with the conclusion that these "modified, but did not refute, [Turner's] basic doctrine." Both the text, which covers the whole period 1492–1896, and the thoroughly annotated bibliography are well-nigh encyclopedic in their inclusiveness, and the text is studded with numerous small maps.

3075. Bolton, Herbert E. Wider horizons of American history. New York, Appleton-Century, 1939. xv, 191 p. (Appleton-Century historical essays) 39–13861 E18.B75

CONTENTS.—The epic of greater America.—Defensive Spanish expansion and the significance of the borderlands.—The Mission as a frontier institution in the Spanish-American colonies.—The Black Robes [Jesuits] of New Spain.

Essays advancing and illustrating the author's characteristic view that the broad phases of United States history are "common to most portions of the entire Western Hemisphere," and that "much of what has been written of each national history is but a thread out of a larger strand." The first essay "sketches in broad outline some of these larger aspects of New World history"; the others are "generalized treatments of special aspects of Western Hemisphere genesis" introduced in the first essay.

3076. Carruth, Gorton. The encyclopedia of American facts and dates, edited by Gorton Carruth and associates. New York, Crowell, 1956. 708 p. (A Crowell reference book) 56–7789 E174.5.C3

3077. Kull, Irving S., and Nell M. Kull. A short chronology of American history, 1492–1950. New Brunswick, Rutgers University Press, 1952. 388 p. 52–9371 E174.5.K8

Mr. Carruth's compilation is also a chronology, from 986 A. D. to 1955, and both volumes are extremely useful in diverse ways. The Kulls list some 10,000 events, largely in political, social, and economic history, in a single series, tersely and with little elucidation of the individual event; a supplementary volume to have been devoted to "the large field of cultural and intellectual history" has not appeared. The Encyclopedia lists its events in four parallel columns, devoted to politics, the arts, economic, scientific, and educational developments, and to sport and entertainment. Events are frequently elucidated at some length, with glances before and after, and from 1932 on each annual column opens with a kind of profile of the year in its spheres. The 116-page index of the Encyclopedia and the 90-page index of the Chronology add greatly to the reference value of each volume.

3078. Clark, Dan Elbert. The West in American history. New York, Crowell, 1937. 682 p. 37–4445 E178.C57

"Bibliographical notes": p. [627]–654.

Professor Clark wrote his survey of "the important features of the history of the West as a whole," from the expedition of Panfilo de Narvaez (1527) to the "passing of the frontier" about 1890, both for college use and for the general reader. It did not catch on as a college text, but remains a quite readable volume in which parts 2 and 3, from 1783 to the end, are organized topically, "with chapters arranged as nearly as possible in the order in which the subjects and problems with which they deal arose in the process of western settlement." The absence of footnote references is compensated for by a substantial bibliography arranged according to the 37 chapters of the book.

3079. Commager, Henry Steele, ed. Documents of American history. 5th ed. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1949. xxiii, 450, 759 p. (Crofts American history series) 49–49474 E173.C66 1949

This collection of original source materials for American history, reprinted in full or in extract, has enjoyed a wider use in college courses than any similar compilation since its original publication in 1934. The fifth edition contains 589 separate documents, each provided with a title, a reference to the source from which it was derived, a brief introduction in smaller type, and, in most cases, a few references for further study. Professor Commager states that he has tried to'limit his "selection to documents of an official and quasi-official character," but that he has not been completely consistent. Many important documents, he explains, have been omitted because they could not be included in extenso, and he was "not able to achieve a satisfactory condensation." In the fifth edition he was able to add 19 documents only by omitting 16 of those in the fourth, which is presumably why his textbook has remained unchanged since 1949. The practice of reprinting comparatively brief documents or other sources for students of American history began with the publication of the Old South Leaflets from 1883; the first collection in book form was Albert Bushnell Hart's four-volume American History Told by Contemporaries (New York, Macmillan, 1897–1901; a supplementary fifth volume was added in 1929). The carefully delimited compilations of William MacDonald, Select Charters and Other Documents Illustrative of American History, 1606–1775; Select Documents Illustrative of the History of the United States, 1776–1861; and Select Statutes and Other Documents Illustrative of the History of the United States, 1861–1898 (New York, Macmillan, 1899 (401 p.), 1898 (465 p.), 1903 (442 p.)) have a continuing value because of that quality. Since Professor Commager's last revision, Avery O. Craven, Walter Johnson, and Frederick Roger Dunn have compiled A Documentary History of the American People (Boston, Ginn, 1951. xxiii, 872 p.), the 250 readings of which include interpretive essays by historians and others as well as primary sources, and Oscar Handlin has edited Readings in American History (New York, Knopf, 1957. xxvi, 715, v p.), with 465 relatively brief and largely nondocumentary pieces arranged in 50 topical sections. Richard D. Heffner's A Documentary History of the United States, expanded ed. ([New York] New American Library, 1956. 303 p. A Mentor book, MD78) calls for mention as presenting a large amount of basic material at a very small price. A very informative discussion by Wallace Evan Davies, "From Sources to Problems: A Guide to Outside Readings," appeared in the American Quarterly, v. 7, summer 1956, p. 127–146; and a review article by Robert J. Taylor, "Inexpensive Source Materials in Early American History," calling attention to a surprisingly large group of recent paperback publications, appeared in The William and Mary Quarterly, 3d ser., v. 15, Jan. 1958, p. 95–110.

3080. Dictionary of American biography, published under the auspices of the American Council of Learned Societies. New York, Scribner, 1943. 21 v. 44-41895 E176.D562

——— Index: volumes 1–20. New York, Scribner, 1943. 613 p. E176.D562 Index

Appleton's Cyclopaedia of American Biography, edited by James Grant Wilson and John Fiske, was originally published in 6 volumes in 1886–89. A useful reference work in its day, it still has value in carrying individuals whose reputation has since suffered an eclipse, and in giving short notices of the sons or other close relatives of important persons, whose limited but respectable achievements are often hard to trace. Appleton's was, however, never a completely dependable work—one ingenious forger contributed a whole series of quite fictitious lives—and it had no citations to sources of information, primary or secondary. It was shortly quite overshadowed by the British Dictionary of National Biography, originally published in 63 volumes between 1885 and 1901, which was undertaken by a commercial publishing house but carried out in accordance with the best scholarly standards of the day. After its completion two decades elapsed before it proved possible to set on foot an American enterprise on the same level. The American Council of Learned Societies was organized in 1919, and in 1922 appointed a committee of six scholars, headed by Dr. J. Franklin Jameson, to plan such a work. The committee eventually found a sponsor in Adolph S. Ochs of the New York Times, who made available $50,000 a year for ten years, and enabled editorial work to begin in 1926. The first editor, Allen Johnson of Yale University, fell a victim to Washington traffic in 1931, but had completed six volumes and established the production of the work on firm principles. His assistant editor, Dumas Malone of the University of Virginia, brought the Dictionary to a triumphant conclusion with the publication of volume XX in 1936. The following year the publishers added an index volume, with sections on the 13,633 subjects of biographies; the 2,243 contributors; the subjects arranged by state or country of birth, by school or college attended, and by occupation; and distinctive topics discussed in the biographies. Supplement I, which appeared under the editorship of Harris E. Starr in 1944, contains 652 additional biographies, largely of persons whose deaths occurred between the original selections and the end of 1935, but also of some whose memoirs "failed to be included in the earlier volumes, although their inclusion would have been appropriate." Nineteen pages of errata may be found at the beginning of volume I of this reprint edition of 1943, rarer in libraries than the original issue. A second supplement, including persons whose deaths occurred before the end of 1940, has been announced for publication in 1958.

The Dictionary has received some criticism, but most of it springs from the appetite for more and more dependable brief biographies which the Dictionary itself has created. The "D. A. B." will long remain a standard work of first resort for the student and scholar in the American field. Marion Dargan's Guide to American Biography [1607–1933] (Albuquerque, University of New Mexico Press, 1949–52. 2 v. in 1) is a convenient biobibliography of the eminent, which annotates some titles, and gives special attention to brief biographies and volumes of biographical sketches.

3081. Faulkner, Harold U. A visual history of the United States. Illustrated by Graphics Institute. New York, H. Schuman, 1953. 199 p. 53–10368 E178.5.F3

The only book which consistently applies the new technique of "graphics"—the expression of all ideas primarily in pictographs with language used to supplement or expand—to the whole field of American history. It grew out of an Army education program during World War II, which called for a number of wall charts based on one of Professor Faulkner's textbooks; after the war Graphics Institute decided to proceed with "a comprehensive visual history," which was eight years in preparation, and for which Faulkner became the historical adviser and writer. The book's primary content is 76 "graphic idea layouts" planned by the Director of the Institute, Herbert Rosenthal, and largely drawn by Mel Bernstein; red and black ink are used, permitting five contrasting shades including white, gray, and pink. The "graphics" are of three main types: maps, charts for quantitative summaries, and simplified multiple cartoons for idea situations such as "Factors for and against a Successful War of Independence," or "The March of Fascism, 1922–1939." Anachronisms and inaccuracies can be found in the graphics, but are few and minor. The subject matter is arranged in nine units, partly chronological, such as "Division and Reunion," and partly topical, such as "Intellectual and Cultural Life." The volume affords a good introduction to American history for the visually minded, and has matter of interest even for the well-informed.

3082. Gabriel, Ralph Henry. The lure of the frontier; a story of race conflict. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1929. 327 p. (The Pageant of America [v. 2]) 29–22308 E178.5.P2, v. 2 E179.5.G13

The expansion of the American people from 1670, when Dr. John Lederer climbed the Blue Ridge and gazed at the lands beyond, to the Klondike Gold Rush of 1896–97, organized around a sequence of illustrations, usually two to a page. They are regularly as well chosen as they are dismally reproduced, and are thoroughly explained by the accompanying text. A number of maps drawn or redrawn for this volume by Gregor Noetzel and others do provide very clear illustrations of individual situations in the movement of expansion. The circumstance that this volume was sold only with complete sets of The Pageant of America has kept it from enjoying a far wider usefulness than it has actually achieved.

3083. Handlin, Oscar, and others. Harvard guide to American history. Cambridge, Mass., Belknap Press, 1954. xxiv, 689 p. 53–5066 Z1236.H27

In 1896 two Harvard professors of history, Edward Channing and Albert Bushnell Hart, issued a Guide to the Study of American History (Boston, Ginn. xvi, 471 p.) in order to "introduce readers to the evolving methods and growing literature of the historical discipline." That literature grew and grew, and 16 years later Frederick Jackson Turner, who came from the University of Wisconsin to Harvard in 1910, joined them in a revised and augmented edition, Guide to the Study and Reading of American History (Boston, Ginn, 1912. xvi, 650 p.), which remained the standard work of the kind for over four decades, although during the later ones its increasing inadequacy was universally recognized and deplored. It required a team of six Harvard historians—the Arthur Meier Schlesingers Senior and Junior, Samuel Eliot Morison, Frederick Merk, and Paul Herman Buck in addition to Professor Handlin (whose name is deservedly first, since he and Mrs. Mary F. Handlin undertook the labor of getting the volume through the press)—to bring out the third and present version, which was announced for publication more than once before its actual appearance. With a few exceptions, imprints later than 1950 are not listed. Of the three parts of the Harvard Guide, the first is a series of 66 essays and special lists on the more general aspects of American historical study, such as "Principles of Historical Criticism," "The Mechanics of Citation," "Guides to Manuscript Materials," "Bibliographies of American History," and "Scholarly Uses of Historical Fiction" (a very skillful classification by the elder Schlesinger). The second part is a sequence of 211 bibliographical sections, primarily chronological and secondarily topical, covering American history from prehistoric times to 1953. Each section is divided into "Summary" (a brief outline of the subject), "General Works," "Special Works" (including many periodical articles), "Sources," and "Bibliography" (other lists of reference). The third part is a large index filling 143 double-column pages, which refers only to the principal entry for a work and ignores the repetitions in more abbreviated form. The student who can afford only one reference book in general American history would find this his natural choice.

3084. Hicks, John D., and George E. Mowry. A short history of American democracy. 2d ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1956. 854, lxxv p. 56–2751 E178.1.H56 1956

Bibliographies at end of chapters.

Most college textbooks in American history now come in two volumes under multiple authorship; Professor Hicks' one-volume survey, originally published in 1943, has acquired a joint author in its third revision. As in nearly all such works, recent history is expanded at the expense of the remoter past: the period 1928–55 receives approximately the same number of pages as 1607–1815. The art staff of Houghton Mifflin has supplied abundant illustrations from contemporary sources and numerous small maps of great clarity, and the chapter bibliographies are uncommonly full and effectively organized.

3085. A History of American life, edited by Arthur Meier Schlesinger and Dixon Ryan Fox. New York, Macmillan, 1927–48. 13 v. E169.1.H67

The Library has classified other sets, in which most of the volumes have later imprints without change of text, as E169.1.H672 and E169.1.H673. "Critical essay on authorities" in each volume.

3086. Vol. 1. The coming of the white man, 1492–1848, by Herbert Ingram Priestley. 1929. xx, 411 p. 29–17105 E178.P94

3087. Vol. 2. The first Americans, 1607–1690, by Thomas Jefferson Wertenbaker. 1927. xx, 358 p. 27–24317 E191.W5

3088. Vol. 3. Provincial society, 1690–1763, by James Truslow Adams. 1927. xvii, 374 p. 27–24316 E195.A22

3089. Vol. 4. The revolutionary generation, 1763–1790, by Evarts Boutell Greene. 1943. xvii, 487 p. 43–16080 E320.1.G82

3090. Vol. 5. The completion of independence, 1790–1830, by John Allen Krout and Dixon Ryan Fox. 1944. xxiii, 487 p. 44–51219 E301.K7

3091. Vol. 6. The rise of the common man, 1830–1850, by Carl Russell Fish. 1927. xix, 391 p. 27–24315 E338.F53

3092. Vol. 7. The irrepressible conflict, 1850–1865, by Arthur Charles Cole. 1934. xv, 468 p. 34–5502 E415.7.C69

3093. Vol. 8. The emergence of modern America, 1865–1878, by Allan Nevins. 1927. xix, 446 p. 27–24314 E661.N5

3094. Vol. 9. The nationalizing of business, 1878–1898, by Ida M. Tarbell. 1936. xvi, 313 p. 36–28986 HC105.T3

3095. Vol. 10. The rise of the city, 1878–1898, by Arthur Meier Schlesinger. 1933. xvi, 494 p. 33–2887 HT123.S3

3096. Vol. 11. The quest for social justice, 1898–1914, by Harold Underwood Faulkner. 1931. xvii, 390 p. 31–5574 E741.F26

3097. Vol. 12. The great crusade and after, 1914–1928, by Preston William Slosson. 1930. xviii, 486 p. 30–22386 E741.S63

3098. Vol. 13. The age of the great depression, 1929–1941, by Dixon Wecter. 1948. xiv, 434 p. 48–10172 E806.W43 1948a

This series was the first large-scale attempt to present the development of the United States through the canons of "the New History" or social history, for which an energetic propaganda had been made in the two decades before 1927. In it the four standard themes of traditional historiography—political, constitutional, diplomatic, and military narrative—were by design either eliminated or subordinated to economic, social, and intellectual factors. Inasmuch as the latter are less amenable to storytelling, description or analysis becomes at least as prominent as narrative. The editors of the venture were the elder Arthur Meier Schlesinger (b. 1888), professor of history at Harvard from 1924 to 1954, whose New Viewpoints (no. 3139) was one of the best-known presentations of the new outlook, and Dixon Ryan Fox (1887–1945), a teacher of history at Columbia from 1913 to 1934, in which year he became president of Union College at Schenectady, N. Y., leaving his volume of the series to be completed by another hand. The series was originally planned to comprise 12 volumes, of which 4 were published together in November 1927, and 6 more appeared in the course of the following decade. The two stragglers were issued during World War II, and a 13th volume, continuing the series to the outbreak of that War, added in 1948. The volumes of the series were usually hailed with enthusiasm on their first appearance, and most of the authors carried out their pioneer tasks with industry, intelligence, and zeal. Several decades of use have led many to conclude that the volumes are lacking in cohesiveness, frequently fall into mere cataloging, and in quality vary rather widely from chapter to chapter. One critic pointed out that the division into periods defined by political dates was a basic inconsistency. But if they did not arrive at a definitive form for social history, they certainly constituted a great advance in its practice. The illustrations from contemporary sources are critically handled if inadequately reproduced, and the bibliographies are uncommonly full and well organized and annotated.

3099. Hofstadter, Richard. The American political tradition and the men who made it. New York, Knopf, 1948. xi, 378, xviii p.
48–8258 E178.H727 1948

These 12 "studies in the ideology of American statesmanship," as the author terms them, form an unusual and striking synthesis of the history of political and economic ideas with that of practical politics. One takes its title from a patrician "agitator," Wendell Phillips, and two others from groups of politicians, the Founding Fathers, and the "Spoilsmen" of the Gilded Age. The remainder are concerned with the ideas and careers of nine prominent statesmen from Jefferson to F. D. Roosevelt, all but two of whom (Calhoun and Bryan, who tried hard enough) reached the Presidency. They all, Professor Hofstadter insists, shared a common politico-economic creed, the tenets of which included the sanctity of private property, the value of opportunity, the necessity of competition to a beneficial social order, and the obligation of politics to preserve the competitive scheme. Since the time of Bryan, "progressive" thought has looked backwards, trying to undo the mischief of the recent past "and re-create the old nation of limited and decentralized power, genuine competition, democratic opportunity, and enterprise." The implied criticism is not developed into a positive doctrine. The author is a master of pertinent quotation from primary sources, and his admirable "Bibliographical Essay" (p. 349–378) reveals the vast reading out of which his shapely essays have come.

3100. Leopold, Richard W., and Arthur S. Link, eds. Problems in American history. 2d ed. Englewood Cliffs, N. J., Prentice-Hall, 1957. xxi, 706 p.
57–6544 E178.L5 1957

Along with Potter and Manning (no. 3106) and the Amherst multivolume Problems series (no. 3107), this represents the newer tendency in source-books for college courses in history, wherein the extracts, mostly from contemporary writings, are organized so as to "provide conflicting and contrasting points of view on major events and controversies," as the present editors put it, and so to make their materials more meaningful for the pupil. Here the editors have recruited 20 specialists able to draw on firsthand research, each of whom presents one of "20 closely integrated problems," "a complex of debates that evolve, the one out of the other, into the vast panorama of American history." They range from "The Sources of [Political] Authority," presented by Edmund S. Morgan, to "Global War and Postwar Crisis," by L. Ethan Ellis, but as usual in recent textbooks, the earlier development is slighted, 1829 and "Jacksonian Democracy" being reached in Problem 6. For reasons not explained, the contributors have been led to avoid "formal documents, such as statutes, treaties, court decisions, and diplomatic notes"—which certainly underlines one of the hazards of this approach. The original edition appeared in 1952; in the second the "focus" of many of the problems has been sharpened by revision or recasting; each has been shortened by about one-fourth, resulting in a volume of 706 instead of 929 pages; and three substitutions of new authors and problems have been made.

3101. Lillard, Richard G. American life in autobiography, a descriptive guide. Stanford, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1956. 140 p.
56–8689 Z5301.L66

An annotated bibliography of over 400 selected American autobiographies arranged in 22 occupational categories, and provided with an index of names and with special lists of the authors who are immigrants, Indians, Jews, or Negroes. The compiler aims his notes on matters emphasized, style, and reader-appeal at "present-day readers of all sorts." In order to include only books "that library patrons can get hold of," he has limited his entries to books published or republished since 1900, and thereby narrowed the retrospective value of his guide. His thoughtful introduction analyzes the weaknesses, strengths, and significance of autobiographical writing: "the better American autobiographies are structured around a perception of change on two levels, the social on one and the personal and intellectual on the other."

3102. Matthews, William. American diaries; an annotated bibliography of American diaries written prior to the year 1861, compiled by William Matthews with the assistance of Roy Harvey Pearce. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1945. xiv, 383 p. (University of California publications in English, v. 16)
A45–1983 PE11.C3, v. 16
Z5305.U5M3

The diary, here defined as "a day-by-day record of what interested the diarist, each day's record being self-contained and written shortly after the events occurred," is a relatively undistorted record of human experience whose value has always been recognized by historians of every aspect of civilization. This annotated list of all published American diaries which were begun between 1629 (the Rev. Francis Higginson's journal of his voyage to New England) and the outbreak of the Civil War is a valuable auxiliary to nearly all branches of American studies. Its usefulness is evidenced by the great variety of historical and other periodicals, memoirs, and family histories in which the diaries are printed.

Each diary is listed under the year of its first entry (alphabetically within the year). The diarist and his localities are identified, and his major interests noted, with travel and war naturally predominating, but by no means to the exclusion of other concerns in great variety. An index of localities is unfortunately lacking. Professor Matthews of the University of California at Los Angeles has gone on to elaborate the Canadian materials in this volume in his Canadian Diaries and Autobiographies (Berkeley, University of California Press, 1950. 130 p.), and to produce kindred lists of British diaries and autobiographies, but has unfortunately not dealt with American autobiographies, nor American diaries beginning later than 1860.

3103. Morison, Samuel Eliot, and Henry Steele Commager. The growth of the American Republic. [4th ed., rev., and enl.] New York, Oxford University Press, 1950. 2 v. maps (part fold., part col.) 50–8134 E178.M85 1950

Contents.—v. 1. 1000–1865. Bibliography (p. [741]–789)—v. 2. 1865–1950. Bibliography (p. [829]–895).

Morison (b. 1887), a Harvard-trained teacher of history at Harvard, was the first holder of the first chair of American history in any British University, the Harold Vyvyan Harmsworth Professorship at Oxford. Endowed by Lord Rothermere in memory of a son fallen in World War I, it was to be filled only by American citizens. The most enduring result of Professor Morison's tenure (1922–25) was his two volumes, The Oxford History of the United States, 1783–1917 (Oxford and New York, Oxford University Press, 1927), a narrative the scope and direction of which, the author wrote, were largely determined by "the questions asked by my English friends and pupils." This origin was evident in its strong emphasis upon Anglo-American relations and the campaigns of the Civil War; and the author's field of concentration could be inferred from the relatively thin treatment of the half-century after 1865. It nevertheless met with warmer appreciation at home than in Britain, and three years later Henry Steele Commager (b. 1902), trained at Wisconsin and domiciled at New York University, collaborated with Morison in converting it into a one-volume college text, incorporating much 19th-century social history, while the original author added a preliminary section going back to 1763. In 1937, following the characteristic evolution of American historical textbooks, it grew into a two-volume work, with the second volume brought down to the election of 1936. The third edition of 1942 "extended the story backward to the origin of man in America," as well as forward, and the fourth, entered above, reaches Truman's reelection in 1948. Despite the numerous patchings, it retains much of the stylistic vitality of the parent work, and notwithstanding the heaviest competition has maintained its place as a text for college courses. Other noteworthy college texts covering the whole of American history in two volumes are the following: Leland D. Baldwin, The Stream of American History (New York, R. R. Smith, 1952); Harry J. Carman and Harold C. Syrett, A History of the American People (New York, Knopf, 1952); Merle E. Curti, Richard H. Shryock, Thomas C. Cochran, and Fred Harvey Harrington, An American History (New York, Harper, 1950); and Robert E. Riegel and David F. Long, The American Story (New York, McGraw-Hill, 1955).

3104. Parkes, Henry Bamford. The United States of America, a history. New York, Knopf, 1953. xvii, 773, xxiv p. illus.

52–12413 E178.P25

Includes bibliographies.

A one-volume college textbook covering the whole of United States history from "The Expansion of Europe" to "Society at Mid-Century [1950]." While political and economic matters are by no means skimped, numerous chapters are devoted to social, intellectual, and artistic developments, and these usually receive clear and concise expositions instead of the unenlightening catalogs of names and titles so frequently found in textbooks. Maps and illustrations are well drafted or chosen, and the end matter is exceptionally useful.

3105. Paxson, Frederic L. History of the American frontier, 1763–1893. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1924. xvii, 598 p. 24–23381 E179.5.P34

"East of the frontier of 1763 the American groups are best to be examined as European frontiers in America; west of the line is an American frontier to be studied in contrast with the East." Professor Paxson was the first to make a detailed and unified narrative out of F. J. Turner's famous generalization, and pursued his theme through the admission of the six "omnibus States" in 1889–90. The post-Civil War period, however, received relatively briefer treatment (p. 494 ff.). Eight years later Paxson stated his conviction that, "after a generation of general currency, the Turner hypothesis stands today as acceptable as when it was launched" ("A Generation of the Frontier Hypothesis, 1893–1932," reprinted in The Great Demobilization and Other Essays. Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1941. 206 p.).

3106. Potter, David M., and Thomas G. Manning, eds. Select problems in historical interpretation. New York, Holt [1949–50] 2 v.
49–9401 E178.P78

Volume 2 by Thomas G. Manning and David M. Potter, with the collaboration of Wallace E. Davies.

CONTENTS.—[v. 1] Nationalism and sectionalism in America, 1775–1877.—[v. 2] Government and the American economy, 1870–present.

These companion volumes constitute the most complex and refined development of the problem sourcebook yet to appear, and make a considerable demand upon both teacher and student—so much so that, the collaborator in the later volume thinks, they are best deferred to "the senior seminar or conference group level." Each volume singles out a major theme in American development, presents various of its aspects in terms of a series of related problems, and aims to make the student analyze the factors involved, "explore the complexity of the issues, and sense the multiplicity of the possible solutions." There are twelve 35 to 40-page problems in each volume; the material presented under each problem is "a balance of fact, opinion, and commentary," with the editors largely providing "the knowledge which is the necessary condition to an investigation of the topics," and relating "each topic to the central subject of the Problem." The theme of the first volume culminates in "Interpretations of the Civil War," with a sequel on "The Political Status of the Negro after Appomattox"; that of the second in the NRA, NRLB, and other agencies of the New Deal, with a sequel on the OPA in World War II.

3107. Problems in American civilization; readings selected by the Department of American Studies, Amherst College. Boston, Heath, 1949–57. 29 v.

A series of slender, paperbound volumes initiated in 1949 under the joint editorship of Earl Latham, George Rogers Taylor, and George F. Whicher; in the latest volumes Professor Taylor appears as the sole editor. The first eight to be published were issued as a numbered series; the subsequent ones have been without numbers, and it has seemed best here to list them all alphabetically by author. They are of course designed to provide "collateral reading" for college courses in American history, and they reflect the trend of the last 15 years to arrange source and documentary materials for such use in relation to controversial issues of the past and present. Each volume of the series has the same arrangement: the editor's Introduction outlines the "Problem" in a few pages; "The Clash of Issues" is a page of striking formulations from either side; there follow a dozen or so selections from contemporary sources and recent historians, and a brief final essay making "Suggestions for Additional Reading." The success of the series as a teaching medium appears from the fact that the first two Problems to be issued have now appeared in revised editions. It seems equally well calculated to provide the general reader with a striking introduction to the topics with which it deals.

3108. Cope, Alfred Haines, and Fred Krinsky, eds. Franklin D. Roosevelt and the Supreme Court. 1952. 109 p. 52–1656 Law

3109. Fenno, Richard F., ed. The Yalta Conference. 1955. 112 p.
55–1646 D734.C7 1945i

3110. Greene, Theodore P., ed. American imperialism in 1898. 1955. 105 p.
55–1630 E713.G7

3111. Greene, Theodore P., ed. Wilson at Versailles. 1957. 114 p. 57–1944 D644.G7

3112. Kennedy, Gail, ed. Democracy and the gospel of wealth. 1949. 116 p.
49–5916 E169.1.P897, no. 6

3113. Kennedy, Gail, ed. Education for democracy; the debate over the report of the President's Commission on Higher Education. 1952. 117 p. 52–10171 LA226.A485K4

3114. Kennedy, Gail, ed. Evolution and religion; the conflict between science and theology in modern America. 1957. 114 p.
57–1698 BL245.K4

3115. Kennedy, Gail, ed. Pragmatism and American culture. 1950. 114 p.
51–7648 B832.K4

3116. Latham, Earl, ed. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution. Rev. ed. 1956. 126 p. 56–14513 JK146.L35 1956

First published in 1949.

3117. Latham, Earl, ed. John D. Rockefeller, robber baron or industrial statesman? 1949. 115 p. 49–5916 E169.1.P897, no. 7

3118. Rozwenc, Edwin C., ed. The Compromise of 1850. 1957. 99 p. 57–3018 E423.R8

3119. Rozwenc, Edwin C., ed. The New Deal: revolution or evolution? 1949. 113 p. 49–5916 E169.1.P897, no. 8

3120. Rozwenc, Edwin C., ed. Reconstruction in the South. 1952. 109 p. 52–1818 E668.R83

3121. Rozwenc, Edwin C., ed. Roosevelt, Wilson and the trusts. 1950. 115 p. 51–7688 HD2785.R6

3122. Rozwenc, Edwin C., ed. Slavery as a cause of the Civil War. 1949. 104 p. 49–5916 E169.1.P897, no. 5

3123. Sanford, Charles L., ed. Benjamin Franklin and the American character. 1955. 102 p. 55–2272 E302.6.F8S32

3124. Taylor, George Rogers, ed. The great tariff debate, 1820–1830. 1953. 95 p. 53–1170 HF3027.3.T38

3125. Taylor, George Rogers, ed. Hamilton and the national debt. 1950. 108 p. 51–7557 HJ8106.T3

3126. Taylor, George Rogers, ed. Jackson versus Biddle; the struggle over the Second Bank of the United States. 1949. 119 p. 49–5916 E169.1.P897, no. 3

3127. Taylor, George Rogers, ed. The Turner thesis concerning the role of the frontier in American history. Rev. ed. 1956. 109 p. 56–14601 E179.5.T96T3 1956
First published in 1949.

3128. Wahlke, John C., ed. The causes of the American Revolution. 1950. 108 p. 51–7685 E210.W3

3129. Wahlke, John C., ed. Loyalty in a democratic state. 1952. 111 p. 52–1192 JK1759.W33

3130. Waller, George M., ed. Pearl Harbor: Roosevelt and the coming of the war. 1953. 112 p. 53–1342 E806.W22

3131. Waller, George M., ed. Puritanism in early America. 1950. 115 p. 51–4731 F7.W3

3132. Warne, Colston Estey, ed. Industry-wide collective bargaining: promise or menace? 1950. 113 p. 51–4732 E169.1.P897, v. 9

3133. Warne, Colston Estey, ed. The Pullman boycott of 1894; the problem of Federal intervention. 1955. 112 p. 55–3476 HD5325.R12 1894.C6

3134. Whicher, George F., ed. The transcendentalist revolt against materialism. 1949. 107 p. 49–5916 E169.1.P897, no. 4

3135. Whicher, George F., ed. William Jennings Bryan and the campaign of 1896. 1953. 109 p. 53–1341 E664.B87W6

3136. Ziegler, Benjamin Munn, ed. Immigration, an American dilemma. 1953. 118 p. 53–8474 JV6455.Z5

3137. Riegel, Robert E. America moves west. 3d ed. New York, Holt, 1956. 659 p. illus. 56–6073 F591.R53 1956
Professor Riegel of Dartmouth College published the first edition of this textbook, as readable as it is informative, in 1930. His third revision adds a new chapter (38) on the Pacific Coast as well as "pertinent research of the past decade," and offers "completely redone" lists of readings (with very brief entries) at the end of each chapter. Chronologically the book extends from the outbreak of the American Revolution to the collapse of "Western Panaceas" with the defeat of Bryan in the Presidential election of 1896. There are concretely descriptive chapters on the successive phases of daily living in the West and on the social consequences of diverse means of transportation. Concluding chapters are "The West is Fictionalized," which affirms that "the most distinctive of American experiences" still offers an unexhausted supply of raw material for the creative writer, and "The Historian Discovers the West," which is largely concerned with the "frontier hypothesis" of Frederick Jackson Turner and its critics (cf. no. 3147).

3138. Rippy, James Fred. America and the strife of Europe. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1938. 263 p. 38–25892 E175.9.R57
"Critical bibliography": [233]–250.
A small volume which takes a large view of the place of the United States in the world, as it considers the place which "the strife of Europe" has occupied in the several American ideologies of isolationism, democratic enthusiasm, pacificism, and expansionism. It furthermore illustrates how inter-European conflicts have facilitated the two major movements of American expansion and the assertion of the Monroe Doctrine. The author found little to approve in the efforts of 20th-century American statesmen to take a hand in the maintenance of European peace.

3139. Schlesinger, Arthur Meier. New viewpoints in American history. New York, Macmillan, 1922. 299 p. 22-7401 E175.9.S34

"Bibliographical note" at the end of each chapter.

CONTENTS.—The influence of immigration on American history.—Geographic factors in American development.—Economic influences in American history.—The decline of aristocracy in America.—Radicalism and conservatism in American history.—The role of women in American history.—The American Revolution.—Economic aspects of the movement for the Constitution.—The significance of Jacksonian democracy.—The state rights fetish.—The foundations of the modern era.—The riddle of the parties.

3140. Schlesinger, Arthur Meier. Paths to the present. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 317 p. 49-7676 E178.S33

"For further reading": p. 278–302.

In New Viewpoints the author's object was "to bring together and summarize, in nontechnical language, some of the results of the researches of the present age of historical study and to show their importance to a proper understanding of American history." While the author sought to identify his "new history" with the emergence of academic historiography, he was actually concerned with the movement whereby "a record of arid political and constitutional development began to be enriched by the new conceptions and fresh points of view afforded by the scientific study of economics, sociology, and politics." Much of what seemed new in 1922 is now agreed commonplace, while some positions which then seemed self-evident now appear doubtful or worse, but Professor Schlesinger's volume remains a landmark in the expanding content of his discipline. Paths to the Present contains 13 essays grouped under 4 headings: "National Traits," "Government of the People," "War and Peace," and "Ampersand." Each is in some degree the pursuit of a single topic through the whole sweep of American history, and each evidences its author's extraordinary knowledge combined with the absence or successful concealment of any personal convictions. "Biography of a Nation of Joiners," "Food in the Making of America," and "Casting the National Horoscope" all contain material hardly to be found elsewhere, and the rest take larger points of view than most treatments of their subjects.

3141. Schouler, James. History of the United States of America, under the Constitution. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1894–1913. 7 v. 2-4002 E301.S372

Volumes 1–5 rev. ed., 1894.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. 1783–1801. Rule of Federalism.—v. 2. 1801–1817. Jefferson Republicans.—v. 3. 1817–1831. Era of good feeling.—v. 4. 1831–1847. Democrats and Whigs.—v. 5. 1847–1861. Free soil controversy.—v. 6. 1861–1865. The Civil War.—v. 7. 1865–1877. The Reconstruction period.

Schouler (1839–1920) was compelled by the failure of his hearing in 1871 to relinquish a very successful career as a lawyer specializing in Civil War veterans' claims. He turned to the compilation of a number of legal textbooks, much used in their day, and utilized his leisure to embark upon a project long meditated: a continuation of George Bancroft's history of the United States from the adoption of the Constitution to the outbreak of the Civil War. After some delays he brought out the first volume, through W. H. Morrison of Washington, D. C., in 1880. The history won the favor of the general public, and achieved its original terminus with volume V in 1891; this was the first to be published by Dodd, Mead and Co. of New York, who thereafter handled the whole set. In 1899 and 1913 the author added volumes on periods to which his personal acquaintance extended and on which his opinions were firmly held: the Civil War and Reconstruction to the election of President Hayes. These volumes naturally drew the fire of the new race of academic historians as being too narrowly political and too unsympathetic with Southern secessionism. Today, after various failures to achieve total history, it is easier to appreciate the work for what it is: a detailed political, constitutional, diplomatic, and military history of the first century of the American Nation, chronologically precise, judiciously proportioned, and economically narrated. As by-products of his magnum opus, Schouler produced two volumes of shorter studies, containing a number of pieces noteworthy for their information or interpretations: Historical Briefs and Constitutional Studies, State and Federal (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1896 (310 p.) and 1897 (332 p.) respectively). In 1906 he published a sterling contribution to social history: Americans of 1776 (New York, Dodd, Mead. 317 p.), which reviews the state of society in the Thirteen Colonies on the eve of the Revolution.

3142. Smith, Bernard, ed. The democratic spirit, a collection of American writings from the earliest times to the present day. 2d ed., rev. New York, Knopf, 1943. xxxv, 923 p.
43–51285 PS507.S59 1943

3143. Angle, Paul M., ed. By these words; great documents of American liberty, selected and placed in their contemporary settings. Illustrated by Edward A. Wilson. New York, Rand, McNally, 1954. 560 p. 54–10616 E173.A79

The Democratic Spirit is a collection of fairly extended extracts from 100 American authors, "the truly democratic and characteristic works of the democratic writers of this country." The kinds of writing included range from political discourse to fiction and poetry embodying democratic aspirations or assailing some concrete wrong such as slavery. The literary extracts of the 1920's and 30's exemplify the anti-fascism and somewhat diffuse social protest of the day, when the American people "began to think of economic democracy as indispensable to liberty," now conceived "as a matter of decent living and collective effort as well as freedom from restraint." A note on each author precedes his work. By These Words is a smaller collection of 46 documents, from the Mayflower Compact of 1620 to President Eisenhower's inaugural address of 1953, presented in a more attractive format than is usual in such compilations, with uncrowded pages and interspersed sketches. Mr. Angle's well-proportioned introductions to each document supply informative backgrounds for the general reader.

3144. Smith, Theodore Clarke. The United States as a factor in world history. New York, Holt, 1941. 142 p. (The Berkshire studies in European history) 41–10192 E183.7.S6

"Bibliographical note": p. 133–138.

A tour-de-force of condensation which considers American history from 1763 to 1940 from the standpoint of world history. The author identifies two main factors of persistent influence: the republicanism of American society deriving from the circumstance that no feudal aristocracy grew up in the Thirteen Colonies, and the economic importance of transatlantic commerce. He traces their presence through three periods: that of separation from Europe, to 1823; that of isolated democracy, to 1897; and that of the United States as a world power.

3145. Stone, Irving, and Richard Kennedy, eds. We speak for ourselves; a self-portrait of America. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1950. xvii, 462 p. 50–9974 E176.S875

Extracts rarely exceeding 8 pages in length from 64 American autobiographies, mostly of the 20th or later 19th century, and arranged in 7 rather esoteric categories which Mr. Stone explains in his introduction. For the most part the compilers have selected some striking or representative episode, but in a few instances they "undertook the task of weaving together in a cohesive whole" passages scattered through a book, "exercising extreme care not to alter either the meaning or the effect of a story." They hoped to create an interest which will send readers back to the original volumes, for which, unfortunately, they provide nothing more than short titles.

3146. Thistlethwaite, Frank. The great experiment; an introduction to the history of the American people. Cambridge [Eng.] University Press, 1955. 335 p. 55–4496 E178.T35

The author is Fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge, and his book, the "result of several years' teaching American history to Cambridge undergraduates," aims "to provide the British student with a point of departure." He hopes, however, to interest American readers by identifying "the special characteristics that distinguish Americans from Europeans"; they will be quite as much attracted by his multitude of striking insights and perspicuous generalizations. He takes as basic "the grand process of migration from Europe," which has brought into being "a new variant of western society"—"the mobile society," which contrasts with the static and conformist societies of Europe. He further emphasizes that "American culture grew to maturity within an Atlantic world with nerve-centers" in Britain as well as America. He gives far more attention to economic factors than to political personalities, and in fact industrialists cut a greater figure in his pages than do statesmen. "In the mid-twentieth century the American people still pursue their Revolutionary ideal," the most ambitious ever to command the allegiance of a great nation, and therefore, naturally if regrettably, one that "has never achieved full acceptance in practice." The Great Experiment is one of the most distinguished interpretations of American history to come from a European pen. Harold Plaskitt's The United States of America; the People, Their History, Institutions, and Way of Life [2d ed.] (London, University Tutorial Press, 1953. 200 p.) is a revision after ten years of a wartime manual which attempted "to provide background information for the improvement of Anglo-American co-operation." It consists of 15 topical chapters, such as "The Constitution," "Culture and Entertainment," "Capital and Labour," and "Relations with the Outside World." It is selective, straightforward, and often considerably simpler than the subject matter it seeks to present.

3147. Turner, Frederick Jackson. The frontier in American history. New York, Holt, 1950, ©1947. 375 p. 53–482 E179.5.T956 1950

CONTENTS.—The significance of the frontier in American history.—The first official frontier of the Massachusetts Bay.—The Old West.—The Middle West.—The Ohio Valley in American history.—The significance of the Mississippi Valley in American history.—The problem of the West.—Dominant forces in Western life.—Contributions of the West to American democracy.—Pioneer ideals and the state university.—The West and American ideals.—Social forces in American history.—Middle Western pioneer democracy.

The American Historical Association, meeting at Chicago during the World's Fair year (1893), were told by a young assistant professor of history at the University of Wisconsin that, up to then, American history had been in essence the history of the colonization of the great West, that the frontier, "the hinter edge of free land," was the line of most rapid and effective Americanization and the salient factor in national unification, that frontier individualism had promoted democracy and transmitted it to the East and even to Europe, and that the American intellect owed its distinguishing characteristics to the lingering effects of frontier life. Seldom has a group of scholars proved so ripe for conversion; the "frontier hypothesis" speedily became a kind of orthodoxy among American historians and went for over 30 years without serious criticism. The present volume, one of the two that Turner (1861–1932) published during his lifetime, opens with the paper of 1893 and contains 12 more essays and addresses that he produced down to 1918; the original edition appeared in 1920. The Early Writings of Frederick Jackson Turner (Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1938. 316 p.) includes a 40-page bibliography of writings by and about Turner, compiled by Everett E. Edwards, and an introduction on "Turner's Formative Years" by Fulmer Mood. Mr. Edwards has also compiled a volume of References on the Significance of the Frontier in American History (Washington, 1939. 99 p. U. S. Dept. of Agriculture Library, Bibliographical contributions, no. 25. 2d ed.); some later contributions to the debate are listed in the bibliography of Billington above (no. 3074). Three other books by Turner, two of them posthumous, are nos. 3356, 3357, and 3784.

3148. Weyl, Nathaniel. Treason; the story of disloyalty and betrayal in American history. Washington, Public Affairs Press, 1950. 491 p. 50–6616 E179.W5

3149. Weyl, Nathaniel. The battle against disloyalty. New York, Crowell, 1951. 378 p. 51–3355 E743.5.W4

"Throughout the hundred and seventy-five years during which the United States has existed as a nation, mercenaries and psychopaths, zealots and misguided idealists, enemy agents and servants of antidemocratic faiths have betrayed their allegiance and struck at the foundations of the Republic." Treason passes briskly from Charles Lee, Benedict Arnold, John Fries, Aaron Burr, Thomas W. Dorr, John Brown, and Clement Vallandigham, to the pro-Nazis and the subversive Communists of our own day. No documentation is offered for these condensed narratives, but they are reasonably accurate if somewhat journalistic in manner. The Battle against Disloyalty is provided with "reference notes" at the end of the volume. It has some material on the secret service during the Civil War and World War I, but is largely concerned with the Communist and Nazi menaces since 1919, and the counterintelligence work, congressional investigations, legal prosecutions, and loyalty programs by which they have been combated.

3150. Wish, Harvey. Society and thought in America. New York, Longmans, Green, 1950–52. 2 v. 50–9981 E169.1.W65

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Society and thought in early America; a social and intellectual history of the American people through 1865.—v. 2. Society and thought in modern America; a social and intellectual history of the American people from 1865.

A general survey of American history with politics and economics subordinated to social and intellectual factors. If it is short on causality and may not cut very deep, it is exceptionally felicitous in its choice of material and in its organization. It is furthermore presented in a leisurely kind of exposition which avoids the cluttered patterns so common in general works of its type, and makes the student's task relatively pleasant. It naturally becomes less adequate as it approaches the complexities of the present day. Each volume has very pertinent illustrations from contemporary sources and a judiciously selected bibliography which the author has deliberately held down to a limited number of significant titles.

3151. Woestemeyer, Ina Faye, ed. The westward movement; a book of readings on our changing frontiers. With the editorial collaboration of J[ohn] Montgomery Gambrill. New York, Appleton-Century, 1939. xx, 500 p. illus. 39–14444 F591.W85

"Notes on the literature of the westward movement": p. 477–484; "Bibliography of sources quoted": p. 485–490.

This anthology originated as a "Professional Project" of the editor in her work for the Ed. D. degree at Teachers College, Columbia University, where Dr. Gambrill was a professor of history. In it the "Westward Movement" is broadly conceived, both chronologically and as a social process. Most of the extracts are from documents or the writings of participants or direct observers, but some are from such historians of the frontier as Parkman and Everett Dick. The arrangement is topical, with special attention to the several factors, chiefly economic, which entered into "The Lure of the West," and to the transmission of culture to the frontier, including a chapter on "Folk-lore, Ballads, and Literature." The editor has made rather too many excisions (indicated by 3 or 4 dots) from her selections, and the large body of contemporary illustrations is provided with quite inadequate identification.

3152. Woods, Henry F. American sayings; famous phrases, slogans and aphorisms. Rev. and enl. ed. New York, Perma Giants, 1950, ©1949. 312 p. 50–3259 PN6084.A5W6 1950

Striking formulations of significant ideas make as well as reflect history, in the United States as elsewhere. Under the 4 categories of "Political and Civil," "War," "Sociological—Economic—Commercial," and "Popular," the compiler has arranged over 300 brief items, such as "The solid South" or "Tell it to Sweeney"; and has traced each to its origin, certain or presumed, with an individual or at least within a milieu. The items are in an approximate chronological order within each category, but are indexed by first words and, when possible, by individuals. The American Treasury, 1455–1955, compiled by Clifton Fadiman assisted by Charles Van Doren (New York, Harper, 1955. xxxii, 1108 p.) has an "Index of Familiar Words and Phrases," but is looser in idea and on a vaster scale. It contains a huge and various collection of pointed statements by Americans, sometimes on American themes and sometimes on things in general, and sometimes running to a page or more, but more often confined to a sentence or two. Dictionary of American Maxims, edited by David Kin [pseud. of David George Plotkin] (New York, Philosophical Library, 1955. 597 p.), is made up of briefer statements—two sentences at most—on things in general; it makes no references and has no author index.

C. The New World

3153. Anghiera, Pietro Martire d'. De orbe novo, the eight Decades of Peter Martyr d'Anghera; translated from the Latin with notes and introd., by Francis Augustus MacNutt. New York, Putnam, 1912. 2 v. ports. 12–24777 E141.A604

Bibliography: v. 1, p. 49–54.

Peter Martyr (1455–1526) was an Italian humanist scholar. In 1487 he went to Spain, where he became associated with the royal court and received clerical preferment. For most of the remainder of his life he occupied various positions connected with the court, such as tutor to the royal children and nobles, diplomatic envoy, historiographer, etc. In these positions he personally met the early Spanish-employed explorers, from Columbus on, and obtained access to most of the documents concerned with the New World. He wrote a succession of Latin letters on the exploration and development of the New World. A part of these writings were brought together in 1516 as De Rebus Oceanis et Orbe Novo Decades Tres. These three, with a fourth decade published in 1521 and four others published posthumously, have come to be known as the Decades (groups of ten letters; the term has no chronological significance), and together constitute the first formal history of the Americas. While this is mainly a chronicling of Spanish America during the first 30 years of discovery, it is of importance for American civilization as a whole, in that it shows the first generally circulated view of the New World, and traces the advances that led to the occupation of both continents.

3154. Augur, Helen. Passage to glory; John Ledyard's America. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1946. 310 p. 46–375 G226.L5A8

Bibliography: p. 295–300.

John Ledyard (1751–1789) was born and raised in colonial Connecticut, and went on to become one of the last of the great world explorers. His career opened as a corporal of marines under Capt. James Cook, whom he accompanied on the last of his famous voyages of Pacific exploration. There he developed the conception of the colonies extending as a nation to the Pacific Ocean, and prospering with the opening of the fur trade in the Pacific Northwest. While this was brought about by men of the next generation, Ledyard worked toward it, and communicated his idea to Thomas Jefferson. Ledyard's own life ended in Egypt, as he was preparing to explore Central Africa, with the intention of thereafter exploring America from Kentucky westwards. Miss Augur's life of Ledyard is based on much research, but is primarily an interpretive study meant to show the importance of his vision of a continental America; it presents him as symbolically and physically completing mankind's circuit westward, from the Old World to the Old World, with the creation and unification of the New World between.

677676 O–63–22

3155. Bakeless, John E. The eyes of discovery; the pageant of North America as seen by the first explorers. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1950. 439 p. illus. 50–10588 E162.B3

As the author states in the preface: "The Eyes of Discovery is an effort to describe North America as the first white men in the area saw it: landscapes, forests, plains, animals, plants, streams, and Indians, as they existed before the inevitable change that began almost from the instant of the first white settlement. It is neither a story of adventure nor a book about Indians nor a history of exploration and colonization. Where the life of an explorer is touched upon at all, it is merely to explain who the man was and how he came to make his discoveries when he did. Because of this approach, many a great name of the ever-moving frontier does not appear at all." Furthermore, since many of the early explorers did not leave adequate descriptions of what they saw, the author has employed later writings where "it is possible to find good descriptions of primitive conditions in the books of visitors to America long after settlement had begun, for such things as waterfalls, prairie fires, buffalo, moose, lakes, rivers, and Indian ways changed very slowly." The book is not an anthology of early writings on American flora, fauna, and geography, but is rather a description of such matters with numerous pertinent quotations included in the author's text.

3156. Bishop, Morris. Champlain, the life of fortitude. New York, Knopf, 1948. 364 p. 48–8873 F1030.1.B6

A professor of Romance languages at Cornell University has written the latest and most distinguished biography of Samuel, Sieur de Champlain (ca. 1567–1635), the Father of New France. Champlain was a veteran officer of Henry IV's army in 1599, when he seized a chance opportunity to visit the Spanish Empire, where he saw such callous exploitation of the Indians that he formed a very different ideal of colonization: honest trade and honest coöperation with the natives. The book is organized around Champlain's 12 voyages to the New World, and communicates to the reader the author's own admiration for this idealist, who devoted his "toughness, tenacity, foresight, courage" to "the foundation in America of a great kingdom, to be ruled with justice and mercy, by France, but for God." Champlain himself published four books on Canada, beginning with the Des sauvages of 1604; The Works of Samuel de Champlain, under the general editorship of Henry P. Biggar (Toronto, Champlain Society, 1922–36. 6 v.), gives both the French text and an English translation, while there is a convenient one-volume translation of the 1613 and 1619 volumes, edited by William L. Grant, in the Original narratives of early American history series (no. 3207).

3157. Bolton, Herbert E., and Thomas M. Marshall. The colonization of North America, 1492–1783. New York, Macmillan, 1936. xvi, 609 p. maps. 38–34415 E188.B69 1936

A concise, nearly an outline account of European discovery, exploration, and colonization in North America, which covers not only what has since become the United States, but also the West Indies, Mexico and Central America, and Canada. The first main section, on "The Founding of the Colonies," traces the story from the discovery by Columbus to the latter part of the 17th century. The second part, "Expansion and International Conflict," carries the story to 1783, when Spain was active in the California area, Russia was penetrating the northwestern part of the continent, and the continental English colonies had achieved considerable maturity and established their independence. The final section of the book is a short group of six chapters on the Revolutionary War and the postwar governmental situation. Since this book, first published in 1920, was designed as a textbook, additional readings for students are included at the end of each chapter. However, these are now somewhat dated, as, unfortunately, is some of the textual material itself. However, no other survey of comparable scope has appeared to replace it.

3158. Bolton, Herbert E. The Spanish borderlands; a chronicle of old Florida and the Southwest. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1921. xiv, 329 p. plates, fold. map. (The Chronicles of America series, Allen Johnson, editor, v. 23) 21–14807 E173.C55, v. 23 E123.B7

"Bibliographical note": p. 297–303.

In a number of states north of the Rio Grande, and stretching from California to Florida, there exists an evident influence of Spanish culture, deriving from the times when these areas were occupied by the Spaniards as outposts for their New World empire. The Spanish exploration, settlement, government, and general colonial practices in this area are sympathetically described in this volume. The work opens with a series of chapters on the early explorers: Ponce de Léon, Cabeza de Vaca, Hernando de Soto, Coronado, and others. The author then discusses individually the areas of Florida, New Mexico, Texas, Louisiana, and California, and concludes with a chapter on the Jesuits on the Pacific coast. One of Professor Bolton's many detailed contributions to the history of these areas, Rim of Christendom; a Biography of Eusebio Francisco Kino, Pacific Coast Pioneer (New York, Macmillan, 1936. 644 p.), is a full-scale reconstruction, from long research in scattered primary sources, of the life of an indefatigable Italian-born Jesuit missionary to Lower California and Pimería Alta (the present Mexican Province of Sonora), who was "explorer, astronomer, cartographer, mission builder, ranchman, cattle king, and defender of the frontier."

3159. Brebner, John B. The explorers of North America, 1492–1806. New York, Macmillan, 1933. xv, 502 p. 4 fold. maps. (The Pioneer histories) 33–31647 E101.B83

"Narratives" at end of each chapter.

A volume which seeks "to draw together as a related whole the explorations which first revealed the general character of the North American continent," and which are usually treated regionally or nationally. All quotations are from the explorers themselves, or from other contemporary narratives. The author closes with the return of Lewis and Clark from the Pacific Ocean, but is careful to explain that only the major features and routes of the continent were established in 1806, and that large areas, isolated or desolate, remained for the 19th century to reveal. A recent paperback reprint of this work (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1955. 431 p. Doubleday anchor books, A44) is not an equivalent of the original edition, since it lacks the indispensable folding maps.

3160. Crouse, Nellis M. In quest of the western ocean. New York, Morrow, 1928. 480 p. maps. 28–6172 E121.C95

Bibliography: p. 453–456.

When Columbus discovered America, he was looking for Asia. As it dawned upon Europeans that Asia had not been reached, an intense effort was made to find some water passage through or around the intervening land, for the fabled treasures of Asia still remained the prime goal, except for the Spanish, who had found gold and silver. Dr. Crouse's book is the story of the many attempts to locate the passage. After the joint outline of South and North America became known for the eastern shore of the continents, the attempts concentrated on a search for a Northwest passage; a belief in this was long encouraged by rumors and misconceptions. The author's story begins with the events impelling the Europeans to seek a passage westward to Asia, and closes in the latter part of the 18th century, when the project was finally abandoned as being relatively useless, should a passage exist, and when most possibilities for a passage had been eliminated. Meanwhile three centuries of explorations seeking a way to Asia had opened up America.

3161. De Voto, Bernard A. The course of empire; with maps by Erwin Raisz. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. xvii, 647 p. 52–5261 E179.5.D4

This book is a study of the factors involved in the discovery and exploration of North America, in so far as they affected the westward movement which resulted in the establishment of a continental American empire and nation. The story is traced through the crossing of the continent by the Lewis and Clark expedition in 1804–6. The author's purpose is to achieve a meaningful whole, viewing all "themes" in combination, rather than a study of the individual parts. The author in his preface presents the principal themes as "the geography of North America in so far as it was important in the actions dealt with; the ideas which the men involved in these actions had about this geography, their misconceptions and errors, and the growth of knowledge; the exploration of the United States and Canada, so much of it as was relevant to the discovery of a route to the Pacific Ocean; the contention of four empires for the area that is now the United States; the relationship to all these things of various Indian tribes that affected them." This is usually regarded as an outstanding work essential to an understanding of the West. While it may be De Voto's major book, his writing as a whole is discussed more fully under Literary History and Criticism (q. v.).

3162. Folmer, Henry. Franco-Spanish rivalry in North America, 1524–1763. Glendale, Calif., A. H. Clark Co., 1953. 346 p. fold. map. (Spain in the West, 7) 54–2218 E131.F6

Bibliography: p. [311]–333.

This is a consecutive narrative of the rivalry between France and Spain for an area now largely included in the gulf coast of the United States, from Florida to Texas. This rivalry persisted through most of the colonial period and was terminated only by the liquidation of the French mainland empire by the Peace of Paris (1763). While Spain claimed all of North America in consequence of the earliest discoveries, France did not recognize Spanish ownership of any area not actually settled by Spaniards. The resultant controversy in its various manifestations, including several outbreaks of overt warfare, is here chronologically traced to the point where France turned the Louisiana Territory over to Spain, and Spain left Britain in possession of Florida in compensation for Britain's restoration of Cuba to Spain. France thus being removed from the scene, her long rivalry with Spain in the gulf area was inherited by Britain, and eventually by the United States.

3163. Jane, Lionel Cecil, ed. Select documents illustrating the four voyages of Columbus, including those contained in R. H. Major's Select letters of Christopher Columbus; translated and edited with additional material, an introd. and notes, by Cecil Jane. London, Printed for the Hakluyt Society, 1930–33. 2 v. (Works issued by the Hakluyt Society. Second series, no. 65, 70)
30–33946 G161.H2, no. 65, 70

3164. Morison, Samuel Eliot. Admiral of the ocean sea; a life of Christopher Columbus. Maps by Erwin Raisz. Drawings by Bertram Greene. Boston, Little, Brown, 1942. 2 v. illus., maps. 42–5606 E111.M86 1942

Columbus (1451–1506) was born and raised in Genoa, Italy, where the original form of his name was Cristoforo Colombo. As a young man he became interested in the possibility of sailing west to discover an easy route to the East. He tried for years to interest people in a voyage of discovery, and finally did obtain some backing from Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain (in which country his name assumed the form of Cristóbal Colón). He sailed on August 3, 1492, and landed on an island in the Bahamas on October 12, 1492; this date is now cited as that of the discovery of America. Columbus explored the area and discovered Haiti and Cuba before returning to Europe. Back at court he received, among other titles, that of Admiral of the Ocean Sea. While he had not found the Cathay and Cipango reported by Marco Polo, he was convinced that he had reached Asia, and that these lands were somewhere in the area. Additional voyages of discovery were made by him in 1493, 1498, and 1502. While his discoveries led to the opening up of the New World, he himself did not know it, or refused to admit it. He died in the apparent belief that Cuba was part of Asia, and that the Malay Archipelago was just a little farther west than he had sailed. While most early biographies of Columbus concentrated on his life on land, Admiral Morison's study concentrates on Columbus' voyages, since these comprise the most important part of his life's work. There is much on the problems and methods of navigation. The book, which was awarded a Pulitzer prize for biography, was also published the same year in a one-volume edition which retained most of the text, but eliminated most of the scholarly apparatus. The Select Documents, edited by Cecil Jane, are largely writings by Columbus about his voyages; they have the merit of immediacy, but the disadvantage of the author's ignorance of much that was involved. The works are presented in English translation with the Spanish text on the facing page. Both volumes contain an extensive introduction covering the period treated, and the first volume contains a list of works cited (p. cli–clv).

3165. Kirkpatrick, Frederick A. The Spanish conquistadores. 2d ed. London, A. & C. Black, 1946. 366 p. maps. (The Pioneer histories)
47–26292 F1411.K57 1946

This book, which first appeared in 1934, relates the story of Spanish conquests in the Americas. As such it traces in a roughly chronological manner the opening of new lands, centering the account about particular places and individuals. The book opens with several chapters on Columbus and the Caribbean islands, and carries the story to the second foundation of Buenos Aires in 1580, at which point "the vast semicircle of Spanish dominion in South America was complete." The author's intention was to present a single coherent narrative of the many conquests, which had hitherto usually been treated as so many individual matters.

3166. McCann, Franklin T. English discovery of America to 1585. New York, King's Crown Press, 1952, ©1951. xiv, 246 p.
52–10564 E127.M15

Bibliography: p. [227]–232.

This Columbia University dissertation is not a study of English explorations in the New World, as one might conclude from the title; it is rather a study of how information was obtained and spread, so that the English came to know, or discover, America as a new continental land mass rather than a fragment of the Indies. Since this involved a revolution in traditional thinking about the world, the author starts by outlining the information and misinformation which was available in England up to the time of Columbus. He discusses the medieval beliefs about the world and nature, such as "the belief that gold, its growth controlled by the rays of the sun, was restricted to the torrid zone," and their influence on English acts and attitudes. He then takes up the European discoveries and the gradual assimilation of the new information, leading to changed concepts of the world and of England's potential role in it. He considers English voyages to America as a source of information, as well as the reports of foreign ones, insofar as they enlightened the English. The work concludes by indicating some of the influence of the "discovery" of America on the creative imagination of English writers in this early period.

3167. Mirsky, Jeannette. The westward crossings; Balboa, Mackenzie, Lewis and Clark. New York, Knopf, 1946. xv, 365, xiii p. illus.
46–7299 E27.M5

This book attempts to exhibit the continuity behind the three great continental explorations of Balboa, Alexander Mackenzie, and Lewis and Clark. In 1513, after crossing the continent at its narrowest section, Balboa discovered the Pacific; he sought gold for the King of Spain, and obtained gold and pearls. His discovery renewed the hope that a water passage to the Pacific and to the East might be found. In the 1770's Mackenzie was still seeking such a passage in the Canadian Northwest; he found a fortune in furs. While Lewis and Clark still hoped for a through waterway, their primary object was to open up the way for the new nation's expansion to the Pacific that Jefferson envisioned and that the Louisiana Purchase made possible; the fortune they found for their government was the commerce of the West. Their difficulties all but put an end to the old dream of a natural and easy cross-continental water route. The bibliography (p. 361–365) is a guide to further reading, listing important primary sources and the main secondary studies for each of the three expeditions.

3168. Newton, Arthur P. The European nations in the West Indies, 1493–1688. London, A. & C. Black, 1933. xviii, 356 p. maps. (The Pioneer histories) 33–18908 F1621.N46

Noting that the history of the West Indies has usually been told either in terms of individual islands, or in groups of islands possessed by a single European power, Professor Newton of the University of London here undertakes "to consider the history of the West Indies as a whole with attention to the history of individual islands only where it played a part in the general drama." He notes that, notwithstanding the tendency to consider the West Indies in terms of their parts, "to whatever Power the islands have belonged, they have been affected by the same broad movements, whether political, social or economic. Their growth in importance, their decline and their subsequent recovery have followed parallel lines and been affected by the same causes." These parallels he traces from the discovery of the islands by Columbus to the year 1688, which was turning point in the history of the area. Up to that time much activity was on an individual or small group basis, with buccaneering playing a large role. After 1688 the rulers of Europe by treaty recognized the expediency of maintaining a civilized policy in the area. Thenceforward action in the West Indies was largely a matter of large, national naval movements.

3169. Newton, Arthur P., ed. The great age of discovery. London, University of London Press, 1932. 230 p. 32–33560 E101.N48

CONTENTS.—Introduction—the transition from the medieval to the modern age, by A. P. Newton.—Spanish civilisation in the great age of discovery, by A. Pastor.—Vasco da Gama and the way to the Indies, by E. Prestage.—Christopher Columbus and his first voyage, by A. P. Newton.—Asia or mundus novus? By A. P. Newton.—The first explorers of the North American coast, by H. P. Biggar.—The search for a western passage, by H. J. Wood.—The first circumnavigation, by J. A. Williamson.—The northern passages, by E. G. R. Taylor.

A volume originating in public lectures delivered at King's College in 1931, with the modest aim of "tracing out some undisputed facts concerning a few of the greatest of the explorers, and by setting them against the background of their times to recover something of the spirit in which all unconsciously they broke the prison bonds of the medieval world in which they had been reared and led the mass of mankind into a new era." Works which treat as a whole the great European movement of discovery and expansion are few; one, which deserves to be but has not been translated, is Georg Friederici's Der Charakter der Entdeckung und Eroberung Amerikas durch die Europäer (Stuttgart-Gotha, F. A. Perthes, 1925–36. 3 v.).

3170. Nute, Grace L. The voyageur. Illus. by Carl W. Bertsch. Reprint ed. St. Paul, Minnesota Historical Society, 1955. 288 p.
55–12180 F1027.N96 1955

The voyageurs were the short, muscular, and tireless French boatmen from the villages of the lower St. Lawrence who operated the canoes and bateaux of the Montreal fur traders, and were the first white men to acquire a detailed knowledge of the western Great Lakes, the Upper Mississippi, and the region beyond as far as the Rockies. This book, which was first published in 1931, concentrates upon the period 1763–1840, when the French Government had been eliminated, and they were in the employ of the Hudson Bay Company, the Northwest Company, and, after 1808, of J. J. Astor's American Fur Company. Even "the great explorers, like Alexander Henry, Jonathan Carver, and Alexander Mackenzie, relied on their canoemen for knowledge of navigable streams, portages, wintering grounds, and other topographical features." The author has treated two of the French pioneers in the western Great Lakes area in a detailed and less popular manner: Caesars of the Wilderness: Médard Chouart, Sieur des Groseilliers, and Pierre Esprit Radisson, 1618–1710 (New York, Appleton-Century, 1943. xvi, 386 p.). A trans-Mississippi pioneer of the 18th century is the subject of Nellis M. Crouse's La Verendrye, Fur Trader and Explorer (Ithaca, N. Y., Cornell University Press, 1956. 247 p.).

3171. Parkman, Francis. Works. New library ed. [Boston] Little, Brown, 1902–3. 12 v. illus. 4–19149 F1030.P24 1902

Parkman (1823–1893), one of the leading American literary historians, and regarded by some as the greatest historian of the 19th century, is also discussed in Section A on Historiography (no. 3069). Shortly after graduating from Harvard College in 1846 he journeyed over the Western plains along the Oregon trail, and for a time lived among the Sioux Indians. The stimulation which his imagination received from them and from the wilderness determined both the choice of subject for his historical work, and the manner in which it was executed. The hardships of the journey, however, had further impaired his already shaky health, and the execution of so large a scheme despite recurrent breakdowns and failures of vision was a moral triumph of the first order. His chosen theme was the struggle of France and England for the control of North America against a savage background, but he had first to describe the establishment of New France (Canada), a subject little known to readers of English. The successive volumes, appearing over a period of 27 years, have collectively been known by the name of France and England in North America. In the edition cited above this is used as a subtitle for the first 9 volumes, although it has been applied to the first 11 volumes, which may in a sense be regarded as a single work. The first volume is Pioneers of France in the New World (originally published in 1865), a work which opens with the story of French and Spanish conflict in Florida, and continues with Champlain's activities in the Great Lakes region. The second volume, The Jesuits in North America in the Seventeenth Century (1867), tells the story of the Catholic missionaries of New France, and of their heroic martyrdoms and extraordinary influence on savage and settler alike. Volume three, La Salle and the Discovery of the Great West (1869), deals with the earliest attempts to settle in the Mississippi Valley. Volume four, The Old Regime in Canada (1874), is the story of the paternalistic and religiously absolute society which Louis XIV sought to impose upon the colonists. Volume five, Count Frontenac and New France under Louis XIV (1877), presents this governor as heroically attempting to maintain a deteriorating and impractical colonial situation. The next two volumes, entitled A Half Century of Conflict (1892), cover the first half of the 18th century and include two major wars. The history of the Seven Years' War in America and the British conquest of Canada is covered in the eighth and ninth volumes, entitled Montcalm and Wolfe (1884). The 10th and 11th volumes are devoted to The Conspiracy of Pontiac and the Indian War after the Conquest of Canada; this work, first published in 1851, was Parkman's initial historical work, although it follows the other works chronologically in terms of subject matter. The 12th volume in this edition is The Oregon Trail (no. 3348). For those who are daunted by multi-volumed history, there are recent condensations of Parkman's work within a single pair of covers: notably, The Battle for North America, edited by John Tebbel (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 746 p.) and The Parkman Reader, edited by Samuel Eliot Morison (Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. 533 p.). Mr. Tebbel has nothing to match Morison's introduction, bibliography, and references to more recent literature, but he does have considerably more extensive extracts from the later volumes covering the Anglo-French wars of 1690–1763.

3172. Pohl, Frederick J. Amerigo Vespucci, pilot major. New York, Columbia University Press, 1944. 249 p. illus. A44–5612 E125.V5P6

Bibliography: p. [235]–240.

The Florentine, Amerigo Vespucci (1451–1512), for whom the Americas were named, has for centuries been the subject of much scholarly debate. Much of this has arisen from the conflicting evidence presented in his own writings, but conflicts also arise from the other scanty evidence. Pohl has resolved much of this by regarding as forgeries most of the material published under the name of Vespucci. With these presuppositions Vespucci appears as a distinguished explorer and brilliant cosmographer, whose name may properly be applied to the hemisphere, since he was the first to recognize that it was a New World and not Asia that had been reached. The same scholarly reasoning, however, leaves to John Cabot the credit of being the first European of the Age of Discovery to arrive at the continental land mass itself. Germán Arciniegas in Amerigo and the New World (New York, Knopf, 1955. 322 p.) accepts the writings allegedly by Vespucci as being genuine; since his book is meant to be a popular biography, the conflicts in evidence are not fully resolved, and Vespucci emerges as an even greater figure than Mr. Pohl presents him as being.

3173. Williamson, James A. The age of Drake. 3d ed. London, A. & C. Black, 1952. 399 p. maps. (The Pioneer histories)
53-34531 DA355.W484 1952
First published in 1938.

The use of the name of Sir Francis Drake (1540?–1596) in this book's title distinguishes it as a history of English maritime affairs in the age of Elizabeth. Drake himself plays a limited part in the book, for while he was one of the leading navigators, explorers, and "pirateers" of the period, his career typified, rather than constituted, his times. In this volume Dr. Williamson studies the factors, political, economic, demographic, religious, etc., which led to England's becoming a major sea power and in time a worldwide maritime empire. Only a small part of the book specifically deals with what is now the United States of America, but its whole theme is that movement which brought about the British occupation of the area.

3174. Williamson, James A. The voyages of the Cabots and the English discovery of North America under Henry VII and Henry VIII. Illustrated with thirteen maps. London, Argonaut Press, 1929. 290 p. 30-8622 E127.W72

In the 1480's John Cabot (who may have been born Giovanni Caboto in Genoa, before moving to Venice) tried to induce the King of England to subsidize a voyage of exploration westward to Asia. However, Henry VII did not supply the requested backing until after Columbus had made his voyage for Spain. In 1497 and 1498 John Cabot, with his son Sebastian, made voyages to North America along a northerly route. The voyage of Cabot was the basis of the English claims to America, although Amerigo Vespucci (no. 3172) claimed he had reached the continental land mass far to the south eight days earlier. Sebastian Cabot's geographical and exploratory activity was largely in the service of Spain; a detailed study of his career is José Toribio Medina's El veneciano Sebastián Caboto (Santiago de Chile, Impr. y Encuadernación Universitaria, 1908. 2 v.). Dr. Williamson's book concentrates on John Cabot's career and the work of Sebastian for England. The first part contains the documents on which the historian's knowledge of John Cabot and his expeditions is based. The second part analyzes that evidence, trying to resolve conflicting data and establish the sequence of events. The work is thus designed not only as a historical study of a phase in the opening of the New World, but also as an example in historical method. Williamson had previously dealt with the Cabots in less detail in Maritime Enterprise, 1485–1558 (Oxford, Clarendon Press, 1913. 416 p.), which tells the story of English maritime work in discovery and commerce under the first four Tudors; while basically English history, it does contain much background information on the opening of America.

3175. Wrong, George M. The rise and fall of New France. New York, Macmillan, 1928. 2 v. (925 p.) maps. 28-28986 F1030.W95

Professor Wrong's work covers nearly the same ground as the successive volumes of Francis Parkman (no. 3171). However, Wrong has achieved a more compact form, and has had the advantage of recent scholarship, and so has added to or modified some aspects of Parkman's very thorough work. Professor Wrong's work is based on library research and thus lacks the sense of immediacy his predecessor was able to convey from personal experience, and it makes no attempt to compete as literature. At the same time, it does pay more attention to the European background and is written by a Canadian with somewhat different preconceptions from his Boston predecessor. The organization also differs, since Professor Wrong follows a more strictly chronological pattern.

D. The Thirteen Colonies

3176. Andrews, Charles M. The colonial background of the American Revolution; four essays in American colonial history. Rev. ed. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1931. 220 p.
31-24004 E210.A55 1931

CONTENTS.—The British colonies in America.—The mother country and its colonial policy.—Conditions leading to the revolt of the Colonies—General reflections.

3177. Andrews, Charles M. The colonial period of American history. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1934–38. 4 v.
34-18339 E188.A572

Charles McLean Andrews (1863–1943) of Yale University became one of the foremost scholars of the American colonial period. His books on the subject include Colonial Self-Government, 1652–1689 (New York, Harper, 1904. 369 p.), which appeared as the fifth volume of The American nation: a history, edited by Albert Bushnell Hart; Colonial Folkways: a Chronicle of American Life in the Reign of the Georges (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1921. 255 p.), which is volume nine of The Chronicles of America series; and Our Earliest Colonial Settlements, Their Diversities of Origin and Later Characteristics (New York, New York University Press, 1933. 179 p.), which deals with Roanoke, Virginia, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and Maryland. The Colonial Period of American History is Andrews' major work, and the summation of his lifetime's scholarship; it is also one of the outstanding studies of the Thirteen Colonies in the 17th century. In it he attempts regularly to present the Colonies from the English point of view, and thus to offset the tendency of earlier American historians to consider them in isolation. He furthermore takes into account all of England's Atlantic colonies, and not merely the mainland group that subsequently formed the United States. The first three volumes deal with the settling and development of the several groups of colonies, in a roughly chronological progression; the fourth volume is a partially independent study of "England's Commercial and Colonial Policy," with the emphasis upon the formative period in the 17th century, but with frequent looks ahead at developments down to the Revolution. The Colonial Background of the American Revolution, by many regarded as the most satisfactory explanation of that crucial event, tries less to present a balanced and complete picture of colonial America than to trace the developing forces and circumstances that led to the separation. The basic reason is found in the fact that English statesmen failed to realize that "the colonies in America were far more advanced, politically, socially, and morally, than the mother country and could no longer be held in leading strings."

3178. Boas, Ralph P., and Louise S. Boas. Cotton Mather, keeper of the Puritan conscience. New York, Harper, 1928. 271 p.
28–27598 F67.M422

Cotton Mather (1663–1728) in the Puritan community of Boston led a life of service as one of the colony's foremost theologians, and hence one of its foremost philosophers and politicians, in a society where church and state had been largely one. His life therefore presents a good view of Puritan society in a transitional stage when secular interests were asserting their autonomy. He was also one of the leading writers of the time, and his work is discussed under Literature (nos. 40–50), and Medicine and Public Health (no. 4826). His best-known work is the Magnalia Christi Americana (nos. 43–44), which is a history of God's wondrous workings in His new land. This history remains a prime source for any who would understand the period, through sectarian views and a highly artificial style must be allowed for.

3179. The Cambridge history of the British Empire; general editors, J. Holland Rose, A. P. Newton, E. A. Benians. v. 1. The Old Empire from the beginnings to 1783. New York, Macmillan; Cambridge, Eng., University Press, 1929. xxi, 931 p. 29–14661 DA30.C3, v. 1

This large and scholarly volume, to which many English historians and one American contributed, presents a balanced picture of the early development of the British Empire, and consequently sets the story of America in a larger framework. The history is carried through the Revolutionary War and the establishment of the United States of America. Considerable attention is paid to the outlook of the British home islands upon the Colonies, and the purposes, causes, and effects of various attitudes and laws are examined in some detail. There are chapters on the imperial bearings of international rivalries, sea power, international law, mercantilism, and constitutional theory. A. P. Newton's chapter on "The Great Migration, 1618–1640," Lilian M. Penson's on "The West Indies and the Spanish-American Trade, 1713–1748," and Eveline C. Martin's on "The English Slave Trade and the African Settlements" cover topics hard to find treated in compendious form elsewhere. An extremely thorough, now somewhat dated, bibliography is presented on p. 823–888.

3180. Crane, Verner W. The Southern frontier, 1670–1732. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1928. 391 p. (Duke University publications) 29–7214 F272.C89

Bibliography: p. 335–356.

South Carolina, founded in 1670, remained a more or less isolated outpost of the British Empire for the next 60 years. As such, it enjoyed a practical monopoly of English trade with the Southern Indians, and developed an increasingly conscious opposition to the outpost of Spanish empire in Florida, and especially to the one which France established on the lower Mississippi at the close of the 17th century. The frontier which resulted, and is so named in many 18th-century documents, "was no line, but rather a zone, indeed a series of zones, merging into the wilderness. On its hither side it was an area of frontier settlements, at its outer edge a sphere of influence over Indian tribes, in contact and conflict with similar Spanish and French spheres." The Charles Town traders developed two main arteries into the Indian country, the Upper and the Lower Paths, bringing about the largest area of commercial and political hegemony and, as Governor Nairne put it in 1705, "the greatest quantity of Indians subject to this Government of any in all America, and almost as many as all other English Governments put together." This interest developed "an Anglo-American sentiment of expansion" which spread from a few colonists and officials to the whole province, and only in the last decade of Professor Crane's period was communicated to the imperial administrators at Whitehall.

3181. Dow, George Francis. Every day life in the Massachusetts Bay Colony. Boston, Society for the Preservation of New England Antiquities, 1935. 293 p. 36–1841 F67.D68

The subjects covered in this volume range from details of the journey to America, through the nature of the buildings, home furnishings, clothing, medicaments, manufactures, and shipping to matters such as games, coinage, tombstone designs, and penology. The volume does not limit itself strictly to the Bay Colony, and is in part representative of all the Northern English colonies. The text is made up largely of contemporary facts and quotations, including personal narratives and statistical accounts. However, these and the numerous illustrations are presented with a minimum of interpretation by the author, who recognizes that much of the detail of the period has been lost, and who embarks on little of a speculative nature.

3182. Ellis, George E. The Puritan age and rule in the Colony of the Massachusetts Bay, 1629–1685. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1888. 576 p. 1–12030 F67.E47

The author states in his preface that his aim in this remarkably extensive work is to set forth "the motives of estrangement and grievance which prompted the exile of the Puritans to this Bay, and the grounds on which they proceeded to exercise their severe and arbitrary rule here. The points to be chiefly emphasized in this historic exposition are these: the relations of the Puritans, as Nonconformists, to the Church of England at the period of its reformation and reconstruction in the transition from the Papacy to Protestantism; the peculiar estimate of and way of using the Bible, characteristic of the Puritans under the critical circumstances of the time which had substituted the Book for the authority of the Papal and the Prelatical Church; their finding in that book the pattern and basis for a wholly novel form of government in civil and religious affairs, with an equally novel condition of citizenship; their attempt at legislation and administration on theocratic principles; and the discomfiture of their scheme as involving injustice, oppression, and intolerance." The story is carried to the loss of the colony charter, when Puritan rule ceased to be absolute and a royal governor was appointed. While the author displays a sympathetic understanding of many of the problems of the Puritans, he regularly maintains a scholarly objectivity towards his subject. The book is based on an extensive knowledge of the primary and secondary printed and manuscript materials available at that time. Subsequent scholarship has modified some points, and raised some new issues, but Ellis' study remains basically sound, as well as the most inclusive study, and nearly the only one which puts its main emphasis on the matters which the Puritans themselves regarded as primary.

3183. Franklin, Benjamin. Writings. Collected and edited, with a life and introd., by Albert Henry Smyth. New York, Macmillan, 1907. 10 v. illus. 33–12844 E302.F82 1907

Volume 1 contains bibliographical introduction (p. 1–217) and the "Autobiography" (p. [219]–439); writings and correspondence arranged chronologically, volumes 2–10 (p. 137); the "Life" by the editor, volume 10 (p. 139–510), and list of correspondents and full indexes (p. 511–633).

3184. Franklin, Benjamin. Letters to the press, 1758–1775, collected and edited by Verner W. Crane. Chapel Hill, Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Va., by the University of North Carolina Press, 1950. lxv, 308 p. 50–8151 E302.6.F75A12

3185. Van Doren, Carl. Benjamin Franklin. New York, Viking Press, 1938. 845 p. ports. 38–31193 E302.6.F8V32

"General bibliography": p. [785]–788.

3186. Crane, Verner W. Benjamin Franklin and a rising people. Boston, Little, Brown, 1954. 219 p. (The Library of American biography) 54–5136 E302.6.F8C77 1954

3187. Stourzh, Gerald. Benjamin Franklin and American foreign policy. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1954. 335 p. 54–9355 E249.S88

Benjamin Franklin (1706–1790) had so versatile a genius it is impossible to offer an adequate, and at the same time short, summary of his career. Some aspects of it are treated in other sections of the bibliography, such as Literature, Science and Technology, Philosophy, and Education (consult the Index). He is included here as a leading statesman and diplomat of his period, although the other aspects of his life have equal importance in a broader conception of history. Franklin's career of public service began with minor offices in Pennsylvania. His first major office, held from 1753 to 1774, was Deputy Postmaster General. In 1754 he represented Pennsylvania at the Albany Congress, where he presented a plan for the union of the Colonies. From 1757 to 1775 he spent most of his time abroad, as the agent for Pennsylvania at London, appointed to represent that colony's cause to the British Government; in time he was also appointed by Georgia, Massachusetts, and New Jersey as their agent. When conciliation failed he returned to America, where he served in the Continental Congress, and was chosen Postmaster General. During the war he represented the United States in France and obtained French support for the American cause. He was a member of the commission signatory to the Treaty of Paris (1783). In 1785 he returned to America, where for 3 years he served as president of Pennsylvania. He then represented that State at the Constitutional Convention, where he was prominent as an elder statesman. Shortly afterwards he died, the first American to have achieved international acclaim and renown, and by some regarded as the greatest figure of his era.

Franklin's collected Writings reveal not only his political role in history, but also the many other aspects of his personality. Almost everything he wrote is infused with the wit and style which has established him as one of the leading literary figures of the period. His extensive scientific and philosophical writings (separated here, although he wrote when science was still largely a part of philosophy) reveal his extensive contributions in these fields. His semiofficial and even some of his satirical works reveal his extensive governmental concerns and accomplishments. Finally, while his famous Autobiography (see nos. 123–127) covers his earlier years, his extensive correspondence reflects his many interests and roles, as well as his close connection with leading figures of the age. Regrettably, Smyth's edition of Franklin's writings is incomplete, largely because of the many Franklin items which have since been uncovered. However, a new edition of Franklin's writings is in preparation, and the first volume is scheduled for publication by the Yale University Press in the spring of 1959.

Outstanding among the volumes needed to supplement Smyth's edition is Professor Crane's Benjamin Franklin's Letters to the Press, 1758–1775, which covers the material written by Franklin for publication while he was a colonial agent in England. Since much of this was originally published anonymously or pseudonymously, and since many of Franklin's manuscripts for the period have been lost, extensive research was needed to uncover them. Crane's work reprints only such press letters as are not included in Smyth's edition; however, all pertinent material is traced, and reference made to Smyth when the letter is to be found there. Since Franklin's work in England has been relatively neglected, this volume is essential for an understanding of that phase of his career, and of the American position on political issues at that time. Of the many biographies of Franklin, Van Doren's 1938 publication surpasses earlier ones by its extensive use of intensive 20th-century Franklin scholarship; and surpasses subsequent biographies by its wide scope, as well as in being in itself an outstanding example of the art of biography. An interesting earlier biography is William Cabell Bruce's Benjamin Franklin, Self-Revealed, a book consisting largely of extracts from Franklin's writings in a topical arrangement, with informed connecting passages by Bruce. A recent short and yet scholarly biography is Crane's Benjamin Franklin and a Rising People, which attempts to show the life of this "first American" as best reflecting those forces which led to the establishment of a new nation. Stourzh's scholarly Benjamin Franklin and American Foreign Policy, like a number of other studies, focuses on but one side of this many-sided genius. Stourzh attempts not only to depict Franklin's direct role in foreign affairs in behalf of America, but also to analyze Franklin's political thought. A work that approaches his foreign influence from quite another point of view is Alfred Owen Aldridge's Franklin and His French Contemporaries (New York, New York University Press, 1957. 260 p.), which discusses not only Franklin's activities in France, but more especially the French reaction to this sage from the American wilderness; for this purpose a large part of the book is devoted to presenting and discussing references to Franklin in contemporary French writings.

3188. Gipson, Lawrence Henry. The British Empire before the American Revolution: provincial characteristics and sectional tendencies in the era preceding the American crisis. Caldwell, Idaho, Caxton Printers, 1936–56. 9 v. maps.

36–20870 DA500.G5

Volumes 4–9, issued without subtitle, have imprint: New York, A. A. Knopf.

CONTENTS.—1. Great Britain and Ireland.—2. The Southern plantations.—3. The Northern plantations.—4. Zones of international friction; North America, south of the Great Lakes region, 1748–1754.—5. Zones of international friction; the Great Lakes frontier, Canada, the West Indies, India, 1748–1754.—6. The great war for the Empire: The years of defeat, 1754–1757.—7. The great war for the Empire: The victorious years, 1758–1760.—8. The great war for the Empire: The culmination, 1760–1763.—9. The triumphant Empire: new responsibilities within the enlarged Empire, 1763–1766.

Dr. Gipson (b. 1880) was a graduate of the University of Idaho when a Rhodes scholarship took him to Oxford for 3 years; from 1924 to 1952 he was professor of history at Lehigh University (Bethlehem, Pa.). Soon after his establishment there he embarked upon his investigations on this subject, which have been continuously subsidized by that university and several foundations, and which have grown into the largest and most imposing American historical work written in our day by a single hand. The author's purpose has been to produce a large-scale study of the British Empire between the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle (1748) and the outbreak of the American Revolution, so as to provide a more adequate basis for the interpretation of the latter event than has hitherto been available. The first three volumes provide "a view of the old Empire in a state of tranquillity and equilibrium for the last time in its history." The next two concentrate upon "the problems involved in the expanding frontiers of the Empire," which were brought about by neither the central nor the colonial governments, but "primarily as the result of the restless activity of individuals or groups, with or without legal warrant." Volumes 6–8 narrate the conclusive struggle with France, as well as the European war into which it merged; this war is viewed as brought on by French aggression, taken up by the home government for the protection of vital colonial interests, and won by the energy and resources of Britain. The latest volume to appear offers "a detailed analysis of developments within the new acquisitions" of the Empire in the years immediately following the peace which brought them, and extends to the trans-Appalachian region, Nova Scotia, Canada, East and West Florida, four new West Indian islands, and Bengal. The work employs a thorough analysis of successive situations, proceeds at an unhurried pace, and is written in clear and straightforward prose.

3189. Graham, Gerald S. Empire of the North Atlantic; the maritime struggle for North America. Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1950. xvii, 338 p. maps. 50–14296 E45.G7

A narrative of the rise and supremacy of British sea power, with particular reference to its role in making Britain the principal colonial power in North America. Introductory chapters outline the long period of Spanish supremacy and the bases of French sea power, and sketch the rise of British sea power in the second half of the 17th century. The long duel between Britain and France, from the outbreak of the War of the League of Augsburg (1689) to the conquest of Canada (1760), is then narrated at some length, with a unity of treatment deriving from the author's emphasis upon the maritime factors involved. There follow outlines of the War of the American Revolution and of the War of 1812, as well as of the troubled period between them, useful as concise presentations from a British point of view. The author pursues the theme of British supremacy in the Atlantic into the age of iron and steam, when it was extended to all the oceans of the world, and then to its remarkably sudden disappearance as a consequence of the construction of the German High Seas Fleet in the first decade of the 20th century. The author, a Canadian who has become Rhodes Professor of Imperial History at the University of London, has also published two more detailed studies of portions of his story: British Policy and Canada, 1774–1791; a Study in 18th Century Trade Policy (London, New York, Longmans, Green, 1930. 161 p. Imperial studies, no. 4), and Sea Power and British North America, 1783–1820; a study in British Colonial Policy (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1941. 302 p. Harvard historical studies, v. 46).

3190. Greene, Evarts Boutell. The foundation of American nationality. Rev. ed. New York, American Book Co., 1935. xii, 614, xiii–xl p. illus. 35–19098 E178.G752

Published in 1922 as volume 1 of A Short History of the American People.

In this book Greene purposes to give the layman and the college student a view "of our early development as it appears in the light of . . . recent research and discussion." This is because, as he notes, the recent work of men such as Andrews, Osgood, and Turner has "made necessary the modification or abandonment of time-honored traditions." The study recognizes American colonial history as part of a much larger picture, but the emphasis is on the development of the Thirteen Colonies; the story is carried to the adoption of the Federal Constitution in 1789. The bibliographies at the end of each chapter are designed to assist the general reader to further material, and are not intended to indicate scholarly sources.

3191. Greene, Evarts Boutell. Provincial America, 1690–1740. New York, Harper, 1905. 356 p. 7 maps. (The American Nation; a history, v. 6)
5–19070 E178.A54

"Critical essay on authorities": p. 325–340.

The period covered by this book was one in which the English colonies were rapidly expanding, and for that reason first giving evidences of unity, as the gaps between them were lessened or eliminated. At the same time it was a period in which the British colonial system was evolving, and in the process uncovering conflicts between the home government and the colonies. This evolution of colonial administration, along with the impact of the wars with the French and their Indian allies, fills a large part of this book. The narrative, which limits itself to the Colonies later to become part of the United States, and devotes little attention to the European background events, also covers other aspects of colonial history, including the commerce and culture of the period.

3192. Greene, Evarts Boutell. The provincial governor in the English colonies of North America. New York, Longmans, Green, 1898. 292 p. (Harvard historical studies, v. 7)
98–1530 JK66.G8

Appendix C. "List of authorities cited": p. 271–278.

Before 1688 British colonial administration was confused by a diversity of origins and franchises, by an unformed and shifting policy, and by a rudimentary development of organization. After 1763 the heightened tone of policy, and the contrary reaction which it provoked in the Colonies, produced a quite altered set of administrative circumstances. The long and relatively stable intervening period therefore provides the best opportunity of "presenting a simple view of the normal working of the provincial constitution," and Professor Greene further provides for the homogeneity of his subject matter by excluding from consideration Connecticut and Rhode Island, where the survival of older charters preserved an elective governorship. Within these limits, this is a clear and well-rounded study of the more formal aspects of the office which was considerably the most important in royal and proprietary provinces alike: the governor commissioned and instructed by the British Crown. After two introductory chapters which trace the complex antecedents of the stabilized system after the Glorious Revolution, the book proceeds analytically, considering in turn the governor's appointment, tenure, and emoluments, his council, his executive powers, and his relations with the provincial judiciary. Last and most important are his relations with his chief rival, the popularly elected assembly, to which complex situation three chapters are devoted. In the latter half of the period, it is concluded, the assemblies everywhere encroached upon his executive functions, and "in some of the provinces the governor's power had been reduced within very narrow limits." A final chapter deals with the governor's legal and political accountability both to the home government and to the people of his province.

3193. Harper, Lawrence A. The English navigation laws; a seventeenth-century experiment in social engineering. New York, Columbia University Press, 1939. xiv, 503 p.
40–244 HE587.G7H3

"Table of statutes cited": p. [449]–460.

Bibliography: p. [417]–447.

In this study of what Americans usually call the Acts of Trade, the author states that his chief purpose "is to analyze the process of social engineering, as exemplified by the Navigation Acts." His study concentrates on the second half of the 17th century. The first part of the book deals with the origin of the laws, the second with their enforcement in England, and the third with their enforcement in the Colonies. The fourth part is a study of the results of the acts; for this purpose the time covered has been pushed both forward and backward so as to extend from the days of the Spanish Armada to the Victorian period. Since the acts were English in origin, designed to build up the English merchant marine and further mercantilist ideas of national prosperity, the subject has been approached from an English point of view. The author has treated the specifically American consequences of these acts in an essay, "The Effect of the Navigation Acts on the Thirteen Colonies," contributed to The Era of the American Revolution: Studies Inscribed to Evarts Boutell Greene, edited by Richard B. Morris (New York, Columbia University Press, 1939), p. 3–39.

3194. Keys, Alice Mapelsden. Cadwallader Colden; a representative eighteenth century official. New York, Columbia University Press, 1906. xiv, 375 p. 6–40257 F122.C69

Colden (1688–1776) was of Scotch ancestry and came to America as a physician in 1710. In 1720 he embarked on his long career of public service when appointed surveyor-general of New York. The following year he was appointed to the governor's council, and he still held that position when in 1761 he became lieutenant governor, an office he held until his death, although its powers had largely disappeared with the outbreak of the Revolution. His long support of the royal authority, and his extensive activities in other fields, have enabled his biographer to write not merely his life, but also a political and social history of the province of New York in his time. His activities as a progressive scientist, especially in physics, botany, and medicine, as a philosopher, and as a historian of the Iroquois Indians, are reflected here, as they are on a larger scale in Colden's Letters and Papers, 1711–[1775] (New York, Printed for the New York Historical Society, 1918–37. 9 v.).

3195. Labaree, Leonard Woods. Royal government in America; a study of the British colonial system before 1783. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1930. 491 p. (Yale historical publications. Studies, 6) 30–25475 JK54.L3
"Bibliographical notes": p. [449]–468.

This book undertakes to depict the system of royal government as a whole in the American Colonies prior to the end of the Revolution. On the ground that before 1675 the details of the political system "were so varied and the attitude of the English officials toward them so unsettled that the early years contribute little to the later story," the author begins his study with the situation in the last quarter of the 17th century. In his preface he says that he has "tried to explain what the instruments were by which royal authority was exercised in America, what the machinery of royal government was and how it operated, what the governmental policies of the British officials were and what influences caused them to be adopted, and how the colonists reacted to these policies when the royal governors tried to apply them. Above all, I have concerned myself with that great contest between the assemblies and the crown over the royal prerogative, which is the central theme of the constitutional history of the colonies." Professor Labaree has collected the most important class of source materials for his study in his edition of Royal Instructions to British Colonial Governors, 1670–1776 (New York, Appleton-Century, 1935. 2 v.). He is also the author of Conservatism in Early American History (New York, New York University Press, 1948. 182 p.), a series of lectures in which he traces the bases and influence of conservatism in the later colonial period.

3196. Miller, Perry. Roger Williams: his contribution to the American tradition. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1953. 273 p. (Makers of the American tradition series)
53–8874 F82.W788

3197. Winslow, Ola Elizabeth. Master Roger Williams, a biography. New York, Macmillan, 1957. 328 p. 57–10016 F82.W692
Includes bibliography.

Williams (ca. 1603–1683), the vigorous opponent of the Massachusetts theocracy and the founder of Rhode Island, is discussed as a writer in Chapter I on Literature (nos. 84–89). Professor Miller's volume is in part a selection from the writings there listed, with useful editorial notes (p. 261–266), and in part a discriminating attempt to relate his thought both to the theological controversies of the 17th century and to the subsequent tradition of American liberalism, which has hailed him as a forerunner, at times with more enthusiasm than understanding. Miss Winslow's study of Williams is the most recent full-length scholarly biography of him; in it the author attempts to balance out the early "harsh" judgments and more modern tendencies to make of the man a glorious myth. She remarks that our relative ignorance of Williams combined with the complexities of his personality guarantee that future biographies will vary in the interpretation. Another recent biography of note is Samuel Hugh Brockunier's The Irrepressible Democrat, Roger Williams (New York, Ronald Press, 1940. 305 p.), in which Williams is viewed as a great man, although some earlier assumptions are called into question; Miller views this work as a "sad example of the misrepresentation that comes when Williams is presented too easily in the language of twentieth-century thought." A somewhat less critical and more favorable study, which has the same "twentieth-century thought" aspect as Brockunier, is James E. Ernst's Roger Williams, New England Firebrand (New York, Macmillan, 1932. 538 p.); while highly partial to his subject, the author does take some account of the traditional controversy.

3198. Morison, Samuel Eliot. Builders of the Bay Colony. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1930. xiv, 365 p. A30–1055 NN
Bibliography: p. [347]–355.

The copies in the Library of Congress are of a limited edition on finer paper, bearing the title Massachusettensis de conditoribus (F67.M86).

A series of biographical sketches of individuals representing the various aspects of life in the colony—"adventurous and artistic, political and economic, literary and scientific, legal, educational, and evangelical." The first four individuals discussed—Richard Hakluyt, Captain John Smith, Thomas Morton, and John White—prepared the way for the settlers of 1630. The others include John Winthrop, Thomas Shepard, John Hull, Henry Dunster, Nathaniel Ward, Robert Child, John Winthrop, Jr., John Eliot, and Anne Bradstreet. This book is distinguished not only as an outstanding example of literary historical writing, but also as one of the few books conveying the nature, significance, and purpose of the Puritans with understanding and respect, thus enabling the modern reader better to appreciate and understand this group from which most Americans feel alienated, and towards which many feel hostile. The well-chosen illustrations on 45 plates add considerably to the merit of the book.

3199. Murdock, Kenneth Ballard. Increase Mather, the foremost American Puritan. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1925. xv, 442 p. illus. 25-21276 F67.M477

"Appendix C. List of books referred to": p. [407]-415. "Appendix D. Checklist of Mather's writings": p. [416]-422.

Increase Mather (1639-1723) was born in Dorchester, Mass., where his father was a leading and strict Puritan minister. In time the son himself became the foremost New England Puritan of his generation. In 1664 he became teacher at the Boston Second Church. Sometime later he became president of Harvard College, a position he held for nearly two decades. In 1688 he represented Massachusetts in England; his relative success, however, came when William III displaced James II toward the end of 1688. Mather obtained a new charter for Massachusetts, and at the same time the unusual political privilege of being allowed to nominate the new officers for its government. He returned to Massachusetts, where he defended his diplomatic and political activities, but as before gave his main attention to the church. In the course of his career he also established himself not only as the most prolific author of his generation (political tracts, histories, sermons, etc.), but also one of the best in more strictly literary terms. Professor Murdock's biography of Mather shows him to have been an intelligent and unusually liberal person for his age. The book also attempts to depict that age to some extent; for Mather was not only involved in most of the public affairs of his day, but was also in many ways representative of his society; the book is thus as much general history as it is biography. An earlier life of Increase Mather was that by his famous son, Cotton Mather (q. v.): Parentator (Boston, B. Green for N. Belknap, 1724. 239 p.), an outstanding example of colonial biography. Increase Mather's own autobiography has not yet appeared in book form.

3200. Nissenson, Samuel G. The patroon's domain. New York, Columbia University Press, 1937. 416 p. (New York State Historical Association series; D. R. Fox, editor; no. 5) 37-20744 F122.1.N58

Bibliography: p. [389]-397.

According to the preface, "This attempt to describe the origin, the economic background and the political development and disintegration of the 'patroon system' as embodied in Rensselaerswyck, its one exemplar in New York, while complete within itself, serves also as an introduction to the history of the town and county institutions which for a time paralleled and ultimately supplanted the patroon's administrative organization." The book opens with a brief account of the founding and development of the Dutch West Indies Company, and its early commercial attitude towards New Netherland, later New York. There follows a history of the development during the 17th century of Rensselaerswyck, the large manorial grant on both sides of the Hudson River just south of Albany, and the patroonship's relationship to the home country and the company, as well as, in the later stages, to the new English system of laws, as the English took over. In large part the work is thus a special study of the 17th-century development in New York of laws affecting land tenure.

3201. Original narratives of early American history, reproduced under the auspices of the American Historical Association; general editor: J[ohn] Franklin Jameson. New York, Scribner, 1906-17. 19 v. 7-6642 E187.O7 (A-Z)

Dr. Jameson, the editor of this series, states in a "General Preface to the Original Narratives of Early American History," which appears only in The Northmen, Columbus and Cabot, 985-1503 (no. 3215), that the plan of the series was approved by the American Historical Association at its annual meeting of December 1902, and that its purpose was to provide "a comprehensive and well-rounded collection of those classical narratives on which the early history of the United States is founded, or of those narratives which, if not precisely classical, hold the most important place as sources of American history anterior to 1700." Many of these, he noted, had become so scarce and expensive that no ordinary library could hope to possess a complete set. The series was to publish not extracts, but whole works or distinct parts of works. Works in English were to be reprinted from the earliest or best editions, and works in foreign languages from the best translations available, or in new translations if no satisfactory ones were obtainable. A few works were to be published from manuscript for the first time. The special editors were to supply introductions concerning the author and the value of his work as a source, as well as brief notes enabling the reader "to understand and estimate rightly the statements of the text." Each volume is supplied with facsimiles of title pages and of maps contemporary with the narratives and serving to illustrate them. "No subsequent sources," said Dr. Jameson, "can have quite the intellectual interest, none quite the sentimental value, which attaches to these early narrations, springing direct from the brains and hearts of the nation's founders." The series has proved quite as useful as its distinguished planner hoped, and most of its volumes are currently available in reprint editions from Barnes and Noble, New York.

3202. Andrews, Charles McLean. Narratives of the insurrections, 1675–1690. 1915. 414 p. 15–4852 E187.A563 E187.O7A6

3203. Bolton, Herbert E., ed. Spanish exploration in the Southwest, 1542–1706. 1916. 487 p. 16–6066 F799.B69

3204. Bradford, William. History of Plymouth Plantation, 1606–1646; edited by William T. Davis. 1908. xv, 437 p. 8–7375 F68.B802 E187.O7B7

See entry nos. 1–6.

3205. Burr, George Lincoln, ed. Narratives of the witchcraft cases, 1648–1706. 1914. xviii, 467 p. 14–9773 BF1573.A2B8

See entry no. 41.

3206. Burrage, Henry S., ed. Early English and French voyages, chiefly from Hakluyt, 1534–1608. 1906. xxii, 451 p. 6–44365 E127.B96

3207. Champlain, Samuel de. Voyages, 1604–1618; edited by W[illiam] L. Grant. 1907. 377 p. 7–22899 F1030.1.C494

See entry no. 3156.

3208. Danckaerts, Jasper. Journal, 1679–1680; edited by Bartlett Burleigh James and J[ohn] Frank Jameson. 1913. xxxi, 313 p. 13–13556 E162.D18 E187.O7D3

"The present translation is substantially that of Mr. Henry C. Murphy, as presented in his edition of 1867," under title: Journal of a Voyage to New York and a Tour in Several of the American Colonies in 1679–80, by Jasper Dankers and Peter Sluyter.

3209. Hall, Clayton Colman, ed. Narratives of early Maryland, 1633–1684. 1910. 460 p. 10–23763 F184.H19

3210. Jameson, John Franklin, ed. Narratives of New Nederland, 1609–1664. 1909. 478 p. 9–24463 F122.1.J31 E187.O7J3

3211. Johnson, Edward. Wonder-working providence, 1628–1651; edited by J[ohn] Franklin Jameson. 1910. 285 p. 10–9809 F67.J675

3212. Kellogg, Louise Phelps, ed. Early narratives of the Northwest, 1634–1699. 1917. xiv, 382 p. 17–6235 F482.K29

3213. Lincoln, Charles H., ed. Narratives of the Indian wars, 1675–1699. 1913. 316 p. 13–24819 E82.L73 E187.O7L5

3214. Myers, Albert Cook, ed. Narratives of early Pennsylvania, West New Jersey and Delaware, 1630–1707. 1912. xiv, 476 p. 12–4611 F106.M98

3215. The Northmen, Columbus and Cabot, 985–1503: The voyages of the Northmen, edited by Julius E. Olson. The voyages of Columbus and of John Cabot, edited by Edward Gaylord Bourne. 1906. xv, 443 p. 6–36882 E101.N87

3216. Salley, Alexander S., ed. Narratives of early Carolina, 1650–1708. 1911. 388 p. 11–9548 F272.S16 E187.O7S3

3217. Spanish explorers in the Southern United States, 1528–1543: The narrative of Alvar Nuñez Cabeça de Vaca, edited by Frederick W. Hodge. The narrative of the expedition of Hernando de Soto by the gentleman of Elvas, edited by Theodore H. Lewis. The narrative of the expedition of Coronado, by Pedro de Castañeda, edited by Frederick W. Hodge. 1907. xx, 411 p. 7–10607 E123.S75 E187.O7S7

3218. Tyler, Lyon Gardiner, ed. Narratives of early Virginia, 1606–1625. 1907. xv, 478 p. 7–33220 F229.T994

3219. Winthrop, John. Journal, "History of New England," 1630–1649; edited by James Kendall Hosmer. 1908. 2 v. 8–17771 F67.W785

See entry nos. 90–91.

3220. Osgood, Herbert L. The American Colonies in the seventeenth century. New York, Columbia University press, 1930. 3 v. 30–26656 E191.O83

3221. Osgood, Herbert L. The American Colonies in the eighteenth century. New York, Columbia University Press, 1924. 4 v. 24–3889 E195O82

The American Colonies in the Seventeenth Century, which first appeared during 1904, is a study of the political and administrative aspects of the development of the English continental colonies in the 17th century; it is thus also in part a study of the development of political institutions in this area. Social and economic aspects of colonial life are not discussed, except in so far as they play a role in the more political aspects of colonial history. The first two volumes of the work discuss the situation in the chartered and proprietary Colonies; the third volume studies the situation in the royal Colonies, in which category the British Government soon tried to place all the Colonies, in order more efficiently to administer them for what was considered the general welfare of the homeland. Because of the extent and thoroughness of Osgood's pioneering study, his work remains an authoritative exposition of the early development of American political institutions. The American Colonies in the Eighteenth Century is a continuation left by Professor Osgood (1855–1918) of Columbia University in a state somewhat short of completion at his death. It was readied for and seen through the press by his pupil, Dixon Ryan Fox, who also produced a short biography: Herbert Levi Osgood, an American Scholar (New York, Columbia University Press, 1924. 167 p.). Taking up where the earlier work left off, in 1690, these four volumes continue the political and institutional aspects of colonial history through the British conquest of Canada. Much attention is given the four "Intercolonial Wars," as Osgood preferred to call them in lieu of their traditional names, and the longer administrations of individual governors in the larger provinces are given individual treatment. The creation of British agencies of colonial administration, and the origin and development of specific British policies are separately described. The position of the Church of England in the Colonies, and the effects of immigration and the tendency to westward expansion are considered. The political narrative conveys the impression that whatever the type of colonial government, colonial grievances and disaffection continued to increase in the face of British policy and administration.

3222. Peare, Catherine O. William Penn; a biography. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1957. 448 p. 56–10810 F152.2.P34

Bibliography: p. 427–444.

The most important event in the life of William Penn (1644–1718), without which he would probably have had small historical importance, took place at Cork, Ireland, on a summer's day in 1666, when he was reduced to tears, and converted to the doctrine of God as the Inner Light, by the testimony of the Quaker Thomas Loe. Miss Peare's biography is uncommonly penetrating in that it gives Penn's Quakerism its proper place at the center of his life, his character, and his influence upon the life of his day, and so upon all succeeding times. It is based upon prolonged research in the manuscript collections of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania and, secondarily, of Friends House, London, and although footnotes are dispensed with, documentation is provided by a series of page references at the end (p. 415–426). The founding of Pennsylvania is placed against its contemporary English background of the Tory and High Anglican reaction that took hold in 1681, and led Penn to see no real solution for the Friends save an American refuge. "As Proprietor of Pennsylvania Penn had received almost absolute power from his monarch"; his greatness was evidenced by his immediate renunciation of this power for himself and his successors, "that the will of one man may not hinder the good of an whole country." On the other hand, William I. Hull's William Penn, a Topical Biography (London, New York, Oxford University Press, 1937. 362 p.) emphasizes the peripheral many-sidedness of Penn's career, concerning which it assembles much out-of-the-way information. William Wistar Comfort's William Penn, 1644–1718, a Tercentenary Estimate (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1944. 185 p.) is a widely esteemed interpretative sketch which views Penn's career as an attempt to implement Quaker ideals.

3223. Quinn, David B. Raleigh and the British Empire. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 284 p. (Teach yourself history library)

49–10375 DA86.22.R2Q5 1949

A clear outline of English dealings with the New World in the later years of Elizabeth I and the first decade of James I, organized around the colorful if not wholly admirable personality of Sir Walter Raleigh (ca. 1552–1618), whom the author is careful not to overrate. However, Raleigh "advanced from the concept of a military settlement of hired men to the view that only a real community of men, women and children, having personal incentives to settle and prosper, could hope to succeed." This success, denied to Raleigh under Elizabeth, was made possible under James by "the slow quantitative development of English capitalism," permitting effort on a larger scale. Professor Quinn has also edited two extremely valuable documentary collections, one concerning Raleigh's half-brother and predecessor: The Voyages and Colonising Enterprises of Sir Humphrey Gilbert (London, Hakluyt Society, 1940. 2 v.) and the other concerning Raleigh's settlements in North Carolina: The Roanoke Voyages, 1584–1590; Documents to Illustrate the English Voyages to North America under the Patent Granted to Walter Raleigh in 1584 (London, Hakluyt Society, 1955. 2 v.).

3224. Raesly, Ellis Lawrence. Portrait of New Netherland. New York, Columbia University Press, 1945. 370 p. (Columbia University studies in English and comparative literature, no. 161) A 45-1615 F122.1.R15

Bibliography: p. [345]-354.

This Columbia dissertation is an attempt to present the "pattern and philosophy of life" of the Dutch colonists of New Netherland. The author studies such matters as the church in the New World, the political and social views of the colonists, the cultural interchanges between the Dutch and the Indians, and the early literary efforts of the Dutch in New Netherland. In the course of this he presents considerable information on the general history of the colony, and especially governmental affairs in so far as they affected the colony's cultural life.

3225. Root, Winfred Trexler. The relations of Pennsylvania with the British Government, 1696-1765. [Philadelphia] University of Pennsylvania, 1912. 422 p. ([Publications of the University of Pennsylvania. History]) 12-5677 F152.R78

"Bibliographical notes": p. 397-407.

In origin a University of Pennsylvania dissertation, this work studies in some detail the relations between the chartered and proprietary province of Pennsylvania and the British agencies of colonial administration, from the reorganization of the latter in 1696 to the second reorganization which followed the French and Indian War. While the author aims to throw light upon colonial administration in general, he is aware that the special circumstances of Pennsylvania differentiated it from other provinces: its establishment under Quaker auspices led in the earlier years of the period to much friction with Anglicans in the province and at home over the judicial oath and other issues, and in the later years to a succession of crises over provincial and imperial defense, to which the pacifist Quakers contributed little and that with reluctance. Furthermore, the Penns and their governors had none of the dignities of a king, and so fared worse in their struggle with the provincial assembly than did the royal governors elsewhere, so that by 1765 "within its sphere the legislature was scarcely less powerful than the British Parliament." But in its chapters on the administration of the acts of trade, the court of vice-admiralty, and the royal disallowance, this study exhibits in concrete example the same sort of situation that obtained in the colonies generally. While British control of the colonies in this age was not harsh or oppressive, Dr. Root concludes, the central fact of the imperial relation was the conflict of interest between a theory of empire primarily economic, and colonial views of religious and political separatism, individualism, and liberty.

3226. Rutledge, Joseph L. Century of conflict; the struggle between the French and British in colonial America. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1956. 530 p. maps. (Canadian history series, v. 2) 56-9541 F1030.R93

Mr. Rutledge, a Canadian magazine writer and editor, here presents the story of the French and English conflict for North America. The story, which tends to focus on personalities, opens with Governor Frontenac's arrival in Quebec in 1672, and closes with the English victories at Quebec and Montreal some 90 years later, establishing English dominance on the continent. While events throughout North America are considered, the author's main interest is in the activities in and about Canada. The history itself, which covers much the same ground as Parkman (q. v.), but with details from more recent studies, is "an attempt to make characters and events move out of the stiff formalities of history, to find flesh and blood and a sense of immediacy in the crowding events."

3227. Sachse, William L. The colonial American in Britain. Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1956. 290 p. 56-5887 DA125.A6S3

Dealing with persons who had settled in or been born in the thirteen mainland Colonies, and who later went to England prior to 1776, Sachse here attempts to study their motives for going to England and their activities and attitudes once there. Many went on business, a large proportion went to study, some retired to England after a successful career, a fair number returned because on economic or legal missions, official or semi-official, and some held "diplomatic" positions in England. Almost none traveled to England purely for pleasure, since the trip was so strenuous and expensive. Nevertheless, there was a strong drive to visit the homeland, and business reasons were often found. Most of the Americans visiting England came from the more populous and prosperous Colonies, such as Virginia, Massachusetts, South Carolina, and Maryland. Mr. Sachse pays some attention to English influences on the visitors, and their influences on England, but that difficult topic is not his main concern. The material for the study is in large part gleaned from diaries, journals, and letters, many still in manuscript. The work reflects much of colonial life and standards, while focusing on an important aspect of them.

677676 O-63-23

3228. Starkey, Marion L. The Devil in Massachusetts, a modern inquiry into the Salem witch trials. New York, Knopf, 1949. xviii, 310, vii p. 49–10395 BF1576.S8 1949
"Selected bibliography": p. 301–310.

The Salem witch trials have already been mentioned under Burr's Narratives of the Witchcraft Cases (no. 3205), and they are also dealt with in several works appearing in the Literature section of this bibliography. Miss Starkey's account of the mass hysteria of 1692 in Salem is deliberately designed to have overtones for a later age. However, it is basically a straightforward and lively narrative of the trials and the events surrounding them, as well as some of the events that followed from them in later years. The work may also be considered a psychological study, for the author attempts to understand the mental functionings of those involved, and through psychology does make some of their strange behavior more comprehensible to a latter-day audience.

3229. Tolles, Frederick B. James Logan and the culture of provincial America. Boston, Little, Brown, 1957. 228 p. (The Library of American biography) 57–6439 F152.L85

Logan (1674–1751) was of Scottish descent, though born in Ireland. His father had been converted to Quakerism in 1671, and the family underwent numerous difficulties because of their religion. In 1699 James Logan became secretary to William Penn, and the same year sailed with him to Pennsylvania. There he rose rapidly in political service, and for the rest of his life was a major factor in provincial affairs. He came as a scholar, and maintained wide interests throughout his life; he was also one of the leading American scientists of the period. However, he was best known as a leading spokesman for the conservative proprietary interest. In addition, he was for many years the leading peacemaker between the Whites and the Indians in the middle Colonies. Tolles' study traces this career in its many aspects of scholar, trader, diplomat, statesman, etc., and at the same time relates it to colonial life and government.

3230. Wallace, Paul A. W. Conrad Weiser, 1696–1760, friend of colonist and Mohawk. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1945. xiv, 648 p. illus. 45–8858 F152.W4286

At the age of 13 Conrad Weiser was brought by his father from Württemberg in Germany to the New York frontier, and four years later he spent the winter with a Mohawk chief, acquiring the foundation of his unrivaled knowledge of Indian languages and customs. After 10 years spent on his own farm in an Indian village, he transferred in 1729 to the Pennsylvania frontier, where his Iroquois connections gave him an exceptional influence in the Indian affairs of the province and made him, for two decades, the principal mediator between red man and white in the region. He is usually credited with the largest part in keeping the Iroquois Confederacy faithful to the English alliance. He shortly became a leading figure among the Pennsylvania Germans, furthering their efforts to retain their own culture by means of a German-language press. He also took a prominent part in German religious developments, deserting the Lutheran Church in which he was born for various Pietist departures, but ultimately returning to the Lutheran fold. During his last two decades he held a succession of appointments as magistrate and military officer under the provincial government, being almost the only German to do so. Mr. Wallace narrates his unique career in great detail, basing himself upon such primary sources as Weiser's own journals, in which many of his expeditions into the wilderness are recorded. Arthur D. Graeff's Conrad Weiser, Pennsylvania Peacemaker, published in 1945 as volume 8 of the publications of the Pennsylvania German Folklore Society, is on a somewhat smaller scale (406 p.), but equally based on original research.

3231. Wallace, Paul A. W. The Muhlenbergs of Pennsylvania. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1950. 358 p. illus. 50–5892 CS71.M95 1950

This book is a study of Henry Melchior Muhlenberg (1711–1787) and his three sons. The father came to America in 1742 as a Lutheran teacher and minister. The Lutheran religion continued to play a prominent role in the family history, as Muhlenberg, by regularizing lax procedures and developing a synodal organization, established an American center for the church. The father quickly established himself in America, and before long was head of one of the leading colonial families. In this respect, the book reflects not only life in Pennsylvania at that time, but the process of rapid Americanization, and even much of what lay behind the Revolutionary War. In that war one of the sons, Peter, left the pulpit to become a major general. Another son, Frederick Augustus, had a distinguished political career, and was the first speaker of the U. S. House of Representatives. The third brother, Henry, devoted himself to religion, but was also famous as president of Franklin (later Franklin and Marshall) College and as one of the leading botanists of the day. Thus the Muhlenbergs played a major part in the transition of America from colonialism to independence.

3232. Wertenbaker, Thomas Jefferson. The founding of American civilization; the middle Colonies. New York, Scribner, 1938. 367 p. illus. 38–27360 E169.1.W37

This history of the middle Colonies (New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania) preceded the author's volumes on the South and on Massachusetts, and had a considerably less worked-over subject matter. Here he describes the early settlements and their development. Much attention is devoted to architecture, while political matters are relatively slighted. Religious concerns, such as the affairs of Puritans in New Jersey and Quakers in Pennsylvania, are considered in so far as they influenced the establishment and development of communities. In this area diversity of language also played a prominent role and is well studied. The net effect is a close picturing of the everyday life in the middle Colonies, without much of the "grand stage" acting usually found in histories more concerned with political and military matters.

3233. Wertenbaker, Thomas Jefferson. The Old South; the founding of American civilization. New York, Scribner, 1942. xiv, 364 p. illus. 42–12383 F212.W5

This volume is a "study of Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina and South Carolina, for the most part during the colonial and early national periods," with the major emphasis on Virginia and Maryland. Topics such as "political history, church history, the plantation system, [and] slavery" have been neglected because of previous extensive studies of them. The book concentrates on the evolution of Southern society and the factors which went into its formation. To a large extent this is studied through the architecture of the period, "because it serves so admirably to illustrate the forces which created our civilization." Attention is also given to agricultural developments and to the tools and products of various classes of artisans. .

3234. Wertenbaker, Thomas Jefferson. The planters of colonial Virginia. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1922. 260 p. 23–3542 F229.W493

This history of colonial Virginia studies its economic foundations in such matters as the spread of population in relation to the cultivation of tobacco and transportation problems. Considerable attention is devoted to land grants, indentured servants, and the effects of slavery on types of tobacco grown, farming methods used, and the English home market. Extensive statistics are cited, and quit-rent rolls for the counties of Virginia in 1704–5 (p. 183–247) are printed in full. Thus the author impressively interprets Virginia as a tobacco colony, whose development was first geared to the production of tobacco by white farmers; however, with the relatively late establishment of slavery in the colony, production shifted to low-grade tobacco mass-produced, the small farmer could no longer compete, and even the indentured servant became unprofitable to his master. In this way came about the splitting of Virginia society into an aristocracy and its slaves, the intermediate groups having fled the colony. Two earlier works of Dr. Wertenbaker, Patrician and Plebeian in Virginia, originally published in 1910, and Virginia under the Stuarts, 1607–1688, originally published in 1914, have recently been reprinted, along with this one, under the general title, The Shaping of Colonial Virginia (New York, Russell & Russell, 1958. 239, 260, 271 p.).

3235. Wertenbaker, Thomas Jefferson. The Puritan oligarchy; the founding of American civilization. New York, Scribner, 1947. 359 p. illus. 47–30879 F67.W4

This is a study of Massachusetts under Puritan government. Professor Wertenbaker refers to this regime as an oligarchy "since from its inception it was the government of the many by the few, a government by the comparatively small body of Church members." After reviewing the forces and events leading to the migration of the Puritans to Massachusetts, the author goes on to consider details of the establishment of the new governing communities. Matters such as the English manor prototypes for New England town designs are discussed, followed by a consideration of the new factors which inevitably transformed these prototypes in their practical application. While considerable attention is given to the activities of the clergy, the author also devotes space to such matters as architecture and literature. He closes with a discussion of the decline of Puritan power, which he sees as starting after the witchcraft trials, when the clergy had so disastrously lost their battle against rationalism.

3236. Wright, Louis B. The cultural life of the American Colonies, 1607–1763. New York, Harper, 1957. xiv, 292 p. illus. (The New American Nation series) 56–11090 E162.W89

Bibliography: p. 253–274.

In carrying out his aim "to provide a brief insight into the cultural developments of the thirteen British colonies which later became the United States," the author derives these developments from two main areas of colonial society: the agrarian aristocracies of Virginia, Maryland, South Carolina, and New York; and the aristocracy of trade which emerged in New England, New York City, and Philadelphia, and which owed its position to a widespread acceptance of "the gospel of work." The several elements of culture are topically and separately handled, from religion and education to science and the press, a treatment which has the disadvantage of blurring the considerable distinctions between the conditions of the 17th century and those of the 18th. The volume makes skillful use of the now huge body of monographic literature, much of it confined to the development of a single element in a single colony, and itemizes this in the considerable bibliography.

E. The American Revolution

3237. Abernethy, Thomas Perkins. Western lands and the American Revolution. New York, Appleton-Century for the Institute for Research in the Social Sciences, University of Virginia, 1937. xv, 413 p. maps. ([The University of Virginia Institute for Research in the Social Sciences. Institute monograph no. 25]) 37–20445 E210.A15

Bibliography: p. 370–392.

A narrative account of the development of the trans-Appalachian West from the mid-18th century to the end of the Confederation period. The causal relationship of the Western land question to the American Revolution is held by the author to be not specific. The colonists' renunciation of British rule was the occasion of a rush to the West; while there is some discussion of the various land companies involved in the trans-Appalachian "land grab," this narrative is primarily concerned with the political consequences of the westward movement and with the policies of the Colonies, the Continental Congress, the several states, and the British Government which affected the acquisition of land in the West. Much of the discussion is devoted to the conflict of interests between the Virginians, with whom the author's sympathies appear to lie, and the Northern promoters, chiefly Franklin, Joseph Galloway, and other Pennsylvanians.

3238. Alden, John R. The American Revolution, 1775–1783. New York, Harper, 1954. 294 p. (The New American Nation series)

53–11826 E208.A35

Includes bibliography.

Though not entirely neglected, the description of the colonial home front is somewhat compressed, while the narrative of maneuver and battle, taking up more than half of the book, is set forth concisely and clearly. In addition to the military aspects of the Revolution, the British and European situations are more fully discussed than is customary in books on this scale. It is contended that British blundering in the years following 1763 brought on the revolt of the American Colonies, a revolt the colonials could probably have sustained alone, but which was hastened to a successful conclusion by European money and munitions, and finally by the avowed entrance of France and of Spain into the struggle. It is suggested that Trenton marked a turning point more significant than the British capitulation at Saratoga, or Howe's failure to crush the rebellion in Pennsylvania. The American Revolution, the author concludes, "inspired and continues to inspire colonials of all colors to seek freedom from European domination."

3239. Bakeless, John E. Background to glory; the life of George Rogers Clark. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1957. 386 p.

56–11684 E207.C5B15

George Rogers Clark (1752–1818) was an heroic but tragic figure, who won the Old Northwest for the United States during the Revolution but died an embittered alcoholic, physically and mentally broken. In 1772 he made his first journey down the Ohio to the land which he later conquered with a few picked frontiersmen. His campaign, made in difficult terrain against heavy odds in favor of the British and their Indian allies, relied upon tactics of surprise. Clark held this territory for the United States for the duration of the War, but neither he nor his men received pay or supplies from the Continental Congress or from Virginia; his personal fortune and those of several other devoted patriots were expended in the effort, and Clark was saddled with a mass of debts which Virginia refused to assume. More or less desperate, after the Revolution he accepted a French commission to attack the Spanish territories west of the Mississippi, but nothing came of this plan. His subsequent attempts to obtain compensation or even relief were all futile, and Clark's personality deteriorated rapidly after 1805. James Alton James' edition of the George Rogers Clark Papers, 1771–1784 in the Virginia State Library (Springfield, Illinois State Historical Library, 1912–26. 2 v. Collections of the Illinois State Historical Library, v. 8, 19. Virginia series, v. 3–4) provides the basic documentation for Mr. Bakeless' biography as well as for his own Life of George Rogers Clark (Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1928. 534 p.), a somewhat impersonal narrative which emphasizes the background of international relations and intrigue.

3240. Bakeless, John E. Daniel Boone. New York, Morrow, 1939. 480 p.
39–27625 F454.B724

At head of title: Master of the wilderness.

"Bibliography and notes": p. [423]–465.

Daniel Boone (1734–1820) before his death had become to many the prototype of the American frontiersman. At the age of 12 or 13 years Boone was presented with a rifle by his father; thus began a career during which Boone was to be a hunter, Indian fighter, surveyor, militia officer, sheriff, magistrate, and legislator. Boone's life began on his father's farm in Pennsylvania and ended in Missouri, but it is Kentucky which hails him as its hero. Mr. Bakeless has made Boone the subject of a documented biography based on scattered original sources. Details of purely local interest have been largely disregarded. The Boone legend is subjected to a critical examination, but the Boone who emerges still bears the qualities which made him famous: courage, fortitude, endurance, and the ability to "think Indian."

3241. Brown, Robert Eldon. Middle-class democracy and the Revolution in Massachusetts, 1691–1780. Ithaca, Published for the American Historical Association [by] Cornell University Press, 1955. 458 p. 56–13503 F67.B86

Bibliography: p. 409–438.

The author believes that in Massachusetts the American Revolution was not what it has latterly been called: a dual struggle for independence from Britain and for a dissemination of democratic rights at home. It was a revolt against British control, but it was also a revolution intended to preserve a social order rather than to change it. Economics, politics, the educational system, religious organization, and the organization and political influence of the militia are all marshaled as evidence of the existence of an effective middle-class democracy in colonial Massachusetts. To a people thus accustomed to political, economic, and social democracy the danger in British imperial policies during the pre-Revolutionary period was soon apparent. The collision of this Massachusetts middle-class democracy and those policies, Mr. Brown asserts, explains the events of the years following 1760 in Massachusetts. It is suggested that the situation in Massachusetts was not fundamentally different from that in the other Colonies during the same period. A divergent view appears in Elisha P. Douglass' Rebels and Democrats; the Struggle for Equal Political Rights and Majority Rule during the American Revolution (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina [Press] 1955. 368 p.) which has rather a misleading title, since it is actually concerned with "the first democratic movement in America from its beginnings in the sporadic protests against the aristocratic domination of provincial governments up to its emergence as a political force during the formation of the first state constitutions" (1776), and closes with a brief explanation of why democracy made so little progress in the Nation as a whole during the Revolution.

3242. Burnett, Edmund Cody. The Continental Congress. New York, Macmillan, 1941. xvii, 757 p. 41–20697 E303.B93

Bibliographical references included in Preface.

First assembled in September 1774 as a consultative body of delegates from the Thirteen Colonies, the Continental Congress soon became the central government of the Revolutionary movement, and eventually of the union of free states it had called into being. Its provisional character lasted until 1781; the Articles of Confederation ratified in that year gave it a permanent basis but quite failed to endow it with adequate powers. This book is a study of the principal activities of the Continental Congress from its inception to its supersession by the government under the Constitution in 1789. The Continental Congress is depicted as being at the very center of the Revolutionary scene, and the chronological arrangement of the narrative impresses on the mind the day-to-day problems with which the Congress was faced in that position. In apparent clumsiness and ineffectuality these problems were solved, merely debated, or ignored; however, the Continental Congress did bequeath to its successor a body of constructive legislation, principles, and practices built up during its precarious 15 years' existence. The basic source for the narrative was Letters of Members of the Continental Congress, edited by Dr. Burnett (Washington, Carnegie Institution of Washington, 1921–36. 8 v.), and it consists, in large part, of the extensive prefaces to those volumes reprinted or expanded.

3243. Dickerson, Oliver Morton. The navigation acts and the American Revolution. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1951. xv, 344 p. 51–13206 E215.1.D53

Bibliography: p. 302–335.

A discussion of representative American and British attitudes toward the Acts of Trade and Navigation, the provisions of those acts and their operation, and the role of the antitrade policy adopted by the British ministry after 1764 in the destruction of imperial unity. The author concludes that although in the span of a century a great and loyal colonial empire had been developed through the wise administration of the trade and navigation laws, that empire was destroyed within a decade when regulation for the sake of revenue rather than regulation for the sake of development became the object of British colonial trade policy. The resentment and disaffection caused by this shift to taxation and exploitation in the interest of an English political faction varied in different areas. Those in which the operation of the old practices was little disturbed by the new revenue program tended to remain loyal to their British allegiance; but in those trading centers in which the heavy taxation, excessive fees, and frequent seizures dictated by the new policy were concentrated, the movement for resistance and eventually for revolution took shape.

3244. Dorson, Richard M., ed. America rebels; narratives of the patriots. [New York] Pantheon, 1953. 347 p. 53–6131 E275.A2D6

Fourteen selections, high spots "from the available abundance of Revolutionary narratives, memoirs, and journals." These Revolutionary chronicles, the compiler thinks, "form a true people's literature, rude and sturdy, marking the departure of American from English prose." The extracts include captivities with the British and the Indians, the misadventures of Loyalists, and social life in wartime Philadelphia, as well as glimpses of Lexington, Saratoga, Vincennes, and Yorktown. The bibliography lists 37 narratives as particularly worth the reader's attention. Rebels and Redcoats, by George F. Scheer and Hugh F. Rankin (Cleveland, World Pub. Co., 1957. 572 p.), draws upon a much larger body of personal sources from either side, but presents it, as a rule, in mere snippets embedded in a none-too-critical narrative provided by the authors.

3245. Frothingham, Richard. The rise of the Republic of the United States. 10th ed. Boston, Little, Brown, 1910. xxii, 640 p. 11–9466 E210.F96

A work first published in 1872, and frequently reprinted without change during the next four decades, which retains value, notwithstanding the immense amount of subsequent research, because of its clearly defined purpose and logical construction. The author had the single "object of tracing the development of the national life; a theme separate from the ordinary course of civil and military transactions, and requiring events to be selected from their relation to principles, and to be traced to their causes." The ideas of local self-government and of national union are followed from the formation of the New England Confederation in 1643 to the inauguration of President Washington in 1789. The work is solidly documented by quotations from and references to the printed sources available in 1872. The author (1812–1880) was a worthy citizen of Charlestown, Mass., and was led to history by compiling its annals; he also wrote an extremely solid History of the Siege of Boston, 4th ed. (Boston, Little, Brown, 1873. 422 p.) and a Life and Times of Joseph Warren (Boston, Little, Brown, 1865. xix, 558 p.) which has not been replaced.

3246. Gipson, Lawrence H. The coming of the Revolution, 1763–1775. New York, Harper, 1954. xiv, 287 p. illus. (The New American Nation series) 54–8952 E209.G5

Bibliography: p. 235–278.

Concerning himself with British-colonial relationships during the period of political maneuver which followed the "Great War for the Empire" (1754–63), the author's thesis is that the American Revolution stemmed from the efforts of the British Government to administer more efficiently the much enlarged Empire, and from coincidental effort on the part of the American colonists, with the threat of hostile forces removed from their borders, to obtain a greater autonomy. The colonists found their field of political action restricted by a home government intent upon carrying out stricter policies. This, in turn, brought on a transformation of the colonial attitude from one of acquiescence in the traditional order of things to a demand for change. The conviction grew in the minds of the colonists that there were more disadvantages than advantages in their continuing to accept a subordinate position within the Empire. The growth of federalism and nationalism inevitably ended the period of political maneuver and brought on that of armed conflict.

3247. Gottschalk, Louis R. Lafayette comes to America. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1935. 184 p. 35–15130 DC146.L2G6

Bibliography at end of each chapter.

3248. Gottschalk, Louis R. Lafayette joins the American Army. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1937. xv, 364 p. 37–3884 E207.L2G7

"Bibliographical notes" at end of each chapter.

3249. Gottschalk, Louis R. Lafayette and the close of the American Revolution. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1942. 458 p. maps. 42–12337 E207.L2G68

"Bibliographical notes" at end of each chapter.

3250. Gottschalk, Louis R. Lafayette between the American and the French Revolution (1783–1789) Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1950. 461 p. 50–5286 DC146.L2G59

"Bibliographical notes" at end of each chapter.

Born in 1757, Marie Joseph Paul Yves Roch Gilbert du Motier, Marquis de Lafayette, grew up in a family which fortune and wise marriages had begun to favor. In 1774, through his marriage to Marie Adrienne Françoise de Noailles, Lafayette became a protégé of the influential Noailles family. In 1777 he came to Philadelphia and was promptly commissioned major general by the Continental Congress. Thus began a career which made Lafayette during his lifetime and since a symbol of Franco-American coöperation and of liberalism. The first of Professor Gottschalk's volumes covers the pre-American years of Lafayette's life; the second is an account of the year and a half following his first landing in America and concludes with his return to France in 1779; the remainder of Lafayette's American career is dealt with in the third volume; and the period 1783–89, when Lafayette held a unique intermediary position between France and America, is the subject of the fourth and latest volume of this biography to be published. Étienne Charavay's Le Général La Fayette, 1757–1834 (Paris, Société de l'Histoire de la Révolution Française, 1898. 653 p.) contains an account of Lafayette's subsequent career, not altogether a prosperous or happy one, in which he took an active part in two French revolutions, and also made a second triumphant tour of the United States in 1824. The Lafayette myth has been scrutinized by Mr. Gottschalk, and his results indicate that Lafayette came to America in 1777 motivated less by liberal idealism than by a sense of frustration and dissatisfaction with affairs at home, by a desire for glory, and by the traditional French hatred of the English adversary. The symbol of Lafayette, the French noble enamored of American ideals of liberty, was the product of others who sought advantage in having Lafayette accepted as such, but once Lafayette became the symbol, he lived the role to such an extent that the symbol became the reality, and in later years, Lafayette deserved his reputation of being the outstanding liberal of his day. It is with this character development that Mr. Gottschalk's work is chiefly concerned. Other personal and idealistic links between the American and French Revolutions are discussed in this author's The Place of the American Revolution in the Causal Pattern of the French Revolution (Easton, Pa., American Friends of Lafayette, 1948. 22 p.). Another European who came to America to join with the colonists in their Revolution and later participated in a revolution in his native land, Poland, is studied in two volumes by Miecislaus Haiman: Kosciuszko in the American Revolution (New York, Polish Institute of Arts and Sciences in America, 1943. 198 p.) and Kosciuszko, Leader and Exile (New York, Polish Institute of Arts and Sciences in America, 1946. 183 p.).

3251. Hendrick, Burton J. The Lees of Virginia; biography of a family. Boston, Little, Brown, 1935. 455 p. illus. 35–18228 E467.1.L4H35

In 1640 Richard Lee emigrated from England to Virginia. In the colony he achieved in rapid succession the offices of clerk of the court, attorney general, sheriff of York County, secretary of state, and councillor. From Richard and his wife, Ann, descended a line whose members, not unlike the other families who comprised Virginia's oligarchy, looked upon public service as a birthright and a family responsibility. The author feels that the Lees illustrate that Virginia system at its most beneficent. The emphasis of the narrative is upon the activities of the members of the Lee family during the latter half of the 18th century, their epic stage. With the fall of the Southern Confederacy the influence of the family ebbed, and the narrative ends here, with the observation that the work of the Lees survives in the State and Nation they did so much to build.

3252. Jameson, John Franklin. The American Revolution considered as a social movement. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1926. 157 p. 26–10868 E209.J33

"Lectures delivered in November 1925 on the Louis Clark Vanuxem Foundation."

The Revolutionary era is considered as a period of political and social reorganization tending in the direction of democracy. The author does not go into a recital of detail, but rather sketches in broad outline the changes which the American Revolution brought about in the social system of America with an emphasis on causes and effects. A wide variety of subjects are touched upon in these lectures: the status of persons, the land, industry and commerce, religion, and philosophy. Dr. Jameson believed that one cannot obtain a satisfactory view of any particular activity of men in the same country during the same period without examining their coexistent activities, for all such activities bear an intimate relationship one to another.

3253. Jensen, Merrill. The Articles of Confederation; an interpretation of the social-constitutional history of the American Revolution, 1774–1781. [Madison] University of Wisconsin Press, 1948, ©1940. xv, 284 p. 48–1595 JK131.J4 1948

An account of the writing and ratification of the first Constitution of the United States, the Articles of Confederation, which regards the Articles as a constitutional expression of the philosophy of the Declaration of Independence, and a natural product of the Revolutionary movement within the American Colonies. The author emphasizes the conflicts arising out of the concrete issues which faced Americans during the Revolutionary period, and centered on group interests, social cleavages, and the relationships among the several states. The basic conflict, however, was that between radical and conservative elements, a struggle which unified the Revolutionary movements throughout the Colonies. Professor Jensen concludes that the fact that the Articles of Confederation were supplanted by another constitution is not proof of their failure; and that the failure of the Confederation government was brought about not by its inadequacy, but rather by the failure of the radicals to maintain the organization they had created to bring about the Revolution and the Confederation. The goal of self-government attained, the radicals "disintegrated with success," and the balance of political power shifted through the action of an aggressive conservatism which had learned not a little from its radical antagonists. A sequel is no. 3302.

3254. Miller, Helen Day (Hill). George Mason, constitutionalist, by Helen Hill. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1938. xxii, 300 p. illus.
38–4827 E302.6.M45M5

"Sources": p. [259]–262.

A member of Virginia's tidewater planter aristocracy, George Mason (1725–1792), like others of his class, administered his plantation and served his parish and county and the neighboring town, in various official capacities, for most of his life. He served briefly in the Virginia House of Burgesses in 1759, and in the Virginia Assembly in 1786. He was a member of the Virginia Conventions of 1775 and 1776, and of the Federal Constitutional Convention in 1787. He strongly opposed the ratification of the Constitution in the Virginia Convention of 1788, among his objections being the absence of a declaration of rights, and the incorporation of the compromise between New England and the Southern States on the tariff and the slave trade. Mason's opposition to slavery was one of the constants of his long career. Though he appeared in the political arena, by nature he was retiring, and his great contribution as a constitutionalist was made in the role of an adviser, a political theoretician, and draftsman of important state papers, especially the Fairfax Resolves of 1774 and the Virginia Declaration of Rights of 1776. The author portrays George Mason as epitomizing "the American Enlightenment as expressed through the democratic movement in Virginia."

3255. Miller, John C. Triumph of freedom, 1775–1783. With maps by Van H. English. Boston, Little, Brown, 1948. xviii, 718 p.
48–6755 E208.M5 1948

Bibliography: p. [689]–705.

A comprehensive history of the Revolution which points out the continuity of American military experience. The author has placed an emphasis on military history, but he has not neglected the diplomatic, economic, political, and idealistic facets of the story; even propaganda is the subject of a chapter. Professor Miller's history is not entirely a tale of heroism and self-sacrifice, for there was much indifference and lethargy, as well as a morale which had been all but pulverized under the hammer of wartime inflation. Despite all of this, steadfast spirits, many of whom were in the Army, brought the Revolution to a successful conclusion. Aside from the victory attained, the value of the struggle of the "virtuous few" was, in the eyes of the author, the endowment of Americans with the principles and ideals which, however imperfectly realized, remain the goal of their collective endeavors. This volume is a sequel to the author's Origins of the American Revolution (Boston, Little, Brown, 1943. 519 p.), which puts heavy emphasis on the opposed outlooks of the conservative and radical wings of the Whig Party, and interprets the Declaration of Independence as a victory for the latter.

3256. Morgan, Edmund S. The birth of the Republic, 1763–89. [Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1956. 176 p. (The Chicago history of American civilization) 56–11003 E208.M85

"Bibliographical note": p. 158–166.

A remarkably concise presentation of the political and constitutional essentials of the crucial quarter-century from the Peace of Paris to the ratification of the Constitution, which confines the war and diplomacy of the Revolution to one 10-page chapter because a separate volume on these aspects is in preparation for this very promising series. The antecedents of the Revolution are interpreted as the colonists' search for principles of government which would ensure the continuance of their real and present freedom. The "Critical Period," if less dark than once painted, was yet an exposure of the inadequacy of the Confederation to conduct foreign affairs, to regulate its finances, or even to maintain order. The constitutional movement was no conspiratorial reaction of the rich and well-born, but the work of a group of sincere libertarians, who compromised their disagreements over means in order to raise "a bulwark to protect what they had gained," as well as a base for further exploration of the principles of free government.

3257. Morgan, Edmund S., and Helen M. Morgan. The Stamp Act crisis; prologue to revolution. Chapel Hill, Published for the Institute of Early American History and Culture at Williamsburg, Va., by the University of North Carolina Press, 1953. 310 p. 53–10190 E215.2.M58

In an effort to insure contributions toward colonial defense from the American Colonies, the Grenville ministry in 1765 carried through Parliament the Stamp Act. Within a year the Act was repealed after a storm of protest had risen to meet attempts to enforce its provisions. The brief Declaratory Act which replaced the Stamp Act was no more acceptable to the Americans once they realized its meaning. This work aims to set forth the general issues which engendered and resulted from the passage of the Stamp Act. The method employed is that of viewing the situation through the eyes of Francis Bernard, the royal governor of Massachusetts, John Robinson, the royal customs collector in Narragansett Bay, Daniel Dulany, Maryland pamphleteer, Thomas Hutchinson, Massachusetts' lieutenant governor, and Jared Ingersoll and John Hughes, distributors of stamps for Connecticut and Pennsylvania, respectively. The significance of the Stamp Act crisis is held to be "the emergence, not of leaders and methods and organizations, but of well-defined constitutional principles. The resolutions of the colonial and intercolonial assemblies in 1765 laid down the line on which the Americans stood until they cut the connection with England. Consistently from 1765 to 1776 they denied the authority of Parliament to tax them externally or internally; consistently they affirmed their willingness to submit to whatever legislation Parliament should enact for the supervision of the empire as a whole."

3258. Mullett, Charles F. Fundamental law and the American Revolution, 1760–1776. New York, Columbia University Press, 1933. 216 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, no. 385) 33–36711 H31.C7, no. 385 E210.M954

Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University.

Bibliography: p. 198–211.

During the decade and a half which preceded the American Revolution the colonists invoked the concept of "fundamental law" in their resistance to parliamentary authority in the realm of taxation and personal rights, and of internal legislation, and, finally, in any realm. The ideas advanced by the colonists to justify their position were not original; intellectual ammunition furnished by authorities from Sophocles to Blackstone was used by the colonists in their struggle to withstand British efforts to reduce their practical autonomy. This study aims to analyze the idea of fundamental law as it was employed by the American revolutionists. The first two chapters sketch the concepts held by those authors whom the leaders of colonial opinion quoted or referred to in their writings. The remainder of the work contains an examination of the ideas of fundamental law current in the Colonies. Dr. Mullett had previously reprinted, with an introduction, five pamphlets by one of the earliest men to give the Patriot cause a theoretical basis, in Some Political Writings of James Otis (Columbia, University of Missouri, 1929. 2 v.).

3259. Nevins, Allan. The American States during and after the Revolution, 1775–1789. New York, Macmillan, 1924. xviii, 728 p. 24–23941 E303.N52

Bibliography: p. 679–691.

A conspectus of State history from the beginning of the Revolution until 1789 which covers a wide range of topics: the Thirteen Colonies and their governments, the origin and early growth of the independent State governments, the development and revision of State constitutions, State politics, financial and social developments, the relation of the States to one another and to the central government, and the early settlement of the West. Professor Nevins finds that the States served a purpose even more important than that of providing a basis for the United States' system of dual government: they exercised a conservative function. They were the repositories of the political and institutional experience of the colonists. At the same time, new theories applied to old practices at the State level often resulted in fruitful experimentation. The success of the American people in forming and controlling their State governments gave them an increasing measure of self-confidence in their ability to control their political destiny. A full index increases the usefulness of this volume.

3260. Niles, Hezekiah. Principles and acts of the Revolution in America: or, An attempt to collect and preserve some of the speeches, orations, & proceedings, with sketches and remarks on men and things, and other fugitive or neglected pieces, belonging to the Revolutionary period in the United States. Baltimore, Printed and published for the editor, by W. O. Niles, 1822. 495 p. 2–19341 E203.N69

The compiler, Hezekiah Niles (1777–1839), was the editor and publisher of Niles' Weekly Register, in which such a collection was first suggested in November 1816, and contributions solicited. It was proposed to present "an acceptable gift to the American people, by rescuing from oblivion a great variety of fleeting, scattered articles," belonging to the history of the Revolution, "whilst its feelings were fresh upon the heart and understanding of our heroes and sages." The result is a miscellany of quite various materials, which gives a vivid view of the Patriot cause as it appeared to its supporters and to their immediate descendants. Here are the ideas by which the Revolution was justified, and the rhetoric in which they were habitually clad. Since Niles set his materials up in print as they came in, his book is a frightful jumble which a preliminary Index is quite inadequate to control. Anticipating the centennial of the Revolution, Hezekiah's grandson, Samuel V. Niles, obtained recommendations from a surprising number of the "prominent statesmen and jurists" of the Gilded Age, and brought out a new edition: Centennial Offering. Republication of the Principles and Acts of the American Revolution (New York, A. S. Barnes, 1876. 522 p.). Since the contents have been rearranged, in chronological order under each colony or other heading, and the print and paper are much superior, it is considerably more convenient to use than the original edition.

3261. Robson, Eric. The American Revolution in its political and military aspects, 1763–1783. London, Batchworth Press, 1955. 254 p.
55–14712 E208.R6

An inquiry into the causes of the American Revolution and of the British failure to subdue the colonial rebellion, by an English scholar whose death in 1954 at the age of 36 caused widespread regret. Heightened by the failure of the British Government to understand or adjust to the American position, a conflict of political ideas, not "tea and taxes," is held to be the basic cause of the Revolution. By 1775 Great Britain and the Colonies had become so divergent in their notions of their proper relationship to each other that only separation or conquest remained as possible solutions of the colonial problem. A lengthy discussion of the British military performance in the Revolutionary War points out that a failure to adjust to strategical circumstances, a lack of determination, and low morale all tipped the scales against the mother country. A further handicap was the cumbersome operation of the government of 18th-century Britain. Nevertheless the dominating factor in Britain's defeat was her political isolation resulting from the peace settlement of 1763.

3262. Schlesinger, Arthur Meier. The colonial merchants and the American Revolution, 1763–1776. New York, Facsimile Library, 1939. 647 p. 39–12039 HF3025.S3 1939.
Bibliography: p. 614–629.

Seeking a relaxation of commercial restrictions imposed by the parliamentary legislation of 1764–65, the merchants of the North American commercial provinces, Professor Schlesinger maintains in this very influential book, originally published in 1918, were the instigators of the first discontents in the Colonies. The events of the years 1767–70 brought the mercantile interests to an even sharper realization than before of the growing power of the radical elements of colonial society; however, their withdrawal to conservatism was delayed while they allied themselves with the radicals to defeat the purposes of the East India Company. The outcome convinced the merchants, as a class, that their future welfare depended upon the maintenance of British authority. Some of them, hoping to control the situation from within, remained within the radical movement. With the meeting of the First Continental Congress, others threw aside the cloak of radicalism, and some of these became active Loyalists. With the outbreak of hostilities, economic interest caused many merchants to follow the line of least resistance and profess adherence to the colonial cause; others, anticipating a British victory, openly cast their lot with Great Britain. Following the Revolution, however, the mercantile interests once more closed their ranks and became a potent factor in the conservative counter-revolution which led to the adoption of the Constitution.

3263. Tyler, Moses Coit. Patrick Henry. Boston, Houghton, Mifflin, 1887. 398 p. (American statesmen, edited by J. T. Morse, Jr. [v. 3])
10–11969 E176.A53, v.3
"List of printed documents": p. 424–429.

After an unpromising start in life Henry (1736–1799) turned to the law and won immediate success practicing in upcountry courts; his fame spread to the whole province of Virginia when his legal eloquence won the "Parson's Cause" from the established church in 1763. Two years later he entered the House of Burgesses from Hanover County and at once won equal fame as political orator by a famous speech opposing the Stamp Act. His contemporaries regarded his rhetorical powers with awe, admiring or grudging, and his fame as the foremost orator of the American Revolution is secure. As a spokesman for upcountry interests and as a leader who took an uncompromising line against British claims, Henry won an unrivaled popularity with the electorate, and was chosen first Governor of the State of Virginia. Neither his stubborn opposition to the adoption of the Federal Constitution, which he painted as a new engine of despotism, nor his adhesion to the Federalist Party in the course of the next decade, succeeded in diminishing his prestige with the people of his State. Tyler's life, one of the few volumes in the American statesmen series which has not been overshadowed by the productions of latter-day scholarship, is a sterling piece of research, organization, and writing, perhaps too favorable to some of Henry's later tergiversations. Robert Douthat Meade's Patrick Henry: Patriot in the Making (Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1957. 431 p.) is based on an enormous amount of research in scattered primary sources, especially in Virginia courthouses, and it is not his fault if they make no great additions to the story. It carries the narrative to 1775, and is to be followed by a second and concluding volume.

3264. Van Doren, Carl C. Secret history of the American Revolution. New York, Viking Press, 1941. xiv, 534 p.
41–24478 E77.V23 1941
"General bibliography": p. [496]–499.

A detailed narrative, based largely on the Clinton papers in the Clements Library, of British attempts to subvert loyalty to the Revolutionary cause and to draw adherents of all ranks into service as secret agents of the Crown. British exploitation of the doubts, hardships of service, defeatism, and personal ambition, which plagued many Americans during this time, did succeed in many instances, but failed in quite as many. The chief instance of success was the Arnold-André plot, and the maneuvers and negotiations necessary to tempt Arnold to treason are reconstructed in great detail. Other cases of treason are treated proportionately to the gravity of their effect upon the Revolution. Counterespionage by the revolutionists and the unswerving loyalty of many men served to defeat the British "fifth column." The postwar fates of some of the traitors are traced. Quotations from letters, memoirs, and courtroom testimony are employed by the author to convey the type of thinking and personality which led Americans either to oppose or support the Revolution. Another work by Mr. Van Doren which throws light on a significant incident of the Revolution is Mutiny in January (New York, Viking Press, 1943. 288 p.). The unsuccessful mutinies of the Pennsylvania and New Jersey Line in January 1781 are narrated in this well-documented study of administrative neglect and British intrigue aimed at inducing the mutineers to desert.

3265. Van Tyne, Claude H. The causes of the War of Independence, being the first volume of a history of the founding of the American Republic. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1922. 499 p.
22–16374 E210.V27
E178.V28, v. 1

3266. Van Tyne, Claude H. The War of Independence; American phase, being the second volume of a history of the founding of the American Republic. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1929. 518 p.
29–23482 E178.V28, v. 2
E208.V28

The first title is a consideration of the growth of the spirit of independence which made Americans discontented with their subordinate position in the British Empire. Factors in this growth, political, economic, social, and religious, are discussed. What political liberty the American colonists enjoyed was inherited, to a great extent, from the mother country. Furthermore, conditions of life on this frontier of the British Empire tended to encourage democratic views and to resist any backward political step of the more conservative homeland. Further, just as British political progress outstripped that of other European nations, so had the American Colonies advanced politically beyond England. The narrative ends with the outbreak of hostilities at Lexington and is continued in The War of Independence; American Phase. Until Burgoyne's surrender at Saratoga, and the subsequent conclusion of the alliance with France, the Revolution had been, outwardly at least, a family affair for the most part localized along the Atlantic seaboard of North America. With the entry of France the complexion of the struggle was transformed. The earlier limited struggle is all the author was able to describe before his death in 1930. He had previously contributed a one-volume narrative to the American Nation series: The American Revolution, 1776–1783 (New York, Harper, 1905. xix, 369 p).

3267. Van Tyne, Claude H. The Loyalists in the American Revolution. New York, P. Smith, 1929. 360 p.
30–4956 E277.V242

First published in 1902.

The case for the Loyalists, or Tories, is sympathetically advanced in this documented account of those Americans whose rooted conservatism impelled them to resist the movement for American independence. To the author, loyalty to King and homeland was the "normal condition" in the Colonies, and the Tories, largely made up of landed gentry, merchants, Church of England clergy, local officials, and professional men, had no recourse but to preserve the status quo which had given them, rather than the Whigs, prosperity and royal favor. Contemporary journals and memoirs are used to create a clear picture of the "just and natural" stand of the Tories, as they initially protested against the Revolution on their home grounds, and then became underground agents, or served in the armies of the Crown, or fled to New York City or to England under the pressure of mobs or of laws designed to deprive them of civil rights. The life of the exiles in New York is treated at length, and may be compared with the lot of those who took refuge in England as described in Lewis Einstein's Divided Loyalties: Americans in England during the War of Independence (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1933. xvi, 469 p.).

3268. Washington, George. Basic writings of George Washington, edited with an introd. and notes, by Saxe Commins. New York, Random House, 1948. xvii, 697 p. 48–7853 E312.72 1948

3269. Freeman, Douglas Southall. George Washington, a biography. New York, Scribner, 1948–57. 7 v. illus. 48–8880 E312.F82

CONTENTS.—v. 1–2. Young Washington.—v. 3. Planter and patriot.— v. 4. Leader of the Revolution.—v. 5. Victory with the help of France.—v. 6. Patriot and President.—v. 7. First in peace.

3270. Little, Shelby (Melton). George Washington. New York, Minton, Balch, 1929. 481 p. 29–18687 E312.L78

Bibliography: p. 465–473.

3271. Stephenson, Nathaniel Wright, and Waldo Hilary Dunn. George Washington. New York, Oxford University Press, 1940. 2 v. illus. 40–27358 E312.S82

After the death of Dr. Stephenson in 1935 the incomplete work was revised, and the last seven chapters written by W. H. Dunn.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. 1732–1777.—v. 2. 1778–1799.

Dr. Freeman's biography of Washington (1732–1799), the seventh volume of which was produced after his death by his assistants, John Alexander Carroll and Mary Wells Ashworth, is a large-scale treatment of the commander-in-chief of the Continental Army and the first President of the United States. More than a detailed account of the life of a Virginia planter, a full record of a public man, and a military biography, these seven volumes include a thorough examination and discerning appraisal of the Washington legend. The result is a biography which takes into account every phase and feature of Washington including his background, his behavior, and his development in private and public life. Above all, this is a study of the growth of a personality, not an account of the static existence of a paragon born. For those not wishing to cope with the mass of detail which Freeman includes in his work, shorter narratives are those of Shelby Little in one volume and of Nathaniel Wright Stephenson in two. Basic Writings of George Washington, edited by Saxe Commins, is an effort to convey the main events of the period from 1753 to 1796 as perceived at the time by Washington. The 242 items contained in this collection were derived from The Writings of George Washington from the Original Manuscript Sources, 1745–1799 (Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1931–44. 39 v.). Prepared under the direction of the George Washington Bicentennial Commission and edited by John C. Fitzpatrick, this collection of approximately 17,000 items includes every Washington writing known up to the time that the last volume went to press, with one important exception: The Diaries of George Washington, 1748–1799 (Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1925. 4 v.), also edited by Dr. Fitzpatrick. This concise and unintrospective record was not kept during the Revolution, and, unfortunately, is quite irregular during the Presidency. Two examples of studies of specific aspects of Washington's life are Samuel Eliot Morison's The Young Man Washington (Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press, 1932. 43 p.), and Charles Henry Ambler's George Washington and the West (Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1936. 270 p.); the latter work is a discussion in some detail of the more important aspects, political, economic, and military, of Washington's interests and activities in the trans-Appalachian West, which he was almost the only statesman of his day to visit. The evolution of Mount Vernon, the home of Washington, from family seat to national shrine, including many details of the day-to-day activities of the United States' first first family, is described in Paul Wilstach's Mount Vernon, Washington's Home and the Nation's Shrine (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1916. xvi, 301 p.).

3272. Wrong, George M. Canada and the American Revolution; the disruption of the first British Empire. New York, Macmillan, 1935. 497 p. 35–1792 E263.C2W6

"Authorities": p. 479–489.

The period under consideration extends from 1763 to the close of the American Revolution. Discussed are French Canada and its people, the military operations of the Revolution, the demands of the American peace commissioners as they affected Canada, and the problems of the American Loyalists. In addition, political, economic, and social conditions in Britain and the Colonies are subjected to a critical analysis. This Canadian scholar attributes much of the responsibility for the Revolution to British "stupidity and arrogance." Emphasis is placed upon the French culture of the Canadians, and, aside from provincial tactlessness on the part of the Americans who invaded Canada in 1775, the reason assigned for the failure of the Americans to woo successfully their northern neighbors is the Canadians' ingrained respect for authority, "derived less from loyalty to George III than from monarchical France and Catholic Rome."

F. Federal America (1783–1815)

3273. Abernethy, Thomas Perkins. The Burr conspiracy. New York, Oxford University Press, 1954. 301 p. 54–6907 E334.A6
Bibliography: p. 276–284.

Set against the background of the period of unrest following the formation of the Union is this detailed account of a conspiracy hatched by the pretentious ambition of Aaron Burr (1756–1836), Revolutionary soldier, lawyer, United States Senator, and third Vice President of the United States. Burr envisioned himself as being at the head of an empire vaster than that which he had lost by a single vote in 1801. From 1804 Burr's major objective was the separation of the Western States from the Union, with New Orleans as the capital and the Alleghenies as the eastern boundary of the new political unit. Also involved were filibustering expeditions into the Floridas and Mexico, and the settlement of the Bastrop lands. Ever an opportunist, Burr presented to anyone who would listen to his scheme only such portions of it as would appeal to him as a prospective conspirator. The success of the conspiracy, which, Professor Abernethy asserts, next to the Confederate War "posed the greatest threat of dismemberment which the American Union has ever faced," depended upon disaffection in the West, the intrigues of certain Eastern Federalists, the adherence of various land speculators, soldiers of fortune, and office seekers, a war between the United States and Spain, and help from Great Britain. The basic patriotism and common sense of the frontiersmen, along with the defection of Burr's fellow conspirator, James Wilkinson, doomed Burr's plot, which ended in the farcical treason trial of 1807 at Richmond.

3274. Adams, Henry. History of the United States of America during the administration of Thomas Jefferson. With introd. by Henry Steele Commager. New York, A. & C. Boni, 1930. 2 v. maps. ([His History of the United States of America, v. 1–2]) 30–10226 E302.1.A24, v. 1–2
Contents.—1. 1801–1805.—2. 1805–1809.

3275. Adams, Henry. History of the United States of America during the administration of James Madison. New York, A. & C. Boni, 1930. 2 v. ([His History of the United States of America, v. 3–4]) 30–10227 E302.1.A24, v. 3–4
Contents.—3. 1809–1813.—4. 1813–1817.

Adams (1838–1918), who is also discussed under Literature (nos. 688–700) and in the preceding section on Historiography (no. 3055), was in 1870 more or less drafted by Harvard College to teach medieval history, of which he knew nothing. During the academic year of 1874–75 Professor Adams added a course in American history, and found the periods in which his own grandfather and great-grandfather were major figures so absorbing that after two more terms he abandoned pedagogy for historical research and writing. The first fruit of his new interest was his edition of Documents Relating to New-England Federalism, 1800–1815 (Boston, Little, Brown, 1877. 437 p.). He had already begun searching and procuring transcriptions from national archives, and his History of the United States was evidently conceived by this time. It was, however, delayed, first by Adams' concentrated work on the Gallatin papers begun in 1877 (see no. 3311) and by the shattering effect upon him of his wife's breakdown and suicide in 1885. Pulling himself together after a long trip to Japan, he worked intensively at the History, which was published, in three installments amounting to nine volumes, during 1889–91. A completely individual work in outlook, style, and organization, it has fascinated three generations of students. The famous first six chapters, which survey the state of American society in 1800, were doubtless inspired by the equally famous third chapter of Macaulay's History of England; the concluding four chapters, which view the social changes of the intervening 16 years in a balancing assessment and an agnostic temper, had no such model. The detailed narrative which intervenes is largely concerned with political, diplomatic, and military events; but those who complain of its deficiency in economic matters overlook the author's special competence in the realm of finance. The chapters on foreign relations are written on a genuinely international level, for Adams had thoroughly familiarized himself with Napoleonic Europe. His sympathies, it has been pointed out, lie with the Northern Democrats; the Southern wing is ironically treated, while the Federalists are castigated. The essence of the History may be said to lie in its contrasting of the requirements of American nationhood with Jefferson's ideal of weak government, and in underlining the confusion to which the latter inevitably worked out in practice. "Already in 1817 the difference between Europe and America was decided." "American character was formed, if not fixed," but circumstances and not national policy had brought about this result.

3276. Adams, John. Works. With a life of the author, notes, and illus., by his grandson, Charles Francis Adams. Boston, Little, Brown, 1850–56 [v. 1, 1856] 10 v. 8–19755 E302.A26

3277. Adams, John. Familiar letters of John Adams and his wife Abigail Adams, during the Revolution. With a memoir of Mrs. Adams. By Charles Francis Adams. New York, Hurd & Houghton, 1876. xxxii, 424 p.
4–16982 E322.A518

3278. Chinard, Gilbert. Honest John Adams. Boston, Little, Brown, 1933. 359 p. illus.
33–32200 E322.C47

3279. Haraszti, Zoltán. John Adams & the prophets of progress. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 362 p. facsims.
52–5030 E322.H3

Born on a Braintree, Massachusetts, farm, John Adams (1735–1826), after attending Harvard and casting aside aspirations to a career in the Christian ministry, served for a short while as a Worcester schoolmaster, and then turned to the practice of the law. Despite his social conservatism and his avoidance of any step which would tend to compromise his position as a legal practitioner, Adams became a leader of the Patriots and was sent to Philadelphia as a member of Massachusetts' delegation to the First Continental Congress. In the Second he soon became a wheelhorse of the Revolution, which took him out of his provincial surroundings and made him a national figure. Before retiring from public life in 1801, Adams served as a diplomatic representative of the United States in Paris, The Hague, and London, and then as first Vice-President and second President of the new Nation. In Honest John Adams, Dr. Chinard focuses his attention not on Adams' politics, but on the personality and beliefs of the self-made New England aristocrat, John Adams. Adams' defense of Captain Preston following the Boston Massacre was inspired by his fear of ochlocracy, but he was no less critical of rule by the few. He eventually incurred the enmity of both the radicals and their antagonists, and was eliminated from active politics. The author regards Adams as "the most realistic statesman of his age." A recent penetrating study is Stephen Kurtz' The Presidency of John Adams; the Collapse of Federalism, 1795–1800 (Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1957. 448 p.). The author does not view the Adams administration as the kind of negative hiatus which it is usually made to appear. He concludes that Jefferson's elevation to the Presidency "promised that political liberty might be assured of a healthy environment within which to grow, but it did not end the threat to liberty in America of that era. John Adams must be credited with having destroyed the instrument of repression and the influence of its champions [the Provisional Army and the Hamiltonian Federalists] months before the election took place. His struggle for independence in 1799 and 1800 was no less significant or remarkable than that in which he had taken a leading part during 1775 and 1776. In a very real sense, Adams' bold conduct allowed Jefferson to say with plausibility, 'We are all republicans—we are all federalists.'" John Adams' library, originally presented to the town of Quincy, has been deposited in the Boston Public Library since 1893. More than a hundred of its volumes contain Adams' marginal notes, and these marginalia are the main substance of Mr. Haraszti's John Adams & the Prophets of Progress. Excerpts from the texts upon which Adams commented are so arranged as to render the whole a running dialogue between him and the individual authors. The product is a rebuttal of the philosophes and a review of the age of the French Revolution and Napoleon. Mr. Haraszti has added accounts of the works upon which Adams commented, and upon their authors, ranging from Bolingbroke to Condorcet. In addition, there are chapters on Adams as a book collector and as a political theorist. In conclusion the author calls for a more general acceptance of Adams as a great political thinker. A new edition of the Adams papers is in prospect, but the standard one remains The Works of John Adams in ten volumes, edited by his grandson, Charles Francis Adams, over a century ago. Included in it are Adams' diary, sections of his autobiography, his longer essays, official papers, and personal letters. An indispensable supplement is the same editor's Familiar Letters of John Adams and His Wife Abigail Adams, during the Revolution, a rich commentary on family and Revolutionary affairs. There are some recent abridgments: George A. Peek's convenient edition, The Political Writings of John Adams: Representative Selections (New York, Liberal Arts Press, 1954. 223 p.), reprints the more cogent portions of Adams' rather diffuse theoretical writings on politics, with an introductory essay emphasizing his basic conservatism. The Selected Writings of John and John Quincy Adams, edited by Adrienne Koch and William Peden (New York, Knopf, 1946. xxix, 413, xxix p.), are taken from diaries, autobiographies, public papers, and letters; many of the selections are prefaced by notes explaining their contents and the circumstances which produced them, and there is an introductory biographical essay.

3280. Baldwin, Leland D. Whiskey rebels; the story of a frontier uprising. Decorations by Ward Hunter. [Pittsburgh] University of Pittsburgh Press, 1939. 326 p.
39–11763 E315.B52

"This book is one of a series relating western Pennsylvania history, written under the direction of the Western Pennsylvania Historical Survey sponsored jointly by the Buhl Foundation, the Historical Society of Western Pennsylvania and the University of Pittsburgh."

Bibliography: p. [303]–316.

Taxes on alcoholic beverages have been a regular resort of American public finance, but the excise act which Hamilton induced the Congress to pass in 1791 bore with uncommon hardship upon the small farmers of western Pennsylvania. They had no marketable commodity save the product of their own small stills, and their differences with the local collectors of excise could be settled only by judicial process in the Federal court at distant Philadelphia. Three years of strenuous agitation succeeded in producing a relaxation of the latter rule, but last-minute prosecutions under the old rule touched off a crisis and some violence at midsummer of 1794. Hugh H. Brackenridge and Albert Gallatin succeeded in persuading the potential rebels to disperse and adopt peaceful means. While there was no rebellion, there was also little submission, and the President mobilized a little army of 13,000 militia from four states, which marched to Pittsburgh and occupied the western counties for a few weeks while conspicuous offenders were rounded up—to be later acquitted by the courts. Professor Baldwin's spirited narrative of this revealing episode is wholly in sympathy with the westerners, and he goes so far as to suggest that the whole affair was engineered by Hamilton in order to strengthen and perpetuate the Federalist regime.

3281. Bowers, Claude G. Jefferson and Hamilton; the struggle for democracy in America. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1933. xvii, 531 p. illus.
35–23547 E311.B6592

Bibliography: p. [513]–518.

A vivid description of what the author, a devoted Jeffersonian, defines as the struggle between the forces of democracy and aristocracy, which marked the first 12 years of the existence of the United States. Hamilton and Jefferson were the titans of the struggle, but behind them were others not neglected by Mr. Bowers. American society, with its drawing rooms, coffeeshops, and taverns, together with the more patently political arenas of the halls of the Congress, mass meetings, and public dinners, was the wellspring of this battle of fundamentals. To explain and give meaning to the controversy over the shaping of the Republic it is described complete with its prejudices and passions. To be sure, Federalist blackness is usually Stygian, and Democratic whiteness dazzling, and all the dramatic elements of the situation are much exaggerated. The work, originally published in 1925, is based upon printed sources, but gains color from its numerous quotations from contemporary newspapers.

3282. Brant, Irving. James Madison. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1941–57. 5 v.
41–19279 E342.B7

Contents.—[v. 1] The Virginia revolutionist.—[v. 2] The nationalist, 1780–1787.—[v. 3] Father of the Constitution, 1787–1800.—[v. 4] Secretary of State, 1800–1809.—[v. 5] The President, 1809–1812.

3283. Hunt, Gaillard. The life of James Madison. New York, Doubleday, Page, 1902. 402 p.
3–4211 E342.H943

On his retirement from the Senate of the United States, William Cabell Rives (1793–1868), who had been a protégé of Jefferson, embarked upon a large-scale life of James Madison (1751–1836). Rives' work on his History of the Life and Times of James Madison was interrupted by his second mission to France and by the secession crisis, but before his death he completed three large volumes (Boston, Little, Brown, 1859–68) which reached 1797. Madison's papers were purchased from Dolley Madison by the Government in several installments, leading to two official publications from them, in 3 volumes in 1840 and 4 in 1865; a more recent edition which does not, however, include everything in the older ones, is that of Gaillard Hunt: The Writings of James Madison (New York, Putnam, 1900–10. 9 v.). Hunt published The Life of James Madison while this edition was in progress; it is a lucid and balanced treatment of its subject down to 1801, but has less than a hundred pages on Madison in Washington. Edward McNall Burns' James Madison, Philosopher of the Constitution (New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1938. 212 p.) is a concise formulation of Madison's political views, setting his contributions to the Constitution against his theories of the State and of democracy, and indicating his relationship to other 18th-century theorists. Rives' project of a large-scale life has been revived in our day by Mr. Irving Brant, a Middle-Western newspaperman who was led to constitutional questions and thence to Madison by President Franklin Roosevelt's plan to change the Supreme Court. Five volumes published over a 16-year period have reached the Declaration of War in 1812. Their reception has been mixed: some critics are obviously delighted with the author's trenchant espousal of the Democratic-Republican position; others find the work wearying in its incessant accumulation of detail, and the two latest volumes, which justify Madison's diplomacy on all occasions, have met with some incredulity. All regard the work as based on vast research in primary sources, and as providing the only detailed analysis of Madison's career after 1787.

3284. Cresson, William P. James Monroe. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1946. xiv, 577 p. illus. 47–652 E372.C7
"List of references": p. 549–559.

James Monroe (1758–1831) was the last and least endowed of the "Virginia dynasty," but by no means the least successful. Following his service as an officer in the Revolution, Monroe, impelled by financial necessity and fortunate in his gifts of honesty, ambition, influential sponsorship, and the ability to work hard and make friends, entered upon a career of public service which led him into a wide variety of offices, state and national, legislative and executive, at home and abroad. Though he was not particularly fortunate in his diplomatic missions, circumstance was not consistently favorable to success. When the Presidency was bestowed upon him in 1817, his industry and judgment, the advice of such friends as Jefferson and Madison, and a strong Cabinet all combined to launch a most successful administration. Though his career in public office was lengthy and varied, the fifth President of the United States is perhaps best remembered for the "doctrine" of foreign policy which bears his name. This biography, which was published 14 years after Dr. Cresson's death, and received its final revision from other hands, grants to Monroe the genius of apprehending the opportune moment for the formal enunciation of a principle which previously had been simply a matter of American public opinion and aspiration.

3285. Dauer, Manning J. The Adams Federalists. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1953. xxiii, 381 p. maps. 53–11171 E321.D23
Bibliography: p. 351–373.

This study of the supporters of John Adams within the Federalist Party is a detailed account of political circumstances and events. Professor Dauer's extensive geographical analysis of votes on major issues in the House of Representatives from March 1796 to May 1802 supports his main thesis: the Federalist majorities which put through the Constitution and established the Federal Government depended upon an alliance between commercial districts and agricultural ones—especially those which produced cash crops for the international market. Through the manipulation of Hamilton and the "High-Federalists," Federal policy became increasingly the servant of commercial interests. During the French crisis of 1798–99, expensive armaments were put on foot which could have been justified by war, but without it could only cost the Federalist Party the support of overtaxed agrarians. The war which the Hamiltonians desired was avoidable, and Adams, who had wanted neither the regiments nor the taxes, made peace with France. Between Adams' lack of political finesse and Hamilton's apparent lack of common honesty, the Federalist Party went to the wall, and Jefferson led a united agrarian majority.

3286. Dodd, William E. The life of Nathaniel Macon. Raleigh, N. C., Edwards & Broughton, 1903. xvi, 443 p. 4–4560 E302.6.M17D6
"Sources of information": p. xvi.

Macon (1758–1837), after serving an apprenticeship in North Carolina politics as an adherent of the upcountry democracy led by Willie Jones, and fighting the adoption of the Constitution, sat continuously for nearly 38 years in the Congress of the United States—in the House from 1791 to 1815, and in the Senate until his voluntary retirement from public life at the close of 1828. From the time that party divisions became discernible, he was among the most influential of the Democratic-Republicans, and he was considerably more representative of the Southern rank and file, and of the opinions which came to prevail in the party as a whole, than was its leader, Thomas Jefferson. To Macon strict construction of the Constitution became a kind of fetish. The interests of agriculture he regarded as paramount, and those of commerce as so antipathetic to them that no navy need be maintained to protect American merchantmen. Macon was one of the earliest to seize upon slavery as an essential interest of Southern agriculture, and to assert its constitutional immunity from national control; he was a forerunner of John Randolph and of Calhoun. The author hardly makes the most of Macon's completely negative conception of the role of the Federal Government, and his passion to restrict its appropriations. Macon was himself completely disinterested and devoid of personal malice, and retained his great popularity in his State and section through changing times.

3287. Driver, Carl S. John Sevier, pioneer of the Old Southwest. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1932. 240 p.
32–30370 E302.6.S45D8
Bibliography: p. [219]–225.

Sevier (1745–1815), frontiersman, Indian fighter, land speculator, state senator, Congressman, only Governor of the State of Franklin, and the first Governor of Tennessee, moved into the West with the frontier and participated in the various activities of the border. His whole life was connected with the development of the West, and he died in its service. The author, in Sevier's behalf, points out that Andrew Jackson, Sevier's antagonist, who became the representative of the West in the eyes of the Nation, reflected the ideals and aspirations of the West after its civilization had been firmly established. Sevier, a more provincial figure, overshadowed by Jackson, the national figure, was the true representative of the old West, the ideal of the man who struggled and fought for the acquisition of the soil.

3288. Hamilton, Alexander. Alexander Hamilton and the founding of the Nation. Edited by Richard B. Morris. New York, Dial Press, 1957. xxi, 617 p. 56–12132 E302.H2573

3289. Hamilton, Alexander. Papers on public credit, commerce and finance. Edited by Samuel McKee, Jr. New York, Columbia University Press, 1934. xxiv, 303 p.
34–18967 HC105.H18

3290. Schachner, Nathan. Alexander Hamilton. New York, Appleton-Century, 1946. 488 p.
46–3861 E302.6.H2S25
Bibliography: p. 473–481.

3291. Mitchell, Broadus. Alexander Hamilton. v. 1. Youth to maturity, 1755–1788. New York, Macmillan, 1957. 675 p.
57–5506 E302.6.H2M6
Bibliography: p. 647–666.

Hamilton (1755–1804) was the Founding Father who was different. Born on the West Indian island of Nevis, he was ineligible for the Presidency of the United States. Technically illegitimate and self-supporting from the age of 12, he was even more completely a self-made man than Franklin. He was the only member of the Constitutional Convention to disapprove of republican government and to propose an elective monarchy; but this did not prevent him from joining with Madison to present the most effective apology for a new frame of government that has ever been penned (The Federalist, q. v.). Whether his military abilities were so transcendent as he and his warmer admirers supposed must remain unknown, since he never held an independent command; but his past mastery of finance and of the techniques of public administration was placed beyond question during his service as first Secretary of the Treasury of the United States (1789–95). Total estimates of Hamilton will probably differ as much in the future as they have in the past, according to the estimator's value of his concrete services as against what Henry Adams aptly termed "the adventurer in him." Both of the older editions of Hamilton's writings took strange liberties with their texts; the new one undertaken at Columbia University has not reached the stage of publication. Professor Morris' volume of selections is arranged in chapters, the progression of which is partly chronological and partly topical; there is a general introduction and much interspersed explanatory matter by the editor. The Secretary of the Treasury's epoch-making reports to Congress on the public credit (1790 and 1795), on a national bank (1790), and on manufactures (1791), together with his letter to President Washington which, in justifying the constitutionality of the bank, develops his doctrine of implied powers, are separately published by Dr. McKee in a volume of attractive format. Mr. Schachner's biography is well proportioned and solidly researched, using manuscripts to supplement printed sources. It takes a middle-of-the-road position, and certainly does not gloss over its protagonist's errors of judgment or temper. Professor Mitchell is more enthusiastic in his admiration of Hamilton's genius; his first volume, which reaches the ratification of the Constitution, is based on an exhaustive searching of the sources, but once more it is true that the fresh material turned up makes no great alteration in the old picture. For the period after 1788, The Intimate Life of Alexander Hamilton by his grandson, Allan McLane Hamilton (New York, Scribner, 1910. 483 p.), contains valuable material not to be found elsewhere.

3292. Jefferson, Thomas. Papers. Julian P. Boyd, editor. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1950–56. 13 v. 50–7486 E302.J463
Associate editors: v. 1–5, Lyman H. Butterfield and Mina R. Bryan; v. 6–8, Mina R. Bryan and Elizabeth L. Hutter; v. 9, Mina R. Bryan; v. 10–12, Mina R. Bryan and Fredrick Aandahl; v. 13, Mina R. Bryan.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. 1760–1776.—v. 2. January 1777 to June 1779.—v. 3. June 1779 to September 1780.—v. 4. 1 October 1780 to 24 February 1781.—

v. 5. 25 February 1781 to 20 May 1781.— v. 6. 21 May 1781 to 1 March 1784.—v. 7. 2 March 1784 to 25 February 1785.—v. 8. 25 February to 31 October 1785.—v. 9. 1 November 1785 to 22 June 1786.—v. 10. 22 June to 31 December 1786.— v. 11. 1 January to 6 August 1787.—v. 12. 7 August 1787 to 31 March 1788.—v. 13. March to 7 October 1788.

——— ——— Index, volumes 1–6. Compiled by Elizabeth J. Sherwood and Ida T. Hopper. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1954. 229 p.
E302.J463 Index

3293. Jefferson, Thomas. Writings. Collected and edited by Paul Leicester Ford. New York, Putnam, 1892–99. 10 v.
2–5666 E302.J466

CONTENTS.—v. 1. 1760–1775.—v. 2. 1776–1781.—v. 3. 1781–1784.—v. 4. 1784–1787.—v. 5. 1788–1792.—v. 6. 1792–1794.—v. 7. 1795–1801.—v. 8. 1801–1806.—v. 9. 1807–1815.—v. 10. 1816–1826.

3294. Jefferson, Thomas. Jefferson himself, the personal narrative of a many-sided American. Edited by Bernard Mayo. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1942. xv, 384 p. illus.
42–50339 E332.J464

3295. Malone, Dumas. Jefferson and his time. Boston, Little, Brown, 1948–51. 2 v. illus.
48–5972 E332.M25

"Select critical bibliography": v. 1, p. [457]–470; v. 2, p. [494]–504.

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Jefferson the Virginian.—v. 2. Jefferson and the rights of man.

3296. Randall, Henry S. The life of Thomas Jefferson. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1888. 3 v.
9–28978 E332.R19

First published in 1857.

3297. Nock, Albert Jay. Jefferson. New York, Harcourt, Brace, ©1926. 340 p.
26–13101 E332.N75

Jefferson (1743–1826) was the author of the Declaration of Independence, the second Governor of the State of Virginia, the second Minister from the United States to France, the first Secretary of State of the United States, the second Vice President and third President of the United States, and the founder of the University of Virginia. Among the Founding Fathers, only Franklin was his peer in universality of mind, and his writings of every description, but particularly the voluminous correspondence which he maintained until a few weeks before his death, constitute an incomparable mirror of the general and especially the intellectual history of his age. The complete edition of The Papers of Thomas Jefferson planned and initiated by Dr. Boyd of Princeton University, with its careful inventorying of all surviving manuscripts and its abundance of elucidation in introductions and notes, naturally supersedes all previous editions as far as it has gone. But volume 13, the latest to appear, only reaches October 7, 1788, and the announced rate of publication has evidently slackened. It is still necessary, therefore, to resort to one of the older editions for the remainder of Jefferson's career; that of P. L. Ford is listed above as being the easiest to use. Professor Mayo's Jefferson Himself is a collection of extracts from Jefferson's brief autobiography, his letters, and his other writings, arranged in a chronological sequence so as to make a reasonably continuous narrative of his career in his own words. Dr. Malone is engaged upon a full-scale biography of Jefferson, incorporating recent scholarship and working out many problems hitherto unsolved or unapproached. He can perhaps at times be reproached with putting Jefferson's lack of straightforwardness in too favorable a light. Unfortunately his second volume, the latest to appear, only reaches the close of 1792. For a detailed narrative from that point one may turn to the older work of Randall, which has the endorsement of Dr. Malone; it has not, he justly says, enjoyed the reputation it deserved because its author, a convinced Democrat, had the misfortune of publishing on the eve of an age of Republican domination, especially of the journals of literary opinion. Among a variety of briefer biographies, that of the late A. J. Nock has had warm admirers through three decades for its selection of material, charm of style, intuitive insight, and delicate characterization. Special studies are legion, and may readily be located through the bibliographies in Malone and elsewhere.

3298. Lewis, Meriwether, and William Clark. The journals of Lewis and Clark. Edited by Bernard De Voto. Maps by Erwin Raisz. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1953. lii, 504 p.
53–9244 F592.4 1953

3299. Bakeless, John E. Lewis & Clark, partners in discovery. New York, Morrow, 1947. 498 p. illus.
47–12243 F592.7.B3

The Lewis and Clark expedition of 1804–6, from St. Louis to the mouth of the Columbia River and back, is one of the high points in the exploration of the North American Continent and in the expansion of the United States; it is also one of the most fascinating of adventure stories. Planned by President Jefferson in order to make known the northern part of the Louisiana Territory purchased the year before, it was entrusted to a young man who enjoyed his personal confidence and was serving as his private secretary. Meriwether Lewis (1774–1809) chose as his colleague William Clark (1770–1838), under whom he had served in the regular army. Under their harmonious leadership, the expedition enjoyed an exceptional blend of good management and good fortune, and was successful in all its objectives. The reader has here a choice between a selection from the original journals of the expedition, chiefly those kept by the two leaders, and a joint biography which includes a narrative of the expedition emphasizing its day-to-day incidents. Mr. De Voto's narrative, written from a rather broader geographical viewpoint, forms the concluding portion of his The Course of Empire (no. 3161). His selection from the journals comes from the 7-volume set edited by Reuben Gold Thwaites in 1904–5: Original Journals of the Lewis and Clark Expedition (New York, Dodd, Mead), and includes about half of the text available there, with a general introduction, some interspersed expository matter in italics, and brief footnotes. Dr. Bakeless devotes nearly three-fifths of his volume to his anecdotal narrative of the expedition, including a chapter on "Aboriginal Amours," and the rest to the earlier careers of his protagonists, to the brief later life and tragic end of Meriwether Lewis, and to the long public service and honorable old age of Governor Clark. For both the early and the late phases he has turned up much new information from scattered documents in archives and manuscript collections.

3300. Link, Eugene Perry. Democratic-Republican societies, 1790–1800. New York, Columbia University Press, 1942. 256 p. (Columbia studies in American culture, no. 9)
42–5915 E310.L6 1942a

Issued also as thesis (Ph. D.) Columbia University.

Bibliography: p. [213]–242.

A detailed study of the popular societies which were a prominent feature of the last decade of the 18th century, which President Washington sought to stigmatize as "self-created," and which indeed spread into most States of the Union in an apparently spontaneous manner. Dr. Link has identified 42 such societies organized between 1793 and 1798, of which 9 were in Pennsylvania and 5 each in Vermont, Virginia, and South Carolina. He has analyzed their membership in the few cases in which this is possible, and finds that it came from a rather wide range of society, with merchants, manufacturers, lawyers, doctors, and public officials the fellows of craftsmen and artisans of all descriptions. He finds that their membership was perceptibly continuous with the Sons of Liberty and other groups which advanced the American Revolution, and that they were conscious of their kinship with comparable organizations in England and on the Continent. After reviewing their activities he concludes that, although they were not without elements seeking political or economic self-aggrandizement, on the whole these societies aimed at the free and enlightened discussion of public issues, and were active in the promotion of schools and libraries as agencies of democratic education.

3301. McLaughlin, Andrew Cunningham. The Confederation and the Constitution, 1783–1789. New York, Harper, 1905. xix, 348 p. maps. (The American Nation: a history, edited by A. B. Hart, v. 10) 5–30250 E178.A54, v. 10

"Critical essays on authorities": p. 318–336.

3302. Jensen, Merrill. The New Nation; a history of the United States during the Confederation, 1781–1789. New York, Knopf, 1950. xvii, 433, xi p. 50–9344 E303.J45 1950

"Essay on the sources": p. 429–432.

The late Professor McLaughlin's volume remains, after half a century, a concise and lucid narrative of the events of greatest national concern from the peace negotiations which terminated the Revolution through the ratification of the new Constitution. He thus states his central theme: "The political task that confronted the people when independence from Great Britain was declared was in its essence the same that had confronted the British ministry ten years before—the task of imperial organization." He regards the Articles of Confederation as "an advance on previous instruments of like kind in the world's history"; they were chiefly defective in withholding from the central authority the powers of raising money and of regulating commerce. Attempts to make the best of the Articles were quite played out by the end of 1786, when a deep gloom had settled upon conservative men, which gave energy to their efforts toward a radical change in the following year. None of this gloom is to be found in the pages of Professor Jensen's volume, which is a sequel to his Articles of Confederation (no. 3253). A spirit of optimism reigned in the new Nation, and is evident in the beginnings of a national literature. Society was in a state of vigorous health, and the grievances left over from the old order were under sharp attack from an active humanitarian movement. The economic prostration which follows protracted war was being alleviated by a remarkable outburst of commercial expansion and business enterprise. Even on the part of the central government there was substantial achievement: the domestic debt created by the Revolution was reduced, a national domain created, and a responsible staff of civil servants built up. The change initiated in 1787 was carried through by men who feared democracy and who wanted a national instead of a federal government. The book provides a more detailed account of many aspects of this period than is available in any other general work, but it resolutely turns a blind eye on the impotence, impecuniosity, and defenselessness of the Confederation.

3303. Malone, Dumas. The public life of Thomas Cooper, 1783–1839. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1926. xv, 432 p. (Yale historical publications. Miscellany, 16)
26–15381 E302.6.C7M2
Thesis (Ph. D.)—Yale University, 1923.
"Bibliographical note": p. [402]–416.

Cooper (1759–1839) was an Englishman, a scientific amateur, a religious and political radical, and a friend of Joseph Priestley, whom he accompanied to America in 1794. His American career was remarkable for its versatility, its vicissitudes, and its progress from a radical to an extremely conservative position in politics. As a Jeffersonian pamphleteer he was sentenced to fine and six months' imprisonment for seditious libel against President Adams. He was appointed to office by the victorious Pennsylvania Republicans, but his independent course as a district judge cost him the favor of the more radical democrats, and in 1811 he was removed from the bench in consequence of an address by both houses of the legislature. Cooper then served as professor of chemistry in two Pennsylvania colleges, and soon after transferring to South Carolina College, in 1820, was chosen its president. Here he became the oracle of the state rights philosophy, repudiating the protective tariff, and defending slavery and nullification. Cooper's own papers were destroyed in their entirety, and Dr. Malone's volume is a fine work of reconstruction, illuminating the career of a man who, if not an original thinker, was a powerful agitator and controversialist, uncommonly influential in the political and intellectual developments of his time.

3304. Monaghan, Frank. John Jay, defender of liberty against kings & peoples, author of the Constitution & Governor of New York, President of the Continental Congress, co-author of the Federalist, negotiator of the Peace of 1783 & the Jay Treaty of 1794, first Chief Justice of the United States. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1935. 497 p. illus. 35–18227 E302.6.J4M6
"The sources": p. [465]–474.

A sympathetic narrative rich in the detail of the life and character of an aristocratic New Yorker who prided himself on the rectitude of his motives and his devotion to public duty. The author seeks to restore Jay (1745–1829) to public esteem, a task not facilitated by the fact that Jay, ever conscious of his dignity, wrote with the feeling that posterity was peering over his shoulder. In addition to the portrait of a moderate who felt that the British colonies were prompted and impelled to independence by necessity and not by choice, many details of the society of Jay's era, such as an entertaining section describing the rigors of life on the judicial circuit, are provided.

3305. Morison, Samuel Eliot. The life and letters of Harrison Gray Otis, Federalist, 1765–1848. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1913. 2 v. illus. 13–23631 E340.O8M8
Bibliography: v. 2, p. [311]–317.

Orator, and attorney of the first rank, Harrison Gray Otis entered politics during Washington's second administration. He was a leader in the movement of resistance to "Mr. Madison's War" which culminated in the Hartford Convention in 1814, a movement in which this native Bostonian exerted his greatest influence. Having succeeded in keeping the convention's action within the bounds of moderation and well short of even a hint of secession, Otis continued to justify the convention and its work during the remainder of his life, often to the detriment of his political career. In spite of the dying out of the Federalist Party, he continued to be elected to office by Massachusetts or Boston into the Jacksonian era. If no great statesman, Otis was an attractive figure who represented the best of the political and social organization which was the Federalist Party. The author has endeavored, in addition to setting forth the events of Otis' life, to describe critically Otis' ideas, feelings, and prejudices, and to discover the motives which guided his actions in the political crises of his day, whether they centered upon nationalism, sectionalism, or abolitionism. These volumes contain a wealth of information about the later and somewhat depressing years of the Federalist Party.

3306. Pratt, Julius W. Expansionists of 1812. New York, P. Smith, 1949, ©1925. 309 p.
49–9879 E357.P9 1949
Bibliography: p. 275–289.

A scholarly study, solidly based on contemporary manuscripts and newspapers, of aspects of public opinion, diplomacy, and strategy before and during the War of 1812. It shows that a general sentiment in the Northwest in favor of the acquisition of Canada, which had existed since the Revolution, became strongly activated when Tecumseh was supplied with British arms; that the South was eager to annex the Floridas, and East Florida was in part occupied before the declaration of war; that Northern sentiment compelled the Madison administration to withdraw from Florida, while the administration and Southern congressmen lacked enthusiasm for the Canada campaign; and that the idea of Manifest Destiny made its first general appearance at this time. At the time of its appearance Professor Pratt's book was hailed with enthusiasm, and has been often taken to show that the "real cause" of the War of 1812 was not maritime grievances but Western land hunger. This conclusion the author had been very careful to disclaim: without those grievances, he declared, "it is safe to say, there would have been no war." To bring about the War of 1812, both sets of causes were probably essential.

3307. Roosevelt, Theodore. The winning of the West. New York, Putnam, 1889–96. 4 v. fold. maps. 1–8663 F351.R79

CONTENTS.—1. From the Alleghanies to the Mississippi, 1769–1776.—2. From the Alleghanies to the Mississippi, 1777–1783.—3. The founding of the trans-Alleghany commonwealths, 1784–1790.—4. Louisiana and the Northwest, 1791–1807.

Theodore Roosevelt was of the belief that the development of the Western country was such as to make the West peculiarly the exponent of all that is most vigorously American in the life of the United States. This vigorous study of the acquisition and settlement of the trans-Allegheny region from 1769 to 1807 concerns itself with the dramatic and picturesque. Of institutional or economic development one finds little information, but Indian warfare, intrigues involving the Westerners, French and Spaniards, and relations between the United States, Britain, and Spain concerning the Western country find places of prominence in a work which is clearly stamped with the emphatic personality of its author.

3308. Smith, James Morton. Freedom's fetters; the Alien and Sedition laws and American civil liberties. Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1956. 464 p. (Cornell studies in civil liberty) 56–2434 E327.S59

Passed in 1798, the Alien and Sedition laws were ostensibly designed to protect the United States during time of war, but in that era, when there was a strong link between foreign influence and domestic faction, these laws could also be used by their sponsors, the Federalists, as an instrument for the repression of political opposition. In this first of two projected volumes the author, pursuing an investigation of the relationship between liberty and authority in a popular form of government, "concentrates as exclusively as possible on the enactment and enforcement of the Federalist measures of 1798 and attempts to assess their influence in shaping the development of the political process of republicanism, with its goals of majority rule and individual rights."

3309. Starkey, Marion Lena. A little rebellion. New York, Knopf, 1955. 258 p. 55–9292 F69.S85

The "little rebellion" named after Captain Daniel Shays, of Pelham, Massachusetts, had few killings and no hangings, but great consequences in that it supplied power to the movement for a more perfect union. Miss Starkey retells this rather externally known episode of 1786–87 in the terms of human experience and achieves a dramatic presentation without ascribing wickedness to either side.

3310. Walters, Raymond. Albert Gallatin: Jeffersonian financier and diplomat. New York, Macmillan, 1957. 461 p. 57–8267 E302.6.G16W3

Bibliography: p. 435–446.

3311. Adams, Henry. The life of Albert Gallatin. New York, P. Smith, 1943. 697 p. A 44–322 NNC

"Reprinted under the auspices of the Out-of-Print Books Committee of the American Library Association."

Gallatin (1761–1849), a native of the Republic of Geneva, came to the United States at the age of 19, and, largely because of a Rousseauist enthusiasm for wild nature, settled in the far southwestern corner of Pennsylvania. The locale proved a disappointment, but Gallatin's uncommon abilities improved by an excellent education led almost at once to a political career among his frontiersman neighbors, and both in the Pennsylvania legislature and in the Congress of the United States his mastery of fiscal policy made him indispensable to the agrarian Republicans with whom he had allied himself. The same reason, together with a general capacity for policy, administration, and hard work of any kind, made him a prime reliance of Presidents Jefferson and Madison, but after nearly 12 years' service as Secretary of the Treasury he was forced out by the factious opposition of Southern party leaders in Congress. The remainder of his public career was employed in a succession of foreign missions, and his eighth and ninth decades were actively spent in private finance, enlightened publicism, and ethnological studies. Dr. Walters complains of his "relative obscurity today," but this is surely a consequence of the circumstances that Henry Adams did so solid a piece of work in his Life, originally published in 1879, and that the Gallatin family kept the papers closed to investigators for the next 60 years. Dr. Walters' volume, which is guided by the wider interests of present-day historians and takes a deeper interest in Gallatin's personality, supplements rather than replaces the earlier work.

G. The "Middle Period" (1815–60)

3312. Adams, John Quincy. Memoirs comprising portions of his diary from 1795 to 1848. Edited by Charles Francis Adams. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1874–77. 12 v. 4–20138 E377.A19

3313. Bemis, Samuel Flagg. John Quincy Adams and the Union. New York, Knopf, 1956. xix, 546 p. illus. 55–9271 E377.B46

When John Quincy Adams (1767–1848) became President in 1825, he had already had a long career in American foreign affairs, which is covered in Professor Bemis' John Quincy Adams and the Foundations of American Foreign Policy (no. 3529). John Quincy Adams and the Union opens with the campaign of 1824 and the election of Adams by the House of Representatives after a four-way race, in which Andrew Jackson received the largest popular and electoral vote. As a minority President Adams struggled, without much success, for his program of national expansion and Federal development of the Nation's resources. In the 1828 election he was defeated by Jackson, and for a time retired to private life. However, in 1831 he was elected to the House of Representatives by his home district, and was repeatedly reëlected by large majorities until his death. As a Congressman he continued his independent career, acting in behalf of the Nation, rather than of his constituency or party, and fought for the cause of liberty. He alienated the Southerners, since he spoke and acted vigorously against slavery, and the Northern abolitionists, since as a constitutionalist he would not fully support their views. He frequently fought the Southern-dominated Congress to a standstill, often by himself, for most Northerners in Congress regarded Southern support as necessary for their political ambitions. While a source of constant irritation to the House of Representatives, he achieved the respect and admiration of most as the leading parliamentarian of his day, and as an amazingly well-informed elder statesman. In this period he came to be known as the Old Man Eloquent. As an independent, a representative of the old elite, and a champion of unpopular views, he never had a large popular following, but he nonetheless managed to play a major, shaping role in the Nation's destiny. Much of this is revealed in his Memoirs, which are usually regarded as factually accurate, however colored by his own views and prejudices; they remain a major source for information on the public affairs of the period. This very large work has been abridged for the layman and general student by Allan Nevins: The Diary of John Quincy Adams, 1794–1845; American Diplomacy and Political, Social, and Intellectual Life from Washington to Polk (New York, Scribner, 1951. xxxv, 586 p.). The Writings of John Quincy Adams (New York, Macmillan, 1913–17. 7 v.) were edited by Worthington Chauncy Ford, but the unfinished set stops with 1823. A selective edition of Adams papers, to be published by Harvard University through the Belknap Press, is in preparation under the editorship of Lyman H. Butterfield; meanwhile a microfilm edition of the papers has been made available by the Massachusetts Historical Society.

3314. Barker, Eugene C. The life of Stephen F. Austin, founder of Texas, 1793–1836; a chapter in the westward movement of the Anglo-American people. Nashville, Cokesbury Press, 1925. xv, 551 p. illus. 26–9002 F389.A936

Bibliography: p. 525–534.

Stephen Fuller Austin was born in Virginia at the site of the lead mines of his father, Moses Austin (1761–1821). The father soon moved westward, controlling lead mines in Missouri, but had his son educated in the East. After Stephen's return he served in the Missouri legislature from 1814 to 1820, and afterward went to New Orleans to study law. In 1820 his father obtained a permit from the Mexican Government for settling families in Texas, then a part of Mexico. Moses Austin died before acting on this, but his son took it up. In January 1822 Stephen Austin settled the first American colony in Texas. In the next dozen years he displayed an extraordinary ability in maintaining smooth relations with the Mexican political factions, obtaining many concessions from the government, and keeping the state open to American colonization. He is deservedly called "the father of Texas," for he was the dominant factor in all activities and decisions to the time of the Texan revolt and declaration of independence in 1835. While until near the very end Austin had been loyal to Mexico, and though the future of Texas seemed to him more promising in association with that country than with the United States, his activities had brought about the Americanization of Texas, and led directly to American expansion across the Southwest to the Pacific. Dr. Barker also edited The Austin Papers (v. 1–2. Washington, Govt. Print. Off., 1924–28. 2 v. in 3; v. 3. Austin, University of Texas, 1927. xxxv, 494 p.), which include the official and private writings of both Moses and Stephen Austin.

3315. Bassett, John Spencer. The life of Andrew Jackson. New ed. New York, Macmillan, 1931. 2 v. in 1. illus. 31–23245 E382.B35
Paged continuously.
First published in 1911.

3316. James, Marquis. Andrew Jackson, the border captain. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1933. 461 p. illus. 33–7933 E382.J26
This volume ends with the presidential campaign of 1824.
Bibliography: p. [417]–424.

3317. James, Marquis. Andrew Jackson, portrait of a President. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1937. 627 p. illus. 37–28638 E382.J27
From 1824 to the end of Jackson's life.
Bibliography: p. [569]–578.

3318. Syrett, Harold C. Andrew Jackson: his contribution to the American tradition. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1953. 298 p. (Makers of the American tradition series) 53–8875 E382.S97

Jackson (1767–1845) was born in a backwoods settlement in the Carolinas, where he early experienced many of the shocks and difficulties of frontier life. At the age of 13 he fought in the Revolutionary War, but was soon taken prisoner. After the war he went to Tennessee, where he practiced law, and helped draft the State constitution. After serving briefly in each House of the U. S. Congress, he sat upon the supreme bench of Tennessee for 6 years (1798–1804), but resigned and lived as a gentleman planter at The Hermitage near Nashville for nearly a decade. He had, however, retained his commission as commander of the Tennessee militia, and when the Creek Indians rose in 1813, Jackson took the field against them. He overcame logistic difficulties, campaigned vigorously, and won hard-fought and complete victories. Rewarded with a major-generalship in the United States Army, he foiled a British descent on Mobile and concluded the war with a one-sided slaughter of the army attacking New Orleans (Jan. 8, 1815). He was at once established as the great popular hero of the war and a presidential possibility, and his further service on the Florida frontier and in the Senate was very much in the public eye. In 1824 he ran for President; while he received a plurality (in a field of four) of the electoral vote, the election by the House of Representatives went to J. Q. Adams. In 1828 and 1832 he was elected by large margins, and thus crystallized a political revolution which has been discussed in other books in this section (particularly Blau, no. 3319; Bowers, no. 3320; and Schlesinger, no. 3352). The introduction into national politics of government by the "common man" is also a major theme of Dr. Syrett's volume; like other books in its series, it is made up of extensive quotations from Jackson's writings (in fact mostly state papers penned by his lieutenants), supplemented by connective and explanatory expositions. After Jackson left the Presidency, he lived in semi-retirement at The Hermitage, but remained a factor in national government. His career was long and intensively studied by Bassett, whose scholarly life remains a highly reliable guide. The two-volume biography by Marquis James is also based on much research, including materials unknown to Bassett. However, James is not a historian's historian in his presentation of the development of the problems Jackson faced; but his work has considerable literary merit, and allows a convincing, living image of Jackson to emerge from its pages. A selective edition of Jackson's Correspondence (Washington, Carnegie Institution of Washington, 1926–35. 7 v. Publication no. 371. Papers of the Department of Historical Research) was edited by John Spencer Bassett; for the ordinary reader it is heavy going, since Jackson's extraordinary personal magnetism never penetrated his writing.

3319. Blau, Joseph L., ed. Social theories of Jacksonian democracy; representative writings of the period 1825–1850. New York, Liberal Arts Press, 1954. 383 p. (American heritage series, no. 1) 55–169 E338.B55 1954
Includes bibliography.

In this volume Mr. Blau has brought together a group of writings expressive of the views held by the supporters of Andrew Jackson. After an introduction by the editor on the Jacksonian movement, his selections are classified in three parts: "The Ideal of Self Government," "Economic Themes," and "Social Criticism." The movement arose with a popular hero after the choice of the President had been won by the people; it won national following while creating a feeling of national unity at a time when the former leading groups were splitting up into pro- and anti-slavery factions; but, as the editor points out, the basic source of unity for the national movement was a widespread lower-middle-class opposition to economic control from Boston, New York, and Philadelphia. The movement itself was an alliance of diverse groups who presented a variety of positive programs, often in conflict with one another. The various facets of this movement, rather than the program which Jackson and his advisers forged, provide the material for this book. Another book which aims to present the varying and at times conflicting elements that made up Jacksonianism is The Jacksonian Persuasion; Politics and Belief (Stanford, Stanford University Press, 1957. 231 p.), by Marvin Meyers; in addition to a number of general chapters on causes, and a detailed analysis of particular groups of problems, the book devotes much space to the individual versions of Jacksonianism held by a number of contemporaries.

3320. Bowers, Claude G. The party battles of the Jackson period. Anniversary ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin [pref. 1928] ©1922. xix, 506 p. front., ports. 38–20418 E381.B792

"Books, papers, and manuscripts cited and consulted": p. [481]–487.

In 1828 the Nation held its first Presidential election wherein the choice was in most States decided by the electorate rather than by the State politicians. The result was the election of the popular Jackson over the entrenched administration party. It also meant that for the first time political parties began to function on the vote-getting level that has since been familiar. This study of the 8 years of the Jackson administration opens with a survey of the physical and social scene in Washington at the time, and then turns to the narrative proper. While Jackson is something of a focal point, more attention is given to other leaders, such as the opposition Senators Henry Clay, John C. Calhoun, and Daniel Webster, and pro-Jackson politicians such as Martin Van Buren, Edward Livingston, Amos Kendall, Roger Taney, and John Forsyth. The story itself tends to be centered about individuals as much as about issues, and the examination of motives leads the author to a rather extensive revaluation of the traditional reputations of some of the leading figures. Most of the leaders emerge as something less than the pure heroes of legend, while a few, such as John Tyler, are elevated above their common reputation.

3321. Chambers, William Nisbet. Old Bullion Benton, Senator from the new West: Thomas Hart Benton, 1782–1858. Boston, Little, Brown, 1956. 517 p. 56–9067 E340.B4C5

3322. Smith, Elbert B. Magnificent Missourian; the life of Thomas Hart Benton. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1958, ©1957. 351 p. 57–12384 E340.B4S56

Benton was elected Senator from Missouri in 1820, and he continued in that office for three decades. In this period he became a leading spokesman, not only of men of the western frontier, but also of the common man. As such he became the leading "Jacksonian" Senator, and by his contemporaries was thought to be as important as Clay, Calhoun, or Webster. An early achievement was his leadership in the fight against the Bank of the United States. He also contributed to the country's financial history by his work on the currency; he was instrumental in establishing the revised bimetallism standards which lasted for many years. His advocacy of hard currency and his opposition to paper money earned for him the nickname of "Old Bullion." Benton also did much to secure Federal backing of the movement for westward expansion. In this matter one of his noteworthy stands was that opposing the extension of slavery to new states; this caused him some political difficulty, since he represented a slave-holding state. The politics of the period and his role in them are depicted in his voluminous Thirty Years' View (New York, Appleton, 1854–56. 2 v.), which has often been regarded as autobiography, although it is rather a slightly personalized political history. As such it is an outstanding example of its form, and a major item for understanding the political background of the period.

3323. Chitwood, Oliver Perry. John Tyler, champion of the Old South. New York, Appleton-Century, 1939. xv, 496 p. 39–22996 E397.C48

"This volume is published from a fund contributed to the American Historical Association by the Carnegie Corporation of New York."

3324. Morgan, Robert J. A Whig embattled; the Presidency under John Tyler. Lincoln, University of Nebraska Press, 1954. 199 p. 54–8442 E396.M6

Bibliography: p. 191–195.

Tyler (1790–1862) was born and educated in Virginia, where he served in the State Legislature as a young man. Subsequently he served in the U. S. House of Representatives (1817–21). From 1825 to 1827 he was Governor of Virginia; this post he left to become U. S. Senator (1827–36). He resigned from the Senate when, on a matter of constitutional interpretation, he found he could not in conscience follow the instructions of the State Legislature. In the 1840 election "Tyler too" was Harrison's vice-presidential running-mate. He became President when Harrison died one month after taking office. Tyler's presidential term was marked by much discord, as he broke from his party because of his insistence on a strict interpretation of the Constitution. Despite the opposition from both parties, Tyler did accomplish a few important measures during his administration. He retired from political life at the end of his term, and did not reappear on the national scene until 1861, when he headed the Washington Peace Conference, an unsuccessful attempt to reconcile North and South. Shortly afterwards he died in full support of the Confederacy. Because Tyler managed to antagonize both political parties of his period, he received considerable denunciation from all sides. This in turn influenced most historians, and he has usually been regarded as one of the minor Presidents. Chitwood's book is an attempt to rectify this situation and establish Tyler as a man of many qualities and more than minor importance. The book traces his entire career, but is more a political than a general biography. Mr. Morgan's book is also an attempt to improve Tyler's historical reputation, indicating Tyler's work in elevating the status of the Presidency, as well as the extent of his influence upon the political developments of the time.

3325. Cleaves, Freeman. Old Tippecanoe; William Henry Harrison and his time. New York, Scribner, 1939. 422 p. illus.
39–32515 E392.C64
Bibliography: p. 392–401.

3326. Green, James A. William Henry Harrison, his life and times. Richmond, Garrett & Massie, 1941. 536 p. illus. 41–25076 E392.G8
Bibliography: p. 493–529.
Appendix I, The Harrison Literature: p. 447–483.

Harrison (1773–1841) was sprung from the first families of Virginia, and was the son of a signer of the Declaration of Independence. He entered the Regular Army in 1791, and for the next 23 years served with great credit in both military and civil posts in the Northwest Territory. He was Governor of Indiana Territory from 1800 to 1813, carried out the administration's self-contradictory Indian policy as well as could be expected, and won striking victories at Tippecanoe (1811) and the River Thames (1813). But after resigning from his command in 1814 Harrison's career was for long anticlimactic: his personal finances went from bad to worse; he served in the national House of Representatives (1816–19) and Senate (1825–28) without making much of an impression; and during his brief tenure as Minister to Colombia succeeded in making himself distinctly unacceptable to the government of President Bolívar. During the 1830's he lived quietly and struggled with his debts, but he continued to be regarded by the Whigs as a presidential possibility. In 1840 the Whig managers settled upon him in preference to Clay and Webster, and entered upon a campaign of ballyhoo in which he was oddly identified with a log cabin and hard cider, and his victories of 25 years back were thrust in front of the actual issues of the day. Harrison won by a landslide, but contracted pneumonia in Washington and died in his 69th year after a month in office. The antics of the campaign are described in Robert Gray Gunderson's The Log-Cabin Campaign ([Lexington] University of Kentucky Press, 1957. 292 p.). Dorothy Burne Goebel's William Henry Harrison, a Political Biography (Indianapolis, Historical Bureau of the Indiana Library and Historical Department, 1926. 456 p.) is at various points of political interest fuller than the two lives entered above. Of these Mr. Green's is somewhat adulatory, but is based on the author's collection of 1,600 items of Harrisoniana, and is worth consulting for the illustrations alone.

3327. Coit, Margaret L. John C. Calhoun, American portrait. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1950. 593 p. illus. 50–5234 E340.C15C63
Bibliography: p. [573]–581.

3328. Wiltse, Charles M. John C. Calhoun. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1944–51. 3 v. illus. 44–8938 E340.C15W5
Bibliography at end of each volume.
CONTENTS.—[v. 1] Nationalist, 1782–1828.—[v. 2] Nullifier, 1829–1839.—[v. 3] Sectionalist, 1840–1850.

John Caldwell Calhoun (1782–1850) was in 1808 elected to the legislature of South Carolina, his native State. In 1810 he was chosen for the U. S. House of Representatives, where he played a leading role before and during the War of 1812. His interest in military affairs and his nationalist outlook led Monroe to appoint him Secretary of War (1817–25). Subsequently he was twice elected Vice-President, under both John Quincy Adams and Andrew Jackson. As the sectional discord between North and South increased, Calhoun increasingly favored the South, and was soon formulating his doctrine of nullification. In 1832 he resigned from the vice-presidency to take a seat in the Senate, where he could speak more forcefully for South Carolina in particular and the South in general, while at the same time he eliminated his chance for the Presidency, as he shifted from national to sectional leadership. In the years that followed he became not only the spokesman and political philosopher of the South, but also a dominating figure in the Senate. As he fought against measures such as tariffs benefiting Northern manufacturers, and attempts to keep slavery out of the territories, he became more and more concerned with the declining minority position of the South. His cure for the situation through a government of "concurrent majorities" he presented in two treatises, A Disquisition on Government and A Discourse on the Constitution and Government of the United States, which first appeared posthumously in his collected Works (New York, Appleton, 1851–55. 6 v.). The set also includes his speeches and public papers and reports. To the end of his life he strove in the Senate to maintain the Union, if that could be done in terms acceptable to the South, but recognized that separation would probably occur. His arguments for nullification and the right of a state to withdraw from the Union bore fruit a decade after his death. Miss Coit's biography is a respectful attempt to understand and make vivid Calhoun and the events amid which he functioned. Professor Wiltse's three-volume work is a scholarly presentation of the details of Calhoun's life, but the very thoroughness of the study tends to obscure Calhoun's function in and meaning for his own period.

3329. Dangerfield, George. The era of good feelings. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1952. 525 p. 51–14815 E371.D3
Bibliography: p. [493]–512.

An account of the personalities and circumstances behind the Treaty of Ghent (Dec. 24, 1814) introduces the subsequent events that led into "the Era of Good Feeling." This term is usually applied to the period of Monroe's presidency (1817–25), but the author extends it through 1829, so as to cover the administration of John Quincy Adams, which he regards as concluding a period of transition in American history. In 1817 America had recently emerged "victorious" from the War of 1812, and a feeling of nationalism and general well-being prevailed from 1817 through most of 1821, while the Jeffersonian Republicans enjoyed almost universal support as a result of the self-discrediting actions of the Federalists during the war. In late 1821 the "good feeling," if not the "era," came to an end with an economic depression. In the years that followed there came to the fore questions such as national finances, slavery, and Western expansion, and with these arose a new party—the Democrats. The disputed election of J. Q. Adams presaged the transition from the concept of a non-interfering, limited central government to a centralized government that might on occasion interfere in behalf of oppressed minorities. The story ends with the elevation to the Presidency in 1829 of Andrew Jackson, "the voice of the people," and the first post-Washington President not groomed for the position by "the administration."

3330. De Voto, Bernard A. Across the wide Missouri. Illustrated with paintings by Alfred Jacob Miller, Charles Bodmer, and George Catlin. With an account of the discovery of the Miller collection by Mae Reed Porter. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1947. xxvii, 483 p. 48–3175 F592.D36 1947a
Bibliography: p. 457–468.

The author states in his preface that in this book he has, for the period 1832–38, "tried to describe the [Rocky] mountain fur trade as a business and as a way of life; what its characteristic experiences were, what conditions governed them, how it helped to shape our heritage, what its relation was to the westward expansion of the United States, most of all how the mountain men lived." The book is liberally illustrated with contemporary pictures, especially those of Alfred Jacob Miller (1810–1874), who in 1833–38 accompanied William Drummond Stewart throughout the area. Since the volume was originally conceived as text for Miller's pictures, the story is still centered around the Stewart expedition, although it includes a full attempt to depict the fur trade of the Rockies during these years, when it was already moving into its decline. The book received the Pulitzer prize in history for 1948. While the author is probably best known for historical work such as this, he also produced much literary and critical work (nos. 2415–18).

3331. De Voto, Bernard A. The year of decision, 1846. Boston, Little, Brown, 1943. xv, 538 p. illus. 43–4191 F592.D38
"Statement on bibliography": p. [523]–527.

The preface states that the purpose of this book "is a literary purpose: to realize the pre-Civil War, Far Western frontier as personal experience." The year 1846 was chosen because it "best dramatizes personal experience as national experience." The work is thus at once both a literary and a historical, and even to some extent a social, document. It focuses on the national events which arose from, were furthered by, or brought about the events on the Western frontier in 1846, with some tracing of the carry-over into 1847. The most obvious event of 1846 for standard history was doubtless the outbreak of the Mexican War. This, with Frémont's exploring activities which brought California into the Union, extended the United States to the Pacific. This was the year when America and Great Britain settled the boundaries of the Pacific Northwest. It was also the year in which migration along the Oregon Trail reached a high point, and Francis Parkman rode over much of the trail. In 1846 the Mormons began their two-year mass exodus to Utah. In addition to following these actions and their interacting aspects, De Voto frequently devotes attention to lesser individuals within the mainstream, such as the traders, trappers, and guides, and even presents the gruesome story of the Donner party, a group of California-bound emigrants who were stranded in the Sierras. Their story is more fully told in George R. Stewart's Ordeal by Hunger (New York, Holt, 1936. 328 p.).

3332. Dyer, Brainerd. Zachary Taylor. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1946. 455 p. illus. (Southern biography series)
47–142 E422.D995
"Critical essay on authorities": p. [420]–433.

3333. Hamilton, Holman. Zachary Taylor. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1941–51. 2 v. illus.
41–2781 E422.H3
Includes bibliographies.
CONTENTS.—[1] Soldier of the Republic.—[2] Soldier in the White House.

Zachary Taylor (1784–1850) was born in Virginia and raised in Kentucky. Before becoming President, he served for 40 years in the Regular Army, and it is doubtless as a soldier that he made his greatest contribution to the Nation. In his early career he was active in those operations which made the Midwest from Indiana through Missouri safe for settlement. In the Mexican War he demonstrated a considerable generalship, and the ability to inspire confidence among his followers, thus leading to the defeat of enemy forces several times the size of his own. His victories brought him great popularity, which induced influential Whigs to back him for the Presidency. He was elected in 1848, assumed office in 1849, and died in 1850. During his brief term he accomplished little, but the little did include the preliminary organization of the recent annexations, and, in international affairs, the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. In his acts he soon showed himself a nationalist rather than a sectionalist, which rapidly lost him the support of the Southern Whigs, who thought they had elected one of their own. Dyer's work is a scholarly study of Taylor's life and importance. Hamilton's two-volume biography is much more detailed in its attempt to present a full picture of Taylor's historical role, and his importance as a leader in the opening of the West.

3334. Frémont, John Charles. Narratives of exploration and adventure; edited by Allan Nevins. New York, Longmans, Green, 1956. 532 p. maps.
56–7867 F592.F8647

3335. Nevins, Allan. Frémont, pathmarker of the West. [New ed.] New York, Longmans, Green, 1955. 689 p. illus.
55–1552 E415.9.F8N46 1955
"Bibliographical note": p. 671–673.

While Frémont (1813–1890) had a long, varied, and adventurous life as army general, Senator from California, mining magnate, railroad president, Republican presidential candidate in 1856, territorial governor of Arizona, etc., the most important part of his career for its contribution to the development of America occurred in 1842–46. In these years he led several expeditions exploring the West. His accurate and extensive scientific reports and his maps established him as one of the world's leading scientist-explorers. In 1842 Frémont explored the Oregon Trail into the Rocky Mountains; his 1843 expedition took him to Oregon, Nevada, and into California. Upon his return East he wrote another vivid report of his expedition; it was published with the first as Report of the Exploring Expedition to the Rocky Mountains in the Year 1842, and to Oregon and North California in the Years 1843–'44 (Washington, Blair & Rives, 1845. 583 p. [U. S. 28th Cong., 2d sess. House. Executive] Document no. 166). In the years that followed, this volume was widely reprinted, and stirred up much enthusiasm for the West and national expansion. In 1845 Frémont set out on another expedition, again working his way into California, where he was instrumental in bringing about its separation from Mexico. While acting as civil Governor of California, Frémont came into conflict with General S. W. Kearny, and was convicted of mutiny by a court martial. Although he emerged from the affair as a popular hero, Frémont's exploring career for the Government was over. His subsequent career was one of greater prominence than significance, since he was cut off from the field of work in which his main talents lay. Toward the end of his life Frémont began to write his autobiography, but died before completing it. A first volume, all that was ever published, appeared as Memoirs of My Life (Chicago, Bedford, Clarke, 1887. 655 p.); this skips over his early years to concentrate on his Western expeditions; unfortunately, it adds little of value to his reports, and the biography by Professor Nevins gives a fuller picture of the man. The volume of Narratives of Exploration and Adventure contains selections from Frémont's Memoirs and his many reports; it is chronologically arranged, and contains material on pre-1842 expeditions in which Frémont took part, though not as leader.

3336. Fuess, Claude Moore. Daniel Webster. Boston, Little, Brown, 1930. 2 v. illus.
30–29651 E340.W4F95
Bibliography: v. 2, p. [419]–430.
CONTENTS.—1. 1782–1830.—2. 1830–1852.

Webster (1782–1852) was an outstanding statesman-politician, and one of the most influential Northerners of his period. In the House of Representatives (1813–17, 1823–27) and in the Senate (1827–41, 1845–50) he expressed the views of New England conservatism, as well as the related views of the businessmen of the increasingly industrial North. However, Webster was also a strong constitutionalist with the outlook of a unionist, so that on occasion he moderated his position out of consideration for other sectional (usually Southern) interests and the national welfare—most notably in his support of the Compromise of 1850 put forth by Henry Clay (nos. 3342–3344). This led many Northerners to view him as a "fallen God," and published denunciations were numerous. Webster was also an important Secretary of State under three Presidents (Harrison and Tyler, 1841–43, and Fillmore, 1850–52). He argued a number of leading constitutional questions before the Supreme Court, and many regarded him as the outstanding constitutional lawyer of the period. His many speeches in Congress, on public occasions and in court, earned for him, in an age of oratory, a reputation as one of the Nation's foremost orators. Most of these have been brought together in his Writings and Speeches, national ed. (Boston, Little, Brown, 1903. 18 v.), which unfortunately is incomplete for Webster's scattered correspondence. While Fuess' biography of Webster remains the most thorough study, and is usually regarded as a leading example of political biography, Richard N. Current's Daniel Webster and the Rise of National Conservatism (Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. 215 p.) in the Library of American biography series does bring out more clearly Webster's part in shaping a conservative political tradition in America.

3337. Garrison, George Pierce. Westward extension, 1841–1850. New York, Harper, 1906. 366 p. (The American Nation: a history, edited by A. B. Hart, v. 17.) 6–46358 E178.A54, v. 17

An older work which still provides a clear outline of a crowded decade. The author states in his preface that it has been his "principal aim to describe the expansion of the United States westward from the Louisiana Purchase to the Pacific Ocean, in such a way as to indicate the real forces which gave it impulse, and how they actually worked; and especially to show how it was affected by, and how it reacted upon, the contemporaneous sectionalizing movement which finally ended in the Civil War." Thus, while a heavy emphasis has been placed on expansion, the book is in large measure a history of the United States for the period covered. It gives a continuous narrative of relations with Mexico in chapters 13–15. The expansion problem is centered upon Texas, Oregon, and California, with some attention to Maine, the initial planning of a Panama Canal, and related problems. The political consequences of expansion are developed in chapters on the Wilmot Proviso and the Compromise of 1850. Despite the predominance of expansion, the author finds space for the party struggle and for the domestic problems of the Tyler and Polk administrations. The author used Polk's diary in manuscript before it became widely known, and was one of the first to emphasize "the stern integrity and strength of his character."

3338. Ghent, William J. The road to Oregon, a chronicle of the great emigrant trail. New York, Longmans, Green, 1929. xvi, 274 p. illus. 29–9318 F592.G45

This book opens with a discussion of the early explorers who established the Oregon Trail, largely following in the footsteps of animals and Indians. Next came the early missionaries and caravans, who followed the trail from its beginning in Independence, Missouri, to various points along its way or its branches, or to its end in Oregon. The author continues with the story of the heavy migration over the trail in the 1840's. Chapter seven is an attempt to establish the route of the trail. Ghent follows this with an account of the development of traffic over the trail in the 1850's, and concludes by describing the decline in the use of the trail, as a result of the construction in the 1860's of a railroad line to the Pacific. While this book is useful for its historical accuracy, and for its extended view of the implications of the use of the trail, a more vivid view of the trail itself may be gathered from Francis Parkman's The Oregon Trail (no. 3348).

3339. Going, Charles Buxton. David Wilmot, free-soiler; a biography of the great advocate of the Wilmot Proviso. New York, Appleton, 1924. xvii, 787 p. 24–21082 E340.W65G6

David Wilmot (1814–1868) was born and raised in Pennsylvania, and from 1834 to the end of his life was active in state and national politics. In 1845 he was elected to Congress as a Democrat, and for a while he showed himself to be a regular party man. However, he came to have increasing doubts about the entrenched power position of the South; these doubts found expression when in 1846 President Polk asked for an appropriation of $2,000,000 for acquiring territory in consequence of the Mexican War. Wilmot proposed an amendment barring slavery from any territory to be acquired with the money. This became famous as the Wilmot Proviso; and, while it was not adopted, it was important as a precipitating factor in the North-South cleavage. On this principle Wilmot took an active part in the "Free Soil" campaign of 1848. As a result of his stand, he left the Democratic Party, and was later instrumental in the founding and developing of the Republican Party. While this one cause dominated Wilmot's life, so that Going's large biography is in large part the detailed story of the issue, Wilmot's extensive connections give his life story an importance for the entire period.

3340. Graebner, Norman A. Empire on the Pacific; a study in American continental expansion. New York, Ronald Press Co., 1955. 278 p. 55–10664 E179.5.G7
"Bibliographical essay": p. 258–265.

This account of the extension of America to the Pacific in the 1840's covers both the expansion from Texas through California as a result of the Mexican War, and the more northerly expansion through establishment of the southern half of the Oregon Territory as American, as a result of negotiations with Great Britain. The author contends that the interest in acquiring these large tracts of land was relatively minor, and that even the emotional force of the doctrine of Manifest Destiny was far from being the major causative force it has usually been considered to be. He presents a strong argument to prove that acquisition of these territories resulted rather from the growing American desire for the major Pacific ports of San Francisco and San Diego in California, and for control of Juan de Fuca Strait, giving access to Puget Sound in the Northwest. Behind this he perceives the driving force of the Eastern States, whose merchants desired Pacific outlets in order to control the developing trade with Asia.

3341. James, Marquis. The Raven; a biography of Sam Houston. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1929. 489 p. 39–2503 F390.H8483
"Sources and acknowledgments": p. [465]–470.

Sam Houston (1793–1863) was born in Virginia, but raised in Tennessee. In 1823, after a varied military and legal career, Houston was elected to Congress, and in 1827 he was chosen Governor of Tennessee. In 1829 Houston's bride suddenly left him, without stating the cause. Rumors multiplied, and Houston resigned from the governorship, but never offered an explanation of what had taken place. Houston then went beyond the Mississippi and soon held a position of leadership among the Cherokees, who knew him as the Raven. In 1835 he entered into the Texan struggle for independence from Mexico, and thus began the career for which he is remembered, and because of which he has been awarded a high seat in the pantheon of American folklore. In 1836 Houston was appointed commander-in-chief of the little Texan army, and on April 21 surprised Santa Anna and destroyed the van of his army at San Jacinto. Houston was promptly elected the first president of the new and victorious republic. For most of the remainder of his life Houston served his commonwealth as president of the Republic of Texas, as Senator from the new State of Texas, and as Governor of the State. He was Governor when the South seceded; Houston tried to keep Texas from seceding, and then tried to keep it from joining the Confederacy. He failed in both, and his governmental career was at an end. He lived long enough to see his prophecies of doom beginning to be fulfilled. James' biography, which is both scholarly and literary, was awarded a Pulitzer prize in 1930.

3342. Mayo, Bernard. Henry Clay, spokesman of the New West. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1937. 570 p. illus. 37–28554 E340.C6M2
Bibliography: p. [527]–548.

3343. Van Deusen, Glyndon G. The life of Henry Clay. Boston, Little, Brown, 1937. 448 p. illus. 37–24249 E340.C6V3
Bibliography: p. [427]–437.

3344. Poage, George Rawlings. Henry Clay and the Whig Party. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1936. 295 p. 36–18979 E340.C6P6
Bibliography: p. [279]–283.

Clay (1777–1852) was born in Virginia, but after he had been admitted to the bar moved in 1797 to Kentucky. Here he practiced law, but was soon diverting most of his energy to politics. Elected to the State Legislature in 1803, he was twice chosen by it to complete unexpired terms in the United States Senate. Sent to the national House of Representatives in 1811, he was at once chosen Speaker, and first gave to that position much of the importance it still holds. A candidate for the Presidency or for nomination to it in each election from 1824 to 1848, he always had an enthusiastic following, and may be said to have had extremely bad luck in missing the grand ambition of his life. After throwing his support to J. Q. Adams in 1824, he served as his Secretary of State, and was afterwards elected to the Senate, where in that body's greatest days he shared its leadership with Calhoun, Webster, and Benton. First conspicuous as a spokesman of the New West, he was later best known as the protagonist of "the American system" of Federal support for internal improvements and domestic manufactures, but his posthumous fame has been principally that of the Great Compromiser, who led in the passage of the Missouri Compromise in 1820, introduced the compromise tariff of 1833, and originated the Compromise of 1850. Professor Mayo's biography was announced as a trilogy, but nothing has appeared save the first volume, which remains the most thorough study of Clay's early years down to the War of 1812. Dr. Van Deusen's biography is the most complete modern account; a briefer one is provided by Clement Eaton: Henry Clay and the Art of American Politics (Boston, Little, Brown, 1957. 209 p.), a volume of the Library of American biography series. Mr. Poage studies Clay as the most conspicuous leader of the Whig Party from the election of 1840 through the Compromise of 1850. For Clay's own writings, the world is still dependent upon the work of the Reverend Calvin Colton, who edited The Private Correspondence of Henry Clay (New York, A. S. Barnes, 1855. 642 p.) and The Speeches of Henry Clay (New York, A. S. Barnes, 1857. 2 v.). The Works of Henry Clay, published in 6 volumes by A. S. Barnes and Burr in 1857, and several times reprinted, consists of these together with a 3-volume life of Clay by Colton, which is ponderous and prosaic. A complete edition of Clay's papers is in preparation at the University of Kentucky, under the editorship of James F. Hopkins.

3345. Monaghan, James. The Overland Trail. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1947. 431 p. illus. (The American trails series)
47–11789 F591.M78

"Bibliographical note": p. 415–423.

The term "Overland Trail" is used here to designate the north central route used by emigrants heading westwards in the 19th century before the construction of the cross-continental railroad. The route was by most of its users known as the Oregon Trail, but the author has not used that name because "parts of it were traveled by many more Mormons and Argonauts than by Oregon-bound pioneers." Mr. Monaghan's history is in large part told in terms of the adventures of various individuals and groups. Roughly the first third of the book is devoted to the period of early discovery and exploration, and tells the stories of Lewis and Clark, John Jacob Astor, Nathaniel Wyeth, and others. The book continues with the popularizing of one particular trail by John C. Frémont, and the subsequent mass migration of the 1840's. Episodes such as the Donner party, and the journey of Francis Parkman which led to his writing The Oregon Trail (no. 3348), are also narrated. These are followed by accounts of the migration of the Forty-niners, the brief flourishing of the Pony Express, and the advent of the railroad. Among other stories included is Mark Twain's journey over the trail by stagecoach.

3346. Moore, Glover. The Missouri controversy, 1819–1821. [Lexington] University of Kentucky Press, 1953. 383 p.
53–5518 E373.M77

Bibliography: p. [353]–375.

This study opens with a discussion of the historical background for the North-South sectionalism that by 1819 had become a serious divisive factor in the Union, and then takes up the controversy that arose when statehood was proposed for Missouri. This first focused national attention on the new sectionalism, and the problems inherent in it. The eventual Missouri Compromise provided that Missouri be admitted as a slave state, and Maine be admitted as a free state, while it was also agreed that in the future states admitted from north of 36°30′ should be free, and those from south of the line should be slave. This compromise set for several decades the pattern used to preserve a balance in the North-South conflict. Moore also studies public opinion in the various states, the economic factors behind sectionalism, and the political implications. An earlier work presenting less of the national bearings of the controversy, but offering more of a picture of Missouri itself, is Floyd Calvin Shoemaker's Missouri's Struggle for Statehood, 1804–1821 (Jefferson City, Mo., Hugh Stephens Printing Co., 1916. 383 p.).

3347. Nichols, Roy Franklin. Franklin Pierce, Young Hickory of the Granite hills. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1931. xvii, 615 p.
32–315 E432.N63

Bibliography: p. 571–584.

Franklin Pierce (1804–1869) was born in New Hampshire, and early (1829–33) served in the State Legislature. In 1833 he was elected to the national House of Representatives, where he remained until he went to the Senate (1837–42). In both Houses he showed himself a loyal follower of the Jacksonians. After 1842 he practiced law in New Hampshire, while continuing to manage local Democratic campaigns, and served without distinction as a brigadier-general in the Mexican War. In 1852 he received the Democratic presidential nomination as a dark horse compromise candidate. He made no campaign speeches, but won the election in an electoral landslide which overwhelmed Whigs and Free Soil Democrats alike. As President he tried to satisfy all elements in his party, and so satisfied practically none. He was a nationalist who tried to reconcile the North-South conflict, but with little success. In foreign affairs he worked for "manifest destiny" on a number of fronts, but failed in practically all. Having failed to obtain renomination from the Democrats, he retired to private life in New Hampshire. With the advent of the Civil War, Pierce became hated for his opposition to abolitionism, his advocacy of a compromise with the South, and his opposition to the war. Professor Nichols' book is an attempt not only to write the President's biography, but also to understand Pierce and others like him who worked unremittingly for compromise, but achieved only obloquy from a nation torn by intense emotions.

3348. Parkman, Francis. The Oregon Trail; sketches of prairie and Rocky-Mountain life. With an introd. by Henry Steele Commager. New York, Modern Library, 1949. xix, 366 p.
49–49101 F592.P284

Parkman has already been discussed a number of times in this bibliography (nos. 2281, 3069, and 3171). The Oregon Trail resulted from a journey he took along part of the trail in 1846, while the first mass migrations westward were in progress. The book first appeared serially in Knickerbocker shortly after he had returned from his travels. It is still considered one of the leading books providing insight into Indian character and ways of life. It shows vividly what the West was like as white men first appeared on the scene in numbers. It is currently fashionable to lament the fact that Parkman did not appreciate the significance of the migration then taking place, and thus did not produce a book on the lines of Ghent's (no. 3338). Had he done so, we might now have a quite good book on the migrations; as it is, we have a superb work focusing on the Indian and wildlife background, and serving as an introduction to Parkman's later historical work. The Oregon Trail is available in many editions and can be read merely as an adventure story.

3349. Polk, James Knox. The diary of James K. Polk during his Presidency, 1845 to 1849, now first printed from the original manuscript in the collections of the Chicago Historical Society. Edited and annotated by Milo Milton Quaife with an introd. by Andrew Cunningham McLaughlin. Chicago, McClurg, 1910. 4 v.
10–15650 F548.1.C4, v. 6–9 E416.P76

"This work forms volumes VI–IX of the Chicago Historical Society's collection, a special issue of 500 copies being printed for the purposes of that society."

3350. McCormac, Eugene Irving. James K. Polk, a political biography. Berkeley, University of California Press, 1922. 746 p.
A22–821 E417.M12

Bibliography: p. [726]–731.

3351. Sellers, Charles Grier. James K. Polk, Jacksonian, 1795–1843. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1957. 526 p.
57–5457 E417.S4

"Sources": p. 493–509.

Shortly after Polk (1795–1849) was born in North Carolina, his family moved to Tennessee, where he was raised. He studied for the law, early entered State politics, and went on to the U. S. House of Representatives, where he served from 1825 to 1839. In this period he established himself as a leader of the Jacksonian forces in Congress, and a popular politician of integrity with an unusual talent for stump speaking. In 1839 he followed his party's call and ran for Governor of Tennessee to save the State for the Democrats; he won this election, but lost in two subsequent tries. In 1844 Polk was being considered for the Democratic vice-presidential nomination, when the deadlock of the Van Buren and Calhoun forces led to his becoming the compromise candidate for the Presidency. Shortly after his inauguration in 1845, he declared that the four main measures of his administration would be: "one, a reduction of the tariff; another, the independent treasury; a third, the settlement of the Oregon boundary question; and lastly, the acquisition of California." With single-minded purpose and untiring activity, Polk achieved all these measures in his one term in office, and refused a renomination. In his unremitting attention to his duties, Polk had worn himself out, and died a few months after leaving office. The biography by McCormac concentrates heavily on the presidential years, with a long section on the Mexican War. Mr. Sellers' study is meant to show Polk not merely in his political role, but as a human figure in his era; it stops short of the presidential years. A close view of Polk's White House activities may be found in his remarkable Diary; a selection from it was made by Allan Nevins and published as Polk: The Diary of a President, 1845–1849 (New York, Longmans, Green, 1952. 412 p.).

3352. Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr. The age of Jackson. Boston, Little, Brown, 1945. 577 p.
45–8340 E381.S38

Bibliography: p. [529]–559.

This volume, which really deserves the overworked adjective "stimulating," does not attempt to offer a detailed narrative of Andrew Jackson's two administrations (1829–37), but is rather an interpretation of three decades of American history in the light of the renewal of the democratic impulse effected by Jackson and his lieutenants. The author seeks to show how the Jacksonian movement grew out of Jeffersonian democracy, as a changing social order required a peaceable revolution to preserve the reality of democracy in a changed context. The younger Schlesinger studies the intellectual, political, and economic forces at work, and reaches the conclusion that the Jacksonian revolution was not the triumph of Western radicalism over Eastern capitalism, as is usually thought; but, rather, that it was the triumph of the non-capitalists (farmers, factory workers, etc.) in all sections over the entrenched capitalistic groups. The author also shows most of the leading intellectuals of the day supporting the movement, and giving it a solid core of ideas. The ramifications of the movement are traced in the law, industrialism, religion, Utopian socialism, and literature. The dilution and disintegration of the impulse, under leaders less determined and less able than Jackson, are followed to the Civil War and even into the administration of Andrew Johnson. The "whole moral of the Jacksonian experience," the author suggests, was that "only a strong people's government could break up the power of concentrated wealth." The wide range of the book, and the forceful style with which the author has brought together the strands of his extensive scholarship, give it a vital quality in picturing the era and the forces that molded it.

3353. Shackford, James Atkins. David Crockett, the man and the legend. Edited by John B. Shackford. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1956. 338 p.
56–13913 F436.C9594
Bibliography: p. 317–324.

Davy Crockett is well known to most Americans as a folklore figure whose incredible adventures have been presented through almanacs, comic books, movies, television programs, children's tee-shirts, etc. The original of these stories was David Crockett (1786–1836), a politician who throughout his life welcomed the retelling of tall tales about himself. He was born in Tennessee to the poverty usual among frontier families. However, he rose through military and judicial positions to represent his frontiersman neighbors in Congress. He served well the interests of these poor settlers, but lost office after breaking with the Jacksonians, largely because of their land policy. He returned to the advancing frontier, then in Texas, and was killed at the Alamo in the Texan war for independence. It is this historical person whose life is traced in Shackford's book, which is based on extensive research among previously neglected primary sources. The author also tries to rehabilitate as a piece of frontier literature, humor, and some truth the 1834 autobiography (nos. 2649–50). Here Crockett emerges as an archetypal frontiersman of great strength, courage, and determination, if on a somewhat diminished scale from the glories of folklore.

3354. Smith, Justin H. The annexation of Texas. Corrected ed. New York, Barnes & Noble, 1941. 496 p. A42–899 F390.S647 1941 "Account of the sources": p. 471–476.

When the United States purchased the Louisiana Territory it acquired some claims to Texas, but waived them in 1821, in exchange for Florida. However, neither Spain nor Mexico, after acquiring independence, succeeded in settling Texas. Settlement was largely by Americans, led first by Stephen Austin (no. 3314). Since the Mexican Government was highly unstable, Texas never developed any attachment to it. In 1835, after the Mexican Government had become a military dictatorship, Texas declared its independence, and managed to maintain it under the leadership of Sam Houston (no. 3341), but sought to become a state of the American Union. Throughout the following decade the pros and cons for annexing Texas were loudly disputed in the United States. The main stumbling block was the issue of slavery. Westerners wanted Texas at any price, southerners wanted an extension of slave areas, and northerners opposed the idea of more slave-voting states. After much argument Texas was finally admitted to the Union, and conflicting views over its western boundary soon led to the Mexican War (no. 3689). It is the background to this phase of American expansion and North-South sectionalism that is examined in this book, originally published in 1911. It was the first thorough study of this historical problem, and research for it was done in archives throughout the world, so that it is based almost exclusively on primary sources. In his thoroughness the author has also considered the attitudes and actions of foreign governments insofar as they concerned the transition of Texas from Mexican Province to independent republic and to American State.

3355. Stephenson, Nathaniel W. Texas and the Mexican War; a chronicle of the winning of the Southwest. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1921. 273 p. illus. (The Chronicles of America series, Allen Johnson, editor, v. 24)
21–14809 E173.C55, v. 24
F389.S92

This is a concise account of Texas, from its beginnings through the stabilization of its boundaries at the end of the Mexican War. The book opens with a brief account of early American claims to Texas, the settlement of that area by Americans, and the relationship of those Americans to the central Mexican Government. It continues with an account of the growing friction between the government and the American settlers, the attempts of the United States to acquire the area by negotiation, and the final revolt of the colonists against Mexico, leading to the establishment of the Texan Republic. The author then reviews the actions which led to the annexation of Texas by the United States, and the conflicting boundary claims and territorial desires which resulted in the Mexican War. The course of the war is then traced, and the book concludes with the ratification of the treaty which resulted in America's acquisition of the Southwest (1848). The "Bibliographical Note" (p. 259–261) at the end is now considerably out of date. The book itself, however, remains essentially valid, for subsequent research has added much detail, but has little altered the main outline of the story which is the substance of this volume.

3356. Turner, Frederick Jackson. Rise of the New West, 1819–1829. New York, Harper, 1906. xviii, 366 p. 9 maps. (The American Nation: a history, edited by A. B. Hart, v. 14)

6–13695 E178.A54, v. 14

"Critical essay on authorities": p. [333]–352.

This volume, the only substantial narrative history completed by the celebrated formulator of the "frontier hypothesis" (no. 3147), is a general view of the United States from the panic of 1819 to the election of Andrew Jackson. The author finds the significance of the decade in the weakening of the nationalism which had flared out toward the end of the War of 1812 and had dominated the first years of the peace, and in the resurgence of sectional interests. However, national feeling, and the sense of alienation from Europe, remained powerful enough to allow the enunciation and general acceptance of the Monroe Doctrine in 1823. The author surveys the situation in each of the three older sections, and then describes developments in the new one, the trans-Appalachian West, at some length, since it was the progress of civilization here which brought a completely new factor into the national composite. The domestic politics of the period, involving such issues as the Missouri Compromise, internal improvements, and the tariff, are interpreted in terms of the interests, the balance, and the alliances of sections. In progress at the same time but, the author confesses, not easy to depict, was "the formation of the self-conscious American democracy, strongest in the west and middle region, but running across all sections and tending to divide the people on the lines of social classes."

3357. Turner, Frederick Jackson. The United States, 1830–1850; the Nation and its sections. With an introd. by Avery Craven. New York, Holt, 1935. xiv, 602 p. maps.

35–5282 E338.T92

The author's incomplete manuscript was edited by M. H. Crissey, Max Farrand, and Avery Craven. "Chapter XIII [Taylor administration and the compromise of 1850] . . . was never written."

In this history of the period from 1830 to 1850, which is in some degree a continuation of his Rise of the New West (supra), Turner pursues his theories of sectionalism and its influence on the development of the country. The bulk of the book consists in studies of the various sections (New England, Middle Atlantic States, South Atlantic States, South Central States, North Central States, and Texas and the Far West) throughout this period. There follow a series of chapters on the presidential administrations from Jackson through Polk. Chapters at the beginning and end bring this material together to some extent. Unfortunately, while Professor Turner spent 15 years in writing the book, he died without completing it, which fact is doubtless responsible for a lack of unity in the volume. Furthermore, only a limited amount of editorial work has been done upon it. Nonetheless, the work remains important for the questions it raises, its influence on subsequent historians, and its pro-Western, pro-frontier view of national development.

3358. Woodford, Frank B. Lewis Cass, the last Jeffersonian. New Brunswick, Rutgers University Press, 1950. 380 p.

50–9741 E340.C3W66

Bibliography: p. 357–369.

Lewis Cass (1782–1866) was born in New Hampshire. As a young man he moved to Ohio, where he entered into law practice in 1802. He had served in the Ohio State Legislature, and he had taken part in the War of 1812 on the frontier, when at the end of 1813 he was appointed Governor of Michigan Territory, a position he held for 18 years. He was then appointed Secretary of War in Jackson's Cabinet, where he remained until 1836. Subsequently he served as American Minister to France; in this position his anti-British maneuverings brought him great popularity at home. In 1844 he came near obtaining the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, but was passed over for Polk. Cass then entered the Senate, where he continued his work as a conservative nationalist until 1848, when he received the presidential nomination. However, he lost to Taylor in a close election, partly because of a split in his own party, and partly because he was too conservative in a period of intense partisanship over such matters as slavery, territorial expansion, and internal improvements. He was then reelected to the Senate, where he remained until he became Buchanan's Secretary of State. He resigned from this position when Buchanan refused to strengthen Fort Sumter, with the Civil War but a few months away. Mr. Woodford's scholarly biography relates Cass' varied and influential career to the progress of the Nation's development.

677676 O–63–25

H. Slavery, the Civil War, and Reconstruction (to 1877)

3359. Bancroft, Frederic. The life of William H. Seward. New York, Harper, 1900. 2 v.
0–1693 E415.9.S4B3

A critical but sympathetic biography of Seward (1801–1872) whose aim in life, not entirely achieved, "was to be supremely great both in his generation and in history." Seward began his active political career in 1830 as an Antimason, joined the Whig Party in 1834, and served in the United States Senate from 1848 until his appointment as Lincoln's Secretary of State. His opposition to slavery in the Senate was partially motivated by the increasing power of the antislavery movement in the North, which led him to enter the Republican Party in 1854. Although an acknowledged party leader, he failed of nomination to the Presidency in both 1856 and 1860. As Secretary of State from 1861 to 1869, Seward became, in the author's opinion, a diplomatist and statesman of the first rank. He was the first Secretary to publish diplomatic dispatches, a part of his campaign to mold public opinion in favor of the policies of the Government. His great triumph was his skillful checking of the interventionist aims of Great Britain and France in the Civil War, and the reduction of their unofficial interference by manipulating the sympathies of the European opponents of slavery. In the postwar years Seward supported Andrew Johnson's policy of moderation toward the South, forced France to withdraw from Mexico, and purchased Alaska from Russia in 1867. Personally amiable and without malice, Seward is here characterized as "pre-eminently a man of theories and expedients, but he also had settled convictions and sound judgment."

3360. Barnes, Gilbert Hobbs. The antislavery impulse, 1830–1844. New York, Appleton-Century, 1933. 298 p. 33–38695 E449.B264

"This volume is published from a fund contributed to the American Historical Association by the Carnegie Corporation of New York."

"Works consulted": p. 199–202.

This influential work traces the main current of antislavery agitation and organization in the United States to the great evangelical revival which reached its peak in 1830, and in particular to the preaching of Charles Grandison Finney (1792–1875), a successful lawyer transformed into an itinerant Presbyterian revivalist of extraordinary fervor and persuasion. At Utica, N. Y., Finney not merely converted but gathered into his Holy Band a student at Hamilton College, Theodore Dwight Weld, and his older friend and mentor, Charles Stuart, a retired captain of the British Army. Finney's mission in New York City brought into line the wealthy and philanthropic merchants, Arthur and Lewis Tappan. In 1833, on learning of the British measure for abolishing West Indian slavery, the New York group proceeded to organize the American Anti-Slavery Society, which in the following year began its nationwide agitation for immediate abolition. In 1837 pamphleteering was subordinated to evangelism, as The Seventy were recruited and sent out to work in the rural counties. In the same year their efforts produced the flood of antislavery petitions to Congress, where they were "stowed away in the antechambers by waggon loads." Antislavery at once became a live political issue, and the first supporter of the petitions, J. Q. Adams, was soon joined by allies on the floors of Congress. "From first to last, throughout the antislavery host the cause continued to be a moral issue and not an economic one." The book is very largely based on original and previously unexploited sources such as the Weld, Lewis Tappan, J. R. Giddings, and J. G. Birney papers, and nearly one-third (p. 203–291) consists of notes containing extensive extracts from them.

3361. Beale, Howard K. The critical year; a study of Andrew Johnson and Reconstruction. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1930. 454 p.
30–14060 E668.B354

Bibliography: p. 407–435.

The election year of 1866 is here critically examined through contemporary newspapers, private correspondence, local campaign speeches, and political sermons, in order to determine the true motives behind the campaigns of Andrew Johnson and the Radical Republicans. In the author's analysis, the election issue was not merely one of deciding the policy to be followed in dealing with the conquered South, but was also the decisive test of power between the rising industries and businesses of the Northeast, represented by the Radical Republicans, and the agrarian South and West, championed by Johnson. The victory of the Radical Republicans and the economic interests allied with them was achieved by adroit propaganda, appealing to the sectionalism and war-bred hatred of the electorate, rather than presenting any actual issues upon which they could express their preference.

3362. Bowers, Claude G. The tragic era; the revolution after Lincoln. New York, Blue Ribbon Books [193–] xxii, 567 p.
37–10370 E668.B7793

Reprinted from the original edition (copyrighted 1929).

"Manuscripts, books, and newspapers consulted and cited": p. [541]–547.

The late Ambassador Bowers (1879–1957) quoted with approval Hilaire Belloc's dictum that "readable history is melodrama," and of his three principal dramatizations of American history (cf. nos. 3281 & 3320) The Tragic Era is the most melodramatic. Anyone who wants to approach Reconstruction and the Gilded Age in Washington through a crowded and stirring narrative in which the whites are dazzling and the blacks Stygian will find this to his taste. For such history there must be dramatis personae, and Andrew Johnson and Thaddeus Stevens, cast respectively as Gabriel and Satan, have each a portrait-chapter to himself. There must be a backdrop, provided by a brilliant chapter on "Washington: the Social Background." Comic relief is provided by "The Great American Farce," as the impeachment trial of President Johnson is denominated. Peripeteia in the action are indicated by such chapter headings as "Military Satraps and Revolution," "The Falling of Rotten Fruit," and "The Red Shirts Ride." For all this, the volume is based upon a thorough knowledge of memoirs and biographies, supplemented from a few manuscript collections and a wide use of contemporary newspaper files. Mr. Bowers was neither an unlearned nor a careless historian, and his vigorous partisanship is harmless because it is so honestly avowed.

3363. Buck, Paul H. The road to reunion, 1865–1900. Boston, Little, Brown, 1937. 320 p.
37–4978 E661.B84

The morrow of Appomattox saw a North arrogant in victory, and a South "spent and exhausted, yet ready to offer stolid resistance" to aggression. During the 12 Reconstruction years, while the North was building its policy upon force, sectional division was perhaps intensified. But before as well as after 1877, "the sturdy barriers of sectional antipathy and distrust crumbled one by one." Within a generation of Appomattox "an American nationalism existed which derived its elements indiscriminately from both the erstwhile foes." As the author states, virtually every activity of the American people during the period had some bearing upon sectional reconciliation, and he traces its progress in a variety of spheres: economic development and integration, the rise of a new generation in the South, the appearance of a new Southern literature hospitably received in the North, and the fraternizing of veterans' organizations. Perhaps the decisive element which permitted the "new patriotism" of 1898 was the acquiescence of leaders of Northern opinion in the disfranchisement of the Southern Negro.

3364. Cate, Wirt Armistead. Lucius Q. C. Lamar, secession and reunion. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1935. 594 p. illus.
35–9410 E664.L2C37

Bibliography: p. 555–563.

Lamar (1825–1893), the nephew of Mirabeau Buonaparte Lamar and the son-in-law of Augustus B. Longstreet, was a Georgian by birth. He represented Mississippi in the two Congresses before the Civil War, drafted the Mississippi ordinance of secession, held a commission in the Confederate Army, and went to Europe as a Confederate commissioner. His real eminence, however, began in 1872, when he succeeded in winning election to the U. S. House of Representatives, and soon thereafter led in the elimination of carpetbag rule from Mississippi. His distinguished and conciliatory service in the U.S. Senate culminated in his appointment by President Cleveland, first as Secretary of the Interior in 1885, and then to the Supreme Court in 1888, in both of which positions the ex-Confederate became a living symbol of restored national harmony. Mr. Cate's biography is extremely laudatory, but has much reason for being so.

3365. Coulter, Ellis M. Travels in the Confederate States, a bibliography. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1948. xiv, 289 p. (American exploration and travel [11])
48–7183 Z1251.S7C68

Travel, in the ordinary sense, is a rarity if not an impossibility in wartime, and this annotated bibliography, which derives its title from the series of which it forms a part, is somewhat misleadingly named. Most of the 492 titles which are here described in considerable detail are the personal narratives, letters, or diaries of soldiers. Somewhat unexpectedly, Southern soldier-writers are in a decided minority; many who did write wrote late and from memory, and Dr. Coulter has excluded most of their publications as "almost worthless" for his purpose. Many of the Northerners, however, are here reproached with being prejudiced witnesses. A considerable proportion of the titles are Northern regimental histories, selected whenever the author was a member of the unit and included descriptive detail. The entries list the illustrations in each work, and the annotations give "some estimate of the nature of its content, its reliability, and the itinerary of the author." In addition to the book's express purpose of showing what the South was like in wartime, it is a valuable guide to personal materials on the campaigns in Southern territory.

3366. Craven, Avery O. The coming of the Civil War. [2d ed. Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1957. 491 p.
57–8572 E338.C92 1957

The second edition of this work differs little from the first of 1942, but adds a preface in which the author tells that it arose out of an attempt to write a history of American democracy. He soon realized that the democratic process in the United States had "completely failed in the critical period that culminated in the Civil War," and this book was the result of his effort to find out why. He finds it necessary to go as far back as 1800 to provide an adequate background, and he approaches the situation from the angle of the South, "since that section's ways and institutions were under fire." Southern arguments in favor of slavery are represented as a reaction to an aggressive attack upon the institution within as well as outside the South. Rising emotionalism in the North engendered by decades of abolitionist propaganda is given the major blame for placing the two sections in irreconcilable frames of mind which left no alternative save secession and war. Despite the divisions which rendered the Democratic Party ineffectual in its efforts for compromise, the author believes that if the Republican movement had been less intransigent, slavery would ultimately have eliminated itself without any breach of the Union. Professor Craven nevertheless asserts that his conclusions "point out the tragedy of being human rather than of being either Southern or Northern."

3367. Craven, Avery O. Edmund Ruffin, Southerner; a study in secession. New York, Appleton, 1932. 283 p. 32–8631 F230.R94

"Notes," containing bibliography: p. 261–[271].

A native of Prince George's County, Virginia, Edmund Ruffin (1794–1865) was one of the South's most noted agriculturalists and became one of its earliest and most emphatic and fanatical secessionists. His writings on slavery and Southern rights vied in quantity with his writings on agriculture. As the founder of the League of United Southerners, Ruffin was allowed to fire the first shot from Morris Island against Fort Sumter. He never held a civil or military commission from the Confederacy, but nevertheless committed suicide when it collapsed. Mr. Craven has written a penetrating study of this man who, however interesting, is less important as an individual than as a representative of the tone and temper of his section and class.

3368. Current, Richard Nelson. Old Thad Stevens, a story of ambition. Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1942. 344 p.
43–52549 E415.9.S84C8

Bibliography: p. 323–328.

Stevens (1792–1868) was a Vermonter by birth but became a lawyer and an iron manufacturer in central Pennsylvania. From 1831 he was a leading politician in the Antimasonic, Whig, Free-Soil, and Republican Parties, and always showed himself a zealous advocate of democratic measures and an intransigent foe of any form of aristocratic privilege. In the Pennsylvania Legislature in the 1830's he did much to extend the system of free schools to the entire state. In the U. S. House of Representatives, from 1849 to 1853 and again from 1859 until his death, he was a vociferous opponent of slavery and the Southern slaveowners. During the Civil War he continued to assail Lincoln's administration for its allegedly slack conduct of the war, and on its close he became the most influential House member of the Joint Committee on Reconstruction. He led in the measures which wrecked Lincoln's plan of Reconstruction, hobbled the Johnson administration, and culminated in the impeachment and trial of President Johnson. He died soon after the latter's acquittal. This harsh and enigmatic figure has attracted a succession of biographers, none of whom can be said to have read the riddle and produced a definitive life, for which sufficient material probably does not exist. Mr. Current's life is based on solid research, but goes rather far in reducing Stevens' avowed passion for equality to a politician's love of power and a desire to make his party "a vehicle for industrialists like himself." The older work by James A. Woodburn, The Life of Thaddeus Stevens (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1913. 620 p.), is still worth consultation, though it is not a biography in the modern manner.

3369. Dodd, William E. Jefferson Davis. Philadelphia, G. W. Jacobs, 1907. 396 p. (American crisis biographies) 8–820 E467.1.D26D8

Bibliography: p. [384]–385.

A sympathetic and relatively brief narrative of the tragic life of Jefferson Davis (1808–1889), soldier, planter, United States Senator, and President of the Confederate States of America. Davis is shown to have derived a love of order and discipline from his West Point training; he was also a man of deep affection for his family. His most salient characteristic, clearly manifested in public office, was his loyalty to his friends, whom he loaded with favors and defended at all times. Attention is given to his leadership of the Southern rights forces in the Senate. As Chief Executive of the Confederacy he was not as effective as his wishes and abilities permitted, because of the jealousy of the seceded states for their sovereignty. Much attention is also given to his decisions affecting the operations of the Southern armies. Having spent two years in a Federal prison after the collapse of the Confederacy, Davis retired to private life, promoting the rebuilding of the Southern economy, but only occasionally appearing to make a speech. A more detailed but as yet incomplete biography is Hudson Strode's Jefferson Davis, [v. 1] American Patriot, 1808–1861 (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1955. xx, 460 p.)

3370. Dumond, Dwight Lowell. Antislavery origins of the Civil War in the United States. Ann Arbor, University of Michigan Press, 1939. 143 p. 39–21131 E449.D87

"List of additional readings": p. 131–134. "Selected bibliography of proslavery and antislavery publications": p. 135–139.

Lectures delivered on the Commonwealth Foundation at University College, London, which analyze "the abolition indictment of slavery and trace the steps by which the defense of the institution forced men to proceed from a general discussion of the subject to a war against it." The antislavery movement is divided into three periods: The first (1787-1833) centered about the activities of the racist American Colonization Society for promoting the deportation of free Negroes to Liberia. The second (1833–39) was marked by the rise of the American Anti-Slavery Society and a clarification of the principles of antislavery doctrine. Slavery's loss of national approval, the rallying of the South to its defense, and the flight of abolitionists from slave to free states all made slavery a sectional issue. In the third (1839–61) manumission became a political question with the formation of the Liberty Party by the antislavery forces, and the major parties became sectional parties vying for control of the Federal Government. The South's refusal to permit outside influence to set in motion economic and social forces in favor of constitutional abolition is regarded as the decisive factor in bringing about secession and war.

3371. Dumond, Dwight Lowell. The secession movement, 1860–1861. New York, Macmillan, 1931. 294 p. 31–30548 E440.5.D88

Bibliography: p. 273–286.

This is one of those historical studies which derive their value from carefully delimiting the field of investigation, and confining their attention to what lies within it. In this University of Michigan dissertation Professor Dumond aimed "to state the premises upon which the several groups of Southerners justified resistance to the Federal Government, and to trace the process of secession." He is aware that slavery was the bone of contention, and that vast economic and social interests were involved, but he is concerned with the expression of these in a Federal system of government under a written constitution. "The Republicans affirmed the right and duty of Congress to exclude slavery from the territories. The Southern-rights men denied it to Congress, to the territorial legislatures, and to the people of a territory until they framed an organic law preparatory to admission as a state." This was the issue which split the Democratic convention, brought about the election of a Republican President, kept the Southern leaders from acquiescence in this result, and frustrated the various attempts to work out a compromise. The author extracts the constitutional interpretations implicit in the course of events from April 1860 to April 1861 with great penetration.

3372. Dunning, William Archibald. Reconstruction, political and economic, 1865–1877. New York, Harper, 1907. xvi, 378 p. (The American Nation: a history. v. 22)

7–24164 E178.A54, v. 22

"Critical essays on authorities": p. [324]–357.

The Reconstruction era is here seen not merely as a time when the victorious North imposed its will upon the defeated South, but as a time marked by a realignment of national powers and a readjustment of political forces which accompanied recovery from the wounds of civil war. It is this national, rather than Southern, transformation which occupies Professor Dunning here. The rival policies of the President and Congress in regard to Reconstruction and national administration are discussed in the light of their effect upon the Southern state governments and their colored and white populations. While social, economic, and political conditions in the country as a whole left much to be desired, public attention came to be focused upon the irresponsible exploitation of Negro suffrage in the South, and on the spread of corruption in the Federal Government which political adversaries called "Grantism." The final chapters deal with the resurgence of the South, the nullification of Negro suffrage, the exposure of scandals throughout the administration, and the questionable election of 1876 and its aftermath. Professor Dunning's seven Essays on the Civil War and Reconstruction and Related Topics (New York, P. Smith, 1931. 397 p.) deal principally with the constitutional and governmental aspects of Reconstruction.

3373. Eaton, Clement. A history of the Southern Confederacy. New York, Macmillan, 1954. 351 p. 54–8772 E487.E15

Mr. Eaton's purpose is to "delineate the changes which occurred in the society of the Old South under the impact of war." The secession movement was a conservative revolt, "in that the South would not accept the 19th century," and all segments of society were of necessity deeply affected by the progress and fortunes of the war. Attention is focused upon the morale of the army and of the civilian population, and the eventual decline of the will to resist. The role of women, the attrition of cultural institutions, the attitude of Negroes, and the personalities of civil and military leaders are described, and there are summaries of Confederate strategy and logistics. Mr. Eaton has drawn upon letters, diaries, and other personal narratives in his effort to illustrate the "human drama" of the Confederacy. Similar in scope, treatment, and thesis, and even more detailed, is E. Merton Coulter's The Confederate States of America (no. 4076).

3374. Fite, Emerson David. Social and industrial conditions in the North during the Civil War. New York, P. Smith, 1930. 318 p. 30–26614 HC105.6.F6 1930

First published in 1910.

The considerable literature on civil society in the Confederacy is matched by a surprising dearth of titles for the situation north of the battle lines. The present volume, originally published over 45 years ago, is largely concerned with the wartime economic boom, in which agriculture, transportation, manufacturing, and commerce all participated, and in which capital and labor both shared. It also contains chapters on the progress, notwithstanding heavy Federal taxation, in municipal improvements, on the continuing foundation and endowment of colleges in spite of reduced attendance in them and in the high schools, on the prevalence of luxurious consumption and entertainment as usual which so outraged many an editorialist, and on the huge effort of organized charities to relieve the miseries, hardships, and dislocations caused by the war.

3375. Fladeland, Betty L. James Gillespie Birney: slaveholder to abolitionist. Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1955. 323 p. 55–13997 E340.B6F55

Bibliography: p. 295–315.

Birney (1792–1857) was the son of a wealthy slaveowner of Danville, Kentucky, and in 1818 moved to Huntsville, Alabama, where he established a successful law practice, acquired a nearby plantation, and entered state politics. In the course of the next decade he was converted to Presbyterianism and acquired a strong conviction of the evil of slavery and the duty of acting to end it. In 1830 he joined the American Colonization Society, and two years later became one of its agents. By 1834 he was ready to emancipate his own slaves and ally himself with the American Anti-Slavery Society. His attempts to publish an antislavery journal in Kentucky led to the usual menaces, and his withdrawal to Ohio. He served as corresponding secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society and was the candidate of the Liberty Party for President, passively in 1840 and actively in 1844, when he received 62,300 popular votes. An accident followed by a stroke eliminated him from public life in the following year. What an Alabama newspaper called his "retrograde progression" from slaveholder to colonizationist to abolitionist makes him one of the most interesting of the antislavery leaders. Miss Fladeland emphasizes the religious motives of his later career, and the sacrifices which he willingly incurred in their behalf.

3376. Fleming, Walter L., ed. Documentary history of Reconstruction, political, military, social, religious, educational & industrial, 1865 to the present time. Cleveland, A. H. Clark, 1906–7. 2 v. 6–39739 E668.F58

Walter Lynwood Fleming (1874–1932), an Alabaman by birth, was probably the best known of William A. Dunning's pupils at Columbia University, where he took his Ph. D. in 1904. He taught history at West Virginia University, Louisiana State University, where he is commemorated by an annual lectureship in Southern history, and from 1917 at Vanderbilt University in Nashville. The present compilation, with nearly 950 pages of text, has been regarded as a first-rate authority since its initial publication; a micro-offset reproduction was issued by Peter Smith in 1950. Volume I is chiefly concerned with the evolution of the Reconstruction policies of the Federal Government, and volume II with their concrete working out in the South, "with special reference to race relations, political morality, and economic, educational and religious matters." The phrase "to the present time" in the title means that materials on later conditions traced to Reconstruction policies, or on later reversals of such policies, are included in some chapters. The documents, most of which are extracts and relatively brief, include state constitutions, Federal and state laws, Congressional documents, a wide range of contemporary publications including Southern newspapers, personal statements from a variety of sources, and previously unpublished pieces from the papers of President Johnson and the records of the War Department. The chapters are largely topical, and each opens with a brief introduction by the editor. Impressive as the compilation is, it is only reasonable to suppose that Dr. Fleming's conviction that Reconstruction was an abomination vindictively imposed upon the white people of the South had some influence in his selection of materials.

3377. Fleming, Walter L. The sequel of Appomattox; a chronicle of the reunion of the States. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1921. 332 p. (The Chronicles of America series, v. 32)
22–12154 E173.C56, v. 32 E668.F62

"Bibliographical note": p. 305–307.

An economical and closely knit narrative of the Radical Republicans' triumph and the decade during which their system of white disfranchisement was imposed upon the South by military rule. The moral and intellectual results were more permanent than the material ones of debt and impoverishment: "the pleasantest side of Southern life came to an end," and "there was a marked change in Southern temperament toward the severe." The restoration of home rule brought in a long period of political stagnation, the result of fear "lest a developing democracy make trouble with the settlement of 1877."

3378. Freeman, Douglas Southall. The South to posterity; an introduction to the writings of Confederate history. New York, Scribner, 1939. 235 p. 39–28978 Z1242.5.F85

Bibliographical references in "Notes" (p. 205–216); "A Confederate book shelf": p. 217–221.

Dr. Freeman's attempts to satisfy readers of Gone with the Wind (no. 1619) and other Civil War novels of the 1930's who desired to go on to more serious fare, led to the present "brief history of Confederate history." Letters and diaries written during the war, the memoirs of participants both military and civil, noteworthy controversies in which the war was refought by the surviving leaders, the "matchless splendor" of the Official Records of the Rebellion (no. 3697) together with a few supplemental documentary publications, and the interpretations of European historians are reviewed. Its depth of knowledge and finish of style, which must make this one of the most readable and rewarding works of bibliography ever written, have made many a convert to the glamor of the Lost Cause.

3379. [Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and Francis Jackson Garrison] William Lloyd Garrison, 1805–1879; the story of his life told by his children. New York, Century Co., 1885–89. 4 v.
11–14856 E449.G2546

3380. Nye, Russel B. William Lloyd Garrison and the humanitarian reformers. Boston, Little, Brown [1955] 215 p. (The Library of American biography) 55–7470 E449.G2558

The comprehensive study of Garrison by his sons, providing a month-by-month account of his life through reprints of the majority of his letters, articles, and speeches, has been the primary source for all subsequent Garrison biographies, such as Lindsay Swift's William Lloyd Garrison (Philadelphia, G. W. Jacobs, 1911. 412 p.). The sons' sympathetic biography describes Garrison's impoverished youth in Newburyport, Massachusetts, where he was apprenticed to a local newspaper editor and himself entered the craft as the editor of the local Free Press in 1826. In 1828 he took up, among other crusades, the cause of the immediate and complete manumission of the South's slaves. After a period which included lecture tours and a stay in jail, Garrison in 1830 founded the Liberator, the foremost emancipation journal. His advocacy of pacifism and nonresistance did not prevent his being mobbed during several speaking engagements. By 1861 he was generally regarded as the leader of the abolitionists, and he hailed secession, which he thought would teach the South a lesson, but not the war. On the ratification of the 13th amendment Garrison refused a 23d term as president of the American Anti-Slavery Society and ceased publishing the Liberator. During his remaining years he turned his reformist energies to writing and preaching on behalf of free trade, women's rights, and other causes. Dr. Nye's brief volume makes Garrison's religious faith the central fact in his career, and likens his role to a guilty conscience of the North.

3381. Hart, Albert Bushnell. Slavery and abolition, 1831–1841. New York, Harper, 1906. xv, 360 p. (The American Nation: a history, v. 16)
6–24128 E178.A54

"Critical essay on authorities": p. [324]–343.

This contribution to the American Nation series by its editor has of late several times been described as obsolete or outmoded. It is listed here because, while more recent studies have done much to broaden our knowledge of the genesis and bases of abolitionism, and the details of plantation slavery, none has the same broad scope and balanced treatment. Here, in one modest-sized volume, is a description of slavery as an economic system and a way of life; the late attempt of the slave interest to find a theoretical justification for it; the ideas and activities of the abolitionists; and the impingement of abolitionism upon national politics and international relations through 1840. Hart has been said to overemphasize the importance of W. L. Garrison, but in chapter XXI he offers evidence "which most conclusively shows how little Garrison is entitled to be taken as the typical or the chief abolitionist." He observes that down to 1840 the abolitionists had achieved practically nothing of a tangible kind, but that they had nevertheless "laid hold of a principle without which the republic could not exist—the principle, namely, that free discussion is the breath of liberty; and that any institution which could not bear the light of inquiry, argument, and denunciation was a weak and a dangerous institution."

3382. Hendrick, Burton J. Lincoln's war Cabinet. Boston, Little, Brown, 1946. 482 p. illus. 46–7733 E456.H4

A popular but substantial account of the activities and personalities of Lincoln's principal Civil War aides. The author credits Lincoln with genius in his appointing to Cabinet rank all his chief rivals for the Republican nomination. Each Cabinet member is described as to personality, political sympathies, contribution to the work of the Cabinet and the progress of the war, attitude toward Lincoln, role in party and national politics, and relations with fellow Cabinet members. Emphasis falls upon the efforts of Secretary of State Seward to control the Cabinet, the struggle for power between moderate and radical Republicans manifest in the debates over emancipation and McClellan's restoration to command, the relations of the Senate with the Cabinet, and the personal antagonism between Salmon Portland Chase and Montgomery Blair, which eventually weakened the cohesiveness of the original Cabinet, and led to the replacement of several of its members.

3383. Hendrick, Burton J. Statesmen of the lost cause; Jefferson Davis and his Cabinet. Boston, Little, Brown, 1939. xvii, 452 p. illus. 39–28981 E487.H47

Bibliography: p. [433]–439.

3384. Patrick, Rembert W. Jefferson Davis and his Cabinet. Baton Rouge, Louisiana State University Press, 1944. 401 p. 44–9637 E487.P3

Bibliography: p. [369]–387.

Mr. Hendrick studies the statesmanship and diplomacy of the ruling circle of the Confederacy through an analysis of the lives and personalities of its civilian leaders. While most of the South's generals were members of the aristocracy, the Cabinet posts and important diplomatic missions were largely filled by men of humbler origin. In showing how each Cabinet member failed to achieve his official goal, with the exception of the Postmaster General, Mr. Hendrick asserts that the statesmanship of the South was inadequate for the situation at hand. Dr. Patrick, in his volume which originated as a dissertation at the University of North Carolina, provides biographies of even the least distinguished members of the Cabinet and seeks to assess their contributions and their deficiencies in relation to the Confederate war effort.

3385. Henry, Robert Selph. The story of Reconstruction. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1938. 633 p. 38–6264 E668.H516

Bibliography included in "Acknowledgments": p. 595–597.

During Reconstruction there was something going on every minute, and Mr. Henry succeeds in getting an extraordinary proportion of it into his crowded pages. Like its predecessor, The Story of the Confederacy (no. 3698), "it is not so much an attempt to enlarge the knowledge of the period treated as to organize and present it in direct narrative form." The author's sympathies are clearly with the ex-Confederates, but his exemplary objectivity of tone allows the course of events to speak for itself. The 51 chapters are organized into 3 books: "Restoration," down to the passage of the Act of March 2, 1867, which, Congressman Garfield said, put "the bayonet at the breast of every rebel in the South"; "Reconstruction," down to the admission of reconstructed Georgia in mid-July, 1870; and "Redemption," concerning which Mr. Henry says: "The story of the last six years of the period of Reconstruction is one of counter-revolution—a counter-revolution effected under the forms of law where that was possible; effected by secrecy and by guile, where that would serve; effected openly, regardless of the forms of law, with violence or the threat of violence, where that had to be. But the counter-revolution was effected, at a cost to the South and its future incalculably great, justified only by the still greater cost of not effecting it."

3386. Horn, Stanley F. Invisible empire; the story of the Ku Klux Klan, 1866–1871. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1939. 434 p. 39–8103 E668.H78

"References": p. [421]–422.

Extensive documentary evidence employed by the author shows that the Klan had innocuous beginnings as a social club in Pulaski, Tennessee, in December 1865, but rapidly grew into a powerful political league with the avowed purpose of protecting the South's white population at a time when they seemed to be without governmental support and in danger of subjection by their former slaves. Mr. Horn sets forth many details of the organization and methods of the Klan as it steadily increased in scope and in the violence of its attempts to restore the prewar position of the Southern whites. Mr.

Horn believes in the essential honesty of the Klan's members, who realized the inherent dangers of such an extralegal agency, and "ceased its use as soon as it had served their purpose, their original objectives fairly well attained." Most of the book is devoted to a state-by-state examination of the Klan's activities and their effects upon Southern Negroes and whites, the Federal Government, and the local civil and military administration.

3387. Hyman, Harold Melvin. Era of the oath; Northern loyalty tests during the Civil War and Reconstruction. Philadelphia, University of Pennsylvania Press, 1954. 229 p.
54–7108 E458.8.H9
Bibliography: p. [208]–222.

3388. Dorris, Jonathan Truman. Pardon and amnesty under Lincoln and Johnson; the restoration of the Confederates to their rights and privileges, 1861–1898. Introd. by J. G. Randall. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1953. xxi, 459 p. 53–13363 E668.D713
Bibliography: p. [423]–437.

Dr. Hyman's "era of the oath" extends from April 1861, when, on the motion of Attorney General Bates, all employees of the Departments were required to take the oath of allegiance anew, to May 1884, when Representative S. S. Cox of New York finally succeeded in his campaign to bring about the repeal of the surviving test oaths from the Civil War. During this time they had been imposed for a diversity of purposes, but, the author thinks, had increasingly become a mere means for the Radical Republicans in Congress to identify and reward their own partisans. The book is written with the loyalty oaths applied to academic personnel after World War II in mind, and heaps up evidence to show that the oaths of 1861–84 failed as a means of determining loyalty, and that they operated to keep the honorable and conscientious out of office or franchise, and let the unscrupulous in. With this animus, it is hardly fair to the oath of future loyalty as used by President Lincoln, and, after his initial period of vindictiveness, by President Johnson in restoring the states of the Confederacy to the Union with their old ruling class still in charge. Four blood-stained years of civil war were to be forgotten in exchange for a simple pledge of future good behavior—conciliation could hardly go much further. This salient fact is also obscured in Dr. Dorris' Pardon and Amnesty, because of his somewhat naïve conviction that "the authorities at Washington" had no warrant for giving the seceders "the odious appellations of 'rebels' and 'traitors.'" The real proscription came when the congressional majority succeeded in writing their "ironclad test oath" into the 14th Amendment, and, by substituting a retrospective for a prospective oath, excluded the former Confederates from franchise and office. Dr. Dorris' volume puts in order for the first time the complex facts concerning the status of the active Confederates, in the eyes of the Federal Government, from the initial secessions to the final repeal of disability under the 14th Amendment on June 8, 1898. There are special treatments of the cases of Robert E. Lee and Jefferson Davis, and the general course of events in North Carolina.

3389. Jenkins, William Sumner. Proslavery thought in the Old South. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1935. 381 p. ([The University of North Carolina. Social study series])
35–15259 E441.J46
Bibliography: p. 309–358.

Soon after the Missouri crisis of 1820 the Old South began to produce a voluminous body of theoretical and polemical writing in defense of slavery, which by 1835 had acquired the status of orthodoxy within the section, and which continued to accumulate even after the outbreak of war in 1861, and down to the collapse of the Confederacy. In the present volume Professor Jenkins aims "to indicate the various thought trends, to evaluate their significance, and to estimate their weight in the entire body of proslavery thought." He considers in turn theories of the nature, origin, and legal basis of slavery; of slavery's relation to the State, the Constitution, and republican government; of the moral and religious justification of slavery; of the racial basis of slavery (including the "plural origin" doctrine, which made the Negro a separate and not necessarily human species); and of slavery as an ordering of social classes and economic production. He finds that the defense of slavery was so elaborated in the thought of antiquity and the Middle Ages that the theorists of the Old South could draw upon these sources at length, and actually contributed little that was original. "The misfortune to the South was that its mental power was taken out of other fields of endeavor at a time when it could have been most fruitful in the development of a higher civilization."

3390. Lincoln, Abraham. Collected works. The Abraham Lincoln Association, Springfield, Illinois. Roy P. Basler, editor; Marion Dolores Pratt and Lloyd A. Dunlap, assistant editors. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1953–55. 9 v. illus. 53–6293 E457.91 1953
CONTENTS.—1. 1824–1848.—2. 1848–1858.—3. 1858–1860.—4. 1860–1861.—5. 1861–1862.—6. 1862–1863.—7. 1863–1864.—8. 1864–1865.—Index.

3391. Angle, Paul M., ed. The Lincoln reader. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1947. 564 p. illus. 47-30067 E457.A58
Bibliography: p. [544]–547.

3392. Thomas, Benjamin P. Abraham Lincoln, a biography. New York, Knopf, 1952. xiv, 548, xii p. illus. 52-6425 E457.T427 1952.
Bibliography: p. [523]–548.

3393. Sandburg, Carl. Abraham Lincoln; the war years. With 414 halftones of photographs and 249 cuts of cartoons, letters, documents . . . New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1939. 4 v.
39-27998 E457.4.S36

3394. Randall, James G. Lincoln, the President. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1945–55. 4 v. illus. (American political leaders)
45-10041 E457.R2
Includes bibliographies.
CONTENTS.—v. 1–2. Springfield to Gettysburg.—v. 3. Midstream.—v. 4. Last full measure.

3395. Basler, Roy P. The Lincoln legend; a study in changing conceptions. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1935. 335 p. illus.
35-13765 E457.B35 Z8505.B31
Thesis (Ph. D.)—Duke University, 1931.
"A classified bibliography of poetry, fiction, and drama dealing with Lincoln": p. 309–[327].

In 1857 Lincoln (1809–1865) was a fairly successful attorney of Springfield, Illinois, whose most profitable client was the Illinois Central Railroad. He had only recently returned to politics as a Republican after a retirement of some years; his earlier Whig career had included four terms in the Illinois Legislature and one in the U. S. House of Representatives (1847–49). In 1858 he contested S. A. Douglas' seat in the U. S. Senate, and won national celebrity if not the election from the set debates in which they engaged throughout the State. He was still a minor candidate when the Republican Convention met at Chicago in 1860, but the more famous leaders eliminated each other, and Lincoln as the Republican candidate carried the electoral college against a Democratic Party now split into fragments. Eleven of the fifteen slave states made his election the occasion for secession, and the retiring administration allowed them to organize their military resources without the least molestation. Resorting to arms to maintain the Union under such handicaps, Lincoln had to conduct a four years' war, of which the first two were largely frustration; and when victory was at last secure, he was assassinated by a mad actor. Lincoln's failure to domineer or engage in histrionics led most of his contemporaries to realize his greatness only in retrospect, but the popular instinct which has picked him out as one of the two greatest Americans, and has made him the lay saint of the democratic faith, is as sound as it is persistent. The foundation work, both in collecting Lincoln's writings and in writing his life and times, was performed in the last century by his secretaries, John G. Nicolay and John Hay. The first task has been recently completed in a quite definitive manner, in the Collected Works edited by Dr. Basler under the auspices of the Abraham Lincoln Association. Supplementary in some degree is David C. Mearns' The Lincoln Papers: the Story of the Collection, with Selections to July 4, 1861 (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1948. 2 v. (xvii, 681 p.)), but unfortunately Lincoln had accumulated very little down to 1860. Paul M. Angle's A Shelf of Lincoln Books: A Critical, Selective Bibliography of Lincolniana (New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1946. xvii, 142 p.) is a uniquely helpful guide to Lincoln literature down to its date, but of course cannot serve for the enormous output of the last dozen years. Dr. Angle's Lincoln Reader is an anthology of biographical materials concerning Lincoln, including both contemporaries and later writers, skillfully pieced together with some connective matter by the compiler. The late Benjamin P. Thomas, in Portrait for Posterity: Lincoln and His Biographers (New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1947. xvii, 329 p.), offers penetrating estimates of attitudes and outlooks, especially of Lincoln's earlier biographers. Mr. Thomas went on to write his own biography, entered above; since its appearance it has been generally acclaimed as the best-balanced and most thoroughly informed one-volume life; but it is sometimes not very apparent that the subject was a great man. Mr. Sandburg's War Years is a vivid and tremendous panorama of Lincoln's Washington, but both it and his earlier Abraham Lincoln, The Prairie Years (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1926. 2 v.) are for readers with leisure and patience. There is now a one-volume condensation of both: Abraham Lincoln, the Prairie Years and the War Years (New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1954. xiv, 762 p.). The late Professor Randall's Lincoln, the President is a work of immense scholarship, and probably treats its subject as objectively as anyone could whose sympathies were wholly with the aristocracy of the Old South. Professor Richard N. Current, who completed Dr. Randall's fourth volume, has also made a one-volume condensation, chiefly from those parts "which deal primarily with Lincoln the man and with his personal relationships": Mr. Lincoln (New York, Dodd, Mead, 1957. 392 p.). Dr. Basler's The Lincoln Legend aims "to show how poets, writers of fiction, dramatists, and occasionally biographers have, with the help of the folk-mind, created about Lincoln a national legend or myth which in conception is much like the hero-myths of other nations." Other biographies, documentary publications, special studies, and monographs are so numerous that space equal to the whole of this section could readily be filled with them.

3396. Meade, Robert Douthat. Judah P. Benjamin, Confederate statesman. New York, Oxford University Press, 1943. 432 p.
43-11218 E467.1.B4M4

"Select bibliography": p. 415-417.

Born in the British West Indies of Jewish parents, Benjamin (1811-1884) had three distinguished careers in one lifetime. After growing up in South Carolina, he settled in New Orleans and commenced his career as a leader of the American bar and as a legislator. His natural conservatism led him to join the Whigs, who in 1852 sent him to the U. S. Senate, where he worked for national expansion to increase the South's strength. After 1856 he became a Democrat and joined in the defense of Southern rights, and was among the first to advocate secession. His friendship with Jefferson Davis brought about his appointment as Attorney General of the Confederacy, and then as Secretary of War in September 1861. His career as Confederate statesman was his least fortunate, since he never had the confidence of the masses and was made a scapegoat for Confederate military failures. In 1862 he transferred to the Department of State, directing the Confederacy's desperate but vain efforts to obtain diplomatic recognition from the European powers. His third career began in 1866, following the Confederacy's collapse, when he fled to England and rapidly became a brilliant and successful barrister, limiting himself to cases before the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

3397. Milton, George Fort. The eve of conflict; Stephen A. Douglas and the needless war. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1934. 608 p. illus.
34-36084 E415.9.D73M5

Bibliography: p. [571]-580.

A sympathetic study which in two chapters passes over the youth and early career of Douglas (1813-1861) so as to concentrate upon his service as Democratic Senator from Illinois in years of almost unintermitted sectional crisis (1847-61). Douglas, his private utterances show, regarded slavery as "a curse beyond computation," but as one shielded by the Constitution from political interference. The Kansas-Nebraska Act of 1854, which unleashed the later stages of the crisis and for which Douglas accepted full responsibility, was introduced primarily because Chicago and the Northwest needed a railroad to the Pacific, and could not get one before the political organization of the vast Platte country, which by the 1850's was long overdue. Southern Congressmen insisted upon equal rights for slaveowners in Kansas and Nebraska up to their admission as states, and Douglas, needing Southern votes and regarding the establishment of slavery in them as an economic impossibility, acquiesced. Thereafter he defended the measure as a genuinely democratic settlement, and strove to preserve the Union in spite of the extremists of either side, his unremitting efforts leading to his premature breakdown and death. At the close of 1857 Douglas, by denouncing the proslavery Lecompton Constitution for Kansas, broke with the Buchanan administration, thereby becoming increasingly estranged from the Southern rights leaders. Milton agreed with Alexander H. Stephens (no. 3415) that "if the extremists of the South had not prevented, Douglas would have prevailed; the Civil War would not have occurred."

3398. Nevins, Allan. Ordeal of the Union. New York, Scribner, 1947. 2 v. illus.
47-11072 E415.7.N4

Contents.—v. 1. Fruits of manifest destiny, 1847-1852. A note on sources (p. 561-562).—v. 2. A house dividing, 1852-1857.

3399. Nevins, Allan. The emergence of Lincoln. New York, Scribner, 1950. 2 v. illus.
50-9920 E415.7.N38

Contents.—v. 1. Douglas, Buchanan, and party chaos, 1857-1859.—v. 2. Prologue to civil war, 1859-1861. Bibliography (p. 491-506).

The first two installments of what is designed to be a large-scale history of the Civil War era. Professor Nevins believes that the Civil War could have been avoided had the people and their leaders acted together in solving the problems of slavery, sectional irritation, and the correct relations between the races. The conflict between the North and the South is viewed as essentially one between the rising force of national homogeneity and the declining influence of regionalism, and is shown to have gotten out of hand as it progressively preoccupied the passions rather than the reason of all Americans. Cultural and economic as well as political developments are traced to convey a complete picture of the America of the times when sectionalism took such a firm grip on men's tempers that civil war had to determine the future position of the Negro race in America. As the author shows, the Presidency, under Taylor, Fillmore, Pierce, and Buchanan, was never more devoid of initiative and leadership—at a time when such qualities were indispensable. On one point the author is emphatic: "of all the monistic explanations for the drift to war, that posited upon supposed economic causes is the flimsiest." Professor Nevins has used contemporary sources throughout in the form of speeches, diaries, letters, and periodicals.

3400. Nichols, Roy F. The disruption of American Democracy. New York, Macmillan, 1948. xviii, 612 p. illus. 48–4344 E436.N56
Bibliography: p. 565–589.

Describes the progressive debilitation of the Democratic Party, called the "American Democracy" in the 19th century, during the years 1856–61. The author treats at length the party conventions of 1856 and 1860, the personal quarrels of leading politicians, the influence of sectional sentiments upon their actions, the splinter parties breaking off from the Democracy, and the relationship of the Democracy to Congress and to the opposition parties. The party itself is examined in the relations of its voters, machines, and leaders both on national and state levels. The Democracy is credited with working to establish coöperative government; however, "deeply affected by the shocks of the collisions occurring within the society in which it operated and of which it was a part, the party failed to overcome the divisive attitudes and was shattered." War came as a result of this failure. The book continues into a more critical period the study of the party which served as the author's doctoral dissertation at Columbia University: The Democratic Machine, 1850–1854 (New York, Columbia University, 1923. 248 p.).

3401. Nye, Russel B. Fettered freedom; civil liberties and the slavery controversy, 1830–1860. East Lansing, Michigan State College Press, 1949. 273 p. illus. 49–3656 JC599.U5N9
"Bibliography of sources": p. 253–269.

Analyzes the controversy between the North and South arising from divergent interpretations of the degree to which men may enjoy their natural and constitutional rights by tracing the history of the attempts to suppress the abolitionist movement. During their agitation to arouse the Nation against slavery, the abolitionists were subjected to mob violence, censorship, unconstitutional interpretations of the laws, discrimination in regard to employment, and other curtailments of civil rights—"the freedoms belonging to the citizen as an individual and as a member of society." From evidence in the form of contemporary newspaper accounts, court and police records, and diaries, the author shows that the deprivation of the abolitionists' civil rights won for them a large body of supporters "who thought less of the wrongs of the slave than of the rights of the white man." The abolitionists were able to point out that the true issue of the sectional struggle was the extent to which civil rights may be curtailed in the interests of the majority.

3402. Phillips, Ulrich Bonnell. American Negro slavery; a survey of the supply, employment and control of Negro labor as determined by the plantation régime. New York, Appleton, 1918. 529 p. 18–11187 E441.P549

3403. Stampp, Kenneth M. The peculiar institution: slavery in the ante bellum South. New York, Knopf, 1956. 435, xiii p. 56–5800 E441.S8
"Manuscripts consulted, and their locations": p. 431–[436].

Professor Phillips' book is concerned with the rise, nature, and influence of slavery in the plantation system, which it supported and to which it owed its existence. The Negro is pictured by Dr. Phillips as a child-like being culturally and intellectually inferior to the white man. This work was usually considered as a definitive treatment until the publication of Professor Stampp's new synthesis from the same or similar sources to those employed by Dr. Phillips. Dr. Stampp assumes that "innately Negroes are only white men with black skins," and produces a history of slavery between 1830 and 1860 which incorporates the point of view of the slaves themselves, and shows in detail how the good intentions of humane masters were normally frustrated by the essential inhumanity of the system. Both refer to contemporary periodicals, letters, plantation journals, and items pertaining to the foreign and domestic slave trade; however, Dr. Phillips finds that slavery was essential to the rise of the cotton industry and beneficial, as a whole, compared with Negro life in Africa, while Dr. Stampp can find no philosophical justification for the "peculiar institution" except that it paid the master class. And it paid in the older slave states only because they raised a surplus of Negroes for sale and transportation to the newer states, from Alabama to Texas.

3404. Phillips, Ulrich Bonnell. The course of the South to secession; an interpretation. Edited by E. Merton Coulter. New York, Appleton-Century, 1939. 176 p. 40–2173 F213.P65
"Prepared and published under the direction of the American Historical Association from the income of the Albert J. Beveridge memorial fund."

Lectures delivered at Northwestern University in 1932 and originally published in the Georgia Historical Quarterly are here reprinted with the author's article, "The Central Theme of Southern History," prepared for the 1928 meeting of the American Historical Association. The lectures provide a historical rationale for the establishment of the Confederacy, while the theme of the article is that the South has always been and always will be the land of white supremacy. With this premise in mind, Professor Phillips' lectures assert that the United States from its colonization had no sectional interests or sentiments which could drive them apart. It was not until the 1820's that slavery became an issue, and then it took the form of legislation and other activities to prevent slave revolts. Professor Phillips lays the main blame for secession at the door of the abolitionists, whose efforts to force the Federal Government and the Congress to intervene in Southern affairs eventually caused violent measures on the part of Southern "fire-eaters." This danger to slavery, Professor Phillips concludes, set in motion the Southern independence movement—"a program so much in keeping with American precedent and the gospel of self-government, so legitimated by state sovereignty, so long considered, and now supported by such a multitude of conservative citizens."

3405. Phillips, Ulrich Bonnell. The life of Robert Toombs. New York, Macmillan, 1913. 281 p. 13–17129 E415.9.T6P5

Toombs (1810–1885) was a planter, lawyer, and political leader of ante bellum Georgia, in the State Legislature from 1837 and in the U. S. Congress after 1844. A conservative Whig, he was ordinarily a moderate advocate of Southern rights, but at the peak of the crisis of 1850 he came out strongly in favor of the equal claim of the slave states to the territories in a series of speeches which established his fame. When the compromise was effected, he organized a Constitutional Union Party to defend it, and entered the Democratic fold only when the movement failed to spread beyond Georgia. Again he exerted a moderating influence until the crisis of 1860, when he took his stand on the Crittenden compromise measures and, on their rejection by the Republicans, came out for immediate secession. Failing to obtain election to the Presidency of the Confederate States, he was too unruly an individualist to succeed either as Secretary of State or as a brigadier-general, and was out of public life after 1862. He did not return until Reconstruction was over, but in 1877 and for a few years thereafter, until the failure of his health, was prominent in the reorganization of Georgia.

3406. Pierce, Edward L. Memoir and letters of Charles Sumner. Boston, Roberts Bros., 1877–93. 4 v. illus. 13–19830 E415.9.S9P6

Contents.—1. 1811–1838.—2. 1838–1845.—3. 1845–1860.—4. 1860–1874.

Born in Boston and prepared for the bar at Harvard, Sumner (1811–1874) entered politics at the top when elected to the Senate in 1851 by a coalition of Democrats and Free-Soilers. Previously he had practiced law, traveled extensively in Europe, and delivered striking public addresses advocating world peace and equal rights for all races. He helped found the Republican Party and, after a vituperative speech on "The Crime against Kansas," was brutally assaulted on the floor of the Senate in 1856 by a South Carolina Representative whose uncle was a Senator from the same State. Sumner was absent from the Senate for the three and a half years required for his recovery. He was made chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1861 and advised the Cabinet throughout the war in matters relating to international law. Although he had been a staunch supporter of Lincoln, Sumner broke with Andrew Johnson over Reconstruction policy and led the Senate in the impeachment proceedings of 1867. During the Grant administration he defeated the President's plan to annex Santo Domingo, and was removed from his committee chairmanship for fear that he might harm the Alabama Claims negotiations then being conducted with Great Britain. He was still an erratic but powerful moral force when his heart gave out after a session of the Senate in March 1874. This biography by a devoted friend and admirer is old-fashioned and at times over-detailed, but is yet to be replaced.

3407. Pressly, Thomas J. Americans interpret their Civil War. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1954. xvi, 347 p. 52–13166 E468.5.P7

Viewing the Civil War as "the classic example of a major event in the history of the United States which has been explained and interpreted in a wide variety of quite different ways," the author treats it "as a specific case history which illuminates to some extent the problems of [historical] relativism and causation." Since the war "has seemed to involve vital issues of lasting significance, it has enlisted not only the interest of successive generations but also their loyalties and their emotions," and even recent utterances have been, in the phrase of the younger O. W. Holmes, "touched with fire." The survey is carried from the reactions of Motley, Bancroft, and Prescott to the attack on Fort Sumter, down to the present "confusion of voices."

3408. Randall, James G. The Civil War and Reconstruction; with supplementary bibliography. [2d ed.] Boston, Heath, 1953. xvii, 971 p. illus., maps. 53–1027 E468.R26 1953

"Bibliographical note": p. 881–883. Bibliography: p. 885–935.

First published in 1937 to supply the lack of "one volume of recent date which brings the whole period of conflict and readjustment [1850–77] into a scholarly synthesis and distills the findings of historical scholarship for the general reader." The only change in the 1953 edition is the addition of a 10-page "Supplemental Bibliography" listing the principal books and articles which had appeared during the interval. There is no reason to suppose that this fresh material would have led the author to change his essential positions, those of a moderate "revisionist," convinced that the conflict between North and South was not "irrepressible," and that war might have been avoided if "something more of statesmanship, moderation, and understanding, and something less of professional patrioteering, slogan making, face-saving, political clamoring, and propaganda had existed on both sides." The work continues to be a widely used textbook and guide to perplexed scholars, since here alone, in brief compass, can they find not only the major political and military developments, but also "border problems, non-military development during the war, intellectual tendencies, anti-war efforts, religious and educational movements, propaganda methods, and the cacophony of voices that influenced public opinion," in a careful, lucid, and balanced treatment.

3409. Simms, Henry H. A decade of sectional controversy, 1851–1861. Chapel Hill, University of North Carolina Press, 1942. 284 p. 42–51250 E415.7.S6
Bibliography: p. 249–265.

The development of the Southern viewpoint during the decade preceding the Civil War is stressed. Extensive quotations from editorial comments by Northern as well as Southern newspapers illustrate the changes in popular opinion as political developments in the sectional controversy unfolded. The slavery issue was the prime manifestation of the conflict, and attention is focused on Southern sentiments and economic and political motives for its retention. This evidence shows, the author thinks, that the South was on the defensive since, in his judgment, it had no intention of extending slavery to free states, and there was no chance that slavery would take hold in the territories. Furthermore, the controversy over fugitive slaves was out of proportion to the number that actually escaped. Party rivalry is blamed as the principal cause of sectional antagonism, which was unduly magnified by vituperation and vilification on the part of Northern and Southern leaders at a time when conciliatory statesmanship might have resolved the most serious differences.

3410. Smith, William Ernest. The Francis Preston Blair family in politics. New York, Macmillan, 1933. 2 v. illus. 33–13071 E415.9.B63S6
Bibliography: v. 2, p. 497–510.

After the Adams family, Professor Smith believes, the Blairs were the second most influential family in 19th-century American politics, participating in nearly every important event between 1828 and 1878. Francis Preston Blair (1791–1876), the Virginia-born founder of the dynasty, was a lifelong political journalist imported from Kentucky to sit in Andrew Jackson's celebrated Kitchen Cabinet. His two sons, Montgomery (1813–1883) and Frank P. Blair (1821–1875), began their political careers in Missouri as Free-Soil Democrats. Like their father, the sons adhered to whatever party at a given time best reflected their political views. All three became Republicans by 1860 and remained so until their views on Reconstruction clashed with the Radicals, which led them to return to the Democrats by 1868. Frank became a Congressman from Missouri, and on the outbreak of the Civil War led the struggle to keep Missouri in the Union, and afterward had a stormy career as a major general. As a Democrat, Frank was the party's nominee for the Vice Presidency in 1868 and served as a Senator until 1873. Montgomery Blair's career was primarily that of a judge and outstanding attorney until 1861, when he was taken into Lincoln's Cabinet as Postmaster General. In 1864 he was ousted in consequence of an ultimatum from the Radicals in Congress. After a brief period as a Liberal Republican, Montgomery threw his weight behind the Democrats, going so far as to found a newspaper which challenged the validity of Rutherford B. Hayes' election.

3411. Stryker, Lloyd Paul. Andrew Johnson, a study in courage. New York, Macmillan, 1930. xvi, 881 p. illus. 33–1228 E667.S924
"Authorities and abbreviations used": p. 838–844.

3412. Winston, Robert W. Andrew Johnson, plebeian and patriot. New York, Holt, 1928. xvi, 549 p. illus. 28–7534 E667.W78
Bibliography: p. 529–540.

Mr. Stryker's favorable appraisal of the life of President Johnson (1808–1875) is designed to eliminate misunderstandings about the man and his actions and policies which had persisted in history books and the popular mind since the days of Johnson's impeachment (March–May 1868). Here Johnson is described as a lifelong Unionist, born in Raleigh, North Carolina, who rose from the humblest beginnings to service as Democratic Governor and Senator from Tennessee before the Civil War. His extreme loyalty to the Union drew the notice of President Lincoln, who appointed him military governor of free Tennessee in 1861, where he administered the first of Lincoln's Reconstruction schemes until his election as Vice President in 1864. Having succeeded to the Presidency, Johnson, after considering the alternative, felt compelled to carry out Lincoln's moderate and wise plans for the rehabilitation of the South—much to the wrath of the Radical Republicans, who resolved to crush him. Johnson's repeated vetoes of extremist Reconstruction legislation so enraged his opponents that impeachment proceedings were instituted in an atmosphere of virtual congressional revolt. Johnson was acquitted and, although his administration was hobbled, did what he could to moderate the vindictive treatment of the South. Such was the bitterness of the Radicals that they spared no effort to defame Johnson during the remainder of his term and of his life. Mr. Winston's biography is a briefer treatment on the same lines and no less sympathetic. David Miller Dewitt's The Impeachment and Trial of Andrew Johnson (New York, Macmillan, 1903. 646 p.) is an objective and thorough account of this constitutionally unique episode.

3413. Thomas, Benjamin P. Theodore Weld, crusader for freedom. New Brunswick, N. J., Rutgers University Press, 1950. 307 p.
50–9667 E449.W46

Bibliography: p. [289]–300.

This first biography of "the greatest of the abolitionists" rescues Weld (1803–1895) from comparative obscurity. Born in Connecticut of a long line of Congregational ministers, Weld matured early, and undertook a lecture tour at the age of 17. Converted by C. G. Finney in 1823, he joined his Holy Band as an active evangelist, but for the first decade his special causes were temperance and manual labor. Not until 1833 did he concentrate upon abolition. In the following year, when he and his friends had been forced out of Lane Seminary, he became a full-time agent of the American Anti-Slavery Society. His active antislavery career lasted only a decade, but in the quality of his converts, who included Henry Ward Beecher, Harriet Beecher Stowe, and James G. Birney, and in the extent and effect of the evangelizing which he conducted or organized in the rural counties of the West, he was of unique importance. In 1841 he transferred to Washington and for two years advised and heartened the small but increasing antislavery group in Congress. In 1843 he withdrew to his farm, and returned to the public platform only once, during the Civil War, in order to rally support for the war effort. Weld avoided personal publicity of any kind, withholding his name from his antislavery writings and, so far as possible, from his other activities, and the crucial nature of his influence has been a rediscovery of recent historians.

3414. Villard, Oswald Garrison. John Brown, 1800–1859, a biography fifty years after. [Rev. ed.] New York, Knopf, 1943. 738 p. illus.
43–10611 E451.V71 1943

Bibliography: p. 599–709, [709a]–709d.

John Brown behind his whiskers looked and talked like an Old Testament prophet, and his strange and sanguinary role in the crisis years from 1856 to 1859 led to as wide a range of conflicting opinions as have ever accumulated about any historic figure. Before May 26, 1856, Brown was a migratory, debt-ridden nobody; after the killings on the Pottawatomie he was a national figure, sinister to some and to others a dauntless champion of righteousness. For the six weeks after October 16, 1859, when his attempt upon Harper's Ferry failed, the eyes and ears of the whole Nation were focused upon him. Mr. Villard was the first to assemble the complete facts about Brown and to put them into an intelligible order; when he came to revise his work after 33 years there proved to be remarkably little to add. He continued to regard Brown as a great figure. Abraham Lincoln spoke thus in February 1860: "An enthusiast broods over the oppression of a people till he fancies himself commissioned by Heaven to liberate them. He ventures the attempt, which ends in little else than his own execution." This would be the last word save for one thing: everything Brown did about slavery was perverse, criminal, and perhaps insane; but everything he said about it had the power and the truth of an Old Testament prophet. Such a contradiction eludes formulae.

3415. Von Abele, Rudolph R. Alexander H. Stephens, a biography. New York, Knopf, 1946. xiii, 337, x p. 46–6961 E467.1.S85V6

This biography, which originated in a Columbia University dissertation, penetrates the psychological characteristics of one of the South's leading politicians. Born on a small farm in Georgia, Stephens (1812–1883) was always physically frail, but did become a successful lawyer and amass a personal fortune. He entered politics in 1836 by election to the Georgia Legislature as a Whig. In 1843 he was sent to the U. S. House of Representatives on his reputation as a champion of state sovereignty, and later defended slavery as a "stern necessity," going so far as to advocate the renewal of the African slave trade in order to extend slave territory. When he retired from the House in 1859 he was convinced that his new party, the Democracy, had triumphed over abolitionism. When secession was being debated in Georgia, Stephens argued against it, but accepted his election as Vice President of the Confederacy on February 9, 1861, and served in that capacity throughout the war. His duties, beside presiding over the ineffectual Confederate Senate, included acting as chief negotiator with Washington for the exchange of prisoners, and for terms of peace. After the war he continued active in Georgia and national politics, returning to the House in 1872, and devoted much time to writing history and to philanthropy. "Liberty under law was his theme and his religion"; however, liberty could be enjoyed only according to one's position in the order of society.

3416. Welles, Gideon. Diary of Gideon Welles, Secretary of the Navy under Lincoln and Johnson, with an introd. by John T. Morse, Jr. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1911. 3 v.
38–34416 E468.W443

Preface signed: Edgar T. Welles.

CONTENTS.—1. 1861–March 30, 1864.—2. April 1, 1864–December 31, 1866.—3. January 1, 1867–June 6, 1869.

This daily chronicle of people and events is regarded by most historians as one of the most useful and reliable sources for Civil War and early Reconstruction era leaders and politics, although the author did some revising after his retirement. Welles (1802–1878), a Connecticut man who had been a Democrat until 1854, was chosen by Lincoln to represent New England in his Cabinet. The diary contains much information on his acts as Secretary of the Navy: he built a navy on an entirely new scale, raised the discipline and standards of the officers and men, and worked for the development of new weapons and tactics. Attached to the cause and personality of Lincoln, and later of Johnson, Welles may be considered the spokesman of the relatively impartial liberal Republicans. In 1874 he published an interesting little volume, Lincoln and Seward (New York, Sheldon. 215 p.), to dispel the illusion that the Secretary of State had been the brains of the administration. Much can be learned of the personal traits and motivations of Union leaders and the development of policies during the war and peace from Welles' vivid characterizations of the important men with whom he came in contact. Gideon Welles, Lincoln's Navy Department, by Richard S. West, Jr. (Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1943. 379 p.), is a sound biography which emphasizes his administrative achievement.

3417. Woodward, Comer Vann. Reunion and reaction; the compromise of 1877 and the end of Reconstruction. [2d ed.] Rev. and with a new introd. and concluding chapter. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1956. 297 p. (A Doubleday anchor book, A83)
56–7531 E681.W83 1956

This work by Professor Woodward of Johns Hopkins University was originally published in 1951; the additional matter in the paperback edition is largely concerned with relating the main narrative to the earlier and later course of Southern politics. In it he completely rewrites the accepted version of the events whereby the disputed election of 1876 was resolved and a renewal of domestic strife averted. The principal evidence is to be found in the papers of President Rutherford B. Hayes, for it was Hayes' lieutenants who devised the plan of securing all the disputed electoral votes for their candidate by driving a wedge between those "Southern redeemers" who in ante bellum days had been conservative Whigs, and those who had been Democrats. The principal agents in this maneuver were Colonel Andrew J. Kellar of the Memphis Avalanche and General Henry Van Ness Boynton, Washington representative of the Cincinnati Gazette, and the chief bait was the promise of a Federal subsidy for the Texas and Pacific Railway Company. The Southern Congressmen in the deal abstained from the Democratic filibuster against the decision of the Electoral Commission, and Hayes became President. The North's more idealistic war aims were thus jettisoned in order to protect "the peculiar interests and privileges of a sectional economy" built up since 1861; Reconstruction came to an abrupt end; compromise was once more the rule of American politics as it had been before 1860; and a persistent partnership between Southern Bourbons and Northeastern industrialists was inaugurated.

I. Grant to McKinley (1869–1901)

3418. Barnard, Harry. Rutherford B. Hayes and his America. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1954. 606 p. illus. 54–11942 E682.B3

"Selected bibliography": p. 571–588.

3419. Eckenrode, Hamilton J. Rutherford B. Hayes, statesman of reunion. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1930. 363 p. illus. (American political leaders) 30–12586 E682.E19

Bibliography: p. 345–349.

Both of these biographies of Rutherford Birchard Hayes (1822–1893), 19th President of the United States, provide sympathetic and intimate portrayals of his human qualities as well as the salient facts of his life. Indeed, Mr. Barnard, whose work is distinguished by its elaborate detail and documentation, aims to present "not so much a biography of a president as a biography of a man who happened to become President." While serving as a fighting Union brigadier general in 1864, Hayes was elected from Ohio to the United States House of Representatives, where, after cessation of hostilities, he served until elected Governor on the Republican ticket in 1867. His performance as Governor earned him the rank of favorite son in Ohio, and he was a dark horse candidate for the Presidency in 1876. Mr. Barnard substantially advances knowledge of the so-called tied election which hung upon one electoral vote; he believes that neither Hayes nor his opponent, Samuel J. Tilden, won a clear title, although the Presidency was awarded to Hayes. Both authors show Hayes' development from a partisan Stalwart supporter of Reconstruction to a liberal, a conciliator of the South, and a reformer, whose sound and well-managed but unspectacular administration of the Presidency in the years 1877–81 brought respectability back to a party embarrassed by the corruption of the Grant era, and, more important, initiated the reunification of the Nation.

3420. Buck, Solon J. The Granger movement; a study of agricultural organization and its political, economic, and social manifestations, 1870–1880. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1913. 384 p. (Harvard historical studies, v. 19)
13–19662 HD201.B8

Bibliography: p. [313]–351.

3421. Buck, Solon J. The agrarian crusade; a chronicle of the farmer in politics. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1920. 215 p. illus. (The Chronicles of America series, v. 45)
20–4901 E173.C55, v. 45
HD201.B75

"Bibliographical note": p. 203–206.

The term Granger here refers to the general agrarian movement which centered in the secret and professedly nonpartisan order of the Patrons of Husbandry founded in 1867. During the 1870's, the Grange constituted a farmers' protest against the power and oppressiveness of big business. Dr. Buck cites as measures undertaken by the Grangers their efforts to subject the large railroads to public control, the formation of third parties in order to oust the industrial interest from its dominance of politics, and the encouragement of cooperatives in order to maintain their own economic independence of big-business-controlled industrial establishments and their agents, the middlemen. The Granger movement the author places as the initial organized effort in American history to bring about political, social, and economic reform. The second title is a more general treatment of the radical agitations undertaken by American farmers to improve their economic condition through legislation when industrialization of the West followed the Civil War. Dr. Buck sketches the course and evokes the spirit of the agrarian crusade from its inception with the Grangers, through the Greenback and Populist phases, which lingered until 1904, to its climax in the battle for free silver, from 1875 to 1896. In general, the agrarians have desired greater governmental control of the Nation's economy and limitation of business competition. Dr. Buck's analysis shows that these desires have been fulfilled in part just as has the agrarian legislative program which, in the following examples, has been enacted into law: national and state regulation of railroad rates, popular election of Senators, graduated income taxes, postal savings banks, parcel post, and rural free delivery. The farmers had forced awareness of their interests upon the major parties, the author concluded (1920), and henceforth both Democrats and Republicans would adopt agrarian planks in their national platforms rather than hazard a repetition of the loss of the rural vote.

3422. Cleveland, Grover, Pres. U. S. Letters of Grover Cleveland, 1850–1908; selected and edited by Allan Nevins. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1933. xix, 640 p. 33–35003 E697.C63

A selection from the correspondence of Grover Cleveland (1837–1908), 22d and 24th President of the United States, containing "nearly all of Cleveland's letters that are important to the student of his life or times." Trivial notes, letters referring to petty official matters, and occasional pieces have, for the most part, been omitted. Because Cleveland wrote more about public business than his private affairs or emotions, the editor has deemed it necessary to arrange the letters in 16 chapters, each prefaced by a brief introduction tracing the events of his life through the appropriate months or years. Cleveland "was Bunyan's Valiant-for-Truth," Professor Nevins believes, "transferred to a scene which sorely needed all his valor." His letters, both the formal, ponderous official messages and the simple, direct missives to friends, "are the work of a man who had the courage to say what he thought and say it plainly." "This forthrightness was based upon a stubborn independence of mind and soul." He refused to truckle to politicians for votes or to appoint mere friends to office, and he resisted the spoilsmen. He fought for civil service reform and for tariff revision downward. "He was willing to go to any length rather than abate his self-respect by a single concession."

3423. [Cleveland] Nevins, Allan. Grover Cleveland; a study in courage. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1934. 832 p. illus (American political leaders) 38-4611 E697.N468
Bibliography: p. 767-772.
First published in 1932.
In this large, definitive biography which won a Pulitzer prize in 1933, Professor Nevins traces both the extraordinary personal growth and the equally amazing political career of Grover Cleveland. He was a hard-working Buffalo lawyer in 1881, the author notes, a good Democrat, a man of integrity, determined, strong, and blunt, but also, slow, unimaginative, and limited. In November 1881, however, the simple, sturdy attorney was swept into office as mayor by a wave of public discontent with municipal misgovernment. Thereafter, his transformation into a successful party leader proceeded so rapidly that by 1883 he was taking the oath as Governor of New York, and by 1885 as President of the United States. In Professor Nevins' opinion, the times were propitious for a "moral knight": Cleveland, as a reform mayor, made himself conspicuous "at the happiest possible time"; as Governor, he broke with Tammany in a demonstration of political fearlessness which "caught the public imagination as nothing else could." His first Presidential candidacy was "based upon a demand for administrative honesty joined with tariff reform," and his third "represented a combination of both with the principle of unyielding conservatism in all that affected finance and business."

3424. Croly, Herbert D. Marcus Alonzo Hanna, his life and work. New York, Macmillan, 1912. 495 p. illus. 12-9163 E664.H24C9
A sympathetic presentation of Mark Hanna (1837-1904) as the embodiment of free enterprise in economics, politics, and personal behavior. Born in Ohio of pioneer stock, Hanna became wealthy in the rising metropolis of Cleveland. In 1880, with the prosperity of his diverse financial interests assured, Hanna began dabbling in Republican politics, initially on the city and state levels, and led his State delegation to the national convention of 1888. He thenceforward devoted his full energies to making William McKinley President. According to the author, Hanna considered this activity his patriotic duty, and so successful was he that McKinley was elected Governor of Ohio in 1891 and Republican Presidential nominee on the first ballot in 1896. So effective, indeed, was Hanna's organization of the whole national party machinery that he was made Republican National Chairman. In 1897 he entered the Senate where he soon became the spokesman of big business and the protector of party patronage. The voting record cited here shows his overwhelming support for McKinley and later for Roosevelt policies, as well as statesmanship of considerable stature. However, in Mr. Croly's opinion, Hanna was at his best as a leader and organizer of the Republican Party, in which capacity he applied practical business management to politics and secured his party's financial stability.

3425. David, Henry. The history of the Haymarket affair; a study in the American social-revolutionary and labor movements. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1936. 597 p.
36-36485 HX846.C4D3 1936
"Selected bibliography": p. 545-561.
This Columbia University dissertation is a careful investigation of how the "Haymarket Bomb" came to be thrown in Chicago, May 4, 1886, of its consequences, and of related aspects of the American and European scenes. The author considers the Haymarket affair an episode "of major significance in the annals of American labor and jurisprudence." "Labor's grievances," he observes, "sprang from the privileges and corruption of the American political system, the growth of a small, immensely wealthy class, the results of corporate industrial organization, and the economic and social condition of the wage-earners at large and certain groups of them in particular." The setting of the Haymarket affair was composed of these factors, Professor David believes, together with "a body of confused revolutionary thought and an uncompromising revolutionary movement," which advocated "propaganda by deed" and drew its support from Chicago's unusually heavy foreign population. In his opinion, the eight radicals convicted of murder "must be considered innocent," in the light of the reliable evidence. He concludes that "capitalist interests through a willing press" pushed the whole affair in order to discredit labor, but that "in precipitating the noteworthy political movement on the part of labor in 1886-1887, the Haymarket bomb had its most positive effect."

3426. Dennett, Tyler. John Hay: from poetry to politics. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1933. 476 p. illus. 33-30803 E664.H41D3
"Appendix I. John Hay: a short list of his writings, by William Easton Louttit, Jr.": p. 451-456.
A biography which underscores Hay's intellectual and emotional characteristics as well as the achievements of this poet, novelist, historian, and statesman

(1838–1905). Hay lingered longer in youth than is usual, but in his capacity as a secretary to the President, 1861–65, he "won the confidence of Abraham Lincoln to a marked degree." Almost a radical for his era, Hay achieved fame in 1871 with his Pike County Ballads and violated literary convention, yet could not endure criticism. "John Hay's successes were obvious; his failures were more subtle." The author ascribes the latter to Hay's complex personality and an inability to integrate the conflicting qualities of heart and mind. He terms Abraham Lincoln: A History (New York, Century Co., 1890. 10 v.), written in collaboration with John G. Nicolay, "a good deal of a Republican document," and believes that through it Hay became "the apostle of the Republican party." In Professor Dennett's opinion, "Hay owed his position in life to his association with Abraham Lincoln; his position in American history he owed to his friendship with William McKinley," who appointed him Ambassador to Great Britain in 1897, and Secretary of State in 1898. He continued to serve under Roosevelt, with less independence than under his predecessor, and conducted important negotiations, affecting our policy toward the Far East and toward Britain, until his physical breakdown in 1905.

3427. Destler, Chester McArthur. American radicalism, 1865–1901, essays and documents. New London, Connecticut College, 1946. 276 p. illus. (Connecticut College monograph no. 3)
46-6081 E661.D45

A collection of 11 articles, 9 of them reprinted from journals, based on a revisionist interpretation of "western radicalism in terms of ideological interchange and conflict between western agrarians and urban radicals." Several papers, notably the sequences on the Pendleton fiscal program of 1867 and on the labor-Populist alliance in Illinois of 1894, and the essay on "The Toledo Natural Gas Pipe-Line Controversy," are case studies in midwestern politics. The other papers offer a rather more generalized "consideration of whether, out of the ideological intercourse of country and city there had not developed in the late nineteenth century West a new radical synthesis. If its existence could be demonstrated such a novel but indigenous creed would give new meaning to the bitter conflicts that characterized the short-lived labor-Populist alliance of 1894–1896." Together, the essays constitute the accumulation of the author's findings as of 1946, and suggest possible lines of further investigation.

3428. Dulles, Foster Rhea. America in the Pacific; a century of expansion. 2d ed. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1938. xiv, 299 p.
38-27337 F970.D94 1938

First published in 1932.

A survey of our expansion in the Pacific area during the 19th century. The ambition to obtain mastery of the Pacific and to control its opulent trade was a powerful motivating force, Professor Dulles believes, behind every American acquisition of territory on the Western Ocean from Oregon, California, and Alaska, to Samoa, Hawaii, and the Philippines. First awakened by the old China traders operating out of Atlantic seaports in the early Federal period, this ambition led shortly to the assertion of claims to territory on the Pacific coast for the development of naval bases and ports, and was a factor in the annexations of islands which reached a climax with the acquisition of the Philippine Islands in 1898. The author is interested in Oregon and California not as natural extensions of the nation's boundaries secured in 1846–48, but "as the basis and point of departure for Pacific empire." The theory of the expansionists of the day, he points out, was "that once established on the Pacific Coast, we would command the commerce of the East, and just so in 1898 did their imperialistic heirs contend that, given Hawaii and the Philippines, we would dominate this same trade." Only in the acquisition of the Philippines, Professor Dulles observes, did the policy of trade and empire ignore the American principles of democracy, and these have since been reasserted.

3429. Farrar, Victor J. The annexation of Russian America to the United States. Washington, W. F. Roberts, 1937. 142 p.
37-33668 E669.F37

"Bibliographical note": p. 131–138.

A completely documented history of the purchase of Alaska by the United States in 1867. Mr. Farrar, relying upon Russian and American documents in the Department of State archives, sets forth Russia's reasons for selling Alaska and describes the diplomatic negotiations which culminated in the treaty. Besides discussing the arguments employed by Secretary of State Seward to secure congressional approval and appropriations for the purchase, the author clears up certain misconceptions regarding the reasons for the visit of the Russian fleet to America in 1863 and the mode of payment to the Russian government.

3430. Flick, Alexander Clarence. Samuel Jones Tilden; a study in political sagacity, by Alexander Clarence Flick, assisted by Gustav S. Lobrano. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1939. 597 p. illus. (American political leaders)
39-31244 E415.9.T5F5

Bibliography: p. 535–553.

This biography traces the career of Tilden (1814–1886) as he moved from corporation counsel to reformer of New York politics, and candidate for the Presidency. Born and educated in the state, Tilden was a lifelong Democrat although it was not until 1874 that he held an elective public office. Admitted to the bar of New York City in 1841, Tilden built up a lucrative practice as a lawyer for the major Eastern railroads, and amassed one of the country's largest personal fortunes. The ousting of the "Tweed ring" in 1872 while Tilden was Democratic State Committee Chairman was, as Mr. Flick points out, the personal triumph which made him a national figure. Elected Governor of New York in 1874 on a reform ticket, Tilden gained further prominence through his efforts to expose graft and corruption in the upstate "canal ring." He was the obvious Democratic reform candidate in 1876, and although nominated and evidently preferred, if not elected, by the people, lost to Rutherford B. Hayes in the contested election, which is here analyzed in great detail.

3431. Fuess, Claude Moore. Carl Schurz, reformer (1829–1906). New York, Dodd, Mead, 1932. xv, 421 p. illus. (American political leaders)
32–26442 E664.S39F92

"Selected bibliography": p. 395–401.

A biography of Carl Schurz, in 1848 a German revolutionary, in 1852 an immigrant to the United States, by 1859 an orator and lecturer on such subjects as "True Americanism" and "American Civilization," and for nearly 50 years thereafter "the self-constituted, but exceedingly useful, incarnation of our national conscience." Schurz struggled between two ambitions, Dr. Fuess believes, politics and scholarship, but when he had to choose, he turned to practical affairs. His career was marked by contributions to four great victories: the abolition of slavery, preservation of the Union, maintenance of sound money, and establishment of the merit system in the civil service. Lincoln's Minister to Spain, 1861, Brigadier and then Major General of Volunteers, 1862–1865, Republican Senator from Missouri, 1869–75, and Secretary of the Interior under Hayes, 1877–81, Schurz "accomplished enough to entitle him to a position among the great practical reformers," the author concludes, and perhaps to a place among our greater statesmen. Dr. Fuess bases the latter opinion upon Schurz' nonpartisanship and independence in politics which set country ahead of party, his advocacy of ideals and his untarnished record in an age of corruption, his promotion of honest government, and his inspiring example of a foreigner's adaptation to American customs and institutions.

3432. Haworth, Paul Leland. The Hayes-Tilden disputed presidential election of 1876. Cleveland, Burrows Bros., 1906. 365 p.
6–22324 JK526 1876.H4

An analysis of "the most remarkable electoral controversy in the history of popular government," based largely upon congressional documents. Although the material is voluminous, Professor Haworth notes, "much of the evidence contained in it is untrustworthy." Initial chapters discuss the issues of the 1876 election—the panic of 1873, the sorry condition of the South, the exposure of corruption high in the Grant administration—which encouraged the Democrats and their candidate, Samuel J. Tilden, to charge the administration with misgovernment. This in turn forced the Republicans and their nominee, Rutherford B. Hayes, to attempt to create distrust of the Democrats by reviving the sectional issue. Succeeding chapters are devoted to the conduct of the election; the count of votes whereby Tilden appeared to have won a popular majority of 200,000 or more but to have lacked the one electoral vote necessary to election; the forwarding to Washington of double sets of returns from the disputed states of Florida, Louisiana, South Carolina, and Oregon; and the compromise that peacefully concluded the perilous situation (cf. no. 3417). Both sides were guilty of fraud, and the Democrats of violence also, the author believes, but he views the outcome of the great contest as "in the main a just one."

3433. Haynes, Frederick Emory. James Baird Weaver. Iowa City, State Historical Society of Iowa, 1919. xv, 494 p. illus. (Iowa biographical series)
19–27188 E664.W36H4

A biography of General Weaver (1833–1912), Union officer in the Civil War, prominent Iowa Republican in the years 1867–77, Democratic-Greenbacker member of the United States House of Representatives, 1879–81 and 1885–89, Greenbacker candidate for the Presidency, 1880, Populist candidate for the Presidency, 1892, and a Democrat after the campaign of 1896. The author believes that Weaver was a pioneer, the first progressive, and a prophet, the precursor of Bryan, Theodore Roosevelt, and Wilson. As presidential candidate in 1880, Weaver advocated a graduated income tax, postal savings banks, the initiative and referendum, direct election of United States Senators, protective labor laws, free silver, and expansion of the powers of government. He was fortunate, Mr. Haynes believes, in living to see many of his own measures enacted into law by the two great parties.

3434. Hendrick, Burton J. The life of Andrew Carnegie. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1932. 2 v. illus. 32–29884 CT275.C3H27
Bibliography: v. 2, p. 389–400.

An appreciative biography of Andrew Carnegie (1835–1919), multimillionaire and philanthropist, which is concerned chiefly with his nonbusiness activities. Although Mr. Hendrick records Carnegie's progress successively from telegrapher to railroad executive, organizer of Civil War railroad and telegraph services, oil man, securities dealer, bridge builder, and, finally, in 1873, to manufacturer of steel by the Bessemer process, he does not attempt to analyze Carnegie's work as a business administrator and investing capitalist. The author notes that Carnegie, himself a fairly prolific writer, as early as 1886 published Triumphant Democracy (New York, Scribner. 519 p.), a criticism of the aristocratic principle, and, in an article of 1889, set forth a Calvinist belief in the stewardship of wealth. He spent his last 20 years implementing this social gospel, his benefactions, principally in support of education, public libraries, and research, having amounted to $350,000,000. An interesting supplement, in which Mr. Hendrick's work was completed by Daniel M. Henderson, is Louise Whitfield Carnegie: the Life of Mrs. Andrew Carnegie (New York, Hastings House, 1950. 306 p.); Mrs. Carnegie, over 20 years younger than her husband, lived until 1946.

3435. Hesseltine, William B. Ulysses S. Grant, politician. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1935. 480 p. illus. (American political leaders) 35–17052 E672.H46
Bibliography: p. 453–460.

A depreciatory revaluation of the political career of Ulysses S. Grant (1822–1885), 18th President of the United States. Professor Hesseltine characterizes him as a man not so much stupid and corrupt as peculiarly ignorant of the Constitution, militantly obstinate and imperious, unable to judge and inept at handling people. "Although he grew as a President," says the author, "his growth was that of a party politician, and he changed from the man who would be the President of all the people in 1869 into the man who could support the Republican party in the theft of the election of 1876. As he acquired the ideology of the politician he lost the vision of the statesman, and became the 'safe' representative of the more reactionary economic interests of his day." Unimaginative and taciturn, yet sensitive, Grant's was a personality suppressed largely by unfortunate parental influences, the negative elements of which strongly conditioned his career. Psychologically the President was overshadowed by the general, and at Grant's death the partisan bitterness and mistakes of his eight years in the White House (1869–1877) "were forgotten in the glories of the soldier and the heroism of the man."

3436. Hicks, John D. The American Nation. 3d ed. [Boston] Houghton Mifflin, 1955. 776, ci p. illus. 54–13492 E661.H55 1955
"List of books cited": p. xxvi-lv.

This well-illustrated college text deals with American history of the years 1865–1954; two-thirds of it is devoted to the events of the 20th century. The author summarizes all significant movements, whether political, economic, or cultural, and discusses their effects upon the development of the country. Professor Hicks remarks such American achievements as the attainment of unsurpassed political democracy, the breaking down to a remarkable degree of class and caste barriers, the acquirement of a higher standard of living than the world has before known, and a relatively low spread between the rich and the poor; he is concerned that the tremendous advances made by American science have not been matched by equal accomplishments in literature. He has faith, however, in the ability of the United States to survive the stresses and strains of the cold war with its ideals and principles intact.

3437. Howe, George Frederick. Chester A. Arthur; a quarter-century of machine politics. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1934. 307 p. illus. (American political leaders) 34–38337 E692.H67
"Select bibliography": p. 292–295.

A friendly but not uncritical biography of Chester A. Arthur (1830–1886), who was prominent in New York politics for more than two decades, and became 21st President of the United States in 1881 upon the assassination of Garfield. He is depicted as a genial and cultivated man, viewed with respect by a few of his contemporaries because of his capable service as state quartermaster general during the Civil War, but distrusted by many because of his long association with Boss Roscoe Conkling, because of his advocacy of the spoils system while he served as collector of the Port of New York, 1871–78, and because his nomination to the Vice-Presidency in 1880 was considered a sop to the followers of General Grant. Professor Howe characterizes Arthur in the Presidency as reassuring to the alarmists and disappointing to the machine politicians, conscientious, honorable, and dignified, a conservative and conciliator. Adequate rather than great, he rehabilitated the Navy, forwarded civil service reform, favored a Nicaraguan canal, and vetoed the Chinese exclusion bill.

3438. Josephson, Matthew. The politicos, 1865–1896. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1938. 760 p. 38–27301 E661.J85

Bibliography: p. 709–719.

The thesis of this chronicle of the politics and key professional politicians of the age of big business which followed the Civil War is that "Governors, Senators, Presidents come and go; but the Party Organization goes on long after them, and its Inner Circle, its bosses, rule not for four or six years, but for a generation or for life tenure." The business-minded Northern politicians of the Reconstruction era "were literally Jekylls and Hydes," asserts the author: as Dr. Jekyll, they secured support by advancing a humane and libertarian ideology; as Mr. Hyde, they enacted measures of high capitalist policy, designed to hold out against future assault—charters and grants to railroads and land companies, special tariff duties, public contracts, and pensions, while they deliberately delayed the recovery of the conquered South and imposed upon it military rule "subject to the Republican Party Organization at Washington." Down to Garfield's death in 1881, Mr. Josephson asserts, the ruling group of Senator-bosses operated the Republican Party as a patronage organization, deriving profit from the sale of office and assessments upon wages, as well as from the subsidies of bankers and industrialists. From 1881 to 1896, the Republican grip on public office relaxed; it began the shift to politics of "interest" and "class," and the Democratic opposition not merely sloughed off the stigma of disloyalty but began to compete forcefully for capitalist backing.

3439. Lindsey, Almont. The Pullman strike, the story of a unique experiment and of a great labor upheaval. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1942. 385 p. illus.

42–50022 HD5325.R12 1894.C54

Bibliography: p. 364–370.

A history of the brief but intense struggle between labor and capital precipitated in 1894 when the American Railway Union's sympathetic boycott against Pullman cars, prompted by a strike of ill-paid workers at the company town of Pullman, Illinois, met vigorous and massive resistance from the General Managers' Association. The author asserts that the aim of the managers was annihilation of the union and that they were prepared neither to negotiate nor to make the smallest concession. A vital part of their strategy, Professor Lindsey believes, "was to draw the United States government into the struggle and then to make it appear that the battle was no longer between the workers and the railroads but between the workers and the government." He describes John Egan, strike manager of the association, as portraying the "situation in a manner as ominous and disturbing as possible in order to arouse the apprehension of the powerful 'interests' and hasten federal participation," and the United States Government as using injunctions, soldiery, and even arrests in a manner calculated to bring victory to the railroads and to nullify completely the aims and activities of labor. The American Railway Union, was, however, widely considered a force for anarchy in this restless era, the author concedes, a rallying point for an attack upon property, corporate control, and the economic machinery of the country.

3440. McMurry, Donald L. Coxey's army; a study of the industrial army movement of 1894. Boston, Little, Brown, 1929. 331 p. illus.

29–23512 HD8072.M23

Bibliography: p. [311]–323.

An interpretation of Jacob S. Coxey's "Commonweal of Christ," which relates it to the economic maladjustments of the 1890's, other organized armies of unemployed marchers, the Populist "uprising of the people," and demand for free silver, as well as the grievances of the 2 million or more wage earners left idle after the panic of 1893. The author believes that the idea of a march of the unemployed to the National Capital for succor originated farther west, but that "Jacob S. Coxey, of Massillon, Ohio, was the man who made it famous." Marching out of town on March 25, 1894, with flags and symbolic banners flying, Coxey's picturesque army, together with his enthusiasm, ability to formulate a program, means to finance his ventures, and instinct for advertising, caused the association of his name with the whole movement, although other armies marched far greater distances to Washington led by such "Generals" as Lewis C. Fry of Los Angeles and Charles T. Kelly of San Francisco. Coxeyism was, in Professor McMurry's opinion, a symptom of the economic revolution in this country; it "showed certain reactions of the American frontier spirit to the growing industrialism which was replacing the old order."

3441. Mitchell, Stewart. Horatio Seymour of New York. Cambridge, Harvard University Press 1938. xx, 623 p. illus. 38–9985 E415.9.S5M6

Bibliography: p. [585]–594.

A political biography of Horatio Seymour (1810–1886), a moderate Jeffersonian Democrat who began his career as an assemblyman from Utica, New York, in 1842 and climaxed it as Democratic candidate for the Presidency in the election of 1868. Seymour was elected Governor of New York in 1852; in 1862, his gubernatorial victory as a Democrat in the midst of the Civil War, Dr. Mitchell believes, "pushed him into the position of the leader of the opposition to the forces that were swiftly and surely getting control of both the Congress and the Cabinet." As early as 1856, Seymour had argued against abolition, prohibition, anti-Catholicism, and secession. He campaigned in 1862 with the slogan, "The Union as it was, and the Constitution as it is." He was accused of treason and a desire to obstruct the war, but the author regards him as "the hard-working object of unjust suspicion and long-lived slander," who honestly believed that emancipation, conscription, and the suspension of habeas corpus were unsound policies. The draft riots of July 1863 in the city of New York were magnified into a political myth, convenient ammunition for use during the campaign of 1868, in which Seymour polled a substantial vote against Grant and "was not improbably the choice of the white men of the country."

3442. Muzzey, David Saville. James G. Blaine, a political idol of other days. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1934. 514 p. illus. (American political leaders) 34-32559 E664.B6M8

Bibliography: p. 501–504.

A biography of James G. Blaine (1830–1893), acknowledged leader of the Republican Party for a quarter of a century, a contestant for the Presidential nomination in five successive elections, 1876–92, and in 1884 the candidate. Idolized by many Americans as the "Plumed Knight," he was loathed by others as a corrupt politician. Avoiding adulation or denigration, Professor Muzzey explores the events of Blaine's life, assessing his achievements and the paradox of his character, and presenting him in the political setting of his time. The author finds that Blaine's chief public service was performed as Secretary of State under Garfield, 1881, and under Benjamin Harrison, 1889–92, when he encouraged closer political and commercial ties between the United States and the Latin American republics, and advocated the policy of peaceful arbitration among them. Professor Muzzey regards Blaine's conduct of the speakership of the United States House of Representatives (1869–75) as "brilliant," but considers his performance as Senator (1876–81) rather less impressive. In the author's opinion, Blaine not only roused "men's emotions of patriotism, partisanship and prejudice, of personal devotion and resentment," but also spent perhaps too much of his "wonderful" talent in a constant effort to make his party seem better than it was.

3443. Nevins, Allan. Abram S. Hewitt: with some account of Peter Cooper. New York, Harper, 1935. 623 p. illus.

35-30046 E664.H523N4

"A note upon sources": p. 603.

The great age of American capitalism is seen at its best in this family history of the lives and achievements of Abram S. Hewitt (1822–1903), and of his father-in-law, Peter Cooper (1791–1883), both self-made industrialists. Of the two, Hewitt receives greater attention, since the author regards him as the more intellectual and versatile. He was one of the first great American ironmasters, supplying guns and armor to Union forces during the Civil War, and a pioneer steel manufacturer; he was a leader of the Democratic Party, serving five terms in Congress from 1875 to 1886, and reform mayor of New York City from 1887 to 1888. Peter Cooper, inventor and idealist, Professor Nevins calls a "picturesque genius"; he was Hewitt's "partner in business, education, and philanthropy for forty years." He built the first American locomotive, accumulated a fortune from the manufacture of glue and gelatine, helped to finance the laying of the Atlantic cable, and founded Cooper Union. The author believes that Hewitt might have become a commanding figure had he concentrated upon a single objective, but "his life would have been less interesting, less a reflection of the important forces of American society, and less useful." Cooper, Professor Nevins declares, was a rare spirit but "as distinctively an American type as Benjamin Franklin, and one as quickly taken to the American heart."

3444. Nevins, Allan. Hamilton Fish; the inner history of the Grant administration. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1936. xxi, 932 p. illus.

37-9994 E664.F52N42

This is both a biography of Hamilton Fish (1808-1893), Secretary of State under Grant, and a history of the Grant administration, based upon the exceedingly rich and voluminous Fish papers. The major portion of the book falls into two divisions: the first devoted to Fish's activities in the field of foreign affairs, 1869–73, when the controversy with Great Britain over the Alabama claims was settled and war with Spain was averted; the second to the "deeply disturbing" politics of the administration. Professor Nevins considers Fish a man of cautious good sense, moral elevation, and pacific temper, "the strongest figure in one of our most troubled Administrations." Grant the author regards as a contradictory person, intermittent in mental energy, at once weak and strong, naïve and inscrutable, reckless and plodding. Ignorant of law, civil affairs, economics, and history, awkwardly constrained before men of superior intellect, he was incapable of communicating with most of the best minds he might have used. "Grant's casual way of performing his duties; his easy acceptance of vicious personal influences; his negligence and favoritism in appointments; his careless inconsequentiality in handling Cabinet affairs; his detestation of reform because reformers were critics," all produced an aroma of corruption by the summer of 1872 and caused "the virtual collapse of the Grant Administration during 1876" in all but foreign affairs. The book was reissued in 2 volumes in 1957 (New York, Ungar).

3445. Nixon, Raymond B. Henry W. Grady, spokesman of the new South. New York, Knopf, 1943. x, 360, xiv p. illus.
43-15899 E664.G73N5
Bibliography: p. [351]-360.

A sympathetic and sprightly biography of Henry Woodfin Grady (1851-1889), editor of The Atlanta Constitution and advocate of the utilization of the natural resources of the South, diversification of its agriculture, development of manufacturing to supplement the once almost exclusively agrarian economy, adjustment of the Negro problem, and, especially, fraternity between North and South. As early as 1874, the author notes, Grady was outlining his program for the economic regeneration of the South. By the 1880's the Constitution had become the most important organ of the movement toward a new South, as Atlanta was its booming industrial and commercial center, and Henry W. Grady the acknowledged spokesman for the Southern spirit of progress and good will. When he made his famous conciliatory speech, "The New South," at the annual dinner of the New England Society in New York, December 22, 1886, "Grady was the right man speaking the right word at the right time." "He was the only Southern speaker of the late eighties who had succeeded in gaining the attention and the confidence of the North to any marked degree; he was one of the few Southern editors whose writings had national circulation." His premature death was widely regretted as a national loss.

3446. Nye, Russel B. Midwestern progressive politics; a historical study of its origins and development, 1870-1950. [East Lansing] Michigan State College Press, 1951. 422 p. illus.
51-11144 F354.N8
Bibliography: p. 387-410.

A comprehensive history of midwestern progressivism, the political movement among farmers, and, later, among labor and reform elements, against the alliance of industrialism and government, the big businessmen and the big bosses. Professor Nye describes the revolt in the 1870's which gave rise to such organizations as the Grangers, Populists, Nonpartisan Leaguers, Socialists, "progressives," and "insurgents." Their leaders strove for popular government, the destruction of monopoly privileges, elimination of corporations from political life, and protection of natural resources. Dealt with in some detail are the activities of men like John P. Altgeld of Illinois, William Jennings Bryan, Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin, and George W. Norris of Nebraska. The midwestern progressives held the balance of power in Congress by 1910 and in 1912 were ready to form a party of their own, but when Theodore Roosevelt seized the leadership of the third-party movement many progressives declined to follow him. The strange result was that "a Virginia Democrat from Princeton" pushed through most of the measures for which the progressives had been battling for three decades. Thenceforward progressivism was in decline: "The first World War split it, the New Deal robbed it, the second World War brought it to the edge of its grave, and the disintegration of political lines in the forties killed it." Regional in spirit, it could not survive the triumph of nationalism and internationalism.

3447. Oberholtzer, Ellis Paxson. A history of the United States since the Civil War. New York, Macmillan, 1917-37. 5 v.
17-28462 E661.O12

A detailed political and socioeconomic history of the years 1865-1901, from the assassination of Lincoln to the emergence of the United States as a world power at the conclusion of the war with Spain. Volume I, dealing with the years 1865-68, reports the honest efforts of President Andrew Johnson to implement Lincoln's conciliatory Reconstruction policies, the revulsion of the North against the South's "Black Codes," and the rise of the Radical Republican congressional opposition with its "conquered provinces" theory. Devoted to the years 1868-72, volume II describes Johnson's attempt to prevent the Radical Congress from overriding the Constitution, his impeachment and trial, and, in the Grant era of "moral blindness," the rule of carpetbaggers and the appearance of protective associations like the Ku Klux Klan in the South, and the sovereignty in the North of political bosses and such robber barons as Cornelius Vanderbilt, James Fisk, Jr., and Jay Gould. Volume III covers the period 1872-78, and deals, among other matters, with Grant's second administration, a "coarse and venal regime," the panic of 1873, the Hayes administration which removed Federal troops from the South and ended Reconstruction, and the Indian uprisings in the Far West. Volume IV, 1878-88, discusses the "infirm character" of the Garfield administration, the surprisingly "discreet, conservative and just" Arthur administration, and the honesty, independence, and "responsible understanding of public duty" demonstrated by the first Cleveland administration. Covering the years 1888–1901, volume V characterizes Benjamin Harrison's administration as honest, efficient, protectionist, and paternalistic, and Cleveland's second administration as sound on money, tariff, and civil service reforms but tactless and ignorant in foreign affairs. The author considers William Jennings Bryan "a rare bigot" rather than a "mountebank," and McKinley a mere recorder of the flow of popular thought. Mr. Oberholtzer (1868–1936) was a disciple of J. B. McMaster (no. 3046 note) and followed the method and style of the latter's History of the People of the United States. Since Mr. Oberholtzer's History was over 20 years in the writing, its manner and outlook had become rather old-fashioned by the time of its completion, and it has had more criticism than praise. It nevertheless remains the only large-scale general treatment of its period, and a thoroughly solid, informative, and honest performance.

3448. Olcott, Charles S. The life of William McKinley. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1912. 2 v. illus. 16–10505 E711.6.O43

An authorized and admiring biography of William McKinley (1843–1901), 25th President of the United States, based not only upon his rather meager papers but also upon the recollections of his friends and associates, notably, George B. Cortelyou, William R. Day, Charles G. Dawes, and Myron T. Herrick. McKinley is characterized here as "a true, earnest, and consistent Christian," who aspired to a congressional career as early as 1869. Beginning in 1877, he served 6 terms in the U. S. House of Representatives, and 2 as Governor of Ohio (1892–96). He made a special study of the tariff and, "from the time of his first speech in Congress until the end of his life, McKinley sought to elaborate, clarify, and systematize the true 'American' policy of Protection." Mark Hanna's promotion of McKinley's successful candidacy in the presidential elections of 1896 and 1900 is attributed to Hanna's disinterested admiration of McKinley as a man, and to his belief that prosperity and the best business interests of the country "depended upon the reëstablishment and permanent maintenance of the principle of Protection, and that this could be accomplished only by the election of its foremost exponent to the Presidency." In Mr. Olcott's opinion, however, McKinley will be remembered not as the advocate of protection and sound money but as the President who successfully conducted the war with Spain and inaugurated a new era of expansion and international responsibility.

3449. Pratt, Julius W. Expansionists of 1898; the acquisition of Hawaii and the Spanish islands. New York, P. Smith, 1951, ©1936. 393 p. (The Albert Shaw lectures on diplomatic history, 1936.) 52–7706 E713.P895 1936a

Bibliography: p. 361–376.

A history of the rise and development in the United States of the movement for overseas expansion, from its uncertain beginnings under Benjamin Harrison in 1889 to its triumphant culmination in the treaty of 1899 with Spain. Professor Pratt analyzes the ideological background of the movement and surveys briefly Harrison's abortive efforts to secure strategic bases in the Caribbean area. He devotes major attention, however, to the question of the annexation of Hawaii which grew out of the revolution there in 1893, both because there had been no previous treatment of the subject and because the proposal to annex the Islands focused public and congressional opinion upon the expansionist policy. When President Cleveland rejected the acquisition of Hawaii, the expansionists turned their attention to Spain's Caribbean colonies, and in 1898 saw the triumph of their policies in both spheres. The debates between proponents and opponents of the policy are explored, as are the attitudes of business and religious groups.

3450. Smith, Theodore Clarke. The life and letters of James Abram Garfield. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1925. 2 v. 25–19753 E687.S66

A sympathetic biography of James A. Garfield (1831–1881), 20th President of the United States, "set forth so far as possible in his own words through extracts from letters, journals, reminiscences and speeches," which give his "own commentary upon himself and his doings, his impressions of events and of contemporaries." The author finds the chief value of these judgments in their "abundance, good humor and candor," and observes: "It is Garfield himself who contributes the personal and psychological analysis." The selections, together with Professor Smith's connective text, illumine Civil War politics and the western campaigns, since Garfield served as colonel and brigadier general, 1861–1862, and as major general of volunteers and chief of staff to Rosecrans in 1863. The work also sheds light upon 17 years of congressional history (1863–1880) when Garfield served as a Republican Representative from Ohio, became known as a moderate and compromiser, and attained the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations. The author exonerates Garfield from complicity in the Credit Mobilier scandal, and defends his stand on the Salary Grab and other such issues. During the 4 months before his assassination in 1881, President Garfield demonstrated "that he fully comprehended the nature of presidential authority and was prepared to exercise it firmly and quietly from the start."

3451. Woodward, Comer Vann. Tom Watson, agrarian rebel. New York, Macmillan, 1938. 518 p. illus. 38–8354 E664.W337W6

Thomas E. Watson of Georgia (1856–1922), a controversial political figure, is viewed by Professor Woodward as a product of the "forces of intolerance, superstition, prejudice, religious jingoism, and mobbism." He struggled bravely against them during the 1890's, first as an Alliance Democrat, then as the foremost Southern Populist, but was thwarted by them at every turn, and led into the futility and degeneration of his later career. Watson stood originally for the Southern farmer and his way of life, war upon Eastern industrialism, alliance with the agrarian West, conflict with other classes both within and outside the South, and the enlistment of the Negro in the farmers' struggle. As the author shows, Watson's career was studded with crushing disappointments. The district from which he was easily elected to Congress in 1890 was gerrymandered by the Democrats in 1892, and he was out of public office until 1920 when he was elected to the United States Senate. When he was Populist candidate for Vice President in 1896, fusionist elements in his own party betrayed him. In his "forlorn crusade" of 1904 as Populist candidate for President, Watson became a defender of white supremacy and began his sorry but understandable swing toward reaction, sectionalism, and sensationalism. Articles in his weekly, the Jeffersonian, on the plutocracy and corporate privilege were replaced by vituperative attacks upon individuals and the "menaces"—the Catholic hierarchy, the Negro, the Jew. "A frustrated man and a frustrated class found that their desires and needs were complementary."

J. Theodore Roosevelt to Wilson (1901–21)

3452. Barck, Oscar Theodore, and Nelson Manfred Blake. Since 1900, a history of the United States in our times. Rev. ed. New York, Macmillan, 1952. 903 p. illus.

52–2595 E741.B34 1952

First published in 1947.

"Suggestions for further reading": p. 861–885.

A textbook emphasizing the historical development of problems currently important to this country. Although ample treatment is accorded to social and cultural trends in America, more space is devoted to the two most impressive lines of development: "the steady expansion of the functions of government to deal with the complex problems of a new age and the increasing involvement of the United States in global politics." The authors see three significant tendencies of the last 50 years: a nation largely indifferent to international affairs has been pushed by events into a position of dominant power in world affairs; it has been compelled not merely to defend democracy as a way of government and life but to reexamine its own institutions in the light of the democratic ideal; and its capitalist system has been put to the acid test of having to provide security and economic well-being for the whole people. There is still no cause for complacency: if wealth, productivity, and the general standard of living have soared, if education, good literature, music, and art have never been so accessible, national and international problems have grown even faster, and in greater complexity and difficulty than ever before.

3453. Bowers, Claude G. Beveridge and the progressive era [Boston] Houghton Mifflin, 1932. xxiv, 610 p. illus. 32–22530 E748.B48B6

Bibliography: p. [591]–593.

The well-documented political biography of a man who began his career as a Hamiltonian Republican but whose practical experience as a legislator carried him into the Progressive ranks. Beveridge (1862–1927) was at first a conservative nationalist, hostile to demagogy, and a believer in the obligations and the self-restraint of power. His dominant passion, Mr. Bowers believes, was for an imperialist national policy, expanding trade through colonialism; his consuming ambition, a leap from private life in Indiana to the United States Senate, which feat he accomplished in 1898. By 1905, however, Beveridge "had discovered that bigness and power do not necessarily make for the good of humanity." When he triumphed over the packers in 1906 with the passage of his meat inspection bill, he took "a long strike forward as a progressive and compromised some of his old relationships." Thereafter, he was engaged more and more in progressive battles for domestic reforms and "was moving into conflict with the major forces of his party"; he consistently supported Roosevelt, and was one of the insurgents under Taft. A Progressive in 1912, "he was passionately in earnest about creating a great party, liberal according to his lights," says the author, "and he saw no hope in the party he had left." Unable to regain office, he devoted his later years to his monumental Life of John Marshall (q. v.) and an unfinished study of Lincoln.

3454. Clark, John Maurice. The costs of the World War to the American people. New Haven, Yale University Press, for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, 1931. 316 p. ([Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. Division of Economics and History. Economic and social history of the World War. American series])

31–28596 HC56.C33, no. 3 D635.C553

An analysis of the costs of World War I to the United States wherein the fiscal allocations "are regarded as of little significance in themselves, their chief importance being as evidence of the outpouring of goods, the diversions of productive power from peace to war uses, and the sacrifices of the people, all of which constitute the more important realities behind the various sums of money which serve to call them forth." Professor Clark considers such matters as the nature of fiscal outlays for the war, how they were financed by the Federal, State, and local governments, or private organizations, and the effects of the war on manpower, agriculture, and industry. He estimates "the real social outlays for prosecuting the war" at 32 billion dollars, broken down by years thus: 1917, 6 billions; 1918, 16 billions; 1919, 9 billions; and 1920, 1 billion. At the time of writing (1931), he had concluded that the postwar prosperity, highest in the Nation's history, was higher than it would have been had there been no war, that the Great Depression cut deeper, and that the effect of the war in so deepening the depression outweighed its effect in heightening the boom.

3455. Goldman, Eric F. Rendezvous with destiny; a history of modern American reform. New York, Knopf, 1952. xiii, 503, xxxvii p.

52–6418 E661.G58

A lively history of the reform movements that culminated in the Wilson administration and, after the reaction of the 1920's, the New Deal, emphasizing the ideas of the reformers and the influence which these ideas exerted in subsequent developments. Since these movements are interpreted as reactions to a rapidly industrializing and urbanizing America, the narrative begins with the late 1860's, when these factors were becoming dominant, and the first reformers in Mr. Goldman's procession are therefore the patrician liberals of the Tilden school, who wanted a government "which the best people of this country will be proud of." After the episodes of the Georgists, the Farmers' Alliance, and the Populists, all currents run together in the Progressive movement of the early 20th century. Thus early emerged the recurrent dilemma of the progressives, which bewilders individuals as well as parties: should freedom of enterprise be restored by creating conditions of fair and equal opportunity, or should big business be accepted as inevitable and controlled by big or bigger government? These and other issues are conducted down to an open present, in a narrative in which social circumstances, liberal thought, and political action are nicely balanced, and which is sometimes quite individual in interpretation, but always thoroughly documented.

3456. Hechler, Kenneth W. Insurgency; personalities and politics of the Taft era. New York, Columbia University Press, 1940. 252 p. (Columbia University. Faculty of Political Science. Studies in history, economics and public law, no. 470)

40–33640 H31.C7, no. 470 E761.H462

Issued also as thesis (Ph.D.) Columbia University.

Bibliography: p. 227–248.

A history of the predominantly agrarian group of Republicans in Congress, who in 1909, inspired by the crusading spirit of Theodore Roosevelt, arose in rebellion against the reactionary "regulars." In the House of Representatives, the author notes, some 25 insurgents regularly fought the personal dictatorship of Speaker Cannon, and, at the high tide of insurgency, March 19, 1910, "rallied forty-two Republicans to join the Democrats in passing a resolution that stripped the Speaker of most of his personal power." Dr. Hechler names among the leaders George W. Norris of Nebraska, Edmond H. Madison and Victor Murdock of Kansas, John M. Nelson of Wisconsin, Miles Poindexter of Washington, Charles A. Lindbergh, Sr., of Minnesota, and Charles N. Fowler of New Jersey. The insurgents of the Senate strayed from the Republican position on a number of issues: revision of the tariff, which first split party solidarity in the special session of 1909; taxes; conservation; postal savings banks; railroad rate regulation; and reciprocity. In breadth of ideas and courage, the author believes, Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin had no equal; also of importance, however, were Senators Moses E. Clapp of Minnesota, Albert B. Cummins and Jonathan P. Dolliver of Iowa, Joseph L. Bristow of Kansas, and Albert J. Beveridge of Indiana.

3457. Hibben, Paxton. The peerless leader, William Jennings Bryan. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1929. xvi, 446 p. illus.

29–24634 E664.B87H6

"The first twenty-one chapters . . . were completed by Paxton Hibben before his untimely death. The book as it stands was completed by C. Hartley Grattan."—p. [v].

Bibliography: p. 409–419.

A not uncritical interpretative biography of Bryan (1860–1925), which relates its subject to the intellectual, social, political, and economic milieu of his day. He is seen as "the perfect product" of the American Middle West, "where sentimentality took the place of knowledge and evangelism was the motive force of action." In the heyday of brass bands and torchlight political parades, "an era when oratory was all a man required to attain to any exalted position," Bryan possessed the equipment of the perfect orator. Yet victory was not in Bryan nor of him, Mr. Hibben maintains; even the Cross of Gold speech that won him the Democratic Presidential nomination in 1896 was defensive. "William Jennings Bryan was of those meek who may inherit but will never conquer the earth." More than a politician seeking votes, he "was the evangelist of a new hope for the helpless and disinherited," a hope which lay not in patient resignation but in self-help through political action. The Great Commoner, thrice defeated nominee for the Presidency, and Secretary of State under Wilson, 1913–15, became a symbol of "emotional Democracy."

3458. Hofstadter, Richard. The age of reform; from Bryan to F. D. R. New York, Knopf, 1955. 328 p. 54–7206 E743.H63

This analysis postulates that reform has set the tone of American politics for the better part of the 20th century. "The reform movements of the past sixty-five years fall readily into three main episodes, the first two of which are almost continuous with each other: the agrarian uprising that found its most intense expression in the Populism of the 1890's and the Bryan campaign of 1896; the Progressive movement, which extended from about 1900 to 1914; and the New Deal, whose dynamic phase was concentrated in a few years of the 1930's." Professor Hofstadter's attention centers upon the ideas of the participants in these movements: their concepts of what was wrong, the changes they sought, and the techniques they found desirable. He is concerned with their most characteristic thinking as found in "middlebrow writers," the popular magazines, muckraking reports, campaign speeches, and articles by representative journalists and influential publicists. The author stresses and criticizes the Yankee-Protestant ethos of responsibility in Populist-Progressive thinking, the "notion that it is both possible and desirable to moralize private life through public action." He regards the New Deal as a drastic new departure in American reformism, principally in its experimental and managerial approach to problems of economic recovery and social welfare.

3459. Jessup, Philip C. Elihu Root. New York, Dodd, Mead, 1938. 2 v. illus. 38–31598 E664.R7J5

"Sources and bibliography": v. 2, p. 507–520; "Chronological list of the principal public speeches and papers of Elihu Root": v. 2, p. 521–552.

Based upon interviews with Root, as well as family papers and other sources, this is a massive biography of the Republican lawyer and statesman (1845–1937). His practice in the years 1865–99, and after his retirement from the Senate in 1915, consisted mainly of cases connected with large corporations and the municipal government of New York. He is here characterized as a man of scientific and detached mind, a master of detail, and an able trial lawyer. Identified with Republican reform elements, Root believed in party regularity as a practical means to political ends, but was always ready to fight the machine on matters of principle. Professor Jessup describes Root's battles against political influence, inertia, personal jealousies, and self-interest, as well as his creation of the General Staff and the Army War College, during his service as Secretary of War under McKinley and Theodore Roosevelt (1899–1904). As Roosevelt's Secretary of State (1905–9), Root, in the author's opinion, proved "the possibility of practical altruism" toward Latin America. Ever devoted to the principle of peaceful arbitration, Root adopted a policy of patience, caution, and friendliness toward all. Professor Jessup considers his greatest diplomatic triumph the settlement of the longstanding Newfoundland fisheries dispute.

3460. Josephson, Matthew. The President makers; the culture of politics and leadership in an age of enlightenment, 1896–1919. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1940. 584 p. 40–33441 E712.J68

"Sources": p. 567–571.

The years 1896–1919 produced in this country not only a cultivated and socially-minded political era, but also a whole gallery of remarkable and diverse leaders who controlled the national party organizations and were, in effect, "President Makers." Mr. Josephson views this period as "the flowering of America's imperial age," and Mark Hanna, "Maker" of President McKinley, as the most important link between large business interests and professional politics. Among younger men and the literati, on the other hand, the author finds a sense of special duty as well as special privilege. Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson "demanded on the part of the rich capitalists who so often supported their campaigns both self-denial and self-control." Progressives like the elder La Follette and Louis D. Brandeis "required of the citizens an alert public conscience, a growing knowledge of public affairs, and readiness to intervene intelligently at almost every point of the governing process." Mr. Josephson sees Theodore Roosevelt's Square Deal and Wilson's New Freedom as the true precursors of Franklin D. Roosevelt's New Deal, calls the Taft administration "an attempted 'Restoration,'" and dismisses the decade of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover as "a miscarried 'Restoration.'"

3461. La Follette, Belle (Case) and Fola La Follette. Robert M. La Follette, June 14, 1855–June 18, 1925. Chapters I–XXVI by Belle Case La Follette and chapters XXVII–LXXII by Fola La Follette. New York, Macmillan, 1953. 2 v. (xx, 1305 p.) illus. 53–13106 E664.L16L13

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 1233–1253.

A warmly written, extensively documented family biography of Senator Robert M. La Follette of Wisconsin, begun by his widow and completed by his daughter. Born in a log cabin and associated in his youth with sturdy, courageous pioneer folk, La Follette, in his daughter's estimation, early acquired the enduring faith in the plain people that "was the compelling force throughout his many years of public service." He is depicted here as a man who took the issues directly to the voters, who won a place in the front ranks of the Republican Party, and who, in 1897, began his long educational campaign in Wisconsin for direct primaries, railroad regulation, tax reform, conservation, and other measures which were enacted during his tenure as Governor, 1900–1905. In his long service as a United States Senator, his daughter points out, La Follette was nominally a Republican but steadily pursued an independent course. He stanchly supported many of Wilson's domestic and some of his foreign policies but, as an isolationist, he voted against the entry of the United States into World War I. Miss La Follette makes it clear that her father ran as an independent rather than a Progressive Party candidate for the Presidency in 1924.

3462. Mock, James R., and Cedric Larson. Words that won the war; the story of the Committee on Public Information, 1917–1919. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1939. xvi, 372 p. illus. 39–27871 D632.M64

Bibliography included in "Notes" (p. [347]–356).

Based on personal interviews with former members as well as intensive study of the files of the so-called Creel Committee of World War I, this history of its activities offers an illustration of war propaganda at work. The Committee on Public Information, a "propaganda ministry" set up by executive order on April 13, 1917, displayed "vigor, effectiveness, and creative imagination, in encouraging and then consolidating the revolution of opinion which changed the United States from anti-militaristic democracy to an organized war machine." Composed of journalists, scholars, press agents, editors, artists, and other manipulators of the symbols of public opinion, working in all media of communication, this "gargantuan advertising agency" sought to mobilize public thinking and emotion on behalf of the Wilson program and "to make it seem like something worth dying for." George Creel, committee chairman, deserves censure for impetuosity and "horseback decisions," in the authors' opinion, but should be credited for maintaining what freedom of the press there was. The senior author's Censorship, 1917 (Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1941. 250 p.) shows how very little freedom of any sort remained. In times of crisis from the American Revolution onward, liberties have always been curtailed to some degree, especially freedom of speech and of the press, but only with the advent of World War I were all guaranteed rights abrogated save those to property. He describes in some detail these contraventions of liberty: censorship of the press, dispatches, wireless, cable, telegraph, and mail under supervision of the Censorship Board; and of newspapers, magazines, books, motion pictures, and public speech under the Department of Justice.

3463. Paxson, Frederic L. American democracy and the World War. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1936–48. 3 v. illus. 36–21132 D619.P42

Volume 3 has imprint: Berkeley, University of California Press.

CONTENTS.—1. Pre-war years 1913–1917.—2. America at war, 1917–1918.—3. Postwar years: normalcy, 1918–1923.

A history of the United States, 1913–23, which includes socioeconomic aspects within a firm political framework. It was, on the whole, a younger generation rather than the Democratic Party, the author maintains, that took control of the Nation's affairs in 1913. "The real problem of democratic society was to determine how far it could go to keep the peace among conflicting interests. And for Democracy, as a political entity, it was a challenge whether it could step from minority to majority, from inexperience to responsibility, and deliver satisfaction where the Republican Party of McKinley, Roosevelt, and Taft had failed." The author regards as impressive the program of domestic legislation enacted in 1913 and 1914: the Underwood-Simmons Tariff, Federal Reserve Act, Federal Trade Commission Act, and Clayton Anti-Trust Act.

Wilson wanted no war and in fact desired a peace consistent with national safety and self-respect, but by 1916 was "desperate in his belief that unless the world could be brought to peace the United States would be driven to war." The American participation in World War I (1917–18) is regarded by Professor Paxson as an important chapter in the history of democracy in action, when a great nation with its mind finally made up acted with speed, directness, and reasonable efficiency in marshaling its resources, went wholeheartedly into combat 3000 miles away, forestalled a German victory, and marched home "carrying no plunder and asking none." He finds the retreat to "normalcy," begun in 1918 with the election of a Republican Congress and completed in 1920 by the election of a Republican President, as much a part of democracy as the wartime single-mindedness, although he deplores the lack of program, authority, and pattern at a time when preparation for peace was as imperative as winning the war had been.

3464. Pringle, Henry F. The life and times of William Howard Taft; a biography. New York, Farrar & Rinehart, 1939. 2 v. (1106 p.) illus. 39–27878 E762.P75

Bibliography: v. 2, p. 1083–1086.

"Authorized but not official," this is a moderately critical biography of William Howard Taft (1857–1930), based chiefly upon his private and official papers. Taft, a Republican, is pictured here as a man of peace, conservative, kindly, of judicial rather than political temper. He spent the greater part of his career in public life, rising through judicial offices, the Governor-Generalship of the Philippines and the Secretaryship of War, to serve from 1909 to 1913 as President of the United States, and from 1921 to 1930 as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court. Taft's worship of the law and strict construction of the executive power are emphasized, as are his "lifelong ineptitude in the complicated art of politics," and his inability to win public support for his measures or to popularize his accomplishments. The author credits Taft as President with the creation of a postal savings system and the initiation of a corporate income tax, and the advocacy of reciprocal trade agreements and civil service reforms; he deprecates Taft's discrimination against the congressional insurgents, his small knowledge of the problems of labor, industry or finance, and his "dollar diplomacy." That Taft, as Chief Justice, "was conservative, if not reactionary, in his political and social views is," in Mr. Pringle's view, "not open to question."

3465. Roosevelt, Theodore. Letters. Selected and edited by Elting E. Morison; John M. Blum, associate editor. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1951–54. 8 v. illus. 51–10037 E757.R7958

CONTENTS.—v. 1–2. The years of preparation, 1868–1900.—v. 3–4. The Square Deal, 1901–1905.—v. 5–6. The Big Stick, 1905–1909.—v. 7–8. The days of Armageddon, 1909–1919.

A selection of not quite 10,000 from the estimated 100,000 available letters of Theodore Roosevelt (1858–1919), most of them in the Library of Congress, intended to make readily accessible to historians those which seem necessary to reveal his thought and action "in all the major and many of the minor undertakings of his public and private life." Arranged chronologically, the letters selected are printed in their entirety. Purely routine and repetitive correspondence has been eliminated. Correspondence connected with the secondary and tertiary pursuits of this public figure who was also naturalist, historian, rancher, man of letters, and explorer, have been chosen to indicate only the continuity and depth of his concerns. Far more inclusive is the material concerning politics, especially letters about significant events such as the Anthracite Strike of 1902 and the battle over the Hepburn Act in 1906, or suggestive minor episodes, such as the disposition in 1902 of the Church lands in the Philippines. Letters about continuing issues—the tariff, state political organizations, the Indians, the fencing of Western lands—are included if they show developments or shifts in policy. Also included are letters dealing with applications of policy to specific cases, if they are representative, as in the administration of the Five Civilized Tribes and of the Panama Canal, or if they possess unusual intrinsic interest, as in the case of the Warren Livestock Company. The editors have provided many brief notes, mostly identifications of addressees or persons mentioned in the letters. Of particular value are the "Chronologies" which appear as appendixes at the end of the even-numbered volumes.

3466. [Roosevelt, Theodore] Blum, John Morton. The Republican Roosevelt. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1954. 170 p. 54–5182 E757.B65

A brief but by no means slight interpretation of the purposes and methods of Theodore Roosevelt's public career, based mainly upon his published works. In the author's opinion, Roosevelt was "a professional Republican politician from New York" who "made a career of politics, studied and mastered politics," because he "loved power." Proficient in the processes of politics, administration, and legislation, he dominated and, for a time, strengthened his party; he exerted pressure upon and persuaded the public; he negotiated with and disciplined Congress, learning continuously to compromise and adjust. His purpose, both in domestic and foreign policy, remained governed by "those related constants: his quest for order, his faith in power" as a means of maintaining or imposing national and international stability and justice. Mr. Blum sees tragedy in the fact that "not all the techniques mastered, not all the expert and moral men summoned to advise, not all the intuition and compassion, not all the adroitness in negotiation or the measured sense of pace of change, not all the nice perceptions about social organization subdued his lust to rule."

3467. [Roosevelt, Theodore] Pringle, Henry F. Theodore Roosevelt, a biography. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1931. 627 p. illus.
31–31893 E757.P96

Bibliography: p. 607–612.

A well-documented political biography of Theodore Roosevelt, nearly half of which is devoted to his years in the Presidency, 1901–9. He is characterized here as a "violently adolescent" person, with a genius for the picturesque, restlessly and aggressively energetic, a jingo, an imperialist, and a conservative who was led "into strange bypaths of political thought" by his fury at the courts for their frequent nullification of Rooseveltian concepts. The core of his political philosophy is seen as "righteousness," coupled with "a due regard for opportunism" and compromise. He sought the "moral regeneration of the business world" through control of corporations, regulation of railroads, conservation, and protection of the rights of labor. He promoted, among other matters, subjugation of the Philippines, limited independence for Cuba, and the construction of the Panama Canal, besides serving as mediator in the Russo-Japanese War. Roosevelt broke with Taft and the Old Guard, turning to radicalism and "the program of William Jennings Bryan and the Democratic party," in Mr. Pringle's opinion, because of his desire to substitute control and perpetuation of the existing order for the Stalwarts' complacency and drift. The relationship of Roosevelt to radicalism and progressivism is more fully developed in Professor George E. Mowry's Theodore Roosevelt and the Progressive Movement (Madison, University of Wisconsin Press, 1946. 405 p.). Roosevelt, the author believes, served as the "advance agent of progressivism" by his continual preaching, leaving the work of legislation to later comers. Roosevelt himself underwent a slow development of his ideas and only "scaled the heights of radicalism," by placing human welfare before profits and property, in a speech delivered at Osawatomie, Kansas, in 1910. Combining Hamiltonian means with Jeffersonian ends, his New Nationalism offered the "concept of a master regulatory state." Mr. Carleton Putnam, who closed a career as an airline executive in order to undertake a full-length portrait of Roosevelt, "done both judicially and sympathetically," has published the first of four projected volumes: Theodore Roosevelt, v. 1, The Formative Years, 1858–1886 (New York, Scribner, 1958. 626 p.). An impressive accumulation of detail, it takes for its epigraph a pronouncement of Roosevelt's in 1885 warning against the tyranny of the majority in a democracy.

3468. Sullivan, Mark. Our times, 1900–1925. New York, Scribner, 1936, ©1927–35. 6 v.
51–4248 E741.S944

Contents.—1. The turn of the century.—2. America finding herself.—3. Pre-war America.—4. The war begins, 1909–1914.—5. Over here, 1914–1918.—6. The twenties.

A report, in the best journalistic sense, on American life during the years 1900–1925, the purpose of which "is to follow an average American through this quarter-century of his country's history, to recreate the flow of the days as he saw them, to picture events in terms of their influence on him, his daily life and ultimate destiny." Actors and events are appraised according to their effects upon this average man, his emotions about them, and his influence upon them. The author has consulted not only formal documents, newspaper files, and other printed records, but also his own correspondence with participants and eyewitnesses, his on-the-spot notes, and newspaper dispatches. Politics is presented principally through the personalities of the Presidents and other conspicuous leaders, but each is regarded as achieving his eminence through his fitness to represent powerful social trends. The history of the people from 1900 to 1925, Mr. Sullivan believes, was "determined less by politicians than by leaders in other walks of life." American achievements were "markedly more important in the fields of science, the invention and perfection of mechanical processes, and the extension of knowledge, than in the field of politics." Besides discussions of these, the author offers lively descriptions of a variety of matters such as prices, fashions, amusements, literature, music, and the theater. A noteworthy feature of these volumes is the abundant and well-chosen illustrations from contemporary sources.

3469. Wilson, Woodrow. Public papers. Authorized ed. Edited by Ray Stannard Baker and William E. Dodd. New York, Harper, 1925–27. 6 v. in 3.
27–15113 E660.W722

Bibliography edited by H. S. Leach: [v. 2] p. 475–506; [v. 4] p. 437–483; [v. 6] p. 543–636.

CONTENTS.—[v. 1–2] College and state; educational, literary and political papers (1875–1913).—[v. 3–4] The new democracy; presidential messages, addresses, and other papers (1913–1917).—[v. 5–6] War and peace; presidential messages, addresses, and public papers (1917–1924).

A collection of the addresses, messages, and other public papers of Woodrow Wilson (1856–1924), 28th President of the United States. The editors have selected documents which best display his intellectual growth and express his principles and policies in the three fields of his greatest interest—politics, education, and religion; they see in all a tendency "toward social and political change, even revolution." In Wilson's earliest writings, he is a historian and professor of jurisprudence, the leader of a reform movement at Princeton University, and an advocate of education as a means to a better social and political order. The presidential papers reveal a resolute leader, with a sense of responsibility to the unknown masses of men and above all to history, whose passion for peace was modified by a love of justice. Dealing with transcendent issues, the important public utterances of the great years of Wilson's second administration, 1918–19, are his finest, both in substance, and in "superb and moving simplicity." In the editors' opinion, "general readers will nowhere find a more succinct and felicitous presentation of the dominating American principles and ideals of the period, or a more powerful appeal for the realization of one of the exalted visions of mankind."

3470. [Wilson] Baker, Ray Stannard. Woodrow Wilson; life and letters. Potomac ed. New York, Scribner, 1946. 7 v. illus.

46–2000 E767.B16 1946

CONTENTS.—[v. 1] Youth—Princeton, 1856–1910.—[v. 2] Governor, 1910–1913.—[v. 3] President, 1913–1914.—[v. 4] Neutrality, 1914–1915.—[v. 5] Facing war, 1915–1917.—[v. 6] War Leader, 1917–1918.—[v. 7] Armistice, Mar. 1–Nov. 11, 1918.

A sympathetic, massive, and painstakingly documented biography of Wilson, consisting in large part of excerpts from the enormous collection of his public and private papers now in the Library of Congress. Mr. Baker had the advantage of personal acquaintance with Wilson and of conversation and correspondence with members of his Cabinet, members of Congress, and others closely associated with him at various stages of his life. The author attempts "to present the man as he was" through his own letters and memoranda, and provides only enough of the historical setting to explain Wilson's actions. In Mr. Baker's opinion, Wilson spent 54 years "in preparation, ten in living, three in dying." In 1885 he began a brilliant career as educator, writer, and lecturer on history and politics, but his labors as college professor and as president of Princeton University formed a "secondary course." His primary ambition was "to take an active, if possible a leading, part in public life." It was natural rather than astonishing, the author believes, that Wilson came confidently as Democratic nominee to the New Jersey gubernatorial race of 1910 and to the presidential campaign of 1912. After long years of studying political organization, the development of representative government, and the then current public issues, he easily "out-generaled the most experienced bosses, dominated his party, came early to control Congress, and finally to stand forth preëminent as a world leader." Mr. Baker thinks that, as in his reforms at Princeton, his progressive legislation at Trenton, his magnificent early record in the Presidency, and his diplomacy in World War I, "Wilson seemed to succeed best in his first irresistible attacks—when he had his following securely behind him." In Woodrow Wilson and the People (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Doran, 1945. 392 p.), Professor Herbert C. F. Bell describes Wilson's sustained effort to achieve "communion in thought and sentiment with the rank and file of his fellow countrymen." A somewhat highhanded crusader who believed in his "mission," he claimed position and responsibility as "political spokesman and adviser of the people," in the faith that they would follow the path of righteousness should the true issues be made clear to them.

3471. [Wilson] Baker, Ray Stannard. Woodrow Wilson and world settlement, written from his unpublished and personal material. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, Page, 1922. 3 v. illus.

22–23112 D644.B27

Based upon official minutes, reports, resolutions, memorandums, and less formal sources, this is a record of American policies and the struggle of Woodrow Wilson and his advisers to apply them at the Peace Conference of Paris, 1919, to the problems of the war-torn world. Baker attempts to illumine the issues and the actions as well as to assess defects and strengths of leadership. Volumes I–II contain the narrative, volume III the texts of the documents referred to or quoted in it. The author wrote from firsthand knowledge, having studied economic and political conditions in the allied countries during 1918, and served as a member of the American Commission at the Conference. In an effort to substitute a new order of mutual understandings for the old sanction of force, the Americans started with principles of justice—the self-determination of peoples, and a world association for mutual aid and protection—and attempted to have them applied by dispassionate scientists to a territorial settlement. The Americans were handicapped, however, in Baker's view, by a lack of knowledge of Europe's affairs, secret diplomacy, traditions, and needs, and, more especially, by the fading, both in Europe and the United States, of the high moral enthusiasm which marked the last year of World War I. Wilson, at the time of the armistice, had been the majority leader of world opinion; at the Peace Conference, "he was the leader of the opposition, a powerful opposition, but undoubtedly a minority." Although written first, this came to form the last part of Baker's Woodrow Wilson: Life and Letters. In Wilson and the Peacemakers (New York, Macmillan, 1947. 2 v. in 1), a critical reinterpretation of our participation in the making of the world settlement of 1919 and of American failure to honor Wilson's pledges, Thomas A. Bailey distinguishes between the cause of our entry into World War I—to defend the American principle of freedom of the seas—and the objectives of the peace—to save the world from Prussian autocracy, to make the world safe for democracy, and to end all wars. Wilson's aims were pitched too high, he believes, and did not command the support of the American people. Although Professor Bailey is in complete sympathy with Wilson's broad program and with his vision for the future, he finds that the President was tactless, stubborn, and unrealistic. In the author's opinion, American reservations about the Treaty of Versailles should have been resolved by compromise. "The United States had a world to gain and virtually nothing to lose by joining the League of Nations."

3472. [Wilson] Link, Arthur S. Wilson. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1947–56. 2 v. illus. 47–3554 E767.L65

Contents.—[1] The road to the White House.—[2] The new freedom.

Bibliography: v. [1], p. [529]–543; v. [2], p. [473]–488.

The first volumes in a large-scale and elaborately documented series devoted to a study of the life and times of Woodrow Wilson. In his analysis of Wilson's presidency of Princeton University (1902–10) Professor Link discovers a pattern of early success in reorganizing the university, increasing pressure for reform, resultant disharmony and frustration, and, in 1910, defeat; he calls this pattern "the microcosm of a later macrocosm." Wilson's entry into politics in 1910 as gubernatorial candidate of the conservative New Jersey Democratic machine, his disregard of the party leaders, and his victorious emergence from the campaign as one of the foremost progressive Democrats, the author considers "one of the miracles of modern politics." The second volume covers only the first two years of the Wilson administration, the New Freedom phase (1913–14) when tariff, tax, and currency reforms and antitrust legislation were enacted in answer to the demands of public opinion. Wilson's greatest contribution, his expansion and perfection of the powers of the Presidency, he achieved by asserting his position as spokesman of the people, by using public opinion as a spur to Congress, by affirming and establishing leadership of Congress, and by seizing party leadership.

3473. [Wilson] Link, Arthur S. Woodrow Wilson and the progressive era, 1910–1917. New York, Harper, 1954. xvii, 331 p. illus. (The New American Nation series) 53–11849 E766.L5

"Essays on sources": p. 283–313.

A compact treatment of the political and diplomatic history of the United States from the beginning of the split in the Republican Party in 1910 to the Nation's entry into World War I in 1917, based on Professor Link's research for his monumental biography of Wilson (q. v.). After surveying briefly the political situation of 1910, the various shades of progressivism, and the issues involved in the election of 1912, the author offers a closely reasoned analysis of Wilson's initial legislative program whereby he secured lowered tariff rates, the enactment of an income tax system, creation of the Federal Trade Commission, and, "crowning achievement of the first Wilson administration," the Federal Reserve System. Wilson's foreign policy, especially toward Latin America, Professor Link explains in terms of inherited commitments and problems, a subconscious "missionary impulse," naïveté, and imperialism, as well as a conscious ambition to be just, and to advance the causes of peace, democracy, and Christianity. In the author's opinion, Wilson found neither Great Britain nor Germany fighting the Great War for worthy objectives. It was "the German decision to gamble on all-out victory or complete ruin" which finally compelled Wilson to take the drastic action leading to war.

3474. Wish, Harvey. Contemporary America, the national scene since 1900. Rev. ed. New York, Harper, 1955. 714 p. illus. 54–11008 E741.W78 1955

Bibliography: p. 683–699.

First published in 1948.

Based upon the urban approach to culture, this history of 20th-century America examines the trends among arts and sciences as well as politics and economics for clues to national motivation and the direction in which our civilization is moving. "Among the useful concepts of cultural integration," the author observes, "have been, first of all, the impact of the metropolis and technology upon our behavior, the rise, decline, and revival of the businessman's leadership in politics and popular culture, the diffusion of foreign as well as indigenous ideas here, and the basic patterns of diplomatic policies." He notes a general faith in progress and the promise of American life, an acquiescence in urban dominance, an unfortunate encouragement of a standardized culture through "socially unregulated technology," a tendency toward concentration in businesses, and a steady growth of mass production. "Since the beginning of the century," Professor Wish believes, "a richer, more powerful, and more equitable society had emerged."

K. Since 1920

3475. Adams, Samuel Hopkins. Incredible era; the life and times of Warren Gamaliel Harding. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1939. 456 p. illus. 39-30355 E786.A34

Bibliography: p. 443-[445].

A newspaperman's biography of Warren Gamaliel Harding (1865-1923) based less upon authoritative documents, most of which had been destroyed by the time of writing, than upon "word-of-mouth testimony" from informants, many of whom have preferred to remain anonymous. It also relies heavily upon an unpublished University of Syracuse dissertation by Dr. Harold F. Alderfer, "The Personality and Politics of Warren G. Harding." Mr. Adams regards the controversial, Ohio-born President as an attractive, warm, even endearing individual, if indifferently educated and imprecise of mind. To him Americanism and Republicanism were inseparable. His career in state politics was insignificant; his term in the United States Senate, 1915-21, was easygoing and negative. Unhampered by principles, he was a "pliant lay-figure for his party, raised to unexpected authority." In 1920 he became President through the efforts of Harry M. Daugherty, whose political protégé he was, and of the Senate oligarchy, whose creature he was expected to become. Harding's "conception of public service was to give a friend a job," and thereafter to depend upon his loyalty. Unfortunately for the Nation, the President made "dreadful errors in the choice of friends and lieutenants."

3476. Allen, Frederick Lewis. The lords of creation. New York, Harper, 1935. 483 p. 35-20649 HG181.A57

"Sources and obligations": p. 465-473.

"This book is an attempt to tell the story of the immense financial and corporate expansion which took place in the United States between the depression of the eighteen-nineties and the crisis of the nineteen-thirties; to show how profoundly it altered the circumstances and quality of American life, why and how it ended in collapse, and what the collapse means to all of us." The why is of course stated in economic terms—"the era of high finance had so swollen the mass of claims upon the future that only roaring prosperity could sustain it; and the effort to sustain it even at the cost of purchasing power undermined the foundations of that prosperity"—but the whole development is related with so pervasive a sense of its interconnections with the rest of the national life that it is best regarded as a contribution to general history, and an unusually successful venture in placing contemporary history in perspective.

3477. Allen, Frederick Lewis. Only yesterday; an informal history of the nineteen-twenties. New York, Harper, 1931. xiv, 370 p. illus. 31-28421 E741.A64

"Sources and obligations": p. 358-361.

3478. Allen, Frederick Lewis. Since yesterday; the nineteen-thirties in America, September 3, 1929-September 3, 1939. New York, Harper, 1940. xiv, 362 p. illus. 40-27130 E741.A66

"Sources and obligations": p. 347-352.

Only Yesterday is a lively social panorama of the years November 11, 1918-November 23, 1929, forming an era between the close of World War I and the disastrous termination of "The Big Bull Market" on the New York Stock Exchange. Chapters I-III describe the American temper in the aftermath of war, 1918-20: the ebbing of wartime idealism, the slow death of the Wilson dream of a new world order, the Red scare and its attendant strikes, riots, and bombings, and the resulting Palmer raids, hysteria, and superpatriotism. Chapters IV-XI characterize the peacetime frame of mind: disillusionment; a sense of life's futility; and a desire both for entertainment and for excitement, through fads, dramatic events, scandals and crimes, sports, and such technological novelties as tabloids, radio, airplanes, and automobiles; together with a new freedom of manners, morals, thinking, and dress, induced by "the war neurosis," Freud, prohibition, lurid magazines, motion pictures, and the like. The three final chapters deal with the boom and subsequent crash of the New York stock market. Rather more conventionally organized, the sequel, Since Yesterday, continues the chronicle to the outbreak of World War II, September 3, 1939. Because he wishes "to give some idea of the high place from which the country fell during the economic collapse of 1929–32," Mr. Allen begins his narrative "with a study of things as they were on September 3, 1929." He stresses particularly as the heart of his story "the enormous economic and political transformation which took place," and tells it in terms of New Deal experiments, reforms in regulation and compulsion, subsidies, the rise of secular "religions of social salvation," pump-priming, and "economic royalism."

3479. Beard, Charles A., and Mary R. Beard. America in midpassage. New York, Macmillan, 1939. 977 p. (His The Rise of American civilization, v. 3) 39–11429 E169.1.B274

About two-thirds of this massive survey of American life and thought in the 1920's and 30's is devoted to political and economic history, the remainder to social and cultural affairs. Coolidge is viewed as an apostle of thrift, prudence, and simplicity, to whom both the domestic and foreign outlook appeared "fair with prosperity and assurance," and Hoover as a firm believer in capitalism, foreign trade, and foreign investment. The administrations of both are shown to have favored the powerful business elements by special policies and by letting them alone in most of their operations. Yet, "under the most beneficient auspices," business was overwhelmed by panic and depression in 1929–32, and its leaders turned for succor to the Roosevelt administration during 1933 "in a spirit of cheerful compliance," which, however, rapidly dwindled. President Roosevelt nevertheless continued to act on his "conviction that it was the function of statesmanship to bring the real into closer conformity to the ideal—the conception of humanistic democracy." The discussion of contemporary entertainment centers in its sociology and its relation to economics and politics, that of the arts in their social concerns and their embodiment of the hurried and harried spirit of the age, and that of science in the advance and application of invention and discovery.

3480. [Coolidge] Fuess, Claude M. Calvin Coolidge, the man from Vermont. Boston, Little, Brown, 1940. 522 p. illus.
40–27145 E792.F85

Bibliography: p. [501]–504.

A very sympathetic biography of that apostle of common sense and hard work, Calvin Coolidge (1872–1933), 30th President of the United States, tracing in great detail the Yankee heritage and environment that produced his laconic speech, frugality, industry, "conservative distrust of foreigners and innovations," caution, and "limited" outlook. His education at Amherst College, the author believes, was responsible for "many of Coolidge's ideas, perhaps his entire political philosophy." By 1905 Coolidge was known in Northampton, Massachusetts, "as a shrewd politician, a good vote-getter, a chap who might possibly become Mayor or even go to Congress"; and in 1915, Frank W. Stearns, attracted by Coolidge's public record, not only pushed his campaign for Lieutenant Governor, but also wrote prophetically, "later, of course, he must be Governor and still later President." The author considers Coolidge an astute judge of men, a keen but ethical politician, and a "first-class" executive, whose accomplishments were chiefly negative: he checked the Boston police strike; he prevented waste and extravagance; and he blocked unwise legislation in Congress. Dr. Fuess' article, "Calvin Coolidge—Twenty Years After," in the Proceedings of the American Antiquarian Society, v. 63, Oct. 21, 1953 (Worcester, Mass., 1954), p. 351–369, summarizes the reasons why he continues to believe that Calvin Coolidge ranks with John Quincy Adams, Hayes, and Cleveland, men "whose integrity and general record have made them stand out more for what they were than for what they did," and that Coolidge deserves our respect and admiration.

3481. [Coolidge] White, William Allen. A Puritan in Babylon, the story of Calvin Coolidge. New York, Macmillan, 1938. xvi, 460 p.
38–34760 E792.W577

A study of the years of the great speculative boom, 1923–29, as well as a life of Calvin Coolidge, "an old-fashioned, God-fearing primitive Puritan democrat." "The reaction of this obviously limited but honest, shrewd, sentimental American primitive to those gorgeous and sophisticated times—his White House years—furnished material for a study of American life as reflected in American business and American politics." This Yankee mystic, partisan Republican, and self-consecrated public servant "learned to love his party as a source of power, power for him, power for what he regarded as good government, the rule of the well-to-do; brains in short." Lacking in perspective and detachment, and quite unprepared to manage the speculative orgy entered into by a runaway finance capitalism, he played down the Teapot Dome scandals, announced that "the business of America is business," and pursued a cheap money policy which reduced the national debt but facilitated the "Coolidge bull market." In 1928, "while the market was careening around like an untamed skyrocket, the President with his habitual avoidance of unnecessary responsibility went right on letting things go." If Andrew Mellon was his "bad angel," the United States Chamber of Commerce was his "alter ego." In all this, as the author declares, he was but reflecting the lust for prosperity which filled the American heart, and "following the democratic vision of the America of his age." The Autobiography of Calvin Coolidge (New York, Cosmopolitan Book Corp., 1929. 246 p.) is a characteristically brief, restrained, and prudent recital of the author's credo and the main events of his life.

3482. Donovan, Robert J. Eisenhower: the inside story. New York, Harper, 1956. xviii, 423 p. illus. 56–9653 E835.D6

A detailed, apparently uncensored, and candid, yet objective report of the actions taken by the Eisenhower administration during the initial three years (1953–55) of the President's first term, by a Washington correspondent who has had access to White House memorandums, minutes of Cabinet meetings, and the like, and has obtained interviews with key officials. The quoted conversations and discussions bear the mark of authenticity. Mr. Eisenhower (b. 1890) is portrayed as a "man of good will," if limited in his contacts with civilian life, who has attempted to fulfill campaign commitments and "to go down the middle" of the road. He strengthened the organization of the executive branch and moved "to eliminate corruption from the government." At the President's request, Mr. Donovan notes, Congress broadened social security, adopted a new farm program, approved the St. Lawrence Seaway, and liberalized the Atomic Energy Act. Besides the successes, the author records the difficulties—conflicts of interest, congressional investigations, book burnings, the failure to enact Hawaiian statehood—and Mr. Eisenhower's reactions to both. Less intimate and immediate, but written in diary form with entries running from May 1950 to December 1955, is The Eisenhower Years, by Richard H. Rovere (New York, Farrar, Straus & Cudahy, 1956. 390 p.). It consists of the author's interpretative journalism contributed to The New Yorker, The Reporter, and Harper's during the period, and emphasizes foreign policy and the activities of Senator McCarthy, admittedly at the expense of economic issues. Kenneth S. Davis' Soldier of Democracy [new ed.] (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1952. 577 p.) is a sympathetic yet judicious biography which interprets General Eisenhower's life and career as symbols of American democracy and the American success story. The latter half of the book deals with his World War II command.

3483. Feis, Herbert. The road to Pearl Harbor; the coming of the war between the United States and Japan. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1950. 356 p. 50–9585 D753.F4

A history of the diplomatic relations, chiefly between the United States and Japan, leading to American entry into World War II, from "the dreary years of the mid-thirties" to December 7, 1941, with a narrative in great detail from April 1940. It is based upon archives of the Department of State, the records of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East, the papers of President Roosevelt, Secretaries Henry L. Stimson and Henry Morgenthau, Jr., and Ambassador Joseph C. Grew, as well as other documents, and conversations with several American officials concerned. Professor Feis holds that, although by 1937 Japan had conquered large areas of Asia's mainland, the country still lacked means to achieve its needs and ambitions, and what means it had were jeopardized by the depression. Rather than see Japan lose status, the army and "excitedly patriotic youth" preferred to extend its empire. The advance was to be managed, the author believes, through strategy—deceit and persuasion—because of Japanese vulnerability, but the design failed. War came because, rather than yield to those whom she had tried to outwit, Japan threw herself against them. America's principal object was to keep out of trouble, and for a time, the "policy of existing as a great power, without acting like one, seemed to work well."

3484. Goldman, Eric F. The crucial decade: America, 1945–1955. New York, Knopf, 1956. 298 p. 55–9285 E813.G6

A Princeton professor of history seeks to give meaning to the 10 years following V–J day by placing "events in the larger perspective." He has submitted portions of his narrative to some 80 prominent participants in the events, thereby catching "many genuine errors." The seven Truman years are treated in greater detail than the three Eisenhower years. The author's cinematic technique vividly recreates the march of crowded events which most of his readers will remember, and evokes the state of the public mind upon which they impinged. He disclaims partisanship, but his viewpoint is definitely left of center: this was, in essence, "an era in the national life when, for all minority groups, for all lower-status Americans, the social and economic walls were coming tumbling down." After 1952 the Eisenhower administration buffered

"the exultant thrust of the right-wing Republicans," and contributed to the emergence of a national consensus on long-term welfare policies. Despite frequent bewilderment and some petulance, the author thinks, the American people are "proving mature enough to perform that most difficult of tasks—adjusting rapidly to the irritatingly and the frighteningly new."

3485. Hoover, Herbert C. Memoirs. New York, Macmillan, 1951–52. 3 v. illus.
51–13301 E802.H7

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Years of adventure, 1874–1920.—[v. 2] The Cabinet and the Presidency, 1920–1933.—[v. 3] The Great Depression, 1929–1941.

The autobiography of the 31st President of the United States, Herbert Clark Hoover (born 1874). The portions dealing with the years since 1919 were written fairly soon after the occurrence of the events described. Arranged topically within a rough chronological order, these chapters express the author's semicontemporary impressions, which he has evidently seen no reason to alter. The first third of volume I deals with Mr. Hoover's boyhood in Iowa and Oregon, his education at Stanford University, and his highly successful pre-World War I career as a mining engineer and engineering consultant; the remainder tells the impressive story of Belgian relief, the United States Food Administration, and other activities connected with postwar European relief and reconstruction. Volume II relates the public career of Mr. Hoover from his return to the United States in 1919, through his administration of the Department of Commerce, 1921–28, and through the development, reforms, and foreign policy of his term in the Presidency, 1929–32. Volume III is devoted to the Great Depression, the election of 1932, and "the continuation of the Depression from Mr. Roosevelt's inauguration in 1933 until 1941." Much of it is polemical in purpose. David Hinshaw's informal, anecdotal, and interpretative biography, Herbert Hoover: American Quaker (New York, Farrar, Straus, 1950. xx, 469 p.), stresses the spiritual, moral, and intellectual qualities of his friend and fellow Quaker, who believes passionately "in the essential goodness of people, in liberty and freedom; in democracy and in God's unfolding purpose for man." The author extols Mr. Hoover's "matchless integrity," great ability, and selfless public service; he seeks to explode "the myth of the Hoover-caused depression"; deplores "the Democratic party's smear-Hoover campaign" of 1932; and states that the President's recovery program had checked the depression by midsummer 1932.

3486. [Hoover] Myers, William Starr, and Walter H. Newton. The Hoover administration; a documented narrative. New York, Scribner, 1936. 553 p. 36–27108 E801.M94

Based upon Herbert Hoover's diaries and other data, "this is American history, as seen from the vantage point of the White House." Opinions and policies cited as his are from his own public or private declarations; comment of the authors has been kept to a bare "explanation of those forces which formed the background for the actions taken." The material is presented in the form of an almost daily log. Part I, "The Battle on a Hundred Fronts," comprising about two-thirds of the book, deals with crisis and depression measures. Here, it is stated: "The forces of depression were definitely checked and the road to full recovery was freed from obstacles during the Hoover Administration." Part II is devoted to "The Normal Tasks of Administration." The authors believe that Mr. Hoover's "claim to statesmanship is secure." Mr. Myers' companion volume, The Foreign Policies of Herbert Hoover, 1929–1933 (New York, Scribner, 1940. 259 p.), repairs the omission of foreign affairs from the earlier work; it surveys Mr. Hoover's "far-reaching plans for the advancement of the interests of the United States, and for the furtherance of the cause of peace and human happiness throughout the world." It presents a somewhat rosy view of a period during which, under the impact of worldwide depression, international relations continued to deteriorate.

3487. [Hoover] Wilbur, Ray Lyman, and Arthur Mastick Hyde. The Hoover policies. New York, Scribner, 1937. 667 p.
37–32153 E801.W55

A massive exposition of President Hoover's principles and policies both in philosophy of government and in action. The authors, who were both members of his Cabinet, vigorously advocate the "traditional American principles, courageously and ably led by Herbert Hoover." He had as his goal advancement of the public welfare "within the framework of strong local as well as Federal Government and the development of understanding and voluntary co-operative action among free men." His doctrines and the actions taken are indicated mainly through quotations from his state papers and published reports, arranged in a rough historical sequence, together with explanatory and connective text supplied by the authors. The topics treated include measures of social, economic, communications, conservation and reclamation, regulatory, fiscal, relief, and foreign policy.

3488. Leighton, Isabel, ed. The aspirin age, 1919–1941. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1949. 491 p. 49–9336 E169.1.L526

The era between World Wars I and II is here presented in terms of significant, typical, or fantastic events, and the personalities who most strongly challenged the American imagination. The 22 chapters have been contributed by well-known authors, some of whom participated in the affairs described, while others were reporters on the scene or specially qualified observers. Hodding Carter, for example, a fighter in the struggle against the Louisiana politician, writes the chapter, "Huey Long: American Dictator," and Gene Tunney describes "My Fights with Jack Dempsey." Each chapter of 20 or 30 pages, preceded by a vignette of the author, characterizes a notable occurrence or person of a given year, from 1919 ("The Forgotten Men of Versailles," by Harry Hansen) to 1941 ("Pearl Harbor Sunday: The End of an Era," by Jonathan Daniels). The title derives from the editor's observation: "During these throbbing years we searched in vain for a cure-all, coming no closer to it than the aspirin bottle."

3489. Link, Arthur S. American epoch; a history of the United States since the 1890's. New York, Knopf, 1955. xxii, 724, xxxvii p. illus. 54–13244 E741.L55

Bibliography: p. [705]–724.

Recent techniques make possible the printing in one volume of what a few decades ago would have been a 2- or 3-volume work; this is history on a generous scale, and illustrated with abundant photographs, maps, and graphs. It is also many-sided history, with balanced attention to demographic, business-cycle, foreign-policy, social, and cultural factors. It has a strongly defined point of view, interpreting the whole period primarily in terms of "the progressive movement," and presenting Theodore Roosevelt, Wilson, Franklin Roosevelt, and Truman as the leaders of its successive phases. A striving after clarity and finality of judgment gives an occasional impression of dogmatic cocksureness, but there is an impressive amount of thoroughly organized information. Intended for the general reader, it is also usable as an advanced college text.

3490. Lyons, Eugene. The red decade, the Stalinist penetration of America. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1941. 423 p. 41–51867 HX86.L97

This book, ready for press just as Nazi Germany invaded Russia (1941) in World War II, offered the timely message that Communist Party propaganda, "always and unswervingly, is determined by the Kremlin's needs and the Kremlin's instructions," and has not the remotest relation to American interests. "Stalin's Fifth Column in America, as in all other nations, has only one set of 'principles': blind obedience to the will of Moscow. It has only one 'ideal': allegiance to a foreign dictator." Deliberately polemic in spirit, this work is intended as "an informal account of Bolshevism in our country" during the years 1930–40. At its height in 1938, "the incredible revolution of the Red Decade had mobilized the conscious or the starry-eyed, innocent collaboration of thousands of influential American educators, social workers, clergymen, New Deal officials, youth leaders, Negro and other racial spokesmen, Social Registerites, novelists, Hollywood stars, script writers and directors, trade-union chiefs, men and women of abnormal wealth." It could not safely be ignored, since "our labor movement, politics, art, culture, and vocabulary still [1941] carry its imprint." Mr. Lyons, a naturalized Russian, believed the Great Depression to have been far more potent in shaping this phenomenon than "any of the masterminds on New York's Union Square."

3491. Perkins, Dexter. The new age of Franklin Roosevelt, 1932–45. [Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1957. 193 p. (The Chicago history of American civilization) 56–11263 E806.P465

"Suggested reading": p. 176–181.

A survey of the great changes instituted during the Roosevelt era which "emphasized, as never before, the dynamic role of the federal government," and introduced a wholly new and positive concept of its responsibility: to relieve want and unemployment through Federal agencies, to provide for the farmer a larger share of the national product, to develop national resources on a grand scale, to maintain industrial peace, and to operate the Nation's credit system. Professor Perkins cites as examples of the substantial alterations produced in the socioeconomic order by the New Deal the advance of industrial unionism, the new political power of the farmer, and the increased self-awareness and influence of the dispossessed and underprivileged. Such alterations Roosevelt viewed with sympathy and hope. Absolving the President of both radicalism and autocracy, the author terms him a "transcendent success" on the domestic front and concludes that his broad view of Federal authority "has been sustained by time." However, the consolidation of the Good Neighbor policy toward Latin America was his only great achievement in foreign affairs. In Mr. Perkins' opinion, Roosevelt quickly and fully grasped the implications of the Nazi advance, but in action he was vacillating, and too often heeded "the siren voice of political opportunism."

3492. Rauch, Basil. The history of the New Deal, 1933–1938. New York, Creative Age Press, 1944. 368 p. 44–8426 E806.R3

A study of the political philosophy and the economic policies of the Roosevelt administration during its first five years, based principally upon published official documents. The author believes that "experimental evolution is the key to understanding the history of the New Deal," and that a fundamental change occurred in 1934, the importance of which "justifies the designations First New Deal and Second New Deal." Grounded on a philosophy of economic nationalism and scarcity, the conservative "First" New Deal had recovery through higher prices as its primary aim and benefited mainly big business and the large farmers. The "Second" New Deal, initiated in 1934 as a deliberate reorientation, and manifesting a liberal philosophy of economic coöperation and economic abundance, had betterment through increased purchasing power and social security for all as its goal, and favored labor and smaller farmers. It "fundamentally altered and in some cases reversed" "First" New Deal policies and legislation in the fields of agriculture, industry, labor, tariff, money, and unemployment relief.

3493. Roosevelt, Franklin D. F. D. R.: his personal letters. Foreword by Eleanor Roosevelt; edited by Elliott Roosevelt. New York, Duell, Sloan & Pearce, 1947–50. 4 v. illus.

47–11935 E807.R649

A chronologically arranged, carefully annotated collection of the personal correspondence of Franklin D. Roosevelt (1882–1945), together with explanatory connective text, published by the family as a service to historians, educators, and those who felt he "was in truth their friend." Volume I contains all of the early surviving letters, from the first childish communication dated 1887 to a note informing Endicott Peabody, headmaster of Groton School, of his engagement to Eleanor Roosevelt in 1904. These letters, addressed chiefly to "My Dearest Mama and Papa," are valuable in reflecting formative influences upon the youth, in the Hudson Valley and at Groton and Harvard. Since his letters written in the years 1905–28 were ill preserved, volume II contains far less but very important material. Here are exhibited not only his growth in political experience as State senator and as Assistant Secretary of the Navy, but also the strengthening of his character during his long and courageous struggle against poliomyelitis. Volumes III–IV cover the years 1928–45, when Roosevelt served first as Governor of New York (1929–32) and then as President of the United States (1933–45), and had less time for family affairs; they differ in character from the earlier volumes, containing "whatever family letters are available," but largely made up of correspondence, memorandums, and other messages to other persons concerning public matters. Of necessity selective, since much of the latter material is restricted for various reasons, these volumes are intended to illustrate White House routines, various facets of the President's personality, and his relationships to his close associates.

3494. Roosevelt, Franklin D. The Roosevelt reader; selected speeches, messages, press conferences, and letters of Franklin D. Roosevelt. Edited and with an introd. by Basil Rauch. New York, Rinehart, 1957. 391 p.

57–3088 E742.5.R65

Selected bibliography: p. xiii–xiv.

A selection from Roosevelt's writings, "designed to reduce the hazard of quantity to proportions reasonable enough to appeal to general readers as well as to more specialized students of American history." The material is intended "to reveal the qualities of Roosevelt's mind, character, and personality, as clues to the leadership which made them important." Because, in Professor Rauch's opinion, they constitute "his supreme acts of leadership" and were in very large part the instrumentalities of his renovation of this country's domestic and foreign policies, Roosevelt's great political speeches are accorded the most space. From transcripts of 986 press conferences "a generous lot of culled passages is offered," as giving "the most intimate perceptions of his leadership," as well as of "his tremendous talent for statesmanship by improvisation." His letters, considered disappointing by this editor, are only sparsely represented. The Roosevelt Treasury, edited by James N. Rosenau (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1951. 461 p.), is an anthology of descriptions and recollections by persons who knew him or had dealings with him, such as Josephus Daniels, Raymond Moley, Grace Tully, Winston Churchill, and Edward J. Flynn, together with some autobiographical passages by F. D. himself. Part I indicates the highlights of Roosevelt's preparation; part II suggests the personal qualities that either aided or hampered his effectiveness; and part III shows him in action in the various capacities required of presidential leadership. Roosevelt is "the hero rather than the subject" of an anthology edited by Milton Crane, The Roosevelt Era (New York, Boni & Gaer, 1947. xiv, 626 p.), since its contents are the "thoughts, writings, and actions which his personality helped to shape." In an effort "to assemble a coherent and connected group of materials for a social history of the age," Mr. Crane has gathered the work, serious, humorous, or sentimental, of journalists, poets, dramatists, politicians, and novelists. Represented are writers as diverse as Carl Sandburg, H. L. Mencken, Thurman Arnold, John Steinbeck, E. B. White, Erskine Caldwell, and A. J. Liebling.

3495. [Roosevelt, Franklin D.] Freidel, Frank B. Franklin D. Roosevelt. Boston, Little, Brown, 1952–56. 3 v. illus. 52–5521 E807.F74

Includes bibliographical references.

CONTENTS.—1. The apprenticeship.—2. The ordeal.—3. The triumph.

3496. Burns, James MacGregor. Roosevelt: the lion and the fox. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1956. 553 p. illus. 56–7920 E807.B835

In the first half of a projected six-volume biography, Professor Freidel sets forth in great detail the life of Franklin D. Roosevelt, from his school days at Groton to his victory in the presidential election of 1932. This monumental work relies heavily upon the Roosevelt papers and other documents, as well as the published memoirs of his colleagues and the recorded reminiscences of his associates, and quotes very generously from them. The author traces the development of Roosevelt's character and traits, his concepts and ideals evaluating them and showing how they affected his actions, and offers a lucid and penetrating analysis of the political record. This began in 1911 when Roosevelt attempted to rally progressive Democrats against Tammany domination in the New York State Senate, and emerged "a new political luminary." Behind his complex political programs were "the firm humanitarian tradition, Christian faith, and sense of noblesse oblige that he had inherited from his parents and learned from Endicott Peabody of Groton and Theodore Roosevelt. His were the background and attitudes, and the aspirations, to point him toward greatness." Nearly three-quarters of Professor Burns' political biography of Roosevelt is a study of his leadership in the Presidency to 1940, his aims and methods, his successes and failures. The author views Roosevelt's personality as eminently practical and flexible, if infinitely complex, and even contradictory. "He had no over-all plans to remake America but a host of projects to improve this or that situation. He was a creative thinker in a 'gadget' sense: immediate steps to solve specific day-to-day problems." In Professor Burns' opinion, Roosevelt could dramatize the significance of the big decisive event—the depression, naked aggression abroad—but when the crisis was less striking, if no less serious, he was unsuccessful, as in the Supreme Court packing, the congressional purge, and his efforts to convince public opinion of the need for collective security. Less a great creative executive than a skilled manipulator and brilliant interpreter, "he was always a superb tactician, and sometimes a courageous leader, but he failed to achieve that combination of tactical skill and strategic planning that represents the acme of political leadership."

3497. [Roosevelt, Franklin D.] Fusfeld, Daniel R. The economic thought of Franklin D. Roosevelt and the origins of the New Deal. New York, Columbia University Press, 1956, ©1954. 337 p. (Columbia studies in the social sciences, no. 586) 55–9065 H31.C7, no. 586

Bibliography: p. [305]–320.

This Columbia University dissertation is "a study of Roosevelt's economic philosophy: its sources in F. D. R.'s family background and education and in the Progressivism of Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson; its development under the impact of contemporary economic problems and their proposed solutions; and its culmination in the political programs advocated by Roosevelt." The author observes that two important points emerge from his study: "In the first place, Roosevelt's thought was derived primarily from the climate of opinion of his time, out of which F. D. R. selected some ideas and rejected others," rather than from systematic study of the writings of philosophers, economists, or political theorists. "Secondly, F. D. R. was a man with a tremendously complex personality and a highly intricate system of beliefs." Dr. Fusfeld quotes Roosevelt's statements, places them "in the context of the ideas, political controversies, and problems of his time," and allows "the varied threads of his economic thought to emerge in all their complexity, complete or incomplete, consistent or inconsistent." Roosevelt, the author believes, was essentially a reformer, who accepted the concept of free enterprise but wanted to improve its performance, especially by means of planning and of Government responsibility for the functioning of the economy.

3498. [Roosevelt, Franklin D.] Ickes, Harold L. The secret diary of Harold L. Ickes. New York, Simon & Schuster, 1953–54. 3 v.

53–9701 E806.I2

CONTENTS.—[v. 1] The first thousand days, 1933–1936.—v. 2. The inside struggle, 1936–1939.—v. 3. The lowering clouds, 1939–1941.

This is both the personal report of Harold L. Ickes and an intimate history of the Roosevelt administration for the years 1933–41. Having had his official acts, interviews, and meetings carefully noted as they occurred, Mr. Ickes made weekly dictations of the full text of his diary and then destroyed the preliminary materials. Since it was thus written in the heat of the moment, and no amplifications or corrections were later made, the diary retains its immediacy and also its controversial attitude. The author presents his versions of battles and skirmishes within the administration over public works policies and projects, conservation, reclamation, slum clearance, politics, foreign affairs, the Supreme Court, and Government reorganization. Beginning with 1936, the journal reflects a shift in emphasis from domestic to foreign concerns as the dangers of the depression were superseded by those of war. Throughout, Mr. Ickes comments vigorously and candidly upon the President, fellow Cabinet members, and other public figures. Frances Perkins, who served as Industrial Commissioner when Roosevelt was Governor of New York and as Secretary of Labor during his whole Presidency, contributes sympathetic, honest, and perceptive reminiscences of him in The Roosevelt I Knew (New York, Viking Press, 1946. 408 p.). "The core of Roosevelt's character was viability—a capacity for living and growing." This quality, she thinks, "accounts for his rise from a rather unpromising young man to a great man." In a large-scale biography which incorporates much personal knowledge, The Democratic Roosevelt (Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1957. 712 p.), Rexford Guy Tugwell, who served as a member of the "Brain Trust" during Roosevelt's first term, provides new information concerning it as well as a highly personal interpretation of the President's thoughts and motives. Mr. Tugwell discovers as the most persistent elements in Roosevelt's character and career his belief "in an external guidance" and his sense of "a commanding destiny" toward which he progressed with a "ferocious drive."

3499. [Roosevelt, Franklin D.] Sherwood, Robert E. Roosevelt and Hopkins, an intimate history. Rev. ed. New York, Harper, 1950. xix, 1002 p. illus. 50–6867 E807.S45 1950

First published in 1948.

Based largely upon Harry Hopkins' personal and public papers, this is a history of American participation in World War II told in terms of Hopkins' relationship to Franklin D. Roosevelt, and his wartime activities as presidential aide. The author, also a White House familiar, contributes generously of his own reminiscences. The bulk of this important book deals in great detail with the political, diplomatic, and military affairs of the prewar and war years: the fight for lend-lease; aid to Great Britain, Russia, and China; the Atlantic Charter; and, for the 44 months after the attack of December 7, 1941, on Pearl Harbor, the massive military effort exerted against the Axis Powers by the Allied Nations. Roosevelt and Churchill demonstrated "politico-military leadership on a global scale." Wanting nothing except to serve, Harry Hopkins acted as Roosevelt's personal negotiator with Churchill, Beaverbrook, Stalin, De Gaulle, and others, and, at the major wartime conferences, as an extra-official resolver of disputes. In Working with Roosevelt (New York, Harper, 1952. xiv, 560 p.), another former White House staff member, Judge Samuel I. Rosenman, presents his recollections of a 17-year association with Roosevelt and of the evolution of Roosevelt's social objectives and political philosophy. The author describes in detail how he, Harry Hopkins, Robert E. Sherwood, and others helped draft and polish the President's major speeches and messages, which, nevertheless, as finally delivered, "were his—and his alone—no matter who the collaborators were." Based upon the testimony of persons who knew him as well as upon printed sources, John Gunther's Roosevelt in Retrospect (New York, Harper, 1950. 410 p.) is an anecdotal but documented analysis, interpretation, and appraisal of Roosevelt's character, personality, and career. Roosevelt had "to a supreme degree," Mr. Gunther believes, important qualifications for statesmanship: courage, patience, a subtle sense of timing, capacity to relate the particular to the whole, idealism, fixed goals, and the ability to impart resolution to others. The author candidly admits that he also had a number of less attractive qualities.

3500. Schlesinger, Arthur M. The age of Roosevelt. [v. 1] The crisis of the old order, 1919–1933. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1957. 557 p. 56–10293 E806.S34

The first in a projected four-volume work, this is a vivid, anecdotal chronicle of events and currents of thought, especially in politics and economics, during the 14 years prior to Franklin D. Roosevelt's inauguration. Based not only upon documents but also upon memoirs, newspaper reports, journal articles, and personal interviews, this crisply written book conveys a strong sense of immediacy. Professor Schlesinger traces the antecedents of the New Deal, from the agrarian Populist challenge to business rule in the 1890's to Woodrow Wilson's New Freedom policies of 1913–16. He describes the Nation's post-World War I acceptance of business leadership, and equation of economic success with spiritual merit, as well as the social-welfare liberalism of those concerned to protect the individual from the hazards of industrial society. He shows the alienation of intellectuals and artists from business culture; assigns blame for the stock market collapse of 1929 and the subsequent depression; and sharply criticizes the structure of the economy, the failure of business leadership, and the lack of business morality. Besides a number of challenging conclusions, Professor Schlesinger offers incisive portraits of many public figures, and narrates Franklin Roosevelt's earlier career at some length.

3500a. Schriftgiesser, Karl. This was normalcy, an account of party politics during twelve Republican years: 1920–1932. Boston, Little, Brown, 1948. 325 p. 48–5968 E743.S38 1948
Bibliography: p. 299–306.

The author, who regards the rejection of the League of Nations as the "greatest political tragedy in the history of the United States," has sought to write an "account of Republicanism triumphant and the effect of this triumph upon the American people from Warren Gamaliel Harding's nomination in 1920 through Herbert Clark Hoover's ruination in 1932." The author regards the choice of Harding as "a fraud upon the people," but, he observes, "Senator Harding was exactly fitted to play the role expected of him by the Senate oligarchy, the corruptionists, and Big Business." Mr. Schriftgiesser deplores "the abdication of the democratic spirit that was the fundamental crime perpetrated upon the people" in these "twelve disastrous years." This was not confined to the Republican incumbents, for the Democratic Party "forgot its historic heritage as the people's party and wanted to be the Party of Prosperity, too. It listened to the siren call of normalcy and turned its back on reform." Presidential leadership, he believes, "was unknown in Washington. Harding lacked the capacity to give it; Coolidge lacked the courage or the will; and Hoover lacked the opportunity." The author writes with much acerbity concerning the pattern of isolationism, "normalcy," and less government in business, that the Nation followed for nearly 12 years.

3500b. Truman, Harry S. Memoirs. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1955–56. 2 v.
55–10519 E814.T75

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Year of decisions.—v. 2. Years of trial and hope.

A very detailed personal report of Harry S. Truman's years in the Presidency of the United States (1945–53), based upon his private papers, official documents, some hitherto unpublished, and the recollections of a number of persons who were present when certain decisions were made. During his tenure, the author was animated by one overriding purpose, "to prevent a third world war." Volume I expresses the humility of the man who felt as if the moon, the stars, and all the planets had fallen on him when the death of Franklin D. Roosevelt thrust him suddenly into the Nation's highest office. Dealing mainly with the conclusion of World War II, this volume exhibits Mr. Truman's courageous approach to the momentous issues confronting him in 1945, such as the termination of the war in Europe, Russian obstructionism, the use of the atom bomb, and the cessation of hostilities in the Pacific area, as well as his forthright judgments concerning persons and events. Volume II consists principally of a defense of the Truman administration and its program for transition from war to peace under heavy economic burdens and the financial drain of emergency relief to Europe and the Far East. Mr. Truman evidently believes that his efforts on behalf of atomic energy control and development have been his single most important achievement.

IX

Diplomatic History and Foreign Relations

A. Diplomatic History

Ai.	General Works	3501–3526
Aii.	Period Studies	3527–3542
Aiii.	Personal Records	3543–3549
Aiv.	The British Empire	3550–3559
Av.	Russia	3560–3568
Avi.	Other European Nations	3569–3573
Avii.	Latin America: General	3574–3579
Aviii.	Latin America: Individual Nations	3580–3587
Aix.	Asia	3588–3597

B. Foreign Relations

Bi.	Administration	3598–3608
Bii.	Democratic Control	3609–3616
Biii.	Policies	3617–3635
Biv.	Economic Policy	3636–3642

THE dual title and organization of this chapter are a consequence of the dual purpose of this Guide: to deal not only with past developments but with present situations. To be sure, no book that has to be written, printed, proofread, bound, and released for publication can ever deal with the reader's present, but only with his recent past. Our books classified as Diplomatic History are primarily retrospective, concerned with the political dealings of the United States with the other nations of the world from the beginning of the American Revolution through World War II. The period since V–J day merges with the present without any breach of continuity as yet perceptible to us, and books concerned solely or principally with the postwar period are therefore placed under Foreign Relations. An exception or two will be found in Section Aiii, the Personal Records of seven men important in formulating our policies in the recent past, and there are some other instances where the assignment of a title to one or the other class will perhaps appear arbitrary.

An extraordinary proportion of professional effort has gone into the writing of diplomatic history, probably because the records of diplomatic transactions are as a rule exceptionally full, carefully preserved, tidily arranged, and ordinarily kept secret, save for discreetly selected excerpts printed under official auspices, for a period of years after their creation. There are numerous histories of the missions of individual ambassadors, of public opinion concerning a single crisis, or of periods of a few years in our relations with a single country—for none of which do we have room here. In Section Aii, Period Studies, we have aimed to select books on epochs important for the subsequent development of the United States, and in Sections Aiv—Aix, we have preferred titles covering, if not the whole span of our relationships with a particular area or nation, at least long and significant periods. International relations are not, of course, exclusively political or diplomatic, and some of the titles which appear here may have an equal claim to be placed in Section F of Chapter XI, on International Influences in our Intellectual History.

The four sections on Foreign Relations we have at least attempted to keep current, but it is a field in which events move rapidly and new titles are published in perturbing quantity. Section Biii on Policies contains, along with a number of primarily factual expositions, a sampling of the numerous books in which amateurs as well as professionals offer a diagnosis or a remedy for what seems to them to be ailing in the international relations of the United States. Our selection has not aimed to emphasize any school of thought or course of policy, and our annotations reflect no opinions except those of the authors in question.

A. Diplomatic History

Ai. GENERAL WORKS

3501. The American foreign policy library. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1947–56. 15 v.

This series began to appear in 1947 under the editorship of Sumner Welles, Undersecretary of State from 1937 to 1943; he was eventually replaced by Professor Donald C. McKay of Harvard University. Authors of the individual volumes are recognized academic authorities on the history or the foreign relations of the areas or countries treated; many either teach at Harvard or received their graduate training there. The volumes range between 250 and 350 pages, save for the latest to appear, Mr. Wolff on the Balkans, which is considerably larger. After summarizing whatever geographic, economic, and historical information the author considers useful, each volume reviews the history of American relations with the nation or region, with principal attention given to recent events and to the major problems of the present day. The approach is scholarly, but the series is intended to provide a lay audience with the background material essential to an understanding of current events. Footnote references are dispensed with, but each volume concludes with a bibliographical essay arranged to correspond with the chapter headings.

3502. Brinton, Clarence Crane. The United States and Britain. [Rev. ed.] 1948. xiv, 312 p. 48–9542 E183.8.G7B75 1948
"Suggested reading": p. [294]–302.

3503. Brown, William Norman. The United States and India and Pakistan. 1953. 308 p. 52–12253 DS480.84.B73
"Suggested reading": p. [291]–297.

3504. Cline, Howard F. The United States and Mexico. 1953. xvi, 452 p. 52–12258 F1226.C6
"Suggested reading": p. [430]–439.

3505. Dean, Vera (Micheles) The United States and Russia. [3d print., rev.] 1948. xvi, 336 p. 48–4500 E183.8.R9D4 1948
"Suggested reading": p. [307]–319.

3506. Fairbank, John King. The United States and China. 1948. xiv, 384 p. 48–7351 DS735.F3
"Suggested reading": p. [350]–367.

3507. Hughes, Henry Stuart. The United States and Italy. 1953. 256 p. 53–9038 DG577.H8
"Suggested reading": p. 240–247.

3508. McKay, Donald C. The United States and France. 1951. xvii, 334 p. 51–11375 E183.8.F8M3
"Suggested reading": p. [310]–319.

3509. Perkins, Dexter. The United States and the Caribbean. 1947. 253 p. 47–11619 F2171.P4
"Suggested reading": p. [235]–240.

3510. Reischauer, Edwin O. The United States and Japan. 1950. xviii, 357 p. 50–3943 E183.8.J3R4
"Suggested reading": p. [343]–347.

3511. Scott, Franklin D. The United States and Scandinavia. 1950. xviii, 359 p. 50–7563 DL59.S35 1950
"Suggested reading": p. [333]–344.

3512. Speiser, Ephraim A. The United States and the Near East. Rev. ed. 1950. xviii, 283 p. 48–6492 DS63.S6 1950
"Suggested reading": p. [255]–263.

3513. Thomas, Lewis V., and Richard N. Frye. The United States and Turkey and Iran. 1951. 291 p. 51-12394 E183.8.T8T5
"Suggested reading": p. [167]-170, [279]-284.
CONTENTS.—The United States and Turkey, by L. V. Thomas.—The United States and Iran, by R. N. Frye.

3514. Whitaker, Arthur P. The United States and Argentina. 1954. xv, 272 p. 55-5541 F2831.W5
"Suggested reading": p. [254]-262.

3515. Whitaker, Arthur P. The United States and South America, the northern republics. 1948. xix, 280 p. 48-6353 F2216.W45
"Suggested reading": p. [255]-367.

3516. Wolff, Robert L. The Balkans in our time. 1956. xxi, 618 p. maps, tables. (Russian Research Center studies [23]) 56-6529 DR48.5.W6
"Useful works in Western languages": p. [588]-596.
Says the editor of the series, Donald C. McKay, in his Introduction: "The present volume on The Balkans in Our Time is a joint publication of The American Foreign Policy Library and the Russian Research Center Studies. The plan and focus of the volume follow very closely those of others in the Foreign Policy Library, but the much greater length and more detailed treatment reflect the interests of the Russian Research Center. The compromise between these two purposes is evident in the 'outsized' format in which the volume has been issued." It might be added that there is less material on American relations and interests than in most of the other volumes.

3517. Bailey, Thomas A. A diplomatic history of the American people. 5th ed. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1955. xxviii, 969, xxxix p. (Crofts American history series) 55-7869 JX1407.B24 1955
A college textbook covering its subject from 1775 to the present day, which was originally published in 1940 and has grown steadily thicker as the narrative of recent events has been added to successive editions. The principal emphasis is placed upon the role of public opinion, and the cartoons of successive periods are drawn upon for illustrations. There are 52 chapters in the latest edition, and the halfway point falls at the Venezuela crisis of 1893. Lewis Ethan Ellis' A Short History of American Diplomacy (New York, Harper, 1951. 604 p.) is an alternative textbook for those who would prefer a briefer treatment.

3518. Bartlett, Ruhl J., ed. The record of American diplomacy; documents and readings in the history of American foreign relations. 3d ed., rev. and enl. New York, Knopf, 1954. xxi, 790, xvi p. 54-2821 E183.7.B35 1954
Bibliography: p. 789-790.
This work is designed to make available to college classes in American diplomatic history a collection of documents which will enable students "to compare policies adopted at different times regarding the same area or subject, trace the evolution of major policies, and examine the reasoning used to defend or advance American foreign interests." Intended to supplement general accounts of diplomatic history, the documents, both public and private and for the most part drawn from printed sources, are grouped in topical chapters which follow a general chronological progression but sometimes overlap. They begin with the colonial era and end with the Korean War. Short passages by the editor introduce each chapter. An alternative documentary textbook in American diplomatic history is edited by William Appleman Williams: The Shaping of American Diplomacy; Readings and Documents in American Foreign Relations, 1750-1955 (Chicago, Rand McNally, 1956. 1130 p.). It includes a selection of writings on each period of our diplomatic history by present-day historians, along with a selection of contemporary documents which, in some instances, duplicate those in Mr. Bartlett's collection.

3519. Bemis, Samuel Flagg, ed. The American secretaries of state and their diplomacy. J. Franklin Jameson, H. Barrett Learned, James Brown Scott, advisory board. New York, Knopf [1927-29] 10 v. 27-8473 E183.7.B46
Volume 1 is devoted to a historical introduction by J. B. Scott on the diplomacy of the Revolution, and studies of the Confederation's two secretaries for foreign affairs, Robert R. Livingston and John Jay. In the subsequent volumes each secretary of state from Thomas Jefferson (1789-94) to Charles Evans Hughes (1921-25) is the subject of a study by an expert on the period or the subject. The essays vary in length, according to the length of the individual's term and the importance of his historical contributions. A bibliographical note for each secretary is appended. The set provides a valuable means of approach to the particular transactions of American diplomacy in detail. The Department of State has recently published an attractive short volume entitled The Secretaries of State, Portraits and Biographic Sketches (Washington, 1956. 124 p.) which includes all the secretaries to John Foster Dulles (from 1953).

3520. Bemis, Samuel Flagg. A diplomatic history of the United States. 4th ed. New York, Holt, 1955. 1018 p. 55–5982 E183.7.B4682 1955

This has been a standard textbook in the field since it was originally published in 1936. The successive editions have made minor alterations in the original text, but have brought the book current with the momentous developments in recent international affairs. After a preliminary discussion of the role of America in European conflicts between 1492 and 1775, the author sketches the foundations of American foreign policy as established between 1775 and 1823; the diplomacy of continental expansion, 1823–99; and since 1899, the United States as a world power. This last phase now fills over half of the volume. The author deals with the rise and significance of such historic doctrines as the freedom of the seas, the Monroe Doctrine, avoidance of entanglement in European conflicts, Manifest Destiny, the self-determination of peoples, and international arbitration.

3521. Bemis, Samuel Flagg, and Grace Gardner Griffin. Guide to the diplomatic history of the United States, 1775–1921. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1935. New York, P. Smith, 1951. reprint: xvii, 979 p. 52–6052 Z6465.U5B4 1951

The first and larger part of this monumental Guide is an annotated bibliography arranged under the headings of a minutely chronological review of American diplomacy, and under each heading the materials are classified as bibliographic aids, special works, printed sources, manuscripts, and maps. Chapter 23, long enough to stand as a separate part (p. 685–789), lists "General Works, Historical Publications and Aids." Part II consists of a 150-page essay on the sources for American diplomatic history, including printed state papers both American and foreign, and archival collections in the United States and abroad. The continuing demand for this indispensable guide led to its reproduction, through photographic process, by a commercial publisher 16 years after its appearance as a government document.

3522. Hill, Charles E. Leading American treaties. New York, Macmillan, 1931. 399 p. 33–13294 JX1407.H5 1931

This work, first published in 1922, is not a compilation of documents, but an approach to the history of American foreign relations through "the historical setting and the chief provisions of the leading American treaties," or arrangements involving groups of treaties. The settlements included are: the French alliance of 1778; the treaty of independence, 1783; Jay's treaty, 1794; the convention with France, 1800; the Louisiana purchase, 1803; the peace treaty of Ghent, 1814; the convention with Great Britain, 1818; the Florida purchase, 1819; the Webster-Ashburton treaty, 1842; the peace treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, 1848; the treaties with Japan, 1854 and 1858; the Alaska purchase, 1867; the treaty of Washington, 1871; the peace treaty with Spain, 1898; and the Panama Canal treaties from 1850 to 1902. A brief bibliography follows each chapter.

3523. Perkins, Dexter. The American approach to foreign policy. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 203 p. (The Gottesman lectures, Uppsala University) 53–3288 E183.7.P46 1952

Bibliography: p. [193]–195.

A series of lectures delivered in 1949, explaining the factors influencing the formulation and implementation of American foreign policy. After a brief general summary of our foreign relations to 1945, Mr. Perkins deals with each factor separately. The drive to achieve and maintain hemispheric solidarity must not be confused with imperialism, nor should our economic system be held exclusively responsible for policy decisions. An overdeveloped sense of morality has led to the sacrifice of our national interests while militarism and pacificism alternately affect our emotions. A final chapter views the antagonism of the Soviet Union and the United States as "the largest and most significant fact in the contemporary world of politics," and assesses the relative advantages of each side, with only the sober conclusion that "the capacity of a great self-governing people to deal with a continuing world crisis will be tested in the years ahead as it has never been tested before."

3524. Savage, Carlton. Policy of the United States toward maritime commerce in war. Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off., 1934–36. 2 v. (U. S. Dept. of State. Publication no. 331, 835) 34–28033 JX5207.S3 1934

Contents.—v. 1. 1776–1914.—v. 2. 1914–1918.

A narrative and documentary history of the United States' contributions to the law of naval warfare. Consistently enunciated in numerous treaties, civil and admiralty court decisions, naval codes and governmental declarations, and carried out as normal procedures by American maritime officials, American doctrines concerning the immunities of neutral goods on enemy ships, and of enemy goods on neutral ships, continuous voyage, the validity of blockade, immunity of private property at sea, and contraband of war were adopted by most major maritime powers between 1783 and the beginning of World War I. Unrestricted submarine warfare, in violation of these rules of law, was a major cause of American participation in that war. Six hundred documents are appended, 431 of which concern World War I.

3525. Tate, Merze. The United States and armaments. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1948. 312 p. 48–5607 JX1974.T32

"Much of the material of Part I . . . is in [the author's] The Disarmament Illusion."

"Selective bibliography": p. 278–286.

A documented history of American participation in disarmament conferences and negotiations from 1794 to 1947. It discusses the agreements effecting disarmament on the Great Lakes, the Hague Conferences of 1899 and 1907, our role in the Conference for the Reduction and Limitation of Armaments sponsored by the League of Nations in 1934, our interwar policy regarding naval disarmament, the program for disarming Germany and Japan following World War II, and our advocacy of the international control of atomic energy. Miss Tate concludes that as long as a nation must defend its own security, and international disunity and mistrust persist, there can be little hope for the achievement of true disarmament.

3526. Wilson, Robert Renbert. The international law standard in treaties of the United States. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1953. 321 p. 53–5063 JX1406.W5

Bibliography: p. [291]–310.

Of special value to advanced students of international law and foreign affairs, this book shows that America's foreign relations, as expressed by U. S. treaty practice, have been influenced by our traditional respect for the rule of law in domestic affairs. This survey of perfected international agreements which the United States has ratified from 1778 to 1950 records the number and variety of specific treaty references to international law or the law of nations. Much of the work is devoted to the analysis of treaties dealing with the pacific settlement of disputes, commerce and navigation, the independence and jurisdiction of states, and war and neutrality. A basis for comparison is provided in an appendix containing summaries of the treaty practices of Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany, Italy, and Japan.

Aii. PERIOD STUDIES

3527. Beale, Howard K. Theodore Roosevelt and the rise of America to world power. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1956. 600 p. (The Albert Shaw lectures on diplomatic history, 1953) 56–10255 E757.B4

A study of the effect of one man upon America's role in world politics, this book is a personalized review of the revolution in American foreign policy which began in 1889 and ended in 1909, and which placed America in the position of a great power. Beginning with his entrance into public life, Theodore Roosevelt worked ceaselessly for America's overseas expansion. He was convinced that this was the only way to achieve the necessary power to support our messianic role, shared with Great Britain, of civilizing the world. As President, T. R. carried on U. S. foreign relations by means of personal and secret contacts with the heads of state of the great powers, and maintained American ability to take action whenever these negotiations were of no avail. Extracts from private and public correspondence, as well as speeches, articles, and interviews have been used to illustrate aspects of Roosevelt's character, such as his peculiar brand of racism, and their relation to his insights and conclusions on foreign policy, arrived at both as a private citizen and as a public servant.

3528. Bemis, Samuel Flagg. The diplomacy of the American Revolution. New York, Appleton-Century, 1935. 293 p. 5 fold. maps. 35–8172 E183.7.B48, v. 1 E249.B44

"This volume is published from a fund contributed to the American Historical Association by the Carnegie Corporation of New York."

"Bibliographical note": p. 265–273.

As director of the European Mission of the Library of Congress from 1927–29, Dr. Bemis initiated the mass photocopying of materials for American history in European archives and libraries. These sources he combined with American ones and printed materials in order to present, he believed for the first time, "a balanced and somewhat condensed narrative of the diplomacy of American independence," in which "details have been subordinated to the significant factors and the broad movements." Four chapters are devoted to relations with France, three to Spain, three to the Netherlands, one to the Armed Neutrality, and five to the peace negotiations. To the author the essence of the story resides in the progressive entanglement of the United States in European diplomacy through the French alliance, and the bold stroke of Franklin, Jay, and Adams in 1782, when they "broke their instructions and cut loose from French advice and control." The work's continuing value is confirmed by a 1957 reprinting in the series of Midland books issued by the Indiana University Press.

3529. Bemis, Samuel Flagg. John Quincy Adams and the foundations of American foreign policy. New York, Knopf, 1949. xix, 588, xv p. 49–10664 E377.B45 1949

John Quincy Adams (1767–1848) served as United States Minister to the Netherlands, Prussia, Russia, and Britain, was concerned with important questions of foreign policy in the Senate of the United States, and assisted in concluding the Treaty of Ghent, before embarking upon his memorable term as Monroe's Secretary of State (1817–25). Accepting the claim that Adams was America's greatest diplomatist, the author states, "more than any other man of his time he was privileged to gather together, formulate, and practice the fundamentals of American foreign policy—self-determination, independence, noncolonization, nonintervention, nonentanglement in European politics, Freedom of the Seas, freedom of commerce—and to set them deep in the soil of the Western Hemisphere." Adams is treated as a highly skilled statesman who took advantage of European wars and revolutions to advance the position of the United States as the predominant continental American power. The last 23 years of Adams' long life, as President of the United States and in the House of Representatives, are the subject of the author's John Quincy Adams and the Union (no. 3300), which has much of interest for diplomatic history although less exclusively concerned with it.

3530. Benton, Elbert J. International law and diplomacy of the Spanish-American War. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1908. 300 p. (The Albert Shaw lectures on diplomatic history, 1907) 8–9495 E723.B47

After 17 years of quiet, in 1895 an insurrection, largely organized by exiled leaders in New York City, broke out in Cuba in protest against arbitrary Spanish rule and heavy taxation, very little of which was spent for Cuba's benefit. Spain reacted with drastic measures of repression, and for two and a half years the United States Government wrestled with the problem of maintaining an official neutrality while the sympathies of a majority of its citizens were warmly and sometimes actively on the side of the insurgents. Of the 71 expeditions in aid of the Cubans fitted out during this period, 33 were halted by Federal authorities. Both Spain and the United States were sufficiently exasperated when the destruction of the Maine in Havana harbor led to immediate intervention and war in an area where many neutrals had important interests. The author is scrupulously fair to the Spanish authorities, and is largely concerned with a critical review of American neutrality, warmaking, and treatment of neutrals in the light of the international law of the day. The two final chapters are concerned with the conclusion and implementation of the treaty of peace.

3531. Darling, Arthur Burr. Our rising empire, 1763–1803. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1940. 595 p. 40–9340 E301.D23

Bibliography: p. [555]–565.

In spite of the dates on the title page, this book really begins with independence in 1776, and constitutes a history of the most critical quarter-century in American foreign relations. Based on primary sources throughout, it is a work of the highest concentration and condensation, and incorporates few facts which it does not seek to interpret. The major, although not the exclusive theme, is the destiny of the Mississippi Valley, for the possession of which the new nation had as many as three rivals: Spain, France, and Great Britain. The detailed narrative is largely confined to our relations with those three powers. The culmination of the period, and conclusion of the book, is the "Achievement of Empire" with the Louisiana Purchase of 1803. In it "the long quest of America's statesmen from Franklin to Jefferson, of Jay, Washington, Hamilton, Livingston, even John Adams, had come to achievement."

3532. Dulles, Foster Rhea. America's rise to world power, 1898–1954. New York, Harper, 1955. 314 p. (The New American nation series) 55–6575 E744.D8

Bibliography: p. 283–301.

"How, notwithstanding history, tradition, and emotion, Americans found themselves involved first with the fragments of the Spanish Empire in America, then in Pacific and Asiatic adventures, and finally in Europe, and how, through advance and retreat and advance they responded, is the central theme" of this book. In providing the historical background for the policies and decisions of the last half-century, the author, a professor at Ohio State University, is concerned only with those developments in foreign policy which marked the gradual and halting emergence of the United States as the leading world power.

3533. Dulles, Foster Rhea. The imperial years. New York, Crowell, 1956. 340 p. 56–7790 E183.7.D78

"Bibliographical notes": p. 314–325.

Of interest to the general reader rather than to the advanced student of American foreign relations, this book recreates the spirit, through quotations from contemporary speeches, newspapers, letters, memoirs, and documents, of the years between 1885 and 1910. This age, characterized by the author as that of America's adolescence, began during the traditionally isolationist administration of Grover Cleveland, rose to its climax during the Spanish-American War, and declined with the end of Theodore Roosevelt's second administration. This decline was the result of the failure of Theodore Roosevelt and his contemporaries to realize that America's new position as a world power meant the abandonment of the traditional foreign policy of noninvolvement, and the formulation of a "coherent global policy."

3534. Fleming, Denna Frank. The United States and world organization, 1920–1933. New York, Columbia University Press, 1938. xiv, 569 p.
38–30813 JX1975.5.U5F6

Professor Fleming of Vanderbilt University devotes this large volume, well documented, organized, and illustrated, to the years during which the United States, having decisively rejected the League of Nations and defeated the party which had sponsored it, maintained an official isolation from the Old World. He has small difficulty in demonstrating that this isolation was nominal rather than real, for after World War I the world had in fact become an economic and political unit. The consequence of its great withdrawal, therefore, was that the United States became involved in a succession of ad hoc negotiations, conferences, and cooperations, and brought forward a number of substitute means for guaranteeing the continuance of peace, instead of strengthening the central organs of international action to the point of real effectiveness. Well before 1933 world-wide economic depression and the reappearance of unchecked aggression in Manchuria pointed to the failure of these half-way measures. This work continues the author's earlier study, The United States and the League of Nations 1918–1920 (New York, Putnam, 1932. 559 p.), and has for a companion volume his The United States and the World Court (Garden City, N. Y. Doubleday, Doran, 1945. 206 p.). A briefer account of the same period from much the same viewpoint is Allan Nevins' The United States in a Chaotic World; A Chronicle of International Affairs, 1918–1933 (New Haven, Yale University Press, 1950. 252 p. The Chronicles of America series, v. 55).

3535. Hyneman, Charles S. The first American neutrality; a study of the American understanding of neutral obligations during the years 1792 to 1815. [Urbana] University of Illinois, 1934. 178 p. ([Illinois. University] Illinois studies in the social sciences. v. xx, no. 1–2)
35–27650 H31.I4, v. 20, no. 1–2
JX1412.H9

On cover: University of Illinois bulletin. vol. xxxii, no. 13.

Bibliography: p. 167–171.

A study of the legal relation of the United States toward belligerents during the wars of the French Revolution and Napoleon. This period of American neutrality marked "the transition from the era of benevolent or limited neutrality to the modern era of impartial conduct," and as such, the author believes, deserves study as a guide to the neutral obligations of the United States in any future war. The topics treated include aid to belligerent vessels, hostilities and seizures in American waters, the recruitment of American citizens, contraband trade, and the machinery for the enforcement of neutrality. The author's source material consists of diplomatic correspondence, court decisions, contemporary periodicals, and international law texts.

3536. Jordan, Donaldson, and Edwin J. Pratt. Europe and the American Civil War. With an introduction by Samuel Eliot Morison. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1931. 299 p.
31–5313 E469.8.J75

Bibliography: p. [269–290]

Part I, "England," is rewritten from a doctoral dissertation which Mr. Jordan submitted to Harvard University, and Part II, "The Continent," from a dissertation which Mr. Pratt submitted to Oxford; Prof. Morison read both and suggested their combination into a single work for the general reader. They jointly assess the part which public opinion played in determining the action of the English, French, and Spanish governments toward the American struggle. During the first two years opinion was sharply divided, and intervention was a real danger. But most pro-southerners did not want actual war, and therefore "Secretary Seward's policy of carrying a chip on his shoulder was entirely successful." Not long after the Emancipation Proclamation, liberal opinion in England, France, and Spain came out sharply on the side of the Union, and carried the indifferent majorities with it. The reintegration of the United States gave a "vast impetus" to European liberalism: it was the Parliament elected in 1865 which passed the Reform Bill of 1867 so crucial for British democracy.

3537. Langer, William L., and Sarell Everett Gleason. The challenge to isolation, 1937–1940. New York, Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1952. xv, 794 p. (Their The world crisis and American foreign policy)
51–11932 E744.L3

3538. Langer, William L., and Sarell Everett Gleason. The undeclared war, 1940–1941. New York, Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1953. xvi, 963 p. (Their The world crisis and American foreign policy)

53–7738 D748.L3

Well documented and abundant in detail, these companion volumes furnish a standard narrative of the international and diplomatic developments which preceded and precipitated United States entry into World War II. Beginning with President Roosevelt's "quarantine" speech of 1937, The Challenge to Isolation is a study of official American reactions and policies in the face of heightened Axis aggression and the stiffening resistance of Great Britain and France. The questions of Soviet alignment, Hemispheric defense, the character of American neutrality, and efforts toward a peaceful settlement occupy this volume, which closes with a consideration of the destroyers-for-bases deal with the British. The Undeclared War, 1940–1941 narrates the Axis conquest of Europe and onslaught on Russia. The United States' moves in favor of the Allies such as lend-lease are considered along with our negotiations with Japan to achieve agreement in the Pacific. In both volumes, the personal efforts of President Roosevelt to draw the United States closer to the Allies, and particularly to Great Britain, receive close attention, and he is represented as overimpressed by Congressional opposition to his foreign policy, and as lagging behind general American sentiment in his support of Great Britain and France during the first year of the war. The authors achieve a balanced presentation of American relations with all areas of the world, as well as of the political and military events which drew us into World War II.

3539. Owsley, Frank Lawrence. King Cotton diplomacy; foreign relations of the Confederate States of America. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1931. 617 p. 31–16342 E488.O85
Bibliography: p. 579–591.

The Confederacy hoped that the European need for raw cotton might be used as a means for inducing diplomatic recognition and aid during the Civil War. European intervention was regarded as a guarantee of Confederate success. England and France, being the principal maritime countries and dependent on cotton, were the chief fields of Confederate activity. The Federal blockade produced a cotton famine in Europe as early as 1862. However, Dr. Owsley maintains, the British cotton processors did not desire more cotton imports because the shortage made it possible to sell their existing stocks at a large profit. The wool, linen, munitions, steel, and shipping enjoyed a war boom. The unemployed cotton workers found work elsewhere. Britain refused to intervene, and Napoleon III was afraid to act alone.

3540. Reeves, Jesse S. American diplomacy under Tyler and Polk. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1907. 335 p. (The Albert Shaw lectures on diplomatic history, 1906) 7–39215 E396.R33

Dr. Reeves was a specialist in international law who taught for 20 years at the University of Michigan. Here he treats the years 1841–49 as a distinct diplomatic epoch in which was accomplished the final settlement of the three major boundary questions which had been outstanding since 1815 or even since 1783. The northeastern boundary, a puzzle for over half a century because of the imperfect geographical knowledge incorporated in the peace treaty of 1783, was settled by compromise in the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842. The northwestern boundary question, postponed rather than settled by the joint occupation of 1818, was concluded in the Oregon Treaty of 1846, again by a compromise line. The southwestern boundary, on the other hand, was settled by conquest, the results of which were embodied in the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, the last great step in the expansion of the United States. This book was one of the first to place a proper emphasis on the magnitude of President Polk's achievement.

3541. Seymour, Charles. American diplomacy during the World War. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1934. 417 p. (The Albert Shaw lectures on diplomatic history, 1933. The Walter Hines Page School of International Relations)
34–11641 D619.S43
"Bibliographical note": p. 401–408.

Restricted to a study of American policy toward the European belligerents, this work centers around President Wilson who determined that policy in all its main aspects. The author, now president emeritus of Yale, asserts that Wilson held the United States apart from embattled Europe as long as practicable, but was "forced by the intolerable conditions of neutrality to bring America into the war and to promote a plan of international organization for peace." The ideals and the personal appeal of Wilson are viewed as determinative of the peace settlement of Versailles and of the League of Nations. His personal contacts with diplomats and other leaders on both sides make up the core of the work. Comments of men such as Colonel House, Count Bernstorff, and others who negotiated for or with Wilson, are used to substantiate the well documented text.

3542. Updyke, Frank A. The diplomacy of the War of 1812. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1915. 494 p. (The Albert Shaw lectures on diplomatic history, 1914) 15–10499 E358.U66

Very formal diplomatic history, of which less than a quarter is devoted to the antecedents of the war, and more than three quarters to the efforts at peacemaking. The causes of the war are located in the British practice of impressing seamen from American vessels, and the British interference with American vessels trading to the Continent of Europe; on the second score French policy was equally high-handed, but America's "suffering at the hands of Great Britain was so much greater that she was warranted in declaring war upon that country alone." The negotiations at Ghent, which went on for the better part of four months, are narrated in great detail. Final chapters are on the complications which arose in executing some of the treaty's provisions, and on the Convention of 1818 and other acts in settlement of questions left open by the treaty; the question of the Newfoundland fisheries, indeed, is pursued as late as 1912.

Aiii. PERSONAL RECORDS

3543. Acheson, Dean G. The pattern of responsibility; edited by McGeorge Bundy from the record of Secretary of State Dean Acheson. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. xxi, 309 p.
51–8864 E744.A217

A collection of speeches and statements (1949–51) selected by Professor (now Dean) McGeorge Bundy of Harvard University. The purpose was to provide an objective basis upon which to judge Mr. Acheson's performance as Secretary of State. "I am bound to say that I think it very hard indeed to square the record of man and policy with most of the charges that have been made," Dean Bundy states.

3544. Byrnes, James Francis. Speaking frankly. New York, Harper, 1947. 324 p.
47–1175 D815.B9

A discussion of the Yalta and Potsdam Conferences, at which he was present, and of various conferences of foreign ministers during his term as President Truman's first Secretary of State, 1945–47. The author believes that the details of postwar negotiations should be public property. He reproduces various high-level conversations at Yalta from his shorthand notes. Mr. Byrnes believes that Russian expansionist aims have been virtually the same since the Nazi-Soviet pact of 1939.

3545. Grew, Joseph Clark. Turbulent era; a diplomatic record of forty years, 1904–1945. Edited by Walter Johnson, assisted by Nancy Harvison Hooker. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. 2 v. (xxvi, 1560 p.) 52–5262 E748.G835A3

The earlier parts of this work are principally composed of excerpts from the author's manuscript diary. The first volume chronicles Mr. Grew's diplomatic career from 1904 to the completion of his first term as Under Secretary of State in 1927. The second volume is concerned with his service as Ambassador to Turkey (1927–32) and Japan (1932–41); and as Under Secretary of State again (1944–45). Since the diary notes were used as the basis of his Ten Years in Japan, a more formal narrative of his mission, written by him in 1941, has been used here. The final sections are based on documents and reminiscences.

3546. Hull, Cordell. The memoirs of Cordell Hull. New York, Macmillan, 1948. 2 v. (1804 p.) 48–6761 E748.H93A3

The author was President Roosevelt's Secretary of State from 1933 to 1944. The book was written with the assistance of Andrew H. Berding, currently Assistant Director of the U. S. Information Agency, from the author's dictated remarks. After a brief relation of his early life in Tennessee and 23 years in Congress, the author concentrates on his term as Secretary of State. Topics treated include the recognition of the U. S. S. R., the reciprocal trade agreements policy, South American relations, American attitudes toward international organization, and Japanese and German aggression. Most of the second volume is devoted to World War II.

3547. Stimson, Henry L., and McGeorge Bundy. On active service in peace and war. New York, Harper, 1948. xxii, 698 p.
48–6427 E748.S883A3

McGeorge Bundy, while still a Junior Fellow of Harvard University, prepared this book, which is in the third person, from Mr. Stimson's diary and other papers, and in constant contact with Mr. Stimson. Stimson (1867–1950) was Secretary of War from 1911 to 1913 and again from 1940 to 1945, Governor General of the Philippines from 1928 to 1929, and Secretary of State from 1929 to 1933. Of greatest interest to the student of international affairs are his service as Secretary of State, when his determined opposition to Japanese claim on Manchuria marked him as one of the earliest advocates of collective action against aggression, and his second term as Secretary of War. During the latter, Mr. Stimson assisted in the making of many military decisions, including the opening up of the second front and the use of the atomic bomb, which profoundly affected wartime and postwar relations with our allies, and observed, at first hand, the conduct of our foreign affairs by virtue of his high and responsible office.

3548. Vandenberg, Arthur H. The private papers of Senator Vandenberg, edited by Arthur H.

Vandenberg, Jr., with the collaboration of Joe Alex Morris. Boston, Houghton Mifflin, 1952. xxii, 599 p. 52–5248 E813.V3

A biographical narrative based upon liberal quotation from the Senator's diary, letters, and speeches covering the years from 1939 to 1951, with major emphasis on the period following 1941. The main theme is the Senator's conversion from isolationism to Congressional leadership of the movement to increase United States participation in international organizations and politics. A long-time Republican member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Vandenberg (1884–1951) played a major role in effecting the passage of such foreign policy legislation as the ratification of the Charter of the United Nations, the Marshall Plan, and American participation in NATO. An advocate of bipartisan support of administration foreign policy, he was a delegate to the San Francisco Conference of 1945, the first and second sessions of the United Nations General Assembly, and the 1946 Paris Conference of Foreign Ministers.

3549. Welles, Sumner. Seven decisions that shaped history. New York, Harper, 1951. xviii, 236 p. 51–10044 D748.W4

Sumner Welles, a specialist in Latin-American affairs who served as Assistant Secretary of State from 1933 to 1937 and as Undersecretary from 1937 to 1943, here defends the foreign policy of Franklin D. Roosevelt, as well as his knowledge and skill in international affairs and the sincerity of his democratic purposes, against their numerous postwar critics. He incidentally justifies his own role on several occasions, particularly at the Rio Conference of 1942, when, in order to avert a breach with Argentina and Chile, he appealed to the President over the head of Secretary Hull, who cuts a poor figure in this volume. Two major errors of Roosevelt's administration, the failure to declare against Hitler and to "quarantine" Japan, were forced upon Roosevelt against his best judgment. However, the failure to force Stalin to agree to a postwar settlement while Russia was heavily depending upon American assistance was Roosevelt's own, and is here attributed to his distrust of career Foreign Service men. There is also criticism of various foreign policies of the Truman administration, especially the abandonment of Chiang Kai-Shek.

Aiv. THE BRITISH EMPIRE

3550. Adams, Ephraim Douglass. Great Britain and the American Civil War. London, New York, Longmans, Green, 1925. 2 v. 25–11786 E469.A25

"Primarily a study in British history in the belief that the American drama had a world significance, and peculiarly a British one." The unresolved struggle in England for democratic institutions is seen as influencing the attitude of the British territorial aristocracy toward the egalitarian tendencies of the North. The British ruling classes doubted whether the American Government could long endure, but the British people sympathized with its aims. For the latter, America was "fighting the battle of democracy."

3551. Allen, Harry C. Great Britain and the United States; a history of Anglo-American relations (1783–1952) New York, St. Martin's Press, 1955. 1024 p. maps. 55–7753 E183.8.G7A47

Bibliography: p. 984–998.

After a two-hundred page discussion of the economic, social, political, cultural, emotional, and diplomatic relations of the British and American peoples, the history of the relationship is analyzed in detail in three periods: 1775–1821, 1821–98, and 1898–1952. The final period is regarded as that in which the United States, emerging as a world power, became aware of a common interest with Britain. The whole period of American national history, however, is seen as one of persistent progress from mistrust to cordiality, and also of increasing American preponderance. The author, a Fellow of Lincoln College, Oxford, disclaims having written a work of original research, but as a believer in "the necessity for cordial Anglo-American relations," has thoroughly digested the large literature of printed sources and secondary works.

3552. Brebner, John Bartlet. North Atlantic triangle; the interplay of Canada, the United States and Great Britain. New Haven, Yale University Press for the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Division of Economics and History, 1945. xxii, 385 p. maps. ([The relations of Canada and the United States; a series of studies prepared under the direction of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Division of Economics and History.]) A45–1973 E183.8.C2B74

"Appendix: bibliographical notes": p. [329]–341.

The 25th and final volume in this very important series, which was published from 1936 to 1945, and covers relations in the realms of population, settlement, the several spheres of economics, international law, and public opinion as well as in diplomacy. Prof. Brebner's book, although the most general in scope, "is not a summary of the volumes in the Series in which it appears. During the past ten years its main outlines have been used as a partial framework, or blueprint, for that Series." Like the series, it traces the relationship from the days of Samuel de Champlain on the levels of physiography, population movements, economic development, and politics and diplomacy. Its central theme is Canadian nationhood, which the Dominion has successfully asserted against the Empire of which it remains a part, and against the Republic which is its overshadowing neighbor. But, as the author shows, these and all related developments can be understood only within the larger picture of Anglo-American relations, in which Canadian interests have only too frequently been relegated to a poor third place.

3553. Burt, Alfred L. The United States, Great Britain and British North America from the Revolution to the establishment of peace after the War of 1812. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1940. 448 p. maps. (The relations of Canada and the United States [a series of studies prepared under the direction of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace, Division of Economics and History]) 40–29766 E183.8.G7B9

This trenchantly written volume covers the period of conflict on the northern frontier of the United States against the background of general Anglo-American relations, in abundant but not excessive detail. The points at issue in each of the major disputes that arose, and especially in boundary disputes, are isolated with a rare clarity. John Jay is given a double credit for the treaty of 1794 which destroyed his popularity: not only did it put off further conflict for two decades, but it "inaugurated the modern use of the judicial process in international affairs." Professor Burt deliberately challenges the theory that the land-hunger of the New West was the major cause of the War of 1812; he finds it rather in the cumulative exasperation of the American Government at the British refusal to come to any accommodation, even of a face-saving kind, on American maritime rights; save for the utter military unpreparedness, war would probably have come a year earlier. The Treaty of Ghent was only the initial step in a series of negotiations in which "the strong will to peace that prevailed in Washington and London made itself felt," and transformed "what was little more than a truce into a lasting peace."

3554. Dunning, William Archibald. The British Empire and the United States; a review of their relations during the century of peace following the Treaty of Ghent. With an introd. by the Right Honourable Viscount Bryce, O. M., and a pref. by Nicholas Murray Butler. New York, Scribner, 1914. xl, 381 p. 14–18567 E183.8.G7D9

A thoroughly digested review of relations between the United States, Great Britain, and Canada. Specific topics treated include Canadian boundary disputes, Newfoundland fisheries, the right of search and African anti-slave patrol, British commentators on the United States, British policy concerning Texas, the Mexican War, the Civil War, and the Spanish-American War, British and American Latin-American policy, Alaska, Canadian internal affairs, the Venezuela dispute of 1895, and Irish home rule.

3555. Keenleyside, Hugh Llewellyn, and Gerald S. Brown. Canada and the United States; some aspects of their historical relations. Rev. and enl. ed. New York, Knopf, 1952. xxvi, 406, xii p. 51–13225 E183.8.C2K3 1952

The original edition of 1929 "was the first published attempt at a comprehensive review of the history of the contacts between these two North American neighbors," and was much esteemed as a lucid narrative of essentials for the general reader. The new edition not only adds the events of the 1930's and 40's, but incorporates the new information on earlier periods made available by the series on the relations of Canada and the United States (nos. 3552, 3553) as well as in the writings of individual scholars. The turbulent period of the Revolution and the War of 1812 has been followed by over 140 years of peace on an unfortified frontier, but the authors' chapters following the Peace of Ghent are entitled "Moments of Crisis," "Major Boundary Disputes," "Minor Boundary Disputes," and "The Fisheries Controversy." They are concerned to make the point, in view of these and the persistence of annexationist sentiment in the United States, that the maintenance of peace since 1815 has not been an easy or automatic matter, but a true achievement of good sense in the conduct of international affairs by the two peoples.

3556. Levi, Werner. American-Australian relations. Minneapolis, University of Minnesota Press, 1947. 184 p. 47–1789 E183.8.A8L4

Bibliography: p. 174–180.

Early commerce, American whaling and sealing in the South Pacific, the California and Australian gold rushes, 19th-century imperialism, and the two world wars are treated. The rise of the United States as a predominant power in the Pacific was paralleled by the rise of Australia as another Pacific power, with major and sometimes conflicting interests.

3557. Roberts, Henry L., and Paul A. Wilson. Britain and the United States: problems in cooperation, a joint report prepared by Henry L. Roberts, rapporteur, a study group, Council on Foreign Relations, New York, and Paul A. Wilson, rapporteur, study group, Royal Institute of International Affairs, London. New York, Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1953. xvii, 253 p. 53–9066 E183.8.G7R68

A consideration of problems of most concern to the two nations during the period January 1951 to June 1952, as discussed by a joint study group of the Council on Foreign Relations and the Royal Institute of International Affairs. Topics considered are: relations with the Soviet bloc, the United Nations and collective security, economic policy, rearmament, global military problems, the political, economic, and military organization of Western Europe, and strategic problems in the Mediterranean, Middle East, and Far East.

3558. Soulsby, Hugh G. The right of search and the slave trade in Anglo-American relations, 1814–1862. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1933. 185 p. (The Johns Hopkins University studies in historical and political science, ser. LI, no. 2)
33–29624 H31.J6, ser. 51, no. 2
JX5268.S6 1933

Bibliography: p. 177–181.

The African slave trade, which had been declared illegal by both the United States and Great Britain, was prolonged far into the 19th century because of diplomatic disagreement over the freedom of the seas, and because southerners regarded agreement on an antislave patrol as a preliminary to assault on slavery in the United States. By declaring the trade in slaves to be piracy, the two governments overcame the issue of freedom of the seas, but it was not until the Civil War that an effective patrol could be set up.

3559. Williams, Mary Wilhelmine. Anglo-American Isthmian diplomacy, 1815–1915. [Baltimore, The Lord Baltimore Press, 1916] 356 p. (Prize essays of the American Historical Association, 1914) 16–14677 JX1398.W5 1916a

Thesis (Ph.D.—Leland Stanford Junior University, 1914)

Bibliography: p. 331–345.

Unravels the protracted Anglo-American disputes over the British occupation of parts of British Honduras, the Bay Islands, and the Mosquito Coast of Honduras and Nicaragua, and over a projected Isthmian canal connecting the Caribbean with the Pacific. The various settlements made in the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty of 1850 and the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 are discussed. As cordiality between the two countries increased, the British ceased their efforts to counter American influence in Central America.

Av. RUSSIA

3560. Bailey, Thomas A. America faces Russia; Russian-American relations from early times to our day. Ithaca, Cornell University Press, 1950. 375 p. 50–10009 E183.8.R9B3

Bibliography: p. 357–368.

The author offers "a broad survey of Russian-American relations from earliest contacts to recent times," emphasizing American public opinion and diplomatic attitudes. Common distrust of England, he thinks, lay behind the 19th-century "friendship" of Russia and the United States. About half the book is devoted to the present century. Attitudes toward Russian claims on the Pacific Northwest, the visit of the Russian fleet to America during the Polish crisis of 1863, the anti-Jewish pogroms of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the Russo-Japanese War, the Russian revolutions of 1905 and 1917, and the Soviet regime are discussed.

3561. Barghoorn, Frederick Charles. The Soviet image of the United States; a study in distortion. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. xviii, 297 p. 50–10897 DK69.B3

Half title: Institute of International Studies, Yale University.

The author served as press attaché in the American Embassy in Moscow, 1942–47. He regards Soviet propaganda against the United States as a major instrument of Russia's "aggressive foreign policy." His work studies the doctrine, opinions, and attitudes of the Soviet leadership as manifested in propaganda reaching the Russian people in the form of speeches, journalism, and literature, in which postwar American foreign and atomic policy, attitudes on war and peace, and the American domestic scene are interpreted. During his residence in the Soviet Union, the United States was first pictured as an ally, for whom there was only limited sympathy, and then as a rival not to be feared. In the Soviet propaganda image since the war, Americans become the slaves of capitalist exploitation, and American foreign policy essentially deceitful and aggressive. One chapter discusses the author's personal contacts with Soviet citizens and concludes that there is still a reservoir of good feeling toward the United States.

3562. Dennett, Raymond, and Joseph E. Johnson, eds. Negotiating with the Russians. [Boston] World Peace Foundation, 1951. 310 p.
51–8287 DK69.D4

CONTENTS.—Negotiating on military assistance, 1943–1945, by J. R. Deane.—Negotiating under lend-lease, 1942–1945, by J. N. Hazard.—Negotiating the Nuremberg trial agreements, 1945, by S. S. Alderman.—Negotiating at Bretton Woods, 1944, by R. F. Mikesell.—Negotiating to establish the Far Eastern Commission, 1945, by G. H. Blakeslee.—Negotiating on refugees and displaced persons, 1946, by E. F. Penrose.—Negotiating on the Balkans, 1945–1947, by M. Ethridge and C. E. Black.—Negotiating on atomic energy, 1946–1947, by F. Osborn.—Negotiating on cultural exchange, 1947, by E. J. Simmons.—Some Soviet techniques of negotiation, by P. E. Mosely.

Ten experts discuss their experiences in negotiations with Russia during the war years and after. Although each presents his own point of view, the common experience was that the Soviet negotiators were uniformly suspicious, even during periods of supposed cooperation, and without authority to depart from previously chosen positions. However, this did not preclude sudden changes in Russian policy, which were defended with equal tenacity although sometimes contradicting previous positions.

3563. Dulles, Foster Rhea. The road to Teheran; the story of Russia and America, 1781–1943. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1944. 279 p. A44–531 E183.8.R9D8

"Bibliographical notes": p. 263–268.

The author is a professor of history at Ohio State University. Despite periods of marked friction, Russian-American relations were generally friendly throughout the whole period 1781–1943. Common rivalry with Great Britain in the 19th century, the challenge of Germany and Japan in the 20th, and a love of peace are seen as factors drawing the two peoples together, and ideological antagonism as a contrary influence. The isolationism of the United States and Russia is represented as a precipitating cause of World War II. The Axis attack drew them together once more.

3564. Laserson, Max M. The American impact on Russia, diplomatic and ideological, 1784–1917. New York, Macmillan, 1950. 441 p. 50–12185 E183.8.R9L35

About half the book is devoted to the period up to the American Civil War. American influence is discovered in the writings of Radishchev, the relations of Alexander I with Jefferson and J. Q. Adams, the Decembrist revolt of 1825, and Turgenev's anti-slavery attitude. The unfriendly attitude of Palmerston and Napoleon III toward the two countries tended to draw them together during the Civil War period. The writings of Herzen and Chernyshevski are examined for American allusions, and the influence of the writings of Henry George and George Kennan is discussed.

3565. Smith, Walter Bedell. My three years in Moscow. Philadelphia, Lippincott, 1950. 346 p. 49–50332 E183.8.R9S6

The author, our Ambassador to Russia during 1946–49, offers a personal narrative, stressing his impressions and experiences with Russians on both a high and low level. After discussing Molotov, Stalin, and their entourage, General Smith comments on Soviet diplomats, police state methods, economics, and propaganda; Titoism; the 1947 Moscow Conference; the Berlin blockade of 1948; and Russian religion and culture. He found the Soviet Union a land overshadowed by tyranny and poverty, the Soviet Government bent on world domination, and the American legation a conscientious group carrying on under serious difficulties.

3566. Sorokin, Pitirim A. Russia and the United States. 2d ed. London, Stevens, 1950. 213 p. (The Library of world affairs, no. 15) 52–1631 E183.8.R9S7 1950

"Published under the auspices of the London Institute of World Affairs."

The author is professor of sociology at Harvard University. After an academic, journalistic, and political career in Russia, he was condemned to death by the Soviet Government, but was allowed to emigrate to the United States in 1923. Like other commentators, he remarks on the unique period of unbroken peace between the United States and Russia. The vital interests of the two countries, he holds, have never conflicted. The continental position of both nations, their frontier experiences, and their ethnic diversity are seen as similar factors in development. The author believes that an "essential sociocultural similarity or congeniality" exists, and "presages still closer co-operation in the future."

3567. Stettinius, Edward R. Roosevelt and the Russians; the Yalta Conference; edited by Walter Johnson. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1949. xvi, 367 p. 49–10915 D734.C7S8

A defense of the Roosevelt policy at the Yalta Conference of February 1945. The author was Secretary of State during Roosevelt's last months, 1944–45. Mr. Stettinius, who died just as this book was being published, denied that vital interests of the United States and the free world were sacrificed at Yalta. "It is not Yalta that is the trouble with the world today, but subsequent failures to adhere to the policies Yalta stood for and to carry out agreements that were reached there." Yalta, he maintained, represented not appeasement but an attempt to set the world on the road to lasting peace.

3568. Tompkins, Pauline. American-Russian relations in the Far East. New York, Macmillan, 1949. xiv, 426 p. 49–48919 DS518.T62

"Undertaken initially in fulfillment of a requirement for the degree of doctor of philosophy [Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy, 1948]."

Bibliography: p. 398–413.

The emphasis here is upon relations since 1917. American participation in the allied intervention in Siberia, 1918–20, is regarded as an act of political expediency, directed primarily at Japan. Other topics treated are the Washington Conference of 1921–22, the Japanese attack on China, and American policy toward Japan and Korea during World War II, as it affected Soviet relations. The author states that the 19th-century "friendship" of America and Russia was a byproduct of practical politics. With American intervention in the Pacific and growing cooperation with Great Britain, antagonism has increased. Dr. Tompkins regards the balance of power theory of world politics as certain to bring disaster at a time when the alternative is to unite or perish.

Avi. OTHER EUROPEAN NATIONS

3569. Chadwick, French Ensor. The relations of the United States and Spain, diplomacy. New York, Scribner, 1909. 610 p. 9–31968 E183.8.S7C4

The author sees the Spanish-American War as the culmination of a long racial and cultural conflict. The deterioration of Spanish rule in Cuba is ascribed to Spain's failure to establish democratic institutions in the homeland. About half of the book is devoted to the diplomacy of the American Revolution, boundary problems, and the American attitude toward the independence movement in Latin America; the second half to the Cuban question in American politics and diplomacy.

3570. Clay, Lucius D. Decision in Germany. Garden City, N. Y., Doubleday, 1950. xiv, 522 p. 50–5813 DD257.C55

General Clay served as Deputy Military Governor, 1945–47, and as Military Governor, 1947–49; his book is rather impersonal and official in manner. The period was characterized by disagreement with Russia over German policy, culminating in the attempt of the Russians to drive the allies out of Berlin and the decision to establish a West German federal government. The author regards the unity of Germany as essential to European peace, for "no lasting stability may be expected as long as 65,000,000 persons in the heart of Europe are divided against their will."

3571. Fogdall, Soren J. M. P. Danish-American diplomacy, 1776–1920. Iowa City, The University, 1922. 171 p. (University of Iowa studies in the social sciences, v. 8, no. 2) 22–27280 H31.I8, v. 8, no. 2 JX1428.S3F6

Bibliography: p. 159–165.

Principal emphasis is placed on maritime rights, such as the rights of American men of war in the Revolution, and the right to be free of dues for transit of the Sound into the Baltic, which Denmark continued to collect until 1857. The failure to buy the Danish West Indies in 1867, and their subsequent purchase in 1916 are discussed.

3572. Hayes, Carlton J. H. The United States and Spain: an interpretation. New York, Sheed & Ward, 1951. 198 p. 51–13793 E183.8.S7H3

"Select bibliography": p. 193–198.

The author, professor emeritus of history at Columbia University, served as Ambassador to Spain during 1942–45, and related his experiences in Wartime Mission in Spain, 1942–1945 (New York, Macmillan, 1945. 313 p.). This book is based on a series of lectures delivered at the College of the Holy Cross, Worcester, Mass. Old misunderstandings and prejudices are represented as having disrupted after the early 1890's the good feeling which generally prevailed through the 19th century. The author discusses misconceptions about Spain, contrasting political traditions, the Spanish Republic of 1931, the Civil War of 1936–39, and relations with Spain since 1939. General Franco, he is convinced, was never taken in by Hitler and was never a catspaw for the Axis. He maintains that Spain and Hispanic America are essential to the Atlantic community.

3573. Reitzel, William. The Mediterranean: its role in America's foreign policy. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1948. 195 p. 48–7273 D843.R4

Issued by Yale Institute of International Studies.

"References": p. [187]–189.

American official interest in the Mediterranean is here interpreted as principally a byproduct of World War II. In the author's judgment, "the key aim of an American policy for the Mediterranean will be to maintain its internal stability in order to be free to use it as a strategic unit." British interest in the area, it is pointed out, is more closely related to imperial interests, causing a basic divergence in point of view.

Avii. LATIN AMERICA: GENERAL

3574. Bemis, Samuel Flagg. The Latin American policy of the United States, an historical interpretation. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1943. xiv, 470 p. 43–51167 F1418.B4

Half-title: Institute of International Studies, Yale University.

Aims to provide in one volume a historical interpretation of Latin American policy since the beginning of the Republic. American policy, it is asserted, has been based upon the Nation's independence under a republican government, its continental expansion, and the security requirements of the resultant continental republic. "These fundamentals naturally favored independence for the whole New World, republican self-government for the new states, opposition to European intervention in their affairs . . . and political solidarity of the nations of the New World." The last part of the book is devoted to the "good neighbor" policy of Franklin D. Roosevelt, which the author regards as an attempt to base United States policy on the concept of hemisphere security rather than the security of the United States alone. The narrative is brought down to the Rio de Janeiro Conference of January 1942.

3575. Gantenbein, James W., ed. The evolution of our Latin-American policy, a documentary record. New York, Columbia University Press, 1950. xxvii, 979 p. 49–50406 F1418.G2

A collection of documents, largely drawn from U. S. Government publications, which go back as far as 1796 but mostly belong to the 20th century. They are arranged under six principal headings: "General Principles," "The Monroe Doctrine," "Independence of Cuba," "The Panama Canal Concession," "Certain Controversies with Mexico," and "Interventions in Nicaragua, Haiti, and the Dominican Republic." Appendixes are concerned with selected documents of successive Pan American conferences and with other international agreements, in all but one of which the United States participated.

3576. Guerrant, Edward O. Roosevelt's good neighbor policy. Albuquerque, University of New Mexico Press, 1950. 235 p. (Publication of the School of Inter-American Affairs, the University of New Mexico. Inter-American studies, 5) 50–5678 F1418.G93

Bibliography: p. 215–225.

In the estimation of Professor Guerrant, "the United States has never had a foreign policy toward any area that was more successful than the Good Neighbor Policy was from 1933 to 1945." That policy is here analyzed in five topical chapters: "Abandonment of Intervention," "Recognition of New Government," "Quest for Law," "Expanding Commerce," and "Cultural and Scientific Relations." Two concluding chapters narrate relevant events during the crisis years of 1939–41, and during World War II. Non-intervention, the author suggests, has been "criticized by liberal elements in those nations which were oppressed by tyrannical governments." After the death of President Roosevelt the efforts of the American Government to cultivate the good will of Latin America rather suddenly slackened.

3577. Perkins, Dexter. A history of the Monroe doctrine. [Rev. ed.] Boston, Little, Brown, 1955. xiv, 462 p. 55–10752 JX1425.P384 1955

Bibliography: p. [420]–435.

This work was originally published in 1941 under the title Hands Off, and continued as well as summarized the author's detailed studies contained in three works of distinguished scholarship: The Monroe Doctrine, 1823–1826 (Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1932. 280 p.); The Monroe Doctrine, 1826–1867 (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1933. 580 p.); and The Monroe Doctrine, 1867–1907 (Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1937. 480 p.). "In the field of politics," the author believed, "there are few more unqualified faiths than the faith of the American people in the Monroe Doctrine . . . There are few subjects, too, with regard to which it has been necessary to clear away so many misapprehensions." To this end he produced, for the general reader, his one-volume history of the Doctrine. While the background of this "prohibition on the part of the United States against the extension of European influence and power to the New World" included the conception of the two spheres, the separation of the New World from the Old, it never was intended to bar the way "to American diplomatic or physical action in other parts of the globe." British and French diplomacy in Texas, French intervention in Mexico, the Spanish reoccupation of Santo Domingo, the Venezuela-British Guiana boundary dispute, Isthmian Canal diplomacy, and American intervention in the Caribbean are among the episodes described. The new edition covers developments from 1941 to 1954, and, against those who regard the Doctrine as outmoded, contends that "the physical integrity of the cisatlantic area, and its protection against subversion, will continue to be a matter of concern."

3578. Stuart, Graham H. Latin America and the United States. 5th ed. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1955. 493 p. 55–5020 F1418.S933 1955

"Supplementary readings" at end of chapters.

This textbook, whose first edition goes back to 1922, aims "to give a brief and accurate survey of the diplomatic and commercial relations between the United States and those Latin-American countries with which our interests have been most closely related." After four preliminary chapters on Pan Americanism, the development of coöperation by conference, and the Monroe Doctrine, the course of United States interests and negotiations is traced in successive areas: Panama, Mexico, Cuba, the Caribbean, Central America, Argentina, Chile, and Brazil. This 5th edition seeks to indicate the changes brought about by the Good Neighbor policy, which inaugurated a new era in the Latin American relations of the United States. "The Western Hemisphere has set up the Golden Rule as its goal for the relations between states. Justice and fair dealing no longer end at the national frontiers."

3579. Whitaker, Arthur Preston. The United States and the independence of Latin America, 1800–1830. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1941. xx, 632 p. (The Albert Shaw lectures on diplomatic history, 1938. The Walter Hines Page School of International Relations)
41–18981 F1418.W6

"Bibliographical note": p. 603–612.

These lectures analyze in considerable detail United States policy as affected by Napoleon's victory in Spain in 1808, the attitude of the despotic powers in Europe after 1815, and the British policy toward Latin America. The "Black Legend" of Spanish cruelty, despotism, and duplicity had created a widespread prejudice which included the Latin Americans. Nevertheless, for both commercial and ideological reasons, the United States favored the establishment of independent republican regimes. In issuing the Monroe Doctrine, President Monroe "counted upon his very threat of war to forestall actual war," and to bluff the French "government into abandoning any plan it might have for intervening in America." Its novelty and its continuing importance both lay in the fact that it gave official sanction to "a special policy towards Latin America which was based on different principles from the policy of the United States toward the rest of the world."

Aviii. LATIN AMERICA: INDIVIDUAL NATIONS

3580. Evans, Henry Clay. Chile and its relations with the United States. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1927. 243 p.
27–9852 E183.8.C4E93

Bibliography: p. [221]–234.

A Columbia University dissertation which reviews the relations of the United States with Chile from 1812 through the close of 1926. Conspicuous episodes are the Spanish seizure of the Chincha Islands in 1864; the 10-year War of the Pacific, in which the United States prevented any European mediation but failed in its own; the attack on the Baltimore's crewmen in Valparaiso in 1891, producing "the nearest approach to a war that the United States has ever had with a South American nation"; Chile's refusal to break with Germany during World War I; and the failure of American arbitration during the earlier stages of the Tacna-Arica dispute. "Possibly no better field could be chosen to illustrate the difficulties that beset the path of American diplomats when they attempt to assert a leadership for their own country in its relations with the sensitive and proud people of smaller nations."

3581. Fitzgibbon, Russell H. Cuba and the United States, 1900–1935. Menasha, Wis., Banta Pub. Co., 1935. 311 p. 35–9034 F1787.F56

Bibliography: p. [278].

The appointment of General Leonard Wood as Governor in 1900 is taken as the starting point. The establishment of the Cuban Republic, the intervention of 1906–9, the Gomez, Menocal, Zayas, and Machado regimes, Cuban sugar and American tariff policy, American subscriptions to Cuban loans, and the abrogation of the Platt Amendment are among the subjects discussed. The author aims neither to defend nor attack American interventionism, but merely to present a "unified, objective, and scientific study."

3582. Hill, Lawrence F. Diplomatic relations between the United States and Brazil. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1932. 322 p.
32–18335 E183.8.B7H56

Bibliography: p. 306–316.

A historical narrative covering the period 1807–1930, with emphasis upon the 19th century. Attention is focused on the degree of neutrality practiced by each nation in the course of the international and civil wars and insurrections in which each was involved from the War of 1812 to World War I. Mr. Hill also examines commercial relations, the consequences of the abolition of the slave trade, the emigration of Confederate exiles following the Civil War, and Brazil's change from empire to republic in 1889.

3583. McCain, William D. The United States and the Republic of Panama. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1937. xv, 278 p.
37–2897 F1566.M24

Bibliography: p. 255–267.

A study of the intervention of the United States in Panama and its subsequent effect upon diplomatic relations with the Panamanian Republic. The author narrates in detail various disputes with the United States over the government of the Canal Zone and the internal affairs of Panama, involving such problems as the threat of revolution, the relations of American soldiers with local residents, expropriation of Panama territory for Canal purposes, interference in Panama road and railroad construction, and the renegotiation of treaty arrangements in the administrations of Coolidge and Franklin Roosevelt.

3584. Montague, Ludwell Lee. Haiti and the United States, 1714–1938. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1940. xiv, 308 p.
40–11470 E183.8.H2M6

Thesis (Ph. D.)—Duke University, 1935.
"Bibliography of works cited": p. 293–302.

It is maintained that since 1800 the United States has recognized that it has a vital strategic interest in the Caribbean and has not hesitated to defend it, on occasion even by military intervention in Haiti and the Dominican Republic. The book surveys the course of relations since the establishment of Haitian independence, discussing the American fear of a slave revolt, projects to colonize freed American slaves in Haiti, the recognition of Haiti by Lincoln, annexationist sentiment, American desire for a naval base, commercial penetration, the interventionist "corollary" of Theodore Roosevelt to the Monroe Doctrine, dollar diplomacy, Marine occupation, and the Good Neighbor policy.

3585. Parks, E. Taylor. Colombia and the United States, 1765–1934. Durham, N. C., Duke University Press, 1935. xx, 554 p.
35–25823 E183.8.C7P37

Bibliography: p. 492–529.

This substantial volume opens by narrating the early history of Colombia, which originally included Ecuador, Venezuela, and Panama. The United States recognized Colombian independence in 1822, but relations were not put on a solid footing until the treaty of 1846, negotiated at Bogotá by Benjamin A. Bidlack. It guaranteed Colombian sovereignty in the Isthmus of Panama and remained an important factor in the Canal question down to the Panama Revolution of 1903. Dr. Parks subjects some of the arguments whereby President Theodore Roosevelt justified his support of that revolution to severe criticism. The Wilson administration's attempt to indemnify Colombia with 25 million dollars went unratified by the Senate until 1921, when the desire of American business interests to develop Colombian oil and other natural resources powerfully reinforced the desire for a rapprochement with the disgruntled Republic.

3586. Rippy, James Fred. The United States and Mexico. Rev. ed. New York, Crofts, 1931. 423 p.
31–18162 E183.8.M6R7 1931

Bibliography: p. 387–396.

Two-thirds of the book is devoted to the period before 1900, with especial attention to the diplomacy of the Mexican War period and after. The expansionist program of President Buchanan in 1857 and French intervention in Mexico during the Civil War are discussed. The Pershing expedition against Villa and the diplomacy of Dwight W. Morrow are covered. American policy is represented as motivated by varying sentiments, sometimes aggressive, sometimes idealistic.

3587. Tansill, Charles Callan. The United States and Santo Domingo, 1798–1873; a chapter in Caribbean diplomacy. Baltimore, Johns Hopkins Press, 1938. 487 p.
38–32982 E183.8.D6T3

At head of title: The Walter Hines Page School of International Relations, the Johns Hopkins University.

The subject is relations with both Haiti and the Republic of Santo Domingo in the period covered, with principal emphasis on the latter. The southern fear of a slave revolt in imitation of the events of 1791, war between Haiti and the Dominican Republic, and the expansionist policy of President Grant are considered, as well as various efforts to obtain naval bases on the island or to forestall their establishment by other nations. The author is professor of diplomatic history at Georgetown University, Washington, D. C.

Aix. ASIA

3588. Agwani, Mohammed Shafi. The United States and the Arab world, 1945–1952. Aligarh, Institute of Islamic Studies, Muslim University, 1955. 184, ix p.
57–15226 DS63.2.U5A65 1955

This thesis submitted to the University of Utrecht offers a detailed critique of America's conduct toward the Arab States since the war. The author believes that American prestige, laboriously built up over the years by the efforts of American missionaries and educators, and confirmed by Wilsonian idealism, has recently been shattered by the United States' support of Zionism and of Israel, of reactionary native governments, and of the interests of British and French imperialism.

3589. Ballantine, Joseph W. Formosa, a problem for United States foreign policy. Washington, Brookings Institution, 1952. 218 p.
53–5824 DS895.F75B27

After a brief discussion of Formosa under Chinese and Japanese rule, post-World War II developments and the problems posed for American foreign policy in Formosa are examined. Topics covered are: the neutralization of Formosa by the United States fleet, American economic and military aid, Formosa as a stake in the international struggle for power, and the Japanese peace treaty of 1952. Formosa having been kept in friendly hands, the problems now are how far the claims of the Nationalist government to rule the mainland should be countenanced, whether the Communist government should be recognized, and to what extent the United States may count on its allies for support in its Formosan policy. The stated purpose of the book is not so much to find answers as to assemble and arrange the facts necessary for decision. The author was Director of the Office of Far Eastern Affairs of the Department of State, 1944–45.

3590. Battistini, Lawrence H. Japan and America, from earliest times to the present. With 5 maps. New York, J. Day, 1954. 198 p. (An Asia book) 54–5881 E183.8.J3B3 1954

A rapid survey of diplomatic relations which reserves the greater part of its space for the war of 1941 and its causes, and the occupation and rehabilitation of Japan. The reaction in American occupation policy as the Communist menace became apparent and the necessity of restoring Japan to full economic self-sufficiency are stressed. A more analytical treatment of current problems will be found in a symposium sponsored by the Institute of Pacific Relations of Hawaii, Japan and America Today (Stanford, Calif., Stanford University Press, 1953. 166 p.).

3591. Battistini, Lawrence H. The United States and Asia. New York, Praeger, 1955. 370 p. maps. (Books that matter) 55–11534 DS518.8.B35 1955a

Bibliography: p. 345–351.

Introduces the lay reader and the student to the development of our relations with the Pacific area as well as with Asia. From 1784 to the Spanish-American War (1898) our interest in Asia and the Pacific was essentially commercial, and accordingly United States policy in the area supported equality of trading rights and the maintenance of the sovereignty of Japan and China. The establishment of America as a Pacific power in 1898 forced the United States into active military and political participation in the Far East at a time when we maintained our isolation from the affairs of Europe. Relations with China were always friendly, but it was not until World War II that this interest manifested itself in the form of aid and advice to stop first the Japanese, and then the Chinese Communists. The author shows how the United States originally encouraged the rise of Japan, but after 1907 worked to contain that Japanese expansion, which at last challenged our Pacific position in the 1940's, to its own undoing. After summarizing our relations with Asian nationalism and the new Southeast Asian nations, the author concludes that we should assume the permanence of their nationhood, and afford them an example of the highest political morality in order to encourage them to resist Communist encroachment.

3592. Dulles, Foster Rhea. China and America; the story of their relations since 1784. Princeton, N. J., Princeton University Press, 1946. 277 p. A46–14 E183.8.C5D8

Bibliography: p. 263–267.

A survey for the general reader, half of which is concerned with Chinese-American relations before 1900. Mr. Dulles stresses the American dream of China as a vast market for American exports. He demonstrates that while the United States has always talked of friendship with China, in times of crisis, such as the Manchurian affair of 1931, it has merely sent diplomatic protests in order to protect our commercial interests, and then stood aside while events have taken their course. The Taiping rebellion, our Chinese exclusion laws, the Boxer rebellion, World War I, the Washington Conference of 1921, Chinese nationalism, the spread of Japanese aggression, and World War II are considered in their effect on our relations with China. The apathy and ignorance of the American public, and their failure to support government leaders who are better informed, are blamed by Mr. Dulles for our failure to act constructively in behalf of China throughout the history of our mutual relations.

3593. Feis, Herbert. The China tangle; the American effort in China from Pearl Harbor to the Marshall mission. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1953. 445 p. maps. 53–10142 E183.8.C5F4

An uncontroversial attempt to clarify the policy of the United States toward China during the period of hostilities with Japan and immediately after. The author regards our China policy as a "tale of crumpled hopes and plans that went awry," the reason being that the war in the Pacific ended abruptly before our effort in behalf of China reached its planned fullness. The military demobilization at the end of 1945 revealed a desire to renounce the burdens thrust upon us. The narrative is built about the rivalry of the Chinese Communists and Nationalists in the face of Japanese aggression, the Chinese-Russian agreement of 1945, the Hurley mission, and the Russian and Chinese Communist occupation of Manchuria.

3594. Griswold, Alfred Whitney. The Far Eastern policy of the United States. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1938. 530 p.
38–29014 DS518.8.G75

At head of half-title: Institute of International Studies, Yale University.

Bibliography: p. 503–517.

Various events in the period 1898–1938 are discussed as they reflected American policy: the annexation of the Philippines, the "Open Door" notes of John Hay, the failure of "dollar diplomacy," recognition of a special Japanese interest in China in the ambiguous Lansing-Ishii agreement of 1917, the question of the German Pacific Islands after World War I, the consolidation of the status quo in the Washington treaties, Oriental exclusion as a diplomatic and political issue, the efforts of Secretary of State Stimson to apply sanctions against Japan, and the Roosevelt policy toward Japanese aggression in China.

3595. Grunder, Garel A., and William E. Livezey. The Philippines and the United States. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1951. 315 p.
51–6997 DS685.G75

Bibliography: p. 286–305.

A study in the origin and evolution of United States policy toward the Philippines during the past half century. Special attention is given to economic relationships, the evolution of political institutions, and the independence question. The defeat of the Spanish fleet in Manila Bay, 1898, annexation and pacification, tariff problems, the problem of ecclesiastical lands, the Moros, the Jones Act of 1916, Governor-Generals Leonard Wood and Henry L. Stimson, the Commonwealth period, Japanese occupation; and reconstruction and independence are discussed. The importance of the islands as collaborators in the Far Eastern policy of the United States is stressed.

3596. Latourette, Kenneth S. The American record in the Far East, 1945–1951. New York, Macmillan, 1952. 208 p. 52–12394 DS518.8.L26

"Issued under the auspices of the American Institute of Pacific Relations."

The author's theme is the "ever deepening entanglement" of the United States in the affairs of the region, which he explains as the result of the historic westward movement of the American people. Despite the confusion of American aims in Asia, he maintains that an American policy exists, namely: sympathy for the attempt of the peoples of Asia to achieve their goals and ambitions; containment of Communism, by force if necessary, but also by financial, technical, and educational aid; support of the United Nations; maintenance of military bases; and subordination of Asiatic to European affairs in overall foreign policy. The American policy in China, where the Communists gained the principal benefit of the American defeat of Japan, was a failure; its success in other areas is only tentative. The author, who has a missionary background, regards the true struggle as ideological. Although he does not believe that democracy in the American sense is now possible in China, he condemns Chinese Communism as a perversion of the Western Christian tradition and a totalitarian creed.

3597. Oliver, Robert T. Why war came in Korea. New York, Fordham University Press; D. X. McMullen Co., distributors, 1950. xxvi, 260 p.
50–9923 DS917.O4

The strategic importance of Korea, the military buildup of North Korea, the military weakness of South Korea, the withdrawal of American troops, the inference that the United States would not defend Korea, and the danger to Soviet propaganda of a successful democratic regime in South Korea are adduced as reasons why war came. The author has been an adviser of Syngman Rhee.

B. Foreign Relations

Bi. ADMINISTRATION

3598. Brookings Institution, Washington, D. C. International Studies Group. The administration of foreign affairs and overseas operation; a report prepared for the Bureau of the Budget, Executive Office of the President. Washington, 1951. xxv, 380 p. 51–61182 JX1705.B7

The study is intended to supplement the researches of the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch (Hoover Commission). New problems in the postwar world are considered: the administration of foreign economic aid, military considerations affecting foreign affairs, the need for program coordination in the conduct of foreign affairs, and problems of personnel management. Issues are objectively stated, the arguments on both sides presented, and possible solutions suggested.

3599. Childs, James Rives. American foreign service; with a foreword by Joseph C. Grew. New York, Holt, 1948. 261 p.
48–5092 JX1705.C45

3600. U. S. Dept. of State. Secretary of State's Public Committee on Personnel. Toward a stronger Foreign Service; report. [Washington, U. S. Govt. Print. Off.] 1954. 70 p. ([U. S.] Dept. of State Publication 5458. Department and Foreign Service series, 36) SD54–7 JK851.A435

The first title is an introduction by a career diplomat to the organization and work of the Foreign Service as governed by the sweeping Foreign Service Act of 1946, which is printed as Appendix A (p. 157–211). Initial chapters trace the evolution of the Service since 1789, and describe its career aspects, including the qualifications it demands. Its relations to other parts of the Department of State, and to other agencies of the U. S. Government, are considered. The Paris Embassy, the "showcase of the Diplomatic Service" with its 600 staff members (30 times the number in 1912), is then chosen for a case study and exhibited in operation at various levels: the ambassador, the administrative units, and the four main sections: political, consular, economic, and information and cultural relations. Appendix B offers comparative data on the British and French foreign services. Toward a Stronger Foreign Service is the work of a committee of prominent educators and business men which recommended integrating the Foreign Service with Department personnel and liberalizing and expanding recruitment policies, so that American representation abroad would be more adequate to our leading role in world affairs. Tables and charts supplement the background information of this study of the Foreign Service and its personnel. The Committee chairman, Henry M. Wriston, in his Diplomacy in a Democracy (New York, Harper, 1956. 115 p.), stresses the importance of a Foreign Service composed of experts, whose pivotal role is preserving peace by maintaining the American alliance system and containing the aggressions of potential enemies.

3601. Hunt, Gaillard. The Department of State of the United States; its history and functions. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1914. 459 p. 14–14205 JK853.H8
"Bibliographical note": p. [438]–439.

3602. Stuart, Graham H. The Department of State; a history of its organization, procedure, and personnel. New York, Macmillan, 1949. 517 p. 49–11378 JK853.S84

These two works are both administrative histories of the Department of State; they supplement each other admirably, and the older of the two is by no means obsolete. Gaillard Hunt (1862–1924) served for many years in responsible posts in the Department and produced the first version of his work for use at the Chicago World's Fair of 1893. It is particularly useful for the antecedents of the Department, the Continental Congress' Committee for Foreign Affairs, and the Confederation's Department of Foreign Affairs, and for the multiple functions, in addition to the conduct of foreign relations, which were imposed upon the Department of State after its organization in 1789. At various times the State Department had competence in a variety of domestic concerns, such as patents, copyrights, census returns, the territories of the United States, the custody of historic documents, etc., which are now handled by specialized agencies; this book is the most convenient source of information for such activities. Professor Stuart, on the other hand, is almost exclusively concerned with the foreign affairs function, as the Department itself has been in the more recent period. He traces the organization, procedures, and personnel concerned in this function in a chronological treatment of the terms of successive secretaries of state from Thomas Jefferson (1790–93) to George C. Marshall (1947–49); his midway point falls in the administration of William Jennings Bryan (1913–15). "Policy problems are discussed only where they are vitally connected with, or illustrative of, the methods employed by the Department officials in the performance of their duties."

3603. Kent, Sherman. Strategic intelligence for American world policy. Princeton, Princeton University Press, 1949. 226 p.
49–8503 JF1525.I6K4

The author, formerly professor of history at Yale University, has been associated with the Office of Strategic Services, the State Department, the National War College, and the Central Intelligence Agency. He defines intelligence as "the knowledge which our highly placed civilian and military men must have to safeguard the national welfare." He analyzes it into knowledge of three main kinds: basic descriptive, current reportorial, and speculative-evaluative. It takes an organization to produce such knowledge, and Part II deals with the organizational and administrative problems of central and departmental intelligence. Part III considers the activities required to produce intelligence, such as surveillance and research. The author is convinced that the integrity and objectivity of intelligence can be preserved only if the producers are kept administratively separate from the consumers. Roger Hilsman's Strategic Intelligence and National Decisions (Glencoe, Ill., Free Press, 1956. 187 p.) is an attempt to ascertain the doctrines concerning their functions and responsibilities that prevail inside and out of the national intelligence agencies, and to compare and criticize them in the interest of a greater interpenetration of knowledge and action. The research agencies, he believes, should "be thinking in terms of real problems and of the alternatives to meet these problems."

3604. McCamy, James L. The administration of American foreign affairs. New York, Knopf, 1950. xiii, 364, x p.
50–8595 JK853.M28 1950

The United States is here seen as lagging in the efficient organization of its foreign affairs agencies. The Department of State is criticized for its diffusion of activities, with "consequent confusion of total policy" and inadequate staff. The foreign affairs responsibilities of the President are not effectively coordinated, outside the work of the Bureau of the Budget, the National Security Council, and various other advisory bodies. The organization and use of information are criticized. Congress is seen as unable to fulfill its responsibility of devoting the necessary time and thought to the formulation of policy, and as failing to appropriate sufficient funds for the conduct of foreign relations.

3605. Snyder, Richard C., and Edgar S. Furniss. American foreign policy: formulation, principles, and programs. New York, Rinehart, 1954. 864 p. 54–9560 JX1416.S55

"Selected bibliography" at end of chapters.

A systematic introduction to the problems encountered by American foreign policy in our day, which are of so altered a character since 1939 that the authors speak of "the revolution in American foreign policy." The historical introduction takes its departure from 1898. The bulk of the text is in two parts, one on structure and processes of policy making, and the other on postwar politics in various spheres and areas. Attention is called to the multiplicity of agencies and voices in the American "decision-making process." Economic and ideological foreign policy receive separate treatment. In both Europe and the Far East, the "falsity of American wartime estimates" of capacities and intentions receives much of the blame for subsequent difficulties.

3606. Stuart, Graham H. American diplomatic and consular practice. 2d ed. New York, Appleton-Century-Crofts, 1952. 477 p.
52–13689 JX1705.S75 1952

Bibliography: p. 453–460.

A historical and functional study of the administrative practices of the Department of State and the United States Foreign Service. The organization of the Department, the Foreign Service, diplomatic duties, rights, and immunities, consular organization and practices, and a history of a representative embassy and consulate abroad (Paris) are among the subjects included. Lists of former secretaries of state and diplomatic representatives at various important posts are appended.

3607. Thomson, Charles A. H. Overseas information service of the United States Government. Washington, Brookings Institution, 1948. 397 p. 48–28231 E744.T5

An administrative history of various official services of the United States Government, 1941–48. The wartime operations of the Office of War Information are covered in detail. Since the Smith-Mundt Act, under which most of the Government's later information activities have been carried on, was not passed until 1948, the book is of slight value for the period since its publication. The final fourth of the book is devoted to a discussion of Government information policies.

3608. Woodrow Wilson Foundation. Study Group, 1950–51. United States foreign policy: its organization and control; report. William Yandell Elliott, chairman. Pref. by Harry D. Gideonse. New York, Columbia University Press, 1952. xviii, 288 p.
52–14095 JX1416.W63 1950/51

The report of a study group whose object was to stimulate academic interest in the theory and practice of United States foreign policy, and to select general problems of theoretical and practical significance for future study. The American system of politics by pressure and adjustment, it is maintained, has come under a new influence: its effect on foreign relations. Naiveté about human nature, the problem of national survival, the overemphasis on economic factors, and the necessity of combining morality with power are among the subjects discussed. The effect of the constitutional separation of powers on foreign policy is analyzed, and some changes making for greater efficiency are proposed.

Bii. DEMOCRATIC CONTROL

3609. Almond, Gabriel A. The American people and foreign policy. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 269 p. 50–6254 E744.A47

Half title: Institute of International Studies, Yale University.

An attempt to place American foreign policy in its psychological and sociological context. The author considers complex questions of foreign policy as being frequently beyond the comprehension of non-specialists, and states that the function of the public under a democratic regime is to set up certain policy criteria in the form of widely held values and expectations and judge the results of foreign policy thereby. What is needed, he concludes, is to inform and moderate the views of the leadership of the various interest groups which influence public opinion. Mr. Almond thinks that our professional idealism is particularly out of touch with moral and historical realities, and that it is unduly influential upon the attitudes of women and young people.

3610. Cheever, Daniel S., and Henry Field Haviland. American foreign policy and the separation of powers. Cambridge, Harvard University Press, 1952. 244 p. 52–5390 JK570.C45

The authors regard the relationship between the executive and legislative branches of government as the weakest and most critical link in the process of making our foreign policy. The present period is one of unprecedented difficulty, requiring extraordinary presidential powers, a consistency difficult to attain when our institutions encourage conflict between the President and Congress over foreign policy, and rapid decision. The book consists principally of a historical survey of relations between Congress and the President in the realm of foreign affairs, with special attention to the larger problems that have arisen since World War II. Various means of establishing cooperation through improved administrative techniques are suggested. Organizational adjustments must be accompanied by "a far stronger spirit of mutual trust between the two branches." Failure to achieve this, it is maintained, will be at the expense of American interests and prestige.

3611. Dahl, Robert A. Congress and foreign policy. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1950. 305 p. 50–8588 JK1081.D32

Half title: Institute of International Studies, Yale University.

According to Mr. Dahl, the traditional role of Congress in the process of foreign policy formulation, that of mediator between the preferences of the citizenry and the realities of international affairs as interpreted by executive proposals, is now made obsolete by the need for quick decisions. He discusses alternate solutions to the problem, which a democracy must solve in order to survive. An increased competence of the electorate in international affairs is desirable, but neither readily obtainable nor able to assert itself without adequate policy-making processes. The President's responsibility could go on expanding until it excluded Congress from any concern with foreign policy. The level of Congressional competence should be raised through more and better use of experts on committee staffs, and by establishing some agency to advise and assist Congress on policy alternatives. Collaboration between the executive and Congressional foreign policy specialists requires Congressional confidence in executive policy decisions, as is the case in Great Britain. Volume 289 of The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science is entitled Congress and Foreign Relations (Philadelphia, 1953. 245 p.) and provides, in a group of informed articles, basic information on the processes of Congressional foreign policy functions and legislative-executive relations.

3612. Dangerfield, Royden J. In defense of the Senate; a study in treaty making. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1933. xvii, 365 p. diagrs. (1 fold.) 33–3594 JK1170.D3

Bibliography: p. [353]–357.

The effect of the constitutional requirement that treaties obtain a two-thirds majority in the U. S. Senate is discussed on the basis of 832 treaties signed before 1928. The treaties which have led to violent controversy have been relatively few but of great importance. The history of the treaty-making power, the development of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and cases of the amendment or obstruction of treaties are considered. The treaties studied are tabulated and classified in the appendix.

3613. Graebner, Norman A. The new isolationism; a study in politics and foreign policy since 1950. New York, Ronald Press, 1956. 289 p. 56–11573 E835.G7

The "new isolationists," in the author's view, continue an unrealistic attitude toward foreign policy which grew up in the 19th century when America's swift successes were made possible by the British Navy and the European balance of power. The continuing illusion of American invincibility has led, in recent foreign relations, to an attitude rather than a policy of "unilateral action aimed at utopian moral goals." Soon after the election of 1948 the isolationists asserted themselves in and out of Congress and blamed the frustrations of our foreign policy upon "incompetence and even betrayal by successive administrations." The Truman and Eisenhower administrations have both come to terms with their critics by relying less upon negotiation, and more upon an inflexible attitude based upon military force, almost to the exclusion of diplomacy. The rest of the Free World has no stomach for a policy of liberation which must keep all on the brink of war, and would like to meet the altered Russian attitude since the death of Stalin with genuine negotiation, especially in the economic sphere. The author calls for "a flexible and imaginative [American] policy geared to a world that can find no alternative to coexistence."

3614. Kirk, Grayson L. The study of international relations in American colleges and universities. New York, Council on Foreign Relations, 1947. 113 p. 47-5856 JX1293.U6K5

The author, at the time of publication professor of international relations, is now president of Columbia University. The book represents his reactions to a series of six regional conferences on teaching and research in international relations sponsored by the Council on Foreign Relations in 1946. The question of whether international relations should remain a subdivision of political science or become a separate discipline is taken up. Problems in undergraduate, graduate, and postdoctoral training and research are surveyed, and constructive suggestions made. Chapter 3 on graduate training reviews the types of professional career to which it may lead, and urges the rigorous selection of candidates by the universities which provide it.

3615. Markel, Lester. Public opinion and foreign policy, by Lester Markel and [others.] New York, Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1949. 227 p. 49-1714 E744.M355

CONTENTS.—Introduction: Opinion, a neglected instrument, by Lester Markel.—Foreign policy and opinion at home: Dark areas of ignorance, by Martin Kriesberg. The number one voice, by James Reston. The mirror called Congress, by Cabell Phillips. When the big guns speak, by H. W. Baldwin. More than diplomacy, by W. P. Davison.—Foreign policy and opinions abroad: Chart of the cold war, by Shepard Stone. Voices of America, by W. P. Davison. Assignment for the press, by C. D. Jackson. Two vital case histories, by Arnaldo Cortesi and "Observer."—Conclusion: Opportunity or disaster? By Lester Markel.

A cooperative project of the Council on Foreign Relations which had for chairman the Sunday editor of The New York Times. It is held that Americans have failed to give public opinion "the emphasis and direction it must have if it is to be the vital instrument we need." As a result, it is alleged, American foreign policy is understood neither at home nor abroad. Prejudice and lack of interest are presented as among the reasons why many Americans view foreign affairs with indifference. In their effort to present American policies and motives in a fair light, our agencies of information have to contend, not only with an unscrupulous Communist counter-propaganda, but with European stereotypes of American luxury and cultural vacuity.

3616. Westerfield, Bradford. Foreign policy and party politics: Pearl Harbor to Korea, by Holt Bradford Westerfield. New Haven, Yale University Press, 1955. 448 p. 55-5990 E806.W455

Bibliography: p. 429-435.

Congressional reaction to administration foreign policy is examined statistically through its voting record, descriptively by party organization for foreign policy control and historically as manifested by the role of the parties in American foreign relations from World War II to the outbreak of the Korean War. The author contends that the problem of adequate democratic control of foreign policy may be resolved through partisanship, bipartisanship, or extrapartisanship. In the latter, a term coined by the author, the administration seeks to remove important foreign policy decisions from the presidential election by securing support outside party lines from influential opposition leaders, and by relying upon party discipline within its own party.

Biii. POLICIES

3617. American Foundation for Political Education. Readings in American foreign policy, edited by Robert A. Goldwin. 4th ed. Chicago, 1955. 3 v. maps. 55-4447 E183.7.A55 1955

CONTENTS.—v. 1. Foreign Affairs in the American democracy. Growth and expansion. The United States and Europe. The United States and Latin America.—v. 2. The United States and the Far East. Some war aims in World War II. From "containment" to "retaliation."—v. 3. Present problems of American foreign policy. Some alternatives to present foreign policy. What principles guide American policy?

These volumes are intended to accompany a discussion program in American foreign policy sponsored by this Foundation for promoting "a more rational approach to politics." The selections, from contemporary books, articles, speeches, and public documents, are chosen to present alternative viewpoints on problems of foreign policy, and to provide the reader with a framework of facts sufficient to enable him to form his own judgment on past and present policies.

3618. Baldwin, Hanson W. The price of power. New York, Published for the Council on Foreign Relations by Harper, 1948. 361 p. 48-6182 E744.B2

Bibliography: p. 329-333.

677676 O-63-29

An attempt to discover the effect of the technical and political revolution growing out of World War II on the strategic position of the United States. The possible effect upon American democracy of the necessity to protect the American continent from attack is regarded as a key problem. The author considers a prodemocratic attitude more important to American defense than mere fear of Russia. Foreign policy must rest on aroused public opinion, not on predominance of the military in American counsels. Military, economic, strategic, intelligence, research, and human problems are discussed.

3619. Barber, Hollis W. Foreign policies of the United States. New York, Dryden Press, 1953. 614 p. 53–8259 E183.7.B34

The outstanding problems of American foreign policy in 1953 are outlined historically in this college textbook. After a definition of American foreign policy as determined by Congress and the administration, and as executed by the Department of State and the Foreign Service, the Cold War is treated in a discussion of American political and economic relations with the USSR and Western Europe. Secondly, attention is focused upon hemispheric relations within the Inter-American system and upon our relations with each nation in that system. There follows a summary of American relations with China and Japan. Finally there is a lengthy outline of America's role in the United Nations.

3620. Burnham, James. Containment or liberation? An inquiry into the aims of United States foreign policy. New York, J. Day, 1953. 256 p. 52–12682 E744.B858

The author criticizes the policy enunciated by George Kennan in 1947, which he identifies as a policy of containment of Soviet Russia, as (1) ignoring Marxist ideology predicting an inevitable conflict between socialism and capitalism; (2) placing the United States at a disadvantage by adopting a purely defensive policy; (3) ignoring the fact that communism cannot be sealed off behind a definable border; (4) leaving vanquished peoples at the mercy of Communists; (5) lacking in moral appeal. He maintains that by consolidating the victories they have already obtained, the Communists will have won world domination. The author does not consider ideological considerations important, but nevertheless advocates an ideological campaign against communism. An extreme statement, which neglects ways and means, and is often unfair to the proponents of other views.

3621. Davis, Elmer Holmes. Two minutes till midnight. Indianapolis, Bobbs-Merrill, 1955. 207 p. 55–6823 E835.D38

The author, wartime Director of the Office of War Information, is a news analyst of long standing. In this work he considers the threat of mass destruction in the form of the hydrogen bomb and its fallout to the world as a whole and to the United States in particular. Time, he is convinced, is rapidly running out for the United States as the leading power in weapons of mass destruction. Although, at the time of the author's writing, the United States was gaining the upper hand in Europe, the Soviet Union was winning out in Asia, and this, the author thought, was the beginning of a course of victories which would ultimately compel the United States to wage war upon the Soviet Union and its growing body of satellites.

3622. Dulles, John Foster. War or peace. New York, Macmillan, 1950. 274 p. 50–7251 E744.D85

The author was an originator of the bipartisan foreign policy, and has been since 1953 Secretary of State. Here he regards an eventual war as probable, unless by "positive and well-directed efforts" it is fended off. The author frequently quotes from Stalin's Problems of Leninism, which he considers an authoritative guide to Soviet intentions. He puts his faith in the moral and religious sense of humanity, world organization, and constant vigilance. He declines to rely on materialism or militarism.

3623. Finletter, Thomas K. Power and policy; U. S. foreign policy and military power in the hydrogen age. New York, Harcourt, Brace, 1954. 408 p. 54–11328 E835.F5

A powerfully argued view of the consequences of the twin menaces, atomic fission and Russian aggression, for American foreign policy. Since the possibility of a devastating sneak attack will always be present, the primary aim of military policy must be decisive air-atomic superiority, and that of foreign policy a state of enforced universal peace and disarmament, as the only tolerable way out of present dangers. Recent American policies in both spheres are criticized as inconsistent half-measures.

3624. Fischer, John. Master plan U. S. A., an informal report on America's foreign policy and the men who make it. New York, Harper, 1951. 253 p. 51–13525 E744.F55

An exposition of the foreign policy of the Truman administration, which is treated as consistently formulated and comparatively stable. As developed by the National Security Council, it is regarded as an attempt to "contain" Russia, through building up situations of strength in Europe and other potential danger points, and as aimed at the preservation of peace by making the consequences of aggression unattractive. China is not regarded as permanently hostile as long as the chance of "Titoism" exists. Technical assistance is regarded as a means of bringing about revolutionary changes favorable to the West.

3625. Kennan, George F. American diplomacy, 1900–1950. Chicago, University of Chicago Press, 1951. 146 p. (Charles R. Walgreen Foundation lectures) 51–12883 E744.K3

The author was the first director of the Policy Planning Staff of the State Department, 1947, a member of the Institute for Advanced Study, Princeton University, 1950–1952, and Ambassador to Russia, 1952–1953. These Walgreen lectures, dealing with the relation of American diplomacy to two world wars, are followed by two articles on Soviet-American relations originally printed in Foreign Affairs. The fifty years under consideration saw the United States move from a detached neutrality to leadership in international affairs. Mr. Kennan shows that during that period American foreign policy has normally been guided by a "legalistic-moralistic" approach to international relations. However, involvement in two global wars and in a cold war with the Soviet Union indicates that the conduct of other nations cannot usefully be judged as good or bad, nor as subject to the Anglo-Saxon concept of individual law. Our recent experiences with the Soviet Union have shown that American policy must be flexible enough to engage in war or political attrition, while continuing to build up the world's confidence in our spiritual and moral integrity.

3626. Morgenthau, Hans J. In defense of the national interest; a critical examination of American foreign policy. New York, Knopf, 1951. xii, 283, viii p. 51–11217 E744.M68

An enlarged version of the author's Walgreen Foundation lectures delivered at the University of Chicago in the spring of 1950. American foreign policy, he maintains, can have only one aim: the preservation of the national security at all costs. However, we have been guilty of confusing the national interest with moral principles too often unrelated to political realities, even though the principles themselves are above reproach. Foreign relations must be conducted according to Hobbes' dictum that there is no law or morality outside of the state, and the national interest must be considered solely in terms of advantages to be gained and risks to be avoided. The morality of foreign policy decisions must not be debated, but only their efficacy in preserving our security. At the time of publication, the author believed that the vital objective of American foreign policy in Europe and Asia was the restoration, by means short of war, of the immediate post-World War II balance of power, i. e., the dislodgement of the Soviet Union from the areas it had brought under control since 1945.

3627. Mowrer, Edgar A. The nightmare of American foreign policy. New York, Knopf, 1948. viii, 283, xxii p. 48–9096 E744.M75

The author, a journalist of wide experience, believes that President Roosevelt's policy of representing Soviet Russia as a democracy and failing to publicize Soviet diplomatic demands was an error. He does not believe that the USSR can be contained by the present system of sovereign states or by the United Nations as presently organized. He favors a grand alliance supplemented by regional Atlantic, Middle Eastern, Far Eastern, and European alliances.

3628. Osgood, Robert Endicott. Ideals and self-interest in America's foreign relations; the great transformation of the twentieth century. [Chicago] University of Chicago Press, 1953. 491 p. 53–10532 E744.O77

A revision of the author's thesis, Harvard University.

The author argues that from the time of the Spanish-American War to World War II the United States failed to make a mature adjustment to its international environment, because it let ideals predominate and "failed, as a whole, to understand or act upon a realistic view of international relations." Alfred T. Mahan and Theodore Roosevelt are treated as realists whose imperialistic opinions discredited realism and encouraged isolationism following the American commitment in world affairs. A realistic balance between ideals and national self interest is advocated as essential. The disillusionment of the 1920's and the insecurity of the 30's and 40's are regarded as having been favorable to a realistic approach, although they were not realism itself.

3629. Reinhardt, George C. American strategy in the atomic age. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1955. 236 p. 55–6363 UA23.R44

This book is a sequel to Atomic Weapons in Land Combat (Harrisburg, Pa., Military Service Pub. Co., 1953. 182 p.) written by Col. Reinhardt with Lt. Col. William R. Kintner. Col. Reinhardt, a follower of Sir Halford Mackinder's doctrine of geopolitics, finds the policy of containment an inadequate safeguard of American security. The openly conducted aggression of the Soviet Union must be opposed by a new policy which will exert direct pressure upon the aggressor. The United States must mass an overwhelmingly strong military force overseas which will directly threaten the Soviet Heartland. Once this is established, the United States must mobilize the non-Communist world in a coalition guided by the specific ideology of "co-operation—activity shared for mutual benefit"—whose purpose is to defeat Soviet communism rather than merely to counter it.

3630. Reitzel, William, Morton A. Kaplan, and Constance G. Coblenz. United States foreign policy, 1945–1955. Washington, Brookings Institution, 1956. 535 p. maps, diagrs.
56–11440 E813.R4

Bibliography: p. 485–511.

This survey, by members of the staff of the Brookings Institution, examines the position of the United States in the light of recent foreign policy decisions. In analyzing the effect of taking one course of action rather than another, the authors have divided the work into four parts. Part I reviews foreign policy goals determined during 1946–47. Part II assesses key decisions made as United States policy toward Russia developed from 1947 to 1950. Part III discusses the decision to meet aggression with collective force, which has shaped United States policy since 1950. Part IV discusses the effect of this decision on the position of the United States in the international system of 1956, suggests methods for review of current foreign policy, and outlines action which may be taken in the future. The annotated bibliography is of value to students of international affairs.

3631. Summers, Robert E., ed. The United States and international organizations. New York, Wilson, 1952. 194 p. (The Reference shelf, v. 24, no. 5)
52–10267 JX1417.S8

Like the other volumes in this series, this small reference work is designed to provide a factual and analytical, though not exhaustive, background for the high school debater. Approximately 50 articles, speeches, and extracts from documents have been assembled on the general question of what type of international organization the United States should support. The articles are grouped under such topics as the United Nations and its strengths and weaknesses, NATO, the problem of regional security, the United States and European integration, world federation, American foreign policy in 1952, and the role of the United States in international affairs. Each section is preceded by an introduction written by the editor. A bibliography is included, mainly of works not utilized in the text.

3632. Tannenbaum, Frank. The American tradition in foreign policy. Norman, University of Oklahoma Press, 1955. 178 p.
55–6364 E183.7.T35

An uncompromising reassertion of the democratic and moral bases of American foreign policy, in the light of "the doctrine of the co-ordinate state." Just as Rhode Island is of equal importance with Texas in the Union, so all states are of equal dignity in international relations, which must therefore be guided into an institutional and federal pattern. The importance of the ideal of the co-ordinate state is traced in our relationships with Latin America, the Far East, and the League of Nations. The author rejects the doctrine of Real-politik urged by Morgenthau and Kennan, and abhors the idea of dividing the world into Russian and American spheres of interest.

